Dans le cahier II, sur 68 cas, seulement 3 dépassent la centaine (n° 24 : 131; n° 44 : 130; n° 66 : 120), et un cas des Wăngatá-Ntómbá 202 (n° 12). Ces derniers font monter la dot au-dessus de 200, tout comme les Bombomba, et à l'imitation des Ekonda, qui ont réellement abusé de la liberté apportée par les Blancs. (cf. art XI, § 3.)

§ 5. Versement du wale.

Au jour convenu, le jeune homme, son père et le ndonga se rendent chez les parents de la fiancée. D'autres proches, qui ne sont pas retenus par ailleurs, ne manquent pas d'assister à cet événement remarquable. Après s'être salués de la façon usuelle, et avant toute autre chose, la famille de la femme offre au ndonga un plat de bananes et de nourriture animale (souvent botómba, ou poule, ou poisson bokósa). Ensuite elle présente au mari des vivres divers : viande ou poisson fumés (par exemple un panier), quelques régimes de bananes, puis, par l'intermédiaire du ndonga, un chien, une chèvre et des poules, qui doivent être comptés dans le nkǫmí (cf. art. VII).

Ensuite ils se demandent des nouvelles, c'est-à-dire ils vont exposer et discuter l'affaire de la dot. Si la famille de la femme n'est pas satisfaite, la discussion se prolonge, et le jeune homme ajoute le supplément exigé (généralement ils ont prévu cette éventualité et déposé chez un parent ou allié quelques valeurs supplémentaires). Parfois certains anneaux ou couteaux sont jugés inconvenables : alors on compte, par exemple, deux pour un, ou l'on remplace les objets refusés par d'autres de meilleure qualité.

Les valeurs sont déposées par le ndonga devant le groupe des parents de la femme.

La présence du fiancé et de la femme n'est pas indispensable. Aussi trouve-t-on des cas où l'un ou l'autre soit absent. Mais ces cas sont rares et sont dus à une grande difficulté de pouvoir assister, par exemple s'ils sont retenus au service d'un Européen, ou si eux-mêmes ne tiennent pas à perdre quelques journées ou semaines, alors que leurs pères respectifs s'entendent bien entre eux et qu'ainsi ils sont rassurés que tout marchera à merveille. D'ordinaire, tant eux-mêmes que leurs parents tiennent à leur présence, car il s'agit d'une affaire de grande importance.

Si le consentement de la femme n'a pas encore été publiquement donné, parce que, comme cela se présente pour un remariage après divorce, ikulá, ndanga et walo sont versés simultanément, c'est à ce moment qu'elle intervient pour cette cérémonie. Nous n'avons plus à y revenir; elle se déroule comme décrit à l'article III, § 2. Seulement, dans le cas présent, elle remet à son père un ou deux anneaux, ou un anneau plus un couteau.

Après cela, le ndonga transmet les valeurs aux parents de la femme. Il invite le mari : « yélá baúmbá bǎ walo = apporte les valeurs du walo ». Celui-ci lui répond : « Les voici, transmets-les à mon beau-père. » Le témoin prend quelques anneaux et les dépose devant ce dernier; ou plutôt, il les touche en faisant le geste de les pousser vers les parents de la femme. Ceux-ci les attirent vers eux.

Dès le versement du walo, la bompáka devient wǎlí = épouse. Comme il a été dit déjà, ce mot n'a rien à voir avec walo; ni avec le radical bal = marier, mais est en connexion étymologique avec les termes analogues employés dans d'autres langues bantoues pour femme, femina.

ARTICLE V. — VALEURS DE LA MÈRE.

Immédiatement après la transmission des valeurs du walo au père de la femme, le ndonga invite le mari au versement des valeurs de la mère : « yélá nlaa la nkando yé nyang'éy'ǫ́na = apporte la chèvre et les nkando de la mère de l'enfant. » On donne donc :

1° Au moins une chèvre, parfois deux ou davantage, selon les cas, jamais un bouc.

2° Deux nkando = spirales en cuivre qu'on porte aux jambes. Autrefois on en exigeait encore deux autres pour les bras, que l'on voit encore parfois portées par de vieilles femmes, mais qui sont devenues bien plus rares que les spirales des jambes. Ce terme de nkando est remplacé par nsongá chez les Elíngá, lés Wăngatá, Bakáala et Ionda (¹).

3° Naguère la mère avait encore droit à un bǫngęmbwá ou bǫngǫmbwá (d'après les dialectes) (²), collier massif en cuivre. Sa valeur était de cinq bakonga. Actuellement, ce genre de parure ayant presque complètement disparu, il n'est plus réclamé; la mère préfère des objets plus intéressants (cf. art. suivant).

En outre, aux temps présents, on commence à réclamer le remplacement de la chèvre et des nkando par des souliers, des habits, des tissus, etc.

La mère justifie ses exigences en invoquant les peines qu'elle a endurées à mettre sa fille au monde et à l'élever. Ces valeurs sont la propriété exclusive de la mère et de sa famille; jamais elles ne passent au clan du mari. Elle-même porte les nkando, ou, si elle en a déjà, elle les donne à sa sœur ou à son frère, qui peut en avoir besoin pour la dot de sa femme. De même elle garde les chèvres ou les donne à sa famille, d'après ses propres préférences. A sa mort, ce sont ses parents qui en héritent, jamais son mari ni même ses propres enfants.

Ce versement est donc manifestement un droit exclusif du clan maternel.

La chose ne change pas si la mère, après divorce, s'est remariée à un autre homme. Les valeurs « maternelles »

(¹) En lokonda : njękę.

(²) En lokonda : lonkaá.

continuent à lui appartenir. Même si la séparation a eu lieu avant le mariage de sa fille, elle conserve son droit de « nỵang'éy'ǫ̌na ».

Si elle était morte avant le mariage de la fille, les valeurs lui destinées par le droit sont données au représentant de son clan (son père, frère, sœur, oncle, etc.).

En cas de divorce, ces valeurs doivent, comme tout le reste, être remboursées au mari; mais le devoir en incombe au clan maternel qui les a reçues.

Si le mari n'a pas en main les valeurs destinées à la mère, il lui remet un gage de paiement (wę̌kǫ, verbe : ékya), consistant en un ou deux couteaux, ou bakonga. Jamais il ne parvient à arranger la palabre dotale sans au moins ce gage. Il s'acquittera ensuite de ses obligations, et le plus vite possible, car la plupart des belles-mères sont tellement avides de ce paiement que leur gendre tardant trop à les satisfaire, elles mettent tout en œuvre pour rompre le mariage. Et souvent elles réussissent. Devant le tribunal elles obtiendront gain de cause, à moins que leur patience n'ait été par trop courte.

ARTICLE VI. — CADEAUX OU BEÉNGO.

Après le versement de la masse de la dot au père et à la mère de la femme, tant ceux-ci que divers membres de la famille réclament au mari divers menus paiements et cadeaux, dénommés beéngo (s. boéngo). Ce substantif dérive du verbe -bénga, qui n'est employé qu'avec lui. Une forme réciproque analogue : -béngana, signifie se toucher l'un l'autre, entrer en collision. Le sens primitif de -bénga serait-il donc : attirer vers soi ? Ou les deux verbes n'auraient-ils aucune connexion étymologique ? Quoi qu'il en soit, ces termes servent également à désigner les rétributions données aux juges pour l'arrangement d'un différend.

Il existe une grande variété de beéngo; plusieurs sont propres à certains groupes et inconnus ailleurs. Les divers parents les réclament sans suivre un ordre déterminé. Mais de toute façon il faut qu'on passe par l'intermédiaire du ndonga. On lui exprime donc son désir, assez haut pour être compris de toute l'assemblée; et c'est lui qui transmet au mari la requête : « Donne tel ou tel boéngo à un tel. » Notons encore que ces beéngo ne sont pas un paiement absolument indispensable. Souvent les requêtes ne sont exécutées qu'en partie; les autres sont déboutées avec une excuse quelconque : « Beau-parent, je ne puis pas te satisfaire; je ne possède pas cet objet. » Aussi l'élaboration du contrat matrimonial n'est-elle pas entravée ni retardée par l'impossibilité de satisfaire tout le monde. Excepté pour le boéngo principal au père (1°) et parfois pour celui de la mère (2°).

Entrons un peu dans les détails des divers beéngo qu'on demande ainsi :

1° Ifaká l'akǫngá b'ìs'éy'ǫ̀na = couteau et lances du père de la fille. C'est un couteau et cinq lances (ou davantage d'après la richesse du mari). Théoriquement, le couteau doit être un efamba. En pratique on peut parfois lui substituer un empútę dans un beau fourreau en bois bien orné de « clous cuivrés ». D'autres fois on admet le remplacement du couteau et des lances par leur valeur correspondante en bakonga. Ce boéngo est considéré comme le plus important. Aussi ne renonce-t-on jamais à le réclamer. Si le gendre ne peut pas le donner à l'instant même, il s'engage à le payer plus tard, et le beau-père ne manquera pas à l'occasion de lui rappeler sa promesse. Certains exigent un wę̃kǫ. D'autres se contentent d'un bout de loasi ou d'un bosóngó (éclat ou partie de tige de palme), que le mari remet au ndonga en signe de reconnaissance de sa dette et comme preuve de sa volonté de la payer dès qu'il en aura les moyens. Certains hommes, pourtant, y tiennent si fort qu'ils n'agréent pas le walo avant d'avoir reçu ce boéngo. Ainsi, un de ces jours, Lomanga d'Ifutó (Bongíli) ne consentit pas à recevoir le walo pour sa fille Ekǫfǫ, fiancée à Bokungú w'ĭkáyá (de Bongíli, Ndǫngǫ́). Il a exigé que le père de celui-ci, Bokungú w'ĭs'éy'Ingilá, retourne d'abord chercher ce boéngo. Comme il ne trouva point les cinq lances, il les remplaça par un second couteau et un anneau de cuivre; ce qui fut accepté par le vieux Lomanga. A un court intervalle, la chose se répéta pour Bokungú de Bǫntǫlẹ (Bongíli), qui voulait payer le walo pour sa fiancée Ngẹlẹ́ de Boímbo (Bombwanja), sœur de Bǫngǫndẹ́, greffier des Bombwanja. La famille de la femme refusa de prendre la dot avant d'avoir reçu ce boéngo de ifaká l'akǫngá b'ĭs'éy'ǫ̆na.

2° Byĭkó byă nyang'éy'ǫ̆na= les porcs-épics de la mère, consistant en deux ou trois porcs-épics frais ou fumés. Ils peuvent être remplacés par des betómba, des oiseaux baatá, ou des poissons bekósa. On n'aime pas leur voir substituer des poules, parce que cette volaille est du domaine du nkǫmí. Si l'on n'a pas de quoi satisfaire à cette obligation, on donne à la mère deux anneaux de cuivre : « máká bakonga báfé yósombe byĭkó bĭkẹ́= voici deux anneaux de cuivre, va t'acheter les porcs-épics ». Actuellement, on les remplace parfois par des étoffes.

Il faut faire attention de ne pas confondre ce boéngo avec ce qu'on entend souvent : byiko byă nyang'éy'ǫ̆na, qui sont n'importe quel versement fait à la mère et englobent donc aussi bien la chèvre et les nkando que ce boéngo et d'autres. Il ne s'agit pas de byĭkó, sing. ĭkó= porc-épic, mais de byiko, sing. wiko= prix, valeur, du verbe -ika= fixer un prix.

3° Lokolé : un frère ou cousin de l'épouse réclame un konga. Il bat le gong (lokolé) pour faire du tapage et ainsi forcer le mari à le satisfaire. Cela paraît être l'origine de ce boéngo. Pratiquement on se contente de demander un cadeau. Parfois le tapage peut durer un certain temps. Mais les vieux ne permettent pas qu'on trouble l'assemblée, si le mari n'a pas précisément de quoi contenter.

4° Bakulá, ou botúwá : les frères de la femme plantent en terre un morceau de tronc de bananier (botúwá), pour que les jeunes parents du mari y lancent des flèches (bakulá), qui sont retirées par les jeunes membres de la famille de l'épouse. Actuellement, ceux-ci reçoivent parfois de l'argent, par exemple 5 francs.

5° Wambá : corde de prisonnier, c'est-à-dire une corde à laquelle, autrefois, on liait les prisonniers de guerre, deux à deux (système imité à présent pour les prisonniers de l'Administration ou de la Justice coloniales). C'était, jadis, le patriarche ou chef de famille qui réclamait un konga ou un couteau comme indemnité anticipée pour l'emprisonnement (personnel ou des membres de sa famille) qu'il aura peut-être à subir à la suite d'une guerre future, occasionnée par cette femme. Actuellement, les chefs établis par l'Administration, qui se sont vu attribuer par l'autorité européenne les droits des chefs de famille, se sont également approprié le droit à ce boéngo, qui, de ce fait, a changé complètement de signification, de destination, même de nom. On le nomme maintenant : bǫnyǫǫ́la w'ǒnkonji = chaîne du chef. Comme on le voit, ce paiement est devenu un contresens.

6° Etáka : lourde fourche de bois, attachée au cou. Il est réclamé par la mère, ou par une autre femme du père, ou par l'épouse du frère de la femme, en prévision de la torture de la fourche, qu'elles auront peut-être à supporter dans l'avenir à cause de la femme dont on paie la dot, c'est-à-dire le jour où elle abandonnera son mari et où celui-ci, pour se venger, parviendra à mettre la main sur sa mère, ou sur une des autres épouses du clan (¹).

(¹) Cfr. chap. VI, art. VII, § 4, n° 1; et chap. VIII, art. II, § 1.

7° Lǫmbę́ : large bandoulière en fourrure, ou tressée en lianes bękǫmbę (Calamus sp.), ou sa valeur (1 couteau, ou un konga). Actuellement on donne 2-3 anneaux. C'est un boéngo de la mère, en guise de rémunération pour la fatigue qu'elle a ressentie en portant et en allaitant sa fille (¹).

8° Betótswá byǎ nkwá : feuilles de l'arbuste bonkongé, employées pour enlever, essuyer et transporter (tóta) les excréments (nkwá) de l'enfant. Ce boéngo d'un anneau constitue un dédommagement des soins de la mère dans ce domaine. En l'absence de la mère, il est réclamé par une autre femme du père, ou par une parente de la mère.

9° Filet de chasse (bojángá) réclamé dans beaucoup de villages sans raison spéciale. Pourtant, certains clans qui sont en butte à la raillerie des autres, comme étant peu nombreux, réclament d'office à l'homme appartenant à un de ceux-là et qui désire épouser une de leurs filles, la livraison d'un filet, disant : « Vous vous moquez parce que nous n'avons pas de population; apportez-nous un filet de chasse pour nous entourer et nous clôturer, puisque nous ne sommes pas nombreux. » Ainsi, le village de Boyela, des Bakáala, ne cède jamais une de ses membres en mariage sans ce boéngo.

10° Wěngé w'ǎę́kę́ : boéngo qui n'est pas connu universellement, mais qui est propre à certains groupements, par exemple chez les Bakáala. Un parent de la femme prend un morceau du jeune tronc épineux de l'arbre wěngé. Il en a raclé l'extrémité qu'il tient en main et présente l'autre au mari, en disant : « Tiens-le ». L'autre, évidemment, se refuse, et se libère au moyen d'un couteau ou d'un cuivre.

(¹) Notons ici qu'à l'occasion de la mise au monde d'un enfant par sa belle-mère, le gendre lui envoie un baudrier en peau de loutre liengé ou un konga équivalent, cadeau qui ne se répète pourtant pas à chaque naissance.

11° Boéngo w'ẹ̌yau, ou des herbes, exigé par certains clans, parce que le clan du mari se moque d'eux, à cause de la quantité d'herbes et d'ivraies qu'ils laissent pousser dans leur village, au lieu de le tenir propre. On donne 1 ou 2 anneaux.

12° Engumbá : connu dans certains groupements, comme les Bakáala, où il est le dernier réclamé. C'est un boéngo d'autorité (¹) réclamé par les patriarches des familles du groupement dont est issue la femme. Il se montait autrefois à 3-5 bakonga, selon le nombre de familles ou groupes de familles ou clans alliés dans le même village. Maintenant, on paie surtout de la monnaie européenne, par exemple 50 francs. Ce boéngo est ensuite partagé entre les divers groupements parents de la famille de l'épouse.

Divers parents et parentes de la femme réclament de menus objets variés, comme : un petit couteau (iféeka), un rasoir indigène (lọtẹ́ú), une épingle à tresser les cheveux (bosóngó), une aiguille (nsọngɩ), un collier de perles bleues (bisẹngẹ́la), etc.

Actuellement, on exige encore bien d'autres objets : habits, vaisselle, etc. Ainsi, à un seul et même versement dotal j'ai entendu, un jour, réclamer :

Pour le père : un pantalon et une veste, parce que la femme, étant jeune enfant, lui a sali les habits sans se gêner;

Pour la mère : un lit, parce que fréquemment les soucis pour sa fille ont empêché son repos;

Pour une tante : un bassin, parce qu'elle a lavé l'enfant;

Pour un frère: une paire de souliers ou de pantoufles, parce que la jeune fille a coqueté avec ses chaussures à lui, etc., etc.

(¹) Engumbá est une case provisoire d'un village nouvellement installé. Ce sont les patriarches des familles qui les premiers doivent aller y résider pour engager les autres à les suivre et pour conjurer tous malheurs d'envoûtement possibles.

Tous ces beéngo sont englobés dans le montant total de la dot. Les cas échéant, ils doivent être restitués comme le reste.

A côté de ces beéngo réclamés et touchés par les parents de la femme, d'autres sont demandés par les membres de la famille du mari. Comme pour les précédents, chacun émet des prétentions selon ses désirs et sans ordre déterminé, mais toujours par l'intermédiaire du ndonga. Ce sont surtout : des fourrures de la loutre ęsǫ́fę, du singe liúka, des félides bǫnkǫ́nǫ et yę̌nyi; une pièce de gibier (singe, antilope, etc.), une natte, un pot, un filet de chasse, un sac porte-objets (bokúmbé), un collier de perles. Et, actuellement, divers objets d'introduction européenne : pièces d'habillement, tissus, casseroles, vaisselle, etc. Cette catégorie de beéngo est englobée dans le montant total du nkǫmí (cf. art. suivant). Si le nkǫmí est donné immédiatement, on y procède. Puis on rémunère le(s) ndonga, comme il a été dit ci-dessus; chaque partie lui donne au moins deux anneaux.

Enfin, le père de la femme dit au mari : « Pars toujours, nous allons réunir le nkǫmí et nous irons le porter chez toi. » Là-dessus le mari part, ou, s'il préfère attendre sa femme, il reste, pour rentrer chez lui dès que les objets du nkǫmí sont rassemblés.

ARTICLE VII. — NKOMI.

Nkǫmí est le nom porté par les objets que la famille de l'épouse donne au mari. On dit parfois aussi likǫmǫ. Les Injǫ́lǫ́ emploient likǫma; les Wǫ̌ngatá, Bakáala, Ionda et Boángí : likǫmí. Tous ces mots dérivent du même verbe -kǫma=emballer, empaqueter (1). En effet, les valeurs du nkǫmí sont généralement emballées dans des paniers, ou des bẹngọnjọ (=bẹlẹlẹ)=paniers tressés en feuilles de palmier.

---

(1) Les Boóyá disent lilǫnga, du verbe -lǫnga, même sens que -kǫma.

Certains ethnologues ont introduit l'expression douaire, dowry (1) pour désigner les biens donnés par la famille de la femme à celle du mari. En réalité, le mot « dot » serait une bien meilleure traduction, parce que correspondant mieux à la nature de ces versements. Mais ce serait bouleverser la terminologie adoptée, et il faudrait trouver un autre terme (comme paiement de mariage) pour ce qu'on entend communément par le mot « dot », qui, de toute façon, est appliqué fort malencontreusement.

D'autre part, le mot douaire, ayant déjà une signification précise et reçue, est de nature à prêter à confusion. C'est pourquoi je préfère user provisoirement d'un terme tout à fait neuf et traduire nkọmí par contre-dot (2).

Le nkọmí consiste en poules, canards (3), sel, nattes, pots, calebasses, voire, si la famille de la femme est riche, une chèvre et, autrefois, même un esclave. A présent on donne aussi des objets de fabrication européenne.

Pour se donner l'air de grand seigneur, un chef de famille particulièrement riche donnait parfois comme contre-dot des êtres humains. De préférence c'étaient des Batswá, ou, si possible, des clients (Mpámạ́), qui ne changeaient de maître que jusqu'à un certain point. En effet, dans l'intention du père, cette livraison était une glorification de sa fille, à laquelle ils devaient assistance sous forme de services divers, et dont la postérité devenait ensuite leur « propriétaire ».

Ainsi Mpumo, un des ancêtres des Boéndé (Bombwanja), avait reçu en nkọmí, d'Ikólé, père de sa femme

---

(1) Cfr. par exemple, TORDAY, dans Africa, II, n° 3, p. 279.

(2) Ce mot m'a été suggéré par M. le Procureur Général A. SOHIER.

(3) Les canards sont d'introduction plus récente : les Nkundó prétendent que leurs ancêtres n'en possédaient point et qu'ils les ont reçus de par les Ekonda. Dans la classification ils les font entrer dans le genre poule.

Lifomí, de Mbúngá (Liókó, Ekonda), l'esclave Bonkútulú, dont la descendance constitue le clan Bonkútambélá et Batsína, établi avec les Bosánjo et Bongangá (¹).

Même des biens immeubles peuvent entrer dans la composition du nkọmí. Ainsi on donne un domaine de pêche (ruisseau, crique, étang, puits), ou une partie de palmeraie (²). Comme pour le cas précédent, cela n'est le fait que d'un chef de famille très riche. S'il n'est pas propriétaire exclusif (ce que, pratiquement, il ne peut être que pour des domaines de pêche), il a besoin du consentement préalable des copropriétaires, soit ses frères, soit les chefs des autres familles, d'après les cas. Comme il est assez intelligent, il faut le supposer, pour ne pas aliéner une propriété dont ils ont besoin eux-mêmes, leur consentement lui est toujours acquis. Celui qui s'opposerait serait d'ailleurs traité de malveillant envers la femme, qui est aussi sa « fille », en lui refusant ce titre de gloire.

Les objets donnés en nkọmí sont la propriété du mari. Il en remet la plus forte part à la « nkóló » de sa femme, c'est-à-dire à sa parente, grâce à laquelle il a pu se procurer cette épouse (cf., plus loin, art. X). La petite partie est conservée par lui-même. Il en dispose pour ses besoins de concert avec son épouse. En bonne entente, le mari consulte sa femme avant d'en donner ou vendre. Et si elle-même désire les aliéner, elle lui en demande la permission. Ils s'arrangent ainsi à l'amiable. Mais en droit, le tout appartient au mari. S'il veut en user pour des cadeaux ou pour tout paiement personnel, sa femme n'a point à réclamer : elle n'obtient pas gain de cause devant la justice. Mais du point de vue pratique, il est bien plus sage de se mettre préalablement d'accord, afin d'éviter tout froissement et toute brouille.

Le nkọmí est plus ou moins important d'après la richesse. Un montant élevé est non seulement un point d'honneur et de gloire, mais constitue en outre un moyen pour rendre le mariage plus stable et un gage de bonne entente. Plus le nkọmi est élevé et plus le mari est tenu de bien traiter sa femme et de faire en sorte qu'elle se plaise chez lui, de peur de devoir restituer toute une fortune si le mariage est jamais rompu.

---

(¹) Cfr. aussi l'exemple cité au chap. III, art. V.

(²) Mais jamais de terres ou forêts.

Il peut être extrêmement élevé, voire égaler la dot, ou la surpasser; dans ces cas extrêmes, on parle de lifayó-njọku; en effet, la jeune fille va habiter ailleurs (lifaya) comme un éléphant (njọku), à cause de la masse de richesses qu'elle apporte avec elle. On parle encore de njọkwobwo = espèce de champignons qui abondent partout sur l'arbre bosúlú (1).

A ce sujet, il nous faut mentionner une vieille coutume. Par amour pour sa fille et par désir de glorification, le père donne à son gendre une quantité plus ou moins grande, mais suffisant à l'acquisition d'une épouse, de bakonga, donc de valeurs dotales proprement dites. Quoique données par le beau-père à son gendre, et faisant donc partie du nkọmi, ces valeurs n'en ont pourtant ni le sens ni la destination. Elles sont versées dès le paiement de l'ikulá. Cette coutume n'est de pratique courante que chez les hommes particulièrement riches et influents, c'est-à-dire les chefs de famille occupant dans la société indigène un rang prépondérant. Elle n'est jamais omise pour une fille bolúmbú (chap. I, IIe partie, art. II). Le père de la femme remet les valeurs à son gendre en lui disant : « Voici, je te donne ma fille en mariage. Elle a toujours occupé un rang élevé; elle est de très bonne famille. Je veux qu'elle conserve sa position prépondérante. Voici donc une dot; va te procurer une seconde épouse avec ces anneaux; pour que ma fille ait sa nkila dès le premier jour. Tu reviendras ensuite me payer la dot pour elle. »

---

(1) Ces termes ne sont point spécifiques. Ils s'appliquent également à tout étranger qui vient s'établir, ou qui simplement passe dans le village, muni d'une grande quantité de richesses. Par exemple les Blancs.

La femme qui est l'objet d'une telle préférence et d'un si grand honneur s'appelle yèngaende. Ce mot est composé des radicaux : éng= acquérir par « dot », et ende= homme (vir). Parce que de cette façon elle paie elle-même, pour ainsi dire, la dot pour son mari, et cela avant que lui-même ne l'ait fait pour elle.

Les Nkundó ayant abandonné cette façon de faire ostentation de leurs richesses, la coutume que nous venons de décrire appartient désormais au passé. Pourtant on trouve encore des femmes qui portent le nom de Yèngaende, en souvenir d'une aïeule quelconque qui avait été l'objet de cet honneur lequel créait une situation privilégiée et pour ainsi dire royale.

Il appert de tout ce qui précède que, dans le droit et la pratique nkundó, les paiements matrimoniaux ne sont pas unilatéraux. Il existe plutôt une tradition mutuelle de biens. Quoique ces biens soient, de part et d'autre, d'une nature nettement différente, ils ont tous une valeur économique et financière. Nous pouvons donc parler d'une réelle réciprocité dans ces paiements. Et, bien que le mari doive fournir le capital le plus élevé et le plus important, il serait faux de dire que lui seul doit « payer son conjoint », car si effectivement il « paie sa femme », l'épouse aussi doit, dans une certaine mesure, « payer son mari ». C'est ce que les Nkundó expriment fréquemment par la forme réciproque de -énga : « bokiló l'okanga béngana= beau-père et gendre s'acquièrent par dot ». Aussi beaucoup d'hommes tâchent-ils, dans le paiement du nkǫmí, d'approcher aussi près que possible le montant de la dot au sens strict, de façon à obtenir un certain équilibre. Ensuite, pour conserver cet équilibre entre les capitaux, ils compensent chaque versement de nature dotale par de nouvelles valeurs de nkǫmí. Par cette façon d'agir on veut obtenir une constance plus ou moins égale dans les influences de chacune des deux parties contractantes, de peur que l'une d'elles ne devienne excessive et prépondérante, ce qui ne serait pas toujours favorable à la stabilité de l'union et à la bonne entente.

ARTICLE VIII. — ACCEPTATION DE LA DOT.

Après le départ du mari, de sa famille et du ndonga, le père de la femme fait ramasser et déposer devant lui les valeurs versées. Dans la hiérarchie familiale cette tâche incombe à ses fils et à ses frères puînés. Puis, les aînés se concertent sur l'emploi qui devra en être fait. Ils s'inclinent (básunama), comme disent les Nkundó dans leur langage figuré. Ainsi que dans toutes les réunions de conseils familiaux et les délibérations d'un jury quelconque, le père est invité à dire son opinion. Mais sans même se prononcer il passe immédiatement la parole à un autre auquel il doit le respect; son frère aîné, son neveu-fils-de-sœur, etc. Celui-ci en fait de même, en laissant la parole au suivant, et ainsi de suite. Finalement, elle revient au père, qui invite les autres à prendre chacun dans le tas l'objet qu'il désire, qui un anneau, qui un couteau ou une lance. De concert avec le patriarche de la famille, il décide de la destination à donner à la dot reçue. Ils sont obligés d'agir d'après les règles de la justice, en sauvegardant les droits de tous et chacun (cfr., plus loin, art. X).

Qu'arrive-t-il si les parents n'acceptent pas la dot déposée devant eux? La chose peut se produire. Et voici un cas récemment arrivé : Etanda, fille d'Isia, d'Esǫ́kǫlǫ-kǫ́lǫ́ (Boléngé, Bakáala), est fiancée à Eanga, de Bofeka l'Asumba (Wǫ̂ngatá), qui a payé pour elle l'ikulá et le ndanga. Au moment du paiement du walo, tous étant réunis, le ndonga remet au père de la femme 50 bakonga; Isia ne les agrée pas, parce que l'union de sa fille avec Eanga ne lui paraît point présenter de garanties suffisantes de stabilité. Il prie donc le ndonga de conserver les valeurs en dépôt jusqu'au jour où l'union se montrera solide. Les événements ont donné raison à Isia. En effet, à peine quelques mois se sont écoulés que la rupture se produit. Le ndonga rend les valeurs au père du fiancé et le mariage n'est pas réalisé. Dans ce cas, aux yeux des indigènes, il n'y a pas eu versement de walo, puisque le père de la femme n'a pas accepté ces valeurs. On ne peut donc pas parler ici d'un mariage véritable.

Ce cas, qui sans être fréquent n'est pourtant pas unique, prouve le sérieux que les indigènes apportent dans l'affaire du mariage. Ils sont loin de l'état d'esprit que certains auteurs leur attribuent. Ce n'est que la liberté de la colonisation, si elle brise les lois ancestrales et leurs sanctions sans les remplacer par au moins l'équivalent, qui amène un état de désordre moral et social dans ce domaine, en laissant libre carrière à la convoitise.

Jusqu'ici nous avons examiné les trois versements : ikulá, ndanga et walo, plus les valeurs de la mère. Avec inclusion des beéngo ils sont groupés sous la dénomination globale de jěngí. Celui-ci comprend d'ailleurs encore d'autres paiements, par exemple cadeaux de bienvenue à la fiancée, cadeaux de visite ultérieurs, etc., et signifie donc, pratiquement, tous les paiements qui ne sont pas le paiement final, dont nous allons traiter. Au sens strict, il indique les versements faits pour obtenir une épouse, à l'exclusion des paiements ultérieurs.

Jěngí dérive du radical verbal éng, qui signifie payer ces valeurs-là, acquérir une épouse au moyen de ces valeurs. Il est impossible de traduire ces termes par un équivalent français. Nous sommes donc forcé d'employer des expressions plus ou moins impropres, comme : payer, se procurer, acquérir, acheter, paiement, achat, etc., qui en lonkundo sont rendues par de tout autres mots. Ne prétendez donc jamais devant un Nkundó qu'ils achètent les femmes : il vous exprimerait toute son indignation d'une monstruosité pareille. Pour acheter il dit : sómb. Dans son idée cela n'a rien de commun avec éng ou sǫ́ng (cfr. infra).

Etre objet d'un versement de dot se dit : kwę́ baúmbá, littéralement = « tomber des valeurs ». D'où le nom Ókwaúmbá = celle qui est l'objet d'un paiement de valeurs.

Comme nous l'avons dit, il est possible de payer simultanément les versements décrits. Cette façon de faire ne se rencontre que pour un remariage. Toutes les valeurs sont déposées ensemble, et l'on ne fait plus aucune distinction entre les trois versements.

ARTICLE IX. — LE BOSONGO.

§ 1. Terminologie et nature du bosóngo.

Le bosǫ́ngo est la partie ultime du versement dotal. C'est le paiement d'un esclave ou de sa valeur en espèces. De là le terme très usité de bonto = proprement : homme, mais dans l'application : esclave (ce n'est qu'un homme, dit-on, c'est-à-dire un esclave; njôáta la bonto, la linto : je le possède comme esclave). Le terme propre pour esclave, bokwála, ou chez les Elíngá et Boóyá : bontamba (¹), n'est jamais employé en matière de dot. Pourtant les Ekonda se servent du terme ilęngę́, qui est synonyme de bokwála et signifie esclave au sens propre du mot. Les tribus nkundó voisines l'emploient aussi, probablement sous leur influence. Ainsi font les Bombwanja, Bongíli, Bonkoso, Bombomba (²).

Le substantif bosǫ́ngo (chez les divers Elíngá : lisǫ́ngí) dérive de sǫ́ng = payer cette partie de la dot. Ainsi un homme dit à son gendre : « oósll'ôénga bǫ́n'ôkárh, yákáká yôsǫ́ngę́ = tu as déjà payé le jèngí pour ma fille, viens maintenant payer le bosóngo ». L'explication, donnée par Ruskin (Dictionary of the Lomongo Language, p. 67 : bosóngo : the passing over of a daughter or ward in marriage without reference to her wishes, money paid for slave wife, et p. 314, sóngya : idem), ne concorde donc pas avec le sens que donnent à ces termes les tribus nkundó dont nous traitons.

---

(¹) Ailleurs on dit encore bodembo ou bómbo.

(²) Les Batswá ne font jamais ce versement.

Un autre terme pour ce paiement est : tsinola bonto (ilengé). Je ne connais aucun autre cas d'emploi de ce verbe tsinola.

Une expression qui fait ressortir le caractère de paiement ultime est kumbola bonto (ilengé). Le verbe kumbola signifie couper la dernière entaille dans un arbre pour achever de l'abattre (1).

Autrefois on exigeait absolument un véritable esclave, c'est-à-dire une personne humaine. Actuellement, l'esclavage étant aboli, on le remplace par sa valeur en bakonga, qui est de 25 anneaux, ou, s'ils sont particulièrement beaux, de 15 à 20 (2). Pour distinguer ces formes du bosóngo on dit : bonťôw'abwó (ilengé y'âbwó) = esclave à cheveux, donc un être humain; et bonťôw'akonga (ilengé y'âkonga = esclave en anneaux de cuivre).

Outre des esclaves, des Batswá pouvaient être donnés en bosóngo. Ils n'étaient pourtant pas réduits en esclavage, mais restaient dans la condition qu'ils occupaient auparavant. La seule différence est qu'ils changeaient de maître.

Parfois le maître voulant se défaire d'un Botswá incorrigible, le donnait en bosóngo à titre de véritable esclave, auquel cas nous revenons à la livraison d'un esclave proprement dit.

Dans les autres cas on agissait avec le consentement plus ou moins explicite du Botswá. D'ordinaire c'étaient des femmes qui étaient ainsi livrées comme paiement dotal. Comme dans les affaires matrimoniales des Batswá le maître Bootó remplit l'office de « père », il a droit à la dot des filles et a le devoir de procurer des épouses aux garçons. Il peut donc livrer à son beau-père une fille Bǫtswá, qui lui appartient. Le beau-père ne prend jamais cette femme comme épouse pour lui ou sa parenté, mais il la donne en mariage à un de ses propres Batswá, ou à un étranger de cette race, qui lui verse la dot pour elle. Socialement et financièrement la chose revient absolument au même que si le gendre avait payé un esclave.

---

(1) Notons que kumbola signifie aussi prendre en mariage.

(2) Autrefois le prix d'un esclave était de 10 à 15 anneaux.

Ainsi, la dot payée par Lokonda jw'ĭsano y'ĭnkanja, de Ngǫmbę (Bongíli), pour Bakutu, des Basékà Elongama (Bęsǫmbǫ́, Bombwanja), et employée par le cousin de celle-ci, Bofénda, de Ekúkola (Bongíli), pour se procurer la femme Ilǫa, de Ndǫngǫ́ (Bongíli), consistait en soixante anneaux et la femme Ómâmęnga (Antonia), du clan Bǫtswá de Mbálanga. Celle-ci fut ensuite épousée par un Bǫtswá de ses nouveaux maîtres, Wanja (Pius).

Il peut y avoir deux ou plusieurs esclaves, pour les mêmes raisons qui déterminent le montant plus ou moins élevé du walo. Les Bombwanja ne se contentent d'un seul qu'exceptionnellement. Mais tous ne forment toujours qu'un seul et même bǫsǫ́ngǫ.

Le bǫsǫ́ngǫ ne fait pas partie du jĕngí : bǫsǫ́ngǫ ĕmí ńk'omóngó=le bǫsǫ́ngǫ est tout à fait à part, disent les indigènes. Et à ce sujet leurs affirmations sont particulièrement catégoriques.

Une expression caractéristique pour désigner l'entièreté de la dot est baúmbá la bonto = anneaux et homme (esclave). Les anneaux sont le jĕngí; ce sont des valeurs purement matérielles. Le bǫsǫ́ngǫ, au contraire, est une personne humaine.

En lonkundo il n'existe aucun terme englobant les deux sortes de versements. La totalité ne peut être exprimée exactement et par un mot unique.

Pourtant, dans les environs de Flandria, les jeunes commencent à mêler les deux mots jèngí et bǫsǫ́ngǫ et à les employer l'un pour l'autre (¹). La confusion moderne est probablement due à la pénétration du dialecte lombwanja, qui exerce, même pour d'autres mots, une assez forte influence sur le dialecte des Bongili et Bonkoso, ainsi que dans le centre de Flandria. Chez les Bombwanja, en effet, -sǫ́ng et bǫsǫ́ngǫ sont synonymes du lokóté : -éng, jèngí. Pour le paiement d'un esclave, ils n'emploient que le mot ilęngę́ et l'expression -lekya ilęngę́=donner un esclave. Les vieux protestent pourtant vivement et traitent cette confusion de faute, de brouillamini, de corruption de la langue.

Autrefois le bǫsǫ́ngǫ était payé en même temps que le walo, ou peu après. A présent, des années peuvent s'écouler entre les deux. Si le mari tarde trop à satisfaire à son obligation, la famille de l'épouse réclame, et souvent, à l'occasion d'une visite de la femme à ses parents, ceux-ci retiennent leur fille et l'empêchent de retourner chez son mari, qu'ainsi ils veulent contraindre à payer. Tout comme pour le jèngí, c'est au mari de le porter, et non à la famille de la femme de le quérir.

L'esclave peut être remplacé, avons-nous dit, par son équivalent en anneaux de cuivre. D'autres objets, par exemple des couteaux, n'entrent point en considération. Pour que les anneaux valent comme bǫsǫ́ngǫ ils doivent être expressément désignés comme tels par le mari ou le ndonga. Si la volonté n'est pas exprimée verbalement, ils sont considérés comme jèngí; puisque, de leur nature, ils appartiennent à ce paiement.

Le bǫsǫ́ngǫ est le versement ultime et définitif de la dot. Ceci ne veut pas dire qu'après cela le mari ne doive plus payer dans certaines circonstances. Au contraire, les transactions financières ne finissent qu'à la mort. Mais les paiements ultérieurs sont dus en raison d'autres obligations, postérieures à la conclusion définitive du contrat matrimonial, bien qu'en découlant. Tels sont les belonga (cadeaux de visite), les valeurs données à l'occasion d'un décès, le nkunjí (paiement funéraire); puis des cas d'assistance à un membre de la famille de l'épouse (par exemple pour la constitution d'une dot). Ou encore la mère de la femme viendra aider sa fille lors d'un accouchement; quand elle rentre chez elle, son gendre lui offre un cadeau d'adieu (bolingako), par exemple quatre bakonga. C'est dans ce sens qu'il faut interpréter l'affirmation des indigènes que le jěngí ne se termine jamais : « jěngí lifósíle elaká ńk'iwá ».

---

(¹) Des jeunes gens des Injǫ́lǫ́, d'environ 20 ans, tant chez eux que ceux que j'ai connus à la Mission de Flandria, ne font aucune confusion et distinguent nettement les deux termes.

De toute façon et en toute supposition, le bǫsǫ́ngǫ doit être livré, même si le divorce ou la mort interviennent avant. Le refus de payer fait perdre au mari les droits sur une de ses filles, dont la dot compensera, avec intérêts, la perte économique et sociale subie par le clan de la femme (¹).

§ 2. Valeur et effets du bǫsǫ́ngǫ.

Quelle est maintenant l'importance du bǫsǫ́ngǫ? Dans la réponse il s'agit de bien distinguer deux aspects du problème : l'aspect financier et l'aspect juridique.

1° Du point de vue financier. Tout d'abord, le bǫsǫ́ngǫ parachève le versement de la dot et ainsi produit la plus grande stabilité théorique qui puisse être obtenue dans un mariage nkundó. C'est dans ce sens qu'il faut comprendre les expressions : « bôló wâ liála ńk'onto = la force du mariage (sa stabilité) se trouve dans l'esclave »; « l'ǫsǫ́ngǫ bômoto ákólongwa wâlí = par le bǫsǫ́ngǫ la femme devient parfaitement épouse »; ou : « wâlí ákólongwa ôkę̂ : l'épouse devient parfaitement tienne ». En effet, comme par ce versement le paiement de la dot est entièrement terminé, dans le sens expliqué, les parents de la femme n'ont plus aucun prétexte de la ravir à son mari et tiennent encore davantage à cette union, où de si gros intérêts sont engagés.

---

(¹) Cfr. chap. VIII, art. IV, et chap. IX, art. IX, § 2.

La richesse, outre sa valeur en elle-même, a encore une influence sociale. De ce point de vue nous devons distinguer :

a) Aux temps où le bosóngo était nécessairement un esclave en chair et os, et non un esclave en anneaux, il était tout naturel qu'on y attachât une plus grande valeur qu'au walo. On préférait vingt-cinq bakonga (de walo) plus deux esclaves à cinquante bakonga et un esclave, bien que, en ramenant le tout à l'unité monétaire en cuivre, on avait plus dans le dernier cas. Ceci s'explique aisément. Autrefois, disent les vieux, nous possédions très peu de cuivre et la fonte du fer était une besogne dure et longue. Le walo payé pour nos mères était très inférieur à ce que nous voyons de nos jours. Dans la majorité des cas, nos pères n'ont versé qu'une quinzaine ou une vingtaine d'anneaux et objets en fer. Mais ils donnaient un plus grand nombre d'esclaves. Il n'était pas rare de livrer pour une femme cinq ou même dix esclaves. De ce fait, le bosóngo était d'une importance bien plus considérable que le walo. Actuellement, les Blancs ont introduit laiton et fer en quantité; c'est cette abondance qui a fait augmenter le prix du walo. D'autre part, il était devenu plus difficile, et finalement impossible de nous procurer des esclaves; c'est pourquoi le bosóngo a baissé. Enfin, nous avons dû substituer les anneaux aux personnes.

b) A présent, quoique l'idée de l'importance familiale du bosóngo soit toujours vivante, à cause de son caractère de versement ultime et d'arrangement définitif de la question financière, son importance pécuniaire, et donc, sous un certain angle, sociale pour le clan récepteur, a beaucoup diminué. Et cela parce que, tout comme les paiements précédents, il est devenu un versement d'anneaux de cuivre. Dans les endroits où tous les paiements dotaux consistent en monnaie et en valeurs d'introduction européenne, l'importance du bǫsǫ́ngǫ, tout naturellement, décroît encore plus rapidement.

2° Au point de vue juridique, la question est tout autre. Le bǫsǫ́ngǫ ne produit aucune nouvelle relation entre les époux. La femme ne change pas de nom : elle reste, comme auparavant, wǎlí. Qu'elle devient parfaitement épouse, cela n'est basé, comme nous l'avons dit, que sur la stabilité théoriquement parfaite qu'acquiert le mariage, grâce à ce paiement final, qui enlève aux parents toute raison de ravir leur fille à son mari, et nullement grâce à une nouvelle opération juridique.

Ceci est encore clairement prouvé par le fait suivant : au cas où la femme meurt avant le bǫsǫ́ngǫ, il n'y a pas de palabre, comme au décès sans walo. Le mari ne doit pas payer d'indemnité (mbálaka). Seulement il doit parachever les versements dotaux par le bǫsǫ́ngǫ, ce à quoi il s'est engagé en payant l'ikulá et le ndanga. Sinon l'alliance entre lui et son beau-père est du fait rompue, d'où impossibilité d'obtenir une nouvelle épouse en remplacement de la défunte et perte de ses droits sur une des filles. Nous devons d'ailleurs revenir sur cette question au chapitre IX, article IX, § 2.

On voit la grande différence que ces règles prouvent exister entre walo et bǫsǫ́ngǫ; d'un côté, indemnité supposant une faute juridique; de l'autre, transaction pour équilibrer les droits financiers des clans en cause.

Nous pouvons conclure de toutes ces considérations que le paiement du bǫsǫ́ngǫ est, par sa modalité pécuniaire spéciale, d'une grande importance pour la stabilité de l'union et pour l'influence sociale du clan de la femme, mais, du point de vue juridique, il est bien moins important que le walo, puisque celui-ci rend la femme véritablement épouse, tandis que le versement final ne crée aucune nouvelle relation sociale, ni entre les époux, ni entre le mari et ses beaux-parents.

ARTICLE X. — DESTINATION DE LA DOT.

En principe, la dot reçue est destinée à procurer une épouse à l'un des membres de la famille qui l'a touchée. La femme épousée grâce à la dot versée pour une autre est appelée la nkita de celle-ci. Ce mot me semble être en rapport étymologique avec le mot nkitó=gain, bénéfice (verbe : -kitola). En dernière analyse, les deux mots pourraient dériver du radical -kit=devenir.

Un synonyme est bongíli (bongíji), surtout employé par les Injǫ́lǫ́, mais connu aussi, quoique peu usité, par les autres tribus.

La femme dont la dot a servi à l'obtention de la nkita est la nkóló (littéralement : maîtresse) de celle-ci. Les Injǫ́lǫ́ et aussi les Boángí lui donnent encore le nom plus délicat de nyangôngíji=mère de la bongíji (¹).

Pour exprimer : obtenir une nkita, on dit -umba nkita = littéralement : abattre une nkita, comme on abat un arbre ou un adversaïre. Ou -báta nkita=posséder une nkita (umba ou báta X. la nkita). Devenir nkita se traduit -kwẹ́ nkita = tomber en nkita.

La hiérarchie des ayants droit est déterminée par la hiérarchie générale des membres de la famille, d'après l'ancienneté de la génération et, dans la même génération, d'après l'âge. Par conséquent, aussi longtemps qu'un des membres ayant titre d'isé (père) est célibataire (à moins qu'il ne soit incapable, physiquement ou moralement), un bǫ̌na (fils) n'a pas droit à la dot, fût-ce de sa propre sœur. Dans la même génération, les aînés passent avant les puînés, mais les garçons ont le droit primordial sur la dot de leurs sœurs utérines (¹).

---

(¹) Ce terme désigne également la femme d'un polygame qui a amené une de ses parentes comme coépouse, dont elle est la nyangôngili. (Cfr. chap. VII, art. IV.)

Il arrive assez souvent, et le cas était anciennement encore bien plus fréquent, que l'ayant droit à la dot est encore trop jeune pour se marier, soit en réalité, soit au jugement de ses « pères » (²). De ce fait, la dot est employée en faveur d'un autre membre de la famille. Le bénéfice en reviendra au créditeur, plus tard, sous forme d'héritage.

Même si la ou les femmes lui ainsi destinées venaient à faire défaut par la mort ou par la capture en esclavage, il lui reste l'issue de recevoir la dot d'une cousine sur laquelle personne n'a un droit direct (étant, par exemple, enfant unique), ou celle d'une fille de la nkita de sa mère, comme nous le verrons ci-après.

Dans ces cas il y a suspension temporaire du droit, ou plutôt changement de la personne qui en est l'objet. Ces règlements sont très fréquents et peuvent atteindre plusieurs personnes. Les dots peuvent échoir même à des parents assez éloignés, voire dans la lignée féminine. Ces transactions sont faites par les patriarches, pour le plus grand bien commun de la famille. Des droits nouveaux naissent en faveur de l'ayant droit originel, la femme épousée au moyen de ces valeurs étant pour lui l'équivalent d'une nkita. En voici un exemple :

Bakutu b'Ŏfóngé (Boniface) de Bombénga w'ŏkenda (Besọmbọ́, Bombwanja) a une sœur Wĕtsĭ, dont la dot sert à fournir à son oncle paternel Elongama éy'ituta la femme Ikọ́kọ́ de Ndọngọ́-Bongíli. Le droit de Bakutu sur sa nièce Bakutu, fille de Bolófo, est transféré à Boténda d'Ekúkola, fils de sa grand'tante paternelle Etáka, donc — en terminologie nkundó — à son père. De ce fait, il obtient le droit sur la dot de la fille (Wăngi) de son oncle et d'Ikọ́kọ́, et en même temps il acquiert une certaine autorité sur le bénéficiaire de la dot qui lui était primitivement destinée, c'est-à-dire sur Bofénda, ainsi que sur les enfants de celui-ci.

---

(¹) Pour la limitation de ce droit et les exceptions, cfr. chap. IV, art. II.

(²) Cfr. ibidem.

La dot étant réservée à l'obtention d'une nkita, rien n'empêche que l'excédent, s'il y en a, soit employé au paiement d'une dette, d'une amende, etc., ni, à fortiori, qu'il soit donné à un parent pour le mettre dans la possibilité de se procurer une femme.

Si, exceptionnellement, la dot est détournée de sa destination naturelle, il y a infraction, parce que violation du droit de la fille, objet du versement. En effet, de la sorte elle est privée de sa nkita, dont elle aurait tiré certains avantages. Il se peut pourtant qu'une autre loi entre en conflit avec celle-ci. Dans ces cas de force majeure, il dépend de la jurisprudence d'examiner laquelle des deux doit primer.

Tel fut le cas de Bọlẹ́i, fille de Ifolí y'ŏngúmá, des Baséká Lọngwâne de Bọnjọku (Bonkoso). Elle fut mariée à Bombélenga de Likolí. La dot fut touchée par son oncle Botóló, car le père de Bọlẹ́i avait été fait prisonnier de guerre par les Bongale. Le conseil de famille décida de libérer Ifolí avant de songer à l'acquisition d'une femme. Botóló paya donc la rançon pour son frère. Évidemment, Bọlẹ́i fut très contrariée de devoir se soumettre à cette ordonnance, mais, tout compte fait, elle aussi jugea que la libération de son père primait son droit à une nkita, dont maintenant elle se trouve privée. Car, bien que les Bongale, grâce à cette rançon, se soient procuré une femme, celle-ci n'est pas la nkita de Bọlẹ́i, chaque groupement familial ne tenant compte que de ses propres membres.

Comme nous l'avons déjà insinué, la nkóló retire certains avantages de la « possession » d'une nkita. Elle a droit au respect et à une certaine assistance à cause de sa position supérieure, selon la mentalité nkundó. Un avantage plus considérable a regard à la contre-dot. Ainsi qu'on l'a vu, une petite partie de ce paiement est conservée par le mari pour les besoins du ménage; la majeure partie revient à la nkóló. Enfin, le fils de la nkóló a le droit de dire son mot dans son clan maternel, qui s'est enrichi avec les valeurs payées par son clan paternel, le droit aussi d'installer des cultures sur les terres du clan maternel et d'y fixer sa résidence. En outre, un membre du clan de sa mère ayant été mis dans la possibilité de se procurer une épouse au moyen de ces mêmes valeurs, il a un certain droit sur les enfants de la nkita de sa mère, voire sur la nkita elle-même (1).

A l'égard des enfants de la nkita de sa mère, — qu'il nomme ses bękwá (2), ou les benkita de sa mère : benkita bĕkáḿ bĕkí ngóya, — le fils de la nkóló a :

1° droit au respect et à l'assistance;

2° droit de siéger dans le conseil familial qui décide du partage de l'héritage (de sorte que le propre fils du défunt ne peut partager les biens de son père sans le consentement de son nkóló) ou de la destination à donner aux dots des filles;

3° dans le cas où il ne peut avoir de femme dans son propre clan, le droit de toucher la dot d'une de ses bękwá, si elle n'est pas d'abord nécessaire à un des propres oncles ou frères de celle-ci, le droit de ces derniers primant celui du nkóló, à moins que celui-ci ne vienne se fixer dans le clan maternel. Car dans ce cas, son droit prévaut contre celui des frères (jamais de l'oncle) et il devient chef de famille, après ses oncles. En effet, étant fils de la sœur, les enfants de l'oncle l'appellent père, tout comme ils désignent sa mère, leur tante paternelle, du nom d'isómoto (=père féminin). Lui-même nomme ses cousins germains băna = enfants et a donc la préséance sur eux.

---

(1) Cfr. supra, art. IV, § 3; et chap. III, art. II.

(2) Sing. bǫkwá, dérivé du verbe -kwá ou -kwę́ : tomber (cfr. ci-dessus).

Les droits de maîtrise du fils de la nkóló sur les filles de la nkita sont donc limités par le droit des oncles et, dans un certain degré, des frères (¹). Mais à l'héritage des veuves le droit du fils de la nkóló revit et il peut réclamer celle qui a été acquise avec la dot de sa bǫkwá, qui, en quelque sorte, est sa nkita (balá ěkę nkita = voici ta nkita, lui dit-on en la lui assignant).

Ces règles peuvent donner lieu à des transactions multiples et à des transferts répétés des droits de l'un à l'autre des deux clans et à l'intérieur du même clan.

Les petits-fils de la nkóló nomment les petits-fils de la nkita : nkwá y'ăúmbá = excréments de valeurs (locution qui n'a rien d'irrespectueux ni de choquant), parce que les droits provenant de la relation de nkóló à nkita n'ont pratiquement plus de vigueur. Dans les circonstances favorables tout se limite à un peu de respect et d'assistance. Et si les petits-fils de la nkóló n'ont aucun autre lien de parenté avec le clan paternel des petits-cousins, ils ne peuvent même plus leur appliquer cette dénomination.

Par conséquent, la personne objet elle-même du versement dotal est la nkita. La première génération de la nkóló l'appelle bonkita. Dans la troisième, les relations deviennent nkwá y'ăúmbá.

Par exemple :

mère . . .	Lokónjó . . .	nkita de Bekombe
fils	Imana. . . .	bonkita de Ifangá
mère . . .	Lokónjó . . .	nkita de Bekombe
fils	Imana } . . .	benkita de Ifangá
petit-fils . .	Etsina }
mère . . .	Lokónjó . . .	nkita de Bekombe
fils	Imana	bonkita de Ifangá
petit-fils . .	Etsina	nkwá y'ăúmbá de Litáola

(¹) Dans son étude : Het Familiehoofd bij de Nkundo-Negers (CONGO, 1930, t. II, p. 332), le R. P. BREPOELS exagère un peu les droits du fils de la nkóló.

La raison du relâchement des liens entre petits-fils de nkóló et petits-fils de nkita est qu'entre grands-parents et petits-fils le respect et l'autorité sont plutôt nominaux; dans la pratique ils n'existent plus [1].

Si la nkóló ne laisse pas de postérité, les fils de la nkita sont libérés de toute obligation. Comme le Nkundó tient à pouvoir nommer une personne sa nkita, ou son bọkwá, de même se glorifie-t-il de ne pas dépendre d'un nkóló.

Les hommes qui ont titre de nkóló peuvent, de par les circonstances, avoir des devoirs envers leurs benkita, notamment celui d'intervenir activement dans la constitution d'une dot. De leur côté, si le nkóló a fourni une épouse à son bonkita, ce dernier doit le traiter comme son père (assistance, part du père à la répartition de la viande de chasse, etc.).

La mutualité de ces droits entre nkóló et nkita est bien exprimée par la locution : ómbáté ńkoáté wẹ̌ = possède-moi que je te possède ». C'est comme le do ut des.

D'après les explications qui précèdent, on peut juger de l'influence considérable exercée par la dot dans les relations familiales. Bien que le régime des Nkundó soit manifestement et nettement patriarcal, le système de la dot avec ses conséquences logiques lui donne un certain aspect qui pourrait faire penser au matriarcat. La chose est toute naturelle. La dot étant une richesse, elle représente une influence sociale. Par le mariage, cette influence est transférée du clan du mari à celui de la femme, que la dot reçue enrichit en biens et en personnes. Le mari est en quelque sorte le pourvoyeur du clan de son épouse. Et l'enfant peut, en toute vérité, prétendre que son clan s'est enrichi grâce à son père. De fait, c'est avant tout sur cette considération que le Nkundó base l'exigence de tous les droits quelconques qu'il possède dans son clan maternel.

---

[1] Cfr. chap. VI, art. VI.

Les relations entre une femme et sa nkita et entre leurs enfants respectifs sont fondées uniquement sur la nature dotale du mariage et n'ont rien à voir avec le matriarcat (¹).

Aussi, n'est-il pas nécessaire d'échafauder des théories compliquées ou des spéculations ardues pour expliquer la naissance du système et le justifier. C'est la conséquence toute simple du paiement de la dot en valeurs qui ne peuvent guère être utiles qu'à un remploi du même genre.

Toutefois, si le système de la nkita est une conséquence logique et naturelle du mariage par dot, ce n'en est pas une conséquence nécessaire. La dot existe dans toutes les tribus congolaises, elle ne paraît pourtant pas avoir amené partout l'institution de la nkita.

Qu'est-ce qui y a donné naissance chez les Nkundó? Le R. P. Brepoels (loc. cit., p. 339) l'explique comme suit : « La vente (sic) de la femme et la perte de sa liberté devaient naturellement la révolter. L'homme a probablement eu grand'peine à l'amener à se résigner. Il fallait lui aménager une compensation; et c'est là-dedans que le système de la nkita trouve son origine. C'est ainsi que la femme obtint des droits sur sa nkita et qu'à ses enfants furent attribués des droits qui n'existent nulle part : ils devinrent les supérieurs, les « pères » de la famille de leurs mères... Les vieux, les riches profitaient du système, qui les déchargeait de tout souci au sujet de leurs filles : ils pouvaient les vendre toutes jeunes, puis, si, plus tard, elles se plaignaient de l'injustice qui leur avait été faite, ils les consolaient en leur rappelant leurs droits et ceux de leurs fils sur la nkita et sa progéniture...; en outre, ce système déchargeait les vieux du devoir de procurer des femmes à leurs fils et enlevait à ceux-ci toute raison de réclamer des droits sur les épouses de leur père. » que nous savons sur la nature du mariage nkundó. Mais il est vraisemblable que le profit procuré par cette institution aux vieux papas en ait favorisé l'éclosion et l'extension. On peut y joindre l'influence de la cupidité native.

Cette explication de l'origine du système de la nkita est inadmissible, car elle s'oppose complètement à tout ce

---

(¹) Quoique ces considérations puissent fournir un élément d'explication de l'origine de ce système familial.

Pourtant, en dehors de l'action des causes qui ont contribué à la pénétration et à la conservation du système dans la société nkundó, il faut rechercher celles qui y sont donné origine.

Devons-nous pour cela imaginer des hypothèses compliquées ? Il me semble que non; nous pouvons nous contenter de l'explication indigène : les droits de la nkóló sur la nkita découlent naturellement de sa prépondérance sur celle-ci, car le mariage de la nkita a pu être réalisé grâce aux valeurs versées pour la nkóló, tandis que les droits des fils de la nkóló sur les enfants de la nkita proviennent de ce que dans la hiérarchie nkundó ceux-ci se trouvent vis-à-vis de ceux-là dans la relation de « fils » à « père ».

Les causes secondaires mentionnées ci-dessus, jointes à la nécessité de concilier les intérêts des divers membres de la famille, ont ensuite amplifié le système.

Il peut arriver, exceptionnellement, que la mère devienne la nkita de sa fille. Tel le cas historique de Bękǫmbę de Belondó (Bǫnjǫku) et de sa fille Mbélá. La dot de celle-ci est versée par son père Nkamba éy'ǫntǫlę, de Bofétola (Bǫnjǫku), comme supplément pour sa femme Bękǫmbę. De ce chef, celle-ci devient nkita de sa fille. La double dot sert pour procurer à Ifolí y'ǒngúmá, frère de Bękǫmbę et oncle de Mbélá, la femme Lintamba, qui donc appartient à la fois à mère et fille; mais les deux ne sauraient se faire de difficultés à ce sujet.

Une même personne peut avoir deux ou plusieurs nkita, si notamment sa dot a été si considérable qu'elle a pu servir à l'obtention de plusieurs épouses. Tel le cas de Mputú (Sofia) des Baséká Mbangó de Bonganda (Bonkoso). Son premier mari, Mpénda de Lofelí, verse 40 anneaux et un esclave. Avec cette somme, l'oncle de Mputú, Mbangó éy'akoso (installé dans son clan maternel Elángá l'Imọmọ), paie la dot pour Bọnjọ́lọ́, de Nkélengo (1). Sur ces entrefaites, Mpénda avait été tué dans une bagarre avec son frère Iloko. Mputú se marie avec le neveu de Mpénda, Elóngola, puis celui-ci étant mort après deux ou trois ans de mariage, à Lọkọnga, de Lǒngá (Nkọ́lẹ), qui n'a pas eu plus longue vie, enfin à Bakutu (Boniface) de Bombénga w'ǒkenda (Bẹsọmbọ́, Bombwanja), qui paie une dot considérable, dont une partie sert à la restitution en faveur de la famille du dernier mari, et dont une autre partie est employée par Mbangó pour l'acquisition de la femme Bọngẹlí d'Ekúkola. Avec la dot payée par Lọkọnga, un cousin germain de Mputú, Mbǎngó (Joseph), s'est procuré la femme Boléjá (originaire des Ionda). Enfin, Bakutu donna à Bọnjẹ́kyá (Christophe) de Lọsẹ́linga, cousin éloigné de Mputú, la dot nécessaire pour épouser Embongàmbembe, de Lǒngá, qui, de ce chef, devient aussi la nkita, bien qu'au sens impropre, de Mputú. Celle-ci a donc quatre nkita qui, toutefois, ne sont plus toutes en vie.

Par contre, nous l'avons vu, deux femmes peuvent avoir une nkita commune, si, notamment, leurs dots réunies ont servi à l'acquisition d'une seule épouse. Dans ce cas, les deux bankóló et leurs descendants sont solidaires dans les devoirs et droits. Pratiquement, cette situation ne se produit que lorsque les deux bankóló sont sœurs utérines, rarement entre autres parentes. Des cas peuvent pourtant se présenter, comme celui de Bolófo w'ĭmeka et Bolúmbú w'ĭkọfọ, toutes deux filles de Bakutu b'ĭs'éy'olónjó, de Bokenda (Bẹsọmbọ́), mais de mères différentes (respectivement Mbélá et Wǎngi), dont les dots ont servi solidairement au mariage de Bolófo wǎ Ekákásá Bonkúfo w'ǒbé (fils de Bakutu et Wǎngi) avec Bokungú, d'Engónjó (Bonkoso).

---

(1) Dans une guerre contre Nkélengo, cette femme avait été capturée par les Elángá, qui voulaient l'immoler à l'ikwẹi lors d'une fête de fin de deuil. Mais Mbangó pria les notables de la laisser en vie, parce que, l'aimant beaucoup, il désirait l'épouser.

ARTICLE XI.

REMARQUES GÉNÉRALES SUR LE VERSEMENT DE LA DOT.

A toutes ces notions et règles sur la dot, il nous reste encore à ajouter quelques remarques générales.

1° Durant la grossesse de la femme, aucun versement dotal ne peut avoir lieu. C'est le principe qu'énoncent les Nkundó et auquel ils tiennent fermement. Seulement, il faut entendre grossesse par grossesse visible, nettement perceptible à tous, c'est-à-dire la période du bokeka, et non le début (bọfọswa) (¹), pendant lequel le versement peut toujours se faire.

Si l'on demande la raison de cette interdiction, on reçoit comme réponse que sinon la femme aura de grandes difficultés à accoucher et qu'elle n'aura pratiquement pas de chances d'éviter la mort. La grossesse est considérée comme un état dangereux. D'une femme enceinte on dit : akéki la jěfa = elle est bloquée par le soleil, le soleil est en travers de son chemin, c'est-à-dire elle est entre vie et mort. C'est toute l'explication qu'on obtient. Y aurait-il quelque connexion avec la croyance à l'elímá ? (Cfr. chap. X, art. II, § 1.)

2° Une double dot ne peut pas être conservée pour la même femme du vivant de son mari, donc pour le même mariage. Après le divorce, le nouveau mari versant les valeurs dotales aux parents, ceux-ci sont obligés de restituer la dot du premier mari. De la sorte il ne reste entre leurs mains qu'une seule dot. Probablement cette stipulation a-t-elle pour raison d'être d'éviter le commerce de la dot, chose absolument illégale. En outre, comme la dot constitue le mariage, une double dot, dans le sens indiqué, rendrait la femme épouse de deux hommes à la fois, ce qui est tout à fait contraire à la conception indigène du mariage, nonobstant leur indulgence à l'égard d'un certain concubinage (1).

---

(¹) Cfr. chap. X, art. II, §§ 3 et 4.

Signalons ici un cas arrivé vers 1878-1880, qui ne va pas à l'encontre de cette loi, mais frise quand même la transgression, et qui est plutôt non contra sed praeter legem. Bakutu b'Is'éy'olónjó des Basék'Élongama (Bęsǫmbǫ́) a eu de sa première femme, Wêtai de Likolí, un fils Bolónjó et une fille Imǫtę. Avec la dot de celle-ci, mariée à Lofalanga de Mpámá (Nkǫ́lę), il se procure une seconde femme, Mbélá des Baséká Nkamba ou Bofétola (Bonkoso). Le fils Bolónjó en tombe amoureux et la ravit à son père, qui, étant devenu passablement vieux, avait jusque-là omis de lui procurer une épouse. Làdessus, fureur du vieux Bakutu, qui va jusqu'à menacer de tuer son fils. Mais la famille intervient et donne tort au père. Celui-ci se soumet au jugement familial et finalement se calme. Il cède Mbélá et va même plus loin. Pour éviter à son fils de méchantes allusions et lui épargner la honte des dires d'autrui, comme s'il possédait une femme obtenue d'une façon anormale, il verse pour Mbélá une nouvelle dot de 40 anneaux plus 2 Batswá comme bosóngo. De ce fait, le clan Bofétola a touché deux dots pour la même femme, mais provenant du même homme, et pour une raison plausible, ce qui, loin de donner lieu à des abus, a procuré beaucoup d'avantages. Car les deux parties étaient contentes : les Baséká Nkamba s'enrichirent doublement; leur fille était honorée hors mesure et recevait deux nkita; de l'autre côté, les Basék'Élongama ont dû débourser, mais leur bon renom et leur gloire ne pouvaient que s'en accroître. Ensuite, le fils de Mbélá a obtenu ainsi une très forte position dans son clan maternel et une influence plus grande par la double progéniture des deux nkita de sa mère.

Une exception réelle à cette règle est admise dans l'union par achat (chap. III, art. VII) et dans le cas de refuge (chap. VIII, art. II, § 3, n° 2). Elle ne l'infirme pourtant nullement, car les deux unions sortent totalement des cadres ordinaires et des règles générales et peuvent être considérées comme n'étant pas de vrais mariages.

---

(1) Dont il sera question plus loin, chap. VI, art. VIII, § 2.

3° Le droit à la dot.

A. — Le droit à la dot est-il définitif ? En d'autres termes, la dot reste-t-elle définitivement acquise ?

Pour répondre à cette question nous devons anticiper sur la suite de cette étude. Nous nous bornerons donc à ne signaler que les conclusions des données qui y seront exposées in extenso ([1]). En cas de divorce, les valeurs doivent être restituées de part et d'autre. Au contraire, en cas de décès de l'épouse, elles restent définitivement acquises.

La non-restitution en cas de divorce empêcherait le remariage de la divorcée. Ce semble être une concession à la faiblesse humaine. C'est la seule explication logique que je conçoive — confirmée d'ailleurs par toutes les autres stipulations du droit nkundó relativement à la matière — de l'existence de ces deux règles diamétralement opposées : acquisition définitive et acquisition limitée uniquement à la durée de l'union.

B. — Les titulaires du droit à la dot.

Comme il appert de tout ce que nous avons dit, la dot est prise en possession par le père de la femme pour laquelle elle a été versée. A son défaut, c'est l'aîné de ses frères, ou son bǫnankáná, — s'il est établi chez lui et a hérité de son autorité, — qui touche la dot de sa nièce (cousine). Sinon, c'est l'aîné des fils. En un mot, ils se succèdent dans l'ordre de la hiérarchie familiale.

Au clan maternel reviennent les spirales en cuivre, la chèvre et certains beéngo.

---

[1] Cfr. chap. VIII, art. III, § 5, et chap. IX, art. VII.

Seulement, il existe des circonstances qui peuvent bouleverser cet ordre, de sorte que le clan paternel ne touche pas la moindre partie de la dot. Cela arrive quand la fille à marier a, pour une raison suffisamment grave, quitté son clan paternel et a été adoptée par la famille de sa mère. En voici un exemple historique :

On est à Bompóma (Injọlọ́), entre 1890 et 1900. Un des habitants, Ilónjó yâ Nsọmbọla, a eu de sa femme, Eale de Bokéndela (Boángí), deux enfants : un garçon : Mpulûnẹ́nẹ, et une fille : Embọ́mbi. Celle-ci est enlevée par un des soldats noirs qui étaient venus occuper la région, et emmenée par lui vers son village d'origine, quelque part près de Coq. Un autre homme de Bompóma, nommé Isêntulu, voit sa femme enlevée et emmenée par un autre soldat. Or Ilónjó devait un chien à cet Isêntulu. Celui-ci profite du désordre causé par le début de l'occupation pour exiger avec force menaces son dû. Ilónjó n'ayant pas de chien, et probablement pris de peur, livre au créancier son fils. Isêntulu n'a rien de plus pressé que de rejoindre le soldat et lui propose d'échanger sa femme contre ce garçon esclave. Ils tombent d'accord et le soldat emmène le garçon, qui, d'une façon que j'ignore, meurt entre les mains de son maître.

Encore du temps de l'État Indépendant, Embómbi parvient à regagner son pays. En passant par son village maternel, elle apprend la façon dont son père a agi envers son frère Mpulûnẹ́nẹ. Indignée, elle ne continue plus sa route, mais déclare qu'elle rompt avec son père et désire demeurer auprès de son oncle maternel, Isála. Après quelque temps, un certain Belekú vient la demander en mariage et paie la dot à Isála.

En 1922, Ilónjó s'amène à Bokéndela et dépose plainte au chef Efóle contre Isála, pour avoir touché la dot de sa fille. Efóle, assisté du messager Bongimá et des notables, tranche en faveur de l'accusé : le plaignant ayant gravement offensé sa fille par la livraison de son frère en esclave, ce qui a occasionné sa mort, doit d'abord se réconcilier avec elle. Si elle accepte les excuses, le père recevra la dot. Ils se mettent d'accord sur la nature du droit de réconciliation (bǫǫ́ndǫ) : Ilónjó payera une chèvre. Comme il ne l'a pas avec lui, il remet son couteau comme gage de paiement (wę́kǫ). Iomí, bǫ̀nankáná de Isála (décédé depuis), s'engage à restituer la dot, et verse déjà anticipativement 12 anneaux et 2 couteaux. Ilónjó rentre chez lui. On l'attend vainement; on ne le revoit plus, ni lui, ni sa chèvre.

Troisième acte : Nous sommes en février 1933. Efóle, Bongimá, etc., ont été destitués, comme conséquence de la réorganisation des chefferies. Bokwála a été investi chef des Boángi. Le tribunal de chefferie a commencé à fonctionner, et notre Ilónjó en profite pour revenir à la charge: il dépose plainte contre Iomí et le frère d'Isála. Engongolo, qui n'était pas sur place en 1922, mais est maintenant rentré chez lui. Le 6 mars 1933, la palabre est tranchée. Les nouveaux tenants de l'autorité, naturellement, y trouvent une occasion favorable pour affermir leur position et font juste l'opposé de leurs prédécesseurs, en condamnant Iomí et Engongolo et en donnant gain de cause à Ilónjó.

Or, voilà un réel abus de pouvoir. Car, en droit nkundó, Ilónjó seul est en faute. Il a mal agi sur toute la lignée. Sa fille ne devait plus le reconnaître comme père, puisqu'il l'avait, le premier, virtuellement reniée. Et le clan maternel pouvait, voire devait, en toucher la dot (cf. aussi le cas expliqué au chap. IX, art. IV).

ARTICLE XII. — L'ATTITUDE A L'ÉGARD DE LA DOT.

§ 1. Quelle est l'attitude de la femme à l'égard de la dot ?

Nous seuls, Européens, pouvons poser pareille question. Devant l'intelligence du Nkundó elle est superflue; non, réellement stupide. Le régime de la dot est le régime matrimonial normal. Le Nkundó ne conçoit pas le mariage d'une autre façon. Sans versement de dot, pas de mariage : la femme est considérée non comme épouse, mais comme une pure esclave. C'est une conséquence nécessaire du système dotal. Aussi constatons-nous sans étonnement que la femme est très attachée à ce système et que dans les conditions normales, c'est-à-dire en dehors des influences européennes, elle ne veut pas d'une union sans dot, qui la mettrait dans une condition d'esclave. C'est une vérité à la Palisse. Tout, dans cet ordre d'idées, se tient comme les anneaux d'une chaîne.

§ 3. Notre attitude à l'égard de la dot.

Au début de la colonisation, les Européens, agents du Gouvernement comme missionnaires, considéraient avec répugnance le système matrimonial basé sur le versement d'une dot. A leurs yeux, ce n'était ni plus ni moins que la vente des femmes, donc une forme d'esclavage, contre laquelle il fallait réagir en abolissant la dot et en introduisant le mariage à l'européenne, plus conforme à la nature libre de l'homme. Nombre de Noirs occupés chez les Blancs, comme soldats, travailleurs, etc., furent ainsi mariés sans dot. Pourtant, aucune action directe ne fut entreprise contre le système. Plus tard on commença à s'apercevoir qu'il était nuisible d'abolir la coutume ancestrale avant d'avoir pu la remplacer par un régime meilleur (1). Puis on finit par se rendre compte de ce que le versement d'une dot n'était nullement un achat (2).

---

(1) Il ne suffit même pas de le remplacer par un régime meilleur; il faut que ceux qui en bénéficient le comprennent et soient convaincus qu'il est meilleur.

(2) Une des causes qui ont retardé une vue plus réelle sur la nature de la dot est sans doute le manque de connaissances linguistiques chez les Européens. Les indigènes ne savaient pas la langue bobangi d'abord, lingala ensuite, qu'on leur parlait, et ils employaient donc forcément (et emploient encore) des termes à sens vague et large. Ainsi ils usaient — et usent souvent encore — pour le mariage le mot sómba = acheter, quoique leur langue possède des mots bien nets.

Etant ainsi peu à peu avisés de la véritable nature de la dot, plusieurs Européens commencèrent à prôner le retour au régime ancien, d'aucuns d'une façon radicale et intransigeante, d'autres d'une manière plus raisonnable, en tenant compte des changements produits par la colonisation. On avait constaté que les indigènes ne sont pas encore mûrs pour l'abolition des lois ancestrales et que les unions sans dot ne tiennent qu'exceptionnellement, en partie parce qu'on avait omis de remplacer les sanctions anciennes par des mesures nouvelles adaptées aux circonstances. Finalement, tant le Gouvernement que les Missions demandèrent, avec plus ou moins de rigueur, l'arrangement de l'affaire dotale avant d'admettre les époux au mariage « civil » ou « religieux ».

L'abolition du système dotal est dans les vœux de beaucoup d'Européens parce qu'il leur paraît inférieur. Et, de fait, il constitue, dans les circonstances actuelles de temps et de lieux, un obstacle à l'évolution des indigènes vers un meilleur état moral et social (1). Mais cette abolition n'est ni réalisable, ni même opportune. Ce système pénètre et pour ainsi dire pétrit toute la vie familiale et sociale de nos populations. Son abrogation pure et simple bouleverserait complètement leur ordre établi. Il faut d'abord que la mentalité change, et ce but ne peut être atteint que graduellement, puisqu'il s'agit d'un changement moral. Or, dans l'état actuel de ces populations, l'évolution n'est pas suffisamment avancée pour que l'abolition de la dot soit bienfaisante. Si jamais, c'est ici que vaut l'axiome : nihil leges sine moribus.

Mais ce qui pourrait peut-être déjà se faire dans cette voie, c'est la limitation du montant de la dot. Un contrôle sévère — très difficile en pratique — devrait assurer l'application de cette mesure, à laquelle, au début, maint intéressé cherchera à se soustraire. Pour obtenir d'heureux effets, cette limitation devrait être accompagnée de la répression efficace de l'adultère et de la fréquence des divorces. Ce serait un premier pas vers l'idéal. D'autres pourraient suivre au fur et à mesure que les indigènes évoluent vers un degré supérieur de moralité.

---

(1) Il faut penser surtout aux suites du système de la nkíta.

Ces considérations nous invitent à dire quelques mots du :

§ 2. Commerce de la dot.

Par ce terme on peut entendre deux choses différentes. Ou bien on veut dire que le montant général des dots a augmenté dans des proportions énormes depuis la pénétration européenne. Ou bien on parle de l'augmentation de la dot d'une seule femme, pour des mariages successifs et au profit de sa famille.

Dans le premier sens il est exact que le montant de la dot a considérablement augmenté. La cause en est l'accroissement des richesses produit par la colonisation. Il y a une plus grande facilité d'acquisition. Mais nous ne devons nullement exclure la cupidité de beaucoup de parents, qui en est également accrue. Celle-ci est la plus grande et peut atteindre des proportions scandaleuses dans les régions où, comme chez les riverains du Bas, la dot est payée en richesses européennes (argent, tissus, machines, ustensiles) et où elle atteint et dépasse aisément 2.000 francs. Songez à ce que cela représente, particulièrement aux époques de dépression économique (¹). Inévitablement, l'exemple de l'un entraîne l'autre, car — faut-il le répéter? — tout s'enchaîne.

Une autre cause peut agir, et agit parfois. C'est le désir

(¹) Voici, à titre de comparaison, quelques chiffres moyens de 1934 :

Salaire	fr.	20.— à 25.—
Copal, le kg.		0.50 à 0.70
Palmistes		0.10 à 0.20
Noix de palme		0.05 à 0.10

du mari de s'attacher la femme d'autant plus fermement qu'il a payé davantage. Ce sentiment est certainement louable, surtout en considération de la facilité avec laquelle la femme recourt au divorce. Sa mise en pratique, toutefois, est pleine de dangers. Si elle demeure limitée à un cas isolé, c'est-à-dire à un seul monogame qui consacre toute sa fortune à son épouse unique, le danger est minime. Tel le cas d'un de nos catéchistes qui a versé des sommes énormes, sans que son exemple ait eu la moindre répercussion sur la région. Mais elle est très grave si un homme la met en pratique pour la constitution d'un harem, spécialement lorsque, à cet effet, il débauche les épouses d'autrui. Ainsi, un homme auquel l'Administration a dévolu une grande influence politique a-t-il fait monter dans une proportion fantastique le prix général des dots chez les Ekonda du Nord (¹).

Contre une augmentation pareille des dots, il serait utile de réagir. Car pour beaucoup de jeunes gens elle crée le danger de les condamner au célibat, alors que, autrement, ils pourraient, avec le fruit de leur travail personnel, se constituer un foyer.

(¹) Une cause qui a agi sur l'augmentation des dots chez les Wangata et autres tribus voisines de Coquilhatville est décrite par le R. P. Kervyn, dans Congo, 1922, I, p. 544. Comme l'étude a été rédigée en néerlandais, il me paraît utile de traduire ici le texte en entier :

« Lorsque les premiers Européens furent arrivés à Léopoldville et à Brazzaville, les tissus et autres articles européens ne tardèrent pas à faire leur apparition à Coquilhatville Les chefs Yoma de Boyeka, Ibuka de Boyere (Boyela), Yamba de Eala, Nkake de Bokele, etc., remontaient les rivières Tshuapa et Ikelemba et, au moyen de ces marchandises, achetaient des esclaves, des femmes et de l'ivoire.

« Rentrés chez eux, ils acquéraient des épouses de leur région et les payaient avec les esclaves et les femmes qu'ils avaient achetés à bon marché au moyen des produits européens. Pour une femme de leur région ils payaient 3 à 4 femmes esclaves. L'arrivée des Blancs et de Noirs étrangers leur apprit le chiffre nkęsi (10,000), mot qui dans leur idée représentait 1.000 et que, autrefois, ils nommaient 10 nkoto ou 10 × 100.

« Les Européens ne tardèrent pas à devoir intervenir dans leurs palabres de femmes. La chose est inévitable au Pays Noir. Lorsque les

Dans le second sens, le terme de commerce des dots s'applique plus exactement. Après le divorce, toutes les valeurs doivent être restituées au mari. Par conséquent, le nouvel époux doit payer au moins autant que le premier, et, en règle générale, il doit même ajouter un supplément pour la famille, qui, d'ailleurs, a dû se mettre en frais pour cette palabre. Et ainsi de suite. Plus donc une femme a eu de maris successifs, plus la dot monte. Dans ce sens, le commerce de la dot ne me semble nullement condamnable. L'augmentation est raisonnable. Car, non seulement elle constitue pour la famille de la femme une certaine compensation pour ses tracas, mais, en outre, elle peut exercer une bonne influence sur l'état social de la population. Pour cela il faut que le divorce ne devienne pas un moyen de satisfaire la cupidité (ce que, d'une manière générale, il n'est pas encore à présent) et que l'augmentation ne soit pas exagérée.

Dans ces cas, l'augmentation peut donc avoir un effet salutaire sur la moralité et la stabilité des unions, en effrayant les hommes de prendre pour épouse une divorcée et, par contre-coup, en incitant les femmes à plus de prudence et à une moindre légèreté. Ici, tout est question de mesure, de prudence et de surveillance suivie de la part des autorités responsables.

Noirs présentaient aux Blancs leurs palabres, ils n'osaient ou ne voulaient pas dire : « J'ai payé cette femme avec 3 autres femmes »; ils disaient : « j'ai payé cette femme avec 3 nkęsi de mitako », c'est-à-dire 3×1.000 mitako. Entre-temps, les mots nkoto et nkęsi obtenaient leur valeur de 1.000 et 10.000. Mais on continuait à dire qu'une femme avait été payée avec des nkęsi, et cela par l'erreur des Blancs ou par la cupidité des polygames, ou par les deux ensemble. Plus tard, plusieurs femmes furent de fait payées au moyen de nkęsi, lorsque, notamment, le mitako était devenu la monnaie officielle du Congo. Ce n'était d'ailleurs pas étonnant, car les polygames tenaient au monopole des femmes et avaient tout intérêt à augmenter le prix.

« Autrefois, le prix pour les femmes n'était pas plus élevé à Wangata qu'ailleurs. Beaucoup de femmes n'ont été payées que de 5 bakonga, comme, entre autres à Bokala, près de Bamanya, village dépendant du chef Yoma de Boyeka. »

§ 4. Raison d'être de la dot.

Cette question ne doit pas être posée aux indigènes : ils ne savent pas y répondre. Les faits, non plus, ne donnent aucune certitude. Tout ce qu'on peut tenter est de construire une hypothèse qui concorde avec la réalité.

Comme théories explicatives nous trouvons : celle de la compensation donnée à la famille de la femme pour le membre qu'elle perd (par exemple Seitz, dans Africa, III, p. 85; cfr. aussi Torday, Africa, II, p. 275, Exchange); celle d'un paiement de fécondité; enfin, celle de la garantie de la stabilité du mariage et de la bonne entente dans le ménage (cf., par exemple Torday, loc. cit., pp. 274 et suiv.).

Il appert de l'exposé du paiement de la dot que les faits constatés chez les Nkundó sont plutôt favorables à cette dernière thèse, quoiqu'ils n'excluent pas la première et que, peut-être, ils unissent les deux en une seule explication.

La dot comprend une partie un peu spéciale : le bọsọ́ngọ. Or, quelle est la raison d'être de ce paiement particulier? Quoique nous devions encore signaler plus loin certains faits du remboursement de la dot (chap. VIII), qui peuvent en donner une compréhension plus nette, nous pouvons déjà indiquer quelques essais d'explication possible. Il a été souvent suggéré par des coloniaux divers que l'esclave serait requis pour remplacer la femme : la perte que subit la famille dans son activité (enfants, travail) (¹) devrait être compensée par la livraison d'un être humain qui pourra travailler pour elle et lui donner des enfants (les enfants d'un esclave restant toujours clients du maître de leur père). Cette explication est manifestement l'application particulière au bọsọ́ngọ de la théorie de la compensation. Et pour cette partie spéciale de la dot, les règles du droit nkundó sont favorables à l'hypothèse en question. En effet, l'homme qui n'a pas effectué ce paiement ultime perd ses droits sur une des filles, dont la dot enrichira le clan maternel, en lui procurant les moyens d'obtenir une nouvelle épouse. Toutefois, les explications des indigènes font plutôt comprendre cette règle comme une espèce de sanction, ce que, en réalité, elle n'est pourtant pas, ainsi que nous l'avons vu.

---

(¹) Cfr. chap. VI, art. II.

§ 5. Élément essentiel de la dot.

Comme nous l'avons vu, la dot consiste en divers versements : likulá et ndanga, tous deux paiements d'engagement: walo, première partie de la dot proprement dite, et bọsọ́ngọ, partie qui parfait la dot. Les belonga, etc., peuvent être laissés hors de considération.

Or, de ces paiements, lequel est l'élément essentiel de la dot? Incontestablement, nous pouvons exclure likulá et ndanga. Tant la nature, le but et le nom de ces versements que le titre qu'ils font donner à la femme prouvent leur caractère de simples paiements de fiançailles. Des deux autres versements, nous pouvons conclure que c'est le walo qui est l'essentiel. Car le bọsọ́ngọ n'ajoute aucun caractère juridique nouveau propre à l'union, et son intérêt ne se révèle que dans des questions accessoires, qu'il est inutile de répéter ici.

§ 6. Le rôle de la famille.

Comme nous l'avons vu, c'est toujours le père, ou son successeur, qui arrange tout, qui s'occupe de tout, qui paraît au premier plan. Une affaire de mariage ne se conclut point en l'absence du chef de famille, tant du côté du mari que de celui de la femme.

Pendant la composition de ce travail, un jeune homme, Ikotama de Bongíli (Líókó, Ekonda), en possession des valeurs nécessaires au paiement de la dot pour sa future, Etúli, fille de Mpokú, de Lofelí (Bongíli), attend depuis de longs mois l'arrivée de son oncle, Ekamba, chef de famille, retenu par ses fonctions de catéchiste de la Mission protestante à Longa.

Quoique la mère reçoive une certaine part de la dot, elle n'a pourtant aucun droit d'intervenir dans la constitution et l'arrangement du mariage de son enfant. Son mari porte tout à sa connaissance, écoute même plus ou moins sérieusement l'exposé de ses vues, opinions et désirs, non parce qu'elle y a le moindre droit en justice, mais uniquement par esprit d'amour conjugal et de bonne entente.

⁂

Ce serait le lieu ici de faire la synthèse de ce que nous avons vu jusqu'à ce moment et d'essayer d'en déduire la conception juridique de la nature du mariage nkundó. Mais comme il nous reste à étudier diverses questions fort importantes, nous sommes obligé de remettre cette synthèse à la fin du chapitre III.

CHAPITRE III.

DES DIFFÉRENTES FORMES DE MARIAGES ET UNIONS PSEUDO-MATRIMONIALES.

Le droit et la pratique nkundó connaissent diverses formes sous lesquelles l'union conjugale peut se présenter, mais qui n'atteignent pas toutes le même degré de perfection, et dont certaines ne sont connues que par l'une ou l'autre partie des tribus envisagées.

En lonkundo, mariage se traduit par liála. Ce mot s'emploie tant au sens large et universel qu'au sens restreint, tout comme le verbe dont il dérive : bál, qui est usité pour désigner l'union sexuelle comme telle, même illégitime. Ainsi on dit : íy'áfé bale ô liála=les rapports entre ces deux (adultères ou célibataires) ne sont pas des actes isolés, mais des relations suivies, prenant la forme d'un concubinage et ainsi ayant une ressemblance extérieure avec le mariage.

Mbáli est celui qui épouse, donc mari. Mais ce terme est général, sans relation avec la conjointe, car dans ce sens mari se dit bŏme. Njéngi, du radical -éng, est celui qui a payé la dot. Ce peut être une personne distincte du mbáli, comme le démontrera l'examen du mariage par héritage (art. II).

Après un court retour sur le mariage type dont nous venons de décrire, au chapitre précédent, l'élaboration, nous examinerons d'une façon détaillée les autres formes d'unions matrimoniales et pseudo-matrimoniales en vogue chez les Nkundó. Ce sont, dans des articles successifs :

I. Le mariage par Nkumbó;
II. Le mariage par héritage, dont
III. Le mariage d'une Bosóló constitue une particularité;
IV. Le remplacement;
V. L'offre d'une épouse, ou Boóngá;
VI. L'échange, et enfin
VII. L'achat.

Une dernière forme est le mariage d'une esclave, dont nous réservons l'étude au chapitre VII (art. V).

ARTICLE I. — MARIAGE PAR NKUMBÓ.

Le mariage dont nous avons déjà décrit l'élaboration est le mariage type, appelé liála jă nkumbó. Nkumbó est l'acte du verbe -kumbol=prendre en mariage de la façon typique, et dont l'intransitif est -kumbwa=être prise en mariage. La forme transitive n'est appliquée qu'au mari: la forme intransitive ne vaut que pour l'épouse. Donc, de la part d'une femme, l'acte d'être prise en mariage est nécessairement exprimé par la forme intransitive-passive, et l'acte de l'homme par la forme transitive.

Le mariage par nkumbó est le mariage avec une femme libre, par versement direct de la dot aux parents de la femme avec entremise d'un ṇdonga.

Cette union existe, soit qu'on épouse une jeune fille qui n'a pas encore été mariée auparavant, soit qu'elle ait déjà eu un fiancé ou un mari. Dans ce dernier cas, l'union ne devient mariage par nkumbó qu'après le divorce (¹). Il diffère du premier par une grande circonspection dans la façon de procéder, — aussi longtemps que la dot n'a été restituée, — afin d'éviter la colère du mari abandonné et de ses conséquences (bagarres et guerres), et, de la part des parents, par le remboursement de la dot. La femme peut être rentrée dans sa famille, ou bien s'être rendue. directement ou indirectement, chez le nouvel amant. Ce dernier cas était rare, parce que gros de suites fâcheuses. Il n'était possible que quand le nouveau mari était un homme riche, qui paierait la dot sans tarder, ou redouté pour son courage, son ardeur combative, ses influences. la grande supériorité numérique de son clan, des clients et Batswá. Car aussi longtemps que la dot ne lui a pas été restituée, les droits de l'ancien mari restent.

---

(¹) Cfr. chap. VIII, art. II et III.

Les Nkundó considèrent cette espèce d'union matrimoniale comme étant le mariage parfait. Ceci deviendra plus clair par l'examen des autres formes de mariage que nous allons expliquer.

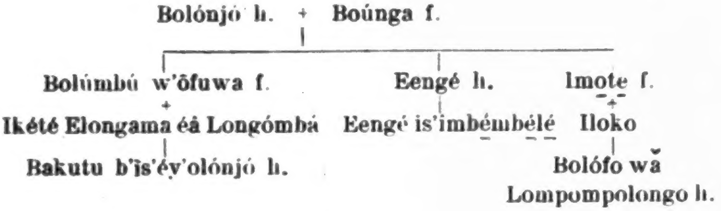
ARTICLE II. — MARIAGE PAR HÉRITAGE.

Cette forme s'appelle liála jă lisangó, ou lisangó tout court. Lisangó signifie héritage, du verbe sangol = hériter, et a le sens tout large, s'appliquant à n'importe quel objet.

La mort du mari ne rend pas, ipso facto, la liberté à la veuve. Elle demeure liée à la famille de son époux défunt.

Après la fête de fin de deuil, les veuves, qui jusque-là avaient dû s'abstenir de toute relation sexuelle. rentrent dans leurs familles respectives. Pendant la dernière période du deuil, elles avaient déjà eu l'occasion d'être courtisées, ou avaient repris leurs relations avec leurs amants antérieurs, parents ou non du mari défunt.

C'est à sa propre famille que la veuve doit être demandée en remariage. A l'exception de la bosóló, dont il sera question à l'article suivant. le partage des femmes entre les héritiers ne peut donc être considéré comme un partage de personnes comme telles, mais uniquement au titre des valeurs pécuniaires qu'elles représentent. En principe, elles reviennent au frère du défunt, mais d'autres parents, surtout neveux, peuvent avoir des droits totaux ou partiels sur l'une ou l'autre d'entre elles (¹). Ces droits sont basés sur l'origine des dots avec lesquelles les veuves ont été acquises. Nous y avons déjà touché au chapitre précédent, quant à certaines personnes. Encore d'autres cas peuvent se présenter. Au lieu d'entrer dans un long exposé, expliquons ceci plutôt par deux cas historiques :



Imotę, de Elękę (Bongíli), un des clans de Lokongo, est mariée à Iloko de Imǫmǫ (Bongíli). Avec les valeurs reçues de sa famille maternelle, leur fils Bolófo épouse trois femmes : Wăngi, Bosoí, favorite, et une esclave originaire de Bolaká (Wăngatá). A sa mort, les veuves appartiennent au clan Elękę, source de sa richesse. Deux prétendants se lèvent : Eengé (cousin germain du défunt, mais, en terminologie nkundó, son fils) et Bakutu, de Bokenda (Bęsǫmbǫ́), autre cousin germain, mais effectif devant la mentalité nkundó. Ils doivent se partager les veuves. Mais tous deux ont jeté leur dévolu sur la favorite et se la disputent. Finalement, elle est assignée à Bakutu, qui est le « père » de son rival et le « frère aîné » du défunt. L'esclave échoit également à Bakutu (²), tandis qu'Eengé doit se contenter de la première épouse. Mais lui et son clan conservent un droit sur ces femmes et leur progéniture. Cet exemple est assez ancien : deux petits-fils de Bakutu et d'Ikándó que je connais personnellement très bien ont maintenant entre 50 et 60 ans.

---

(¹) Cfr. chap. II, art. IV, § 3, et art. X.
(²) Qui la cède à Ikáudó y'ăngamba de Elękę.

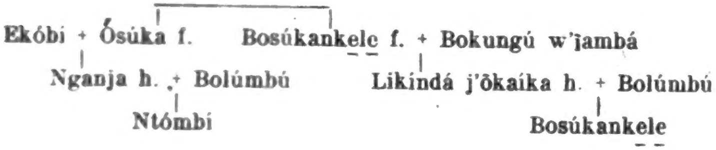
Voici un exemple plus récent :



Ekóbi + Ósúka f.
Bosúkankẹlẹ f. + Bokungú w'ĩambá
Nganja h. + Bolúmbú
Likíndá j'ŏkaíka h. + Bolúmbú
Ntómbi
Bosúkankẹlẹ

Deux sœurs Ósúka et Bosúkankẹlẹ, de Ikẹngọ, Ntómbá (Wăngatá), sont mariées respectivement à Ekóbí de Likáala (Bẹsọmbọ́, Bombwanja) et à Bokungú de Bombénga wă Ikolé (Bẹsọmbọ́). Nganja épouse Bolúmbú de Iámbo (Bonkoso). Devenue veuve, celle-ci est héritée — pour que le patrimoine ne se disperse pas — par le cousin germain maternel du défunt, Likíndá, auquel elle donne une fille Bosúkankẹlẹ, dont le père emploie la dot pour se procurer la femme Bombúla (Teresa), fille d'Ilito de Boléngé (Bongíli). A la mort de Likíndá les droits reviennent à Ntómbí (Joseph), dans la personne de la veuve Bombúla, nkita dẹ sa sœur utérine.

Si l'héritier légitime, ou un autre proche du défunt, désire épouser une veuve, il se rend, après avoir pris le conseil du chef de famille, chez les parents de la femme et leur donne des bekooli (¹) = 1 à 3 anneaux de cuivre, qui seront ajoutés au montant de la dot. Ce cadeau est une preuve de son respect pour la famille de la femme (²). Si après un certain temps la femme ne veut plus rester avec lui, mais aime un autre proche parent, celui-ci porte aussi ses bekooli: même si la femme n'est pas d'abord rentrée chez elle, mais a passé de l'un à l'autre. Les bekooli du premier sont restitués.

---

(¹) Substantif pluriel dérivé du verbe koola = chercher, prendre pour quelqu'un; donc des objets pour aller prendre quelqu'un.

(²) A côté de cette interprétation indigène nous pouvons en donner une autre, plus profonde et de nature juridique, ce qui sera fait plus loin (art. IX).

Si le nouveau mari n'est apparenté au défunt qu'à un degré éloigné (¹), il doit, outre les bekooli aux parents de la femme, donner à l'héritier un bompángá dénommé nsâsangó ou bosangójwá (chèvre, chienne, ou cinq à dix anneaux de cuivre, d'après les circonstances), qui ne fait pas partie de la dot, — celle-ci étant un payement à la famille de la femme, — mais est un cadeau destiné à ménager les susceptibilités de l'héritier et à gagner ou affermir sa sympathie bienveillante. Il équivaut à demander la permission de cohabiter avec cette femme et de bénéficier de son activité.

Nous devons donc distinguer deux sortes de mariage par héritage :

1° Le nouveau mari héritier appartient à la famille immédiate du défunt; il est eóto éâ ntsína : fils, frère, oncle, neveu, cousin;

2° Le nouveau mari héritier est d'une parenté éloignée: il est eóto éâ nsǫ́ngę́.

Dans le premier cas le mariage est considéré comme assez stable, difficile à rompre, mais pourtant plus facilement dissoluble qu'un mariage par nkumbó. La difficulté ou la facilité de la dissolution sont en rapport avec le degré de parenté. La raison que donnent les Nkundó pour la plus grande facilité de rupture est que le mari héritier n'a pas versé la dot lui-même : il n'a fait que la recevoir d'autrui. Aussi, s'il ne veut plus de la femme, il motive le renvoi en disant : « Ce n'est pas moi en personne qui ai payé la dot pour toi ». De son côté, la femme invoquera, mutatis mutandis, la même raison. Pour le reste, l'union est comme un mariage par nkumbó. C'est pour-quoi, lorsque la femme abandonne son mari, on emploie le terme kófa, tout comme pour un mariage par nkumbó.

---

(¹) On le nomme eóto éâ nsǫ́ngę́ = littéralement : parent du sommet; contre eóto éâ ntsína = parent de la base, donc rapproché.

La deuxième sorte de mariage par héritage est nettement différente. Le nouveau mari n'est pas le mari juridique: il n'est mari qu'au sens impropre, matériel. Ce sont les héritiers légitimes, donc les proches parents du défunt, et plus spécialement celui auquel la femme échoit de droit dans le partage de l'héritage, qui en restent les maîtres, et cela malgré les nsásangó payés par le mari usager. Cela appert de toutes les conséquences qui découlent de cette situation :

1° Les enfants qui naissent de cette union n'appartiennent pas au père naturel, mais aux propriétaires de la femme, aux bankóló. Ceux-ci, éventuellement, acquiesceront aussi à leur mariage et en toucheront la dot. C'est encore eux seuls qui ont le droit d'imposer un nom aux enfants.

2° Le faisant fonctions de mari n'a droit à l'activité de la femme que partiellement. Ainsi, si elle découvre un trésor enfoui dans son champ, qu'elle prenne un esclave en fuite ou trouve un objet quelconque de valeur délaissé, perdu, sans propriétaire connu, par exemple des anneaux, des objets forgés, des défenses d'éléphants, etc., ce n'est pas au mari qu'ils appartiennent, comme dans le mariage par nkumbó, mais aux maîtres. Ceux-ci ont encore droit à une partie des fruits de son industrie : pêche, chenilles, nourriture préparée même.

3° Si à une occasion quelconque le nouveau mari désire faire un cadeau ou versement à la famille de la femme, il doit demander l'intervention de l'époux propriétaire. Il le prie donc de l'accompagner : « óndaké likiló = fais-moi connaître mes beaux-parents; introduis-moi chez eux ». Ils s'y rendent avec le ndonga.

Il peut même se faire que le bọsọ́ngọ n'ait pas encore été versé et que l'époux non-propriétaire possède l'esclave ou les valeurs équivalentes. Avec la permission du propriétaire et accompagné du ndonga il pourra exécuter ce paiement. Pourtant il n'en reçoit aucun droit supplémentaire sur la femme.

Si celle-ci, un jour, retourne dans la famille immédiate du défunt, chez ceux qui sont ses « maîtres », ces derniers doivent restituer ces valeurs supplémentaires et toutes celles qui ont été versées par le mari « usager ». Si elle est prise en mariage par nkumbó par un étranger quelconque, la dot entière est restituée aux héritiers du défunt, qui doivent rembourser à l'homme qui a fait fonction de mari toutes les valeurs dotales qu'il a versées.

Cette pratique de « ndălaka likiló » n'est pas sans inconvénients. Il est, en effet, à redouter que l'héritier nie ces paiements et en refuse le remboursement. Cela est d'autant plus facile que le ndonga qui est intervenu est le même que celui qui a fonctionné dans l'élaboration du contrat matrimonial. Aussi remarque-t-on une tendance à l'omettre.

Notons que l'application de cette expression de ndălaka likiló n'est pas restreinte à ce seul cas. Il s'emploie aussi au sens obvie; ainsi lorsqu'il s'agit simplement de faire la connaissance de la famille de la femme, sans qu'il soit question de paiement, quoique, évidemment, pareille visite ne se conçoive point sans cadeaux; ou encore pour un homme qui désire s'unir à la parente de l'épouse d'un sien parent ou d'un ami quelconque.

4° Les présents que la famille de la femme fait au mari usager, par exemple à l'occasion d'une visite, d'un service rendu, etc., ne lui appartiennent pas, mais reviennent de droit aux héritiers. Si ceux-ci sont bien disposés à son égard, ils lui laissent l'usufruit d'une partie de ces biens, mais il n'y a aucun droit strict.

5° A la rupture de cette union par la femme on n'emploie pas le verbe -kófa, mais -kumbwa = être prise en mariage. Rejoint-elle un des proches parents du défunt, donc un de ses bankóló, on dit d'elle : « aǒlul'ěka bǒm' ǒkáé : elle est retournée chez son mari ». De son côté, l'homme qui a reçu la femme en usage peut à n'importe quel moment la répudier. Il lui dit : « kęndá éka baóm' ǎkę̌, eḿ ntsikwěngákí = va chez tes maris, je n'ai point payé la dot pour toi ». Quant aux valeurs données par lui en nsǎsangó, elles lui sont remboursées.

6° Enfin, si la femme meurt chez cet homme, il doit payer aux héritiers légitimes une indemnité (-foma mbálaka) qui est généralement un esclave ou sa valeur.

Cette deuxième sorte de mariage par héritage n'a donc rien qui caractérise le mariage légitime nkundó. Le mari n'a que l'usage de la femme. Ce n'est que l'héritier du défunt qui en toute vérité et légalité peut l'appeler épouse. D'ordinaire une femme engagée dans une telle union est plutôt appelée sa chose (yǒmba). Lui-même s'intitule son propriétaire, son maître, et l'on réserve le terme de mari à celui qui cohabite avec elle.

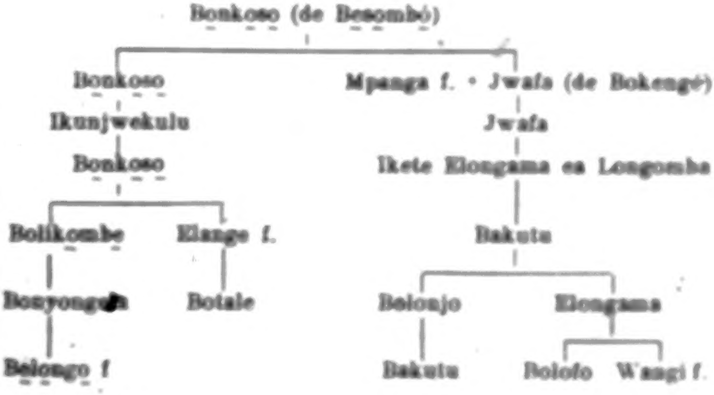
C'est à cause de toutes ces divergences manifestes que les Nkundó considèrent cette seconde espèce plutôt comme une union non matrimoniale. Avec le mariage proprement dit elle ne montre qu'une ressemblance extérieure : au fond la différence est essentielle, puisqu'elle n'en possède aucune propriété spécifique; ce n'est donc pas un mariage, mais un concubinage régulier.

Aussi un homme qui cohabite de cette façon avec une femme pour laquelle d'autres ont payé la dot est souvent l'objet d'allusions humiliantes. Ainsi il est traité de nkolasangó = preneur d'héritages (dans le sens de femmes héritées). Dans une dispute avec une femme pareille, sa congénère « achetée » régulièrement se permet parfois de battre des mains (-foma losáka) pour signifier sa supériorité. C'est la raison pour laquelle cette dernière est parfois appelée wǎli óá fomalosáka, par opposition à l'autre.

Les circonstances actuelles font encore mieux ressortir tout cela. Presque partout les indigènes même païens connaissent à présent l'intransigeance de l'Église catholique dans le domaine de l'indissolubilité du mariage religieux. Pour cette raison les « maîtres » ne permettent pas à une femme qui en droit leur appartient, mais qui de fait cohabite de la façon décrite avec un autre homme, de se marier religieusement avec celui-ci, à moins qu'il ne paie la dot.

Nous pouvons donc considérer cette dernière sorte d'union comme un concubinage qui ne satisfait pas aux conditions posées par la morale pour une union matrimoniale véritable. Quant à la première sorte, union avec un parent immédiat du défunt, la question est plus compliquée; mais j'opine pour sa valeur au point de vue moral. J'espère pourtant que d'autres voudront, pour plus de certitude, réexaminer le cas à la lumière des éléments de solution donnés.

Pour illustrer ce qui précède, citons un exemple historique des personnes dont voici la généalogie :



Bonkoso (de Besombó)
Bonkoso
Mpanga f. • Jwafa (de Bokengé)
Ikunjwekulu
Jwafa
Bonkoso
Ikete Elongama ea Longomba
Bolikombe
Elange f.
Bakutu
Bonyongwa
Botale
Bolonjo
Elongama
Belongo f
Bakutu
Bolofo
Wangi f.

Elongama (jr) épouse Ikǫ́kǫ́ de Bongili, fille de Bǫlę́kę́lá wá Nkunja et Tómpénda. Après sa mort, la veuve est prise en héritage par Bonyongela, auquel elle donne une fille Bẹlọ́ngọ́. Ce sont Bakutu (jr) et son cousin germain Bolófo qui disposent de la dot et sont responsables de ses palabres matrimoniales, à l'exclusion de son père Bonyongela (décédé depuis) et du frère de celui-ci, Bọnkọsọ. Par complaisance on a cédé à Bonyongela 18 anneaux. Les 30 autres ont été ajoutés par Bolófo à la dot de sa sœur Wǎngi pour se procurer la femme Ióngó (de Likolí, actuellement décédée). Après x ans, Ikọ́kọ́ abandonne Bonyongela pour Botálé, fils-de-la-sœur, qui, étant proche parent, ne donne pas de nsǎsangó. Ce qui avait été payé à ce titre par Bonyongela lui est restitué par Bakutu, puisque l'union est rompue. Cinq ans après, Ikọ́kọ́ quitte Botálé, dont elle n'est pas satisfaite, parce qu'il est paresseux et ne lui procure pas assez de gibier, de vêtements, etc. Elle se rend chez Ilumbé de Ngọmbẹ Mbálanga (Bongíli), qui, étant parent éloigné du côté maternel, donne les nsǎsangó réglementaires.

Un autre cas se présenta un de ces jours (mai 1933). Un de nos chrétiens, Babolá Michel, de Ianda (Bonkoso), veut prendre femme. Il a jeté son dévolu sur Bolúmbú, fille de Ntando éy'ilengu de Bofalambóka. Celle-ci, après le décès de son mari, Esalé éà Lonkongá (en 1926), avait été demandée par Bombóngo, parent éloigné d'Esalé, comme de coutume, par l'entremise de son frère aîné Engambí, et en versant un bompángá de 4 bakonga plus 20 francs. Entre-temps, Babolá a atteint l'âge adulte : il quitte notre école et rentre dans son village natal. Comme il est le neveu direct d'Esalé éà Lonkongá, il a un droit strict sur cette femme, qui quitte Bombóngo. Seulement, comme celui-ci est protestant, une question morale se pose au prêtre : il s'agit de savoir s'il existe un véritable mariage entre eux. Car, dans l'affirmative, il ne saurait être question de mariage entre Babolá et Bolúmbú, l'Église ne rompant pas un mariage valide entre chrétiens. Conformément à ce qui a été dit ci-dessus, une union comme celle du cas présent n'a pas, aux yeux des Nkundó, la nature du mariage type. Je voulais pourtant avoir tous mes apaisements et tâcher d'obtenir la plus grande certitude possible. A cet effet, je me rendis à Bǫnjǫku au moment de la perception de l'impôt. J'y trouvai beaucoup d'hommes réunis. Je soulevai la question du mariage par héritage. L'entretien se termina par l'opinion unanime que dans le cas proposé rien ne s'opposait à la nouvelle union. Tous les cas pareils, ajouta-t-on, sont plutôt une espèce de concubinage admis par la loi ancestrale, mais ne présentant aucune propriété d'un véritable mariage.

Afin d'éviter les inconvénients nombreux inhérents à cette seconde sorte de mariage par héritage, le mari, s'il a quelque richesse, fera tout son possible pour réunir les valeurs de la dot qu'il versera à son beau-père et que celui-ci emploiera au remboursement de l'héritier. Du fait de ce versement, qui se fait par l'intermédiaire d'un nouveau ndonga désigné par lui-même, la femme lui appartient pleinement. Et le mariage par héritage se change en mariage par nkumbó. Les besangójwá que l'époux avait donnés à l'héritier doivent lui être restitués, le lien qui l'unissait à cette femme étant rompu par ces formalités.

Il arrive que l'héritier voie ce nouveau versement de très mauvais œil et qu'il s'en trouve offensé. Autrefois cela pouvait donner lieu à une guerre, illégale il est vrai; après quoi, comme toujours, l'affaire s'arrangeait quand même.

D'autre part, il arrive aussi, et même assez communément, que la femme, tout en aimant son « mari » (au sens impropre), ne veut nullement du changement. Elle reste attachée de cœur à la parenté de son mari défunt, par amour pour celui-ci, ou par affection pour la famille qui l'a toujours bien traitée. Il n'est pas rare que le « concubin », lui proposant de l'épouser régulièrement, se heurte à une opposition irréductible. La femme peut même en être offusquée au point de l'abandonner pour un proche parent du défunt.

Dans ce domaine, un autre cas encore peut se présenter, bien qu'il soit plutôt rare : c'est celui, par exemple, de Lowåka, fille de Bompúkú de Bọntọlẹ. Après la mort de son époux, Botúna des Basékà Ilúka (Lofelí), elle est prise en mariage par un parent à lui, Nsẹngẹ, qui donne les besangójwá réglementaires à Imọmọ de Bofalambóka, bọ́nankáná de Botúna. Après un certain temps, Imọmọ, ayant eu une petite palabre avec Nsẹngẹ, n'entend plus maintenir la situation; il exige un mariage régulier pour rentrer dans ses droits dotaux sur Lowåka. D'accord avec celle-ci, Nsẹngẹ verse soixante bakonga aux parents de la femme, qui remboursent à Imọmọ. Ce dernier rend les besangójwá reçus et Lowåka devient ainsi la véritable épouse de Nsẹngẹ.

On le voit, on trouve ici toute la gamme des variantes individuelles selon les tempéraments et les sentiments des personnes en question. En conclusion, ce qui est le plus répandu, c'est l'attachement à la famille du défunt, ou le remariage en règle.

Dans ce dernier cas la veuve se rend chez un homme non apparenté, soit immédiatement après le deuil, soit après un certain temps de vie conjugale avec l'héritier. Celui-ci a droit au remboursement de la dot. Le nouveau mari doit faire tous les versements usuels par l'intermédiaire de son ndonga à lui, tout comme pour un mariage à nkumbó initial. Et de la sorte on ne donne plus à cette union le nom de mariage par héritage, avec lequel elle n'a rien de commun.

Dans tout mariage par héritage, que le nouveau mari soit héritier ou simplement parent du défunt, c'est-à-dire lorsque aucun versement de dot n'est intervenu, le mari doit donner à la femme un cadeau nommé isengó, donc cadeau d'héritage. La femme remet ce présent à sa famille ou le conserve pour ses besoins personnels. En tout cas, il n'est pas considéré comme faisant partie des valeurs dotales.

Enfin, pour tout remariage d'une veuve, que ce soit par héritage ou par nouveau nkumbó, le mari doit, avant d'avoir avec elle des relations conjugales, lui offrir un présent d'un ou deux anneaux ou couteaux équivalents. Ce cadeau se donne, soit le même jour que l'isangó, soit un autre, selon les cas. Il s'appelle boingé = couchette, ou, plus communément, ikondeyantangé (de -kondeya = faire monter sur, et ntangé = lit). C'est un cadeau de consolation après le veuvage. Contrairement à l'isangó, il fait partie de la dot. C'est probablement à ce cadeau de l'ikondeyantangé qu'Engels fait allusion lorsque, dans son étude citée sur les Wangata, il parle de « racheter le deuil ».

De l'examen du mariage par héritage il ressort que la veuve est libre de se remarier à l'homme de ses préférences, que ce soit l'héritier ou un autre parent du défunt, ou un étranger quelconque. N'est exceptée que la femme qui a été léguée par le défunt (¹). Si plus tard l'héritier ne satisfait pas à ses obligations envers elle, elle pourra réagir comme dans un mariage par nkumbó. Quant au cas spécial de la bosálo, nous allons en traiter.

Une autre loi se déduit des faits observés : aussi longtemps qu'aucun nouveau versement de dot n'est intervenu, la femme continue à appartenir à la famille du défunt. Seule la restitution de la dot rompt le contrat et le prive de tous ses effets (²).

Enfin, on y constate la propriété collective dans le clan ou la grande-famille. Un proche parent, Bosálo, par exemple, épousant la veuve, la considère en droit comme sa conjointe légitime, tout comme elle l'était du défunt; aucune nouvelle convention dotale ne doit intervenir. Le contrat préexistant continue à valoir. La seule nouveauté introduite est qu'un autre individu de la famille du défunt contracte le lien matrimonial avec la veuve. Que ce soit l'héritier légitime ou un proche parent qui épouse la femme, la chose revient au même de par la communauté d'intérêts (les enfants sont aussi bien ceux de Bosúlú que de l'héritier, par exemple (7).

(¹) Le Nkundó observe scrupuleusement les stipulations d'un testament ([illegible] ou [illegible]), parce qu'il craint la vengeance du défunt, qui, d'ailleurs, au moment où il exprime ses dernières volontés, ajoute d'ordinaire la menace : « Si vous ne les exécutez point, vous me suivrez dans la mort ».

(²) Nous devons encore revenir sur ces points à l'art. IX et suiv.

A cause de la similitude superficielle des cas, il est utile de mentionner ici que la demande en usage d'une femme n'est pas restreinte aux seules veuves. Elle peut aussi s'appliquer à une femme de polygame durant la vie de son mari; mais elle n'est pratiquée que par un proche parent, et encore n'est-elle pas vue d'un bon œil. Généralement, le cas se présente comme suit : un homme tombe amoureux d'une des femmes du harem de son parent, et elle partage ses sentiments. Il la prend chez lui. Palabre. Fureur du mari, qui cesse toute relation avec le séducteur et ne veut plus de ses invitations ni de ses cadeaux, ce qui est la preuve d'une brouille sérieuse. Alors les autres parents interviennent pour réconcilier les deux adversaires, et voyant qu'il n'y a pas moyen d'empêcher la cohabitation ou jugeant que la chose n'est pas opportune, ils tâchent d'amadouer le mari légitime. L'amant lui fait remettre, par l'entremise de son aîné, un cadeau à titre de supplication. Le mari, ne trouvant personne en sa faveur, s'incline devant le fait accompli, accepte le présent (bompángá) et cède la femme en usage. Au lieu de s'y prendre de cette façon cavalière, l'amant peut également faire la demande d'une manière normale. Lorsque pour l'une ou l'autre raison les deux amoureux veulent cesser la cohabitation, ils se séparent sans autre cérémonie. Si le mari est bienveillant, il rend à son parent les valeurs données, et l'incident est clos.

---

chap. VIII et IX.

(7) Nous reviendrons sur cette question plus loin (art. IX).

Tel le cas arrivé autrefois à Insílǫ de Bokenyola (Bǫnjǫku) (1) : Dans le harem de son oncle maternel, E̲fǫnja la'Ófuwa, originaire de Bǫnjǫku, mais intégré dans les Bongale, il avait remarqué une certaine Mbiléeyenga, originaire de Bosáá, et « son cœur s'était fendu », comme disent les Nkundó. Par l'intermédiaire de son cousin germain aîné Mpętsí éà Lingǫmǫ, il envoie un bompángá de 6 anneaux à E̲fǫnja, en le priant de bien vouloir lui permettre la cohabitation avec cette femme. Sa requête est bien accueillie. Mais après un certain nombre d'années, leur passion s'étant refroidie et Insílǫ désirant contracter un mariage régulier pour se donner une postérité, il se sépare de Mbilé, qui rentre chez son mari. Celui-ci rend à Insílǫ les 6 anneaux, parce qu'il ne veut point s'enrichir aux dépens de son parent.

ARTICLE III. — LA BOSÓLÓ.

Le mariage d'une bosóló constitue une forme spéciale d'héritage de femmes.

Le terme bosóló est en usage partout. Les Injǫ́lǫ́ emploient encore un synonyme : njémó, terme impropre dérivé du verbe émola=faire se lever. De cette façon on dit : émoja bǫ̃na njémó = donner une bosóló à l'enfant (fils, fille) (2). Chez les Beloko et leurs Elíngá on entend, à côté de bosóló, encore le mot bombíjí.

Au jour où les veuves sont « levées de terre » et peuvent « remonter sur le lit » (3), tous ceux qui ont titre et droits de père, c'est-à-dire ceux qui ont la préséance, hommes ou femmes, s'assemblent avec le fils de la sœur, pour procéder à la cérémonie. Comme dans toutes les affaires, on se passe la parole par respect mutuel. Elle revient à l'aîné :

---

(1) Actuellement chef des Bonkoso.

(2) Ainsi encore les tribus Elanga de la région de Losanganya.

(3) Cfr. Les Coutumes funéraires des Nkundó. Les Elingá font la cérémonie quelques jours seulement après l'enterrement; les Boangi même avant. Les Injǫló commencent à imiter les Elingá.

père, frère, tante paternelle (isómoto). Le préposé fait un petit discours de circonstance, puis donne une des veuves au premier-né des enfants (nsǫ́mi), en tenant compte de ses préférences, dont on s'est assuré préalablement. On la lui remet en disant : « Nous arrachons pour toi la bosóló que ton père t'a laissée = tókokumela bosóló bôki isé okotsikéláká ». La signification propre de kuma est : saisir en tirant vers soi, arracher, et inclut une idée de force. L'application primaire se trouve dans kuma ballo = arracher des herbes; kuma nsálá = arracher des plumes, etc. Mais on l'emploie également pour tout ce qu'on prend d'une façon vigoureuse vers soi, comme kuma mbǫmbǫ = arracher une chikwangue d'un tas, etc.

La bosóló est toujours donnée au premier-né, sans égard au sexe et à l'exclusion des autres enfants. Si l'aîné est une fille, elle passe la bosóló à son frère, premier-né des garçons. Il s'agit ici de l'exercice d'un véritable droit d'aînesse, droit qui doit être racheté ou plutôt payé par le frère, en faisant à sa sœur un cadeau qui consiste surtout en poules, argent, menus objets utiles, souvent une quantité de bière. La même règle vaut si l'aîné cède la femme à son puîné, parce que celui-ci l'aime ardemment, ou bien — à présent — parce que l'ayant droit ne veut pas prendre une seconde femme.

Subsidiairement, une bosóló est encore donnée au bǫ́nankáná. Seul l'aîné de la sœur dont le défunt a touché la dot peut revendiquer ce droit. Si la dot de la mère du neveu n'entre pour rien dans la constitution du harem à partager, il n'a droit à une bosóló que si celle-ci n'est pas la nkita d'autrui, c'est-à-dire si elle a été acquise au moyen de richesses que le défunt s'est procurées par son activité personnelle. Si le défunt s'est procuré des femmes avec les dots de deux sœurs qui toutes deux laissent des fils, ce n'est que l'aîné de la sœur aînée qui a ce droit (1).

---

(1) Il peut arriver qu'ainsi un des fils se trouve déshérité par les droits du bǫ́nankáná. Celui-ci devra alors — si du moins il a une épouse

La délivrance d'une bosóló à d'autres parents que le fils ou la fille du défunt semble une extension du droit primitivement réservé à cet enfant.

Dans la remise d'une bosóló il est tenu compte des désirs de l'ayant droit. Pourtant le fils aîné n'obtient jamais la favorite de son père : seul le frère aîné peut en hériter.

Le fils peut ainsi recevoir en bosóló sa propre mère, mais uniquement s'il n'y a point d'autres veuves et si par ailleurs il ne possède aucun autre moyen de se procurer une épouse. Évidemment, il ne peut l'épouser. Elle lui est donnée pour qu'il perçoive le montant de la dot, lorsqu'elle sera remboursée pour le remariage.

Si le défunt ne laisse pas de harem, mais bien d'autres richesses, la bosóló est constituée par l'un ou l'autre objet de grande valeur. Ceci semble indiquer que le mot bosóló ne s'applique à la femme que par une extension du sens, qui, au fond et primitivement, serait « héritage par droit d'aînesse ».

Dès que la bosóló a été assignée à qui de droit, elle sort du groupe des veuves et se rend chez son nouveau mari; elle peut désormais cohabiter avec lui, tous deux étant dès ce moment dispensés de l'observation des prescriptions et interdits du deuil. Il arrive que la femme, par affection pour son mari défunt et par chagrin, prie son nouvel époux de patienter encore quelque temps. Son désir est respecté; car le refus d'acquiescer serait une injure fort grave qui pourrait causer la rupture immédiate.

Malgré la rareté du cas, — inconnu même autrefois, à ce qu'il paraît, — il se peut que la femme choisie comme bosóló refuse le mari auquel on la destine. En voici un ou les valeurs nécessaires dans son clan paternel — céder cette femme à son cousin malheureux. C'est pour lui un devoir d'amour familial (lóóte) auquel il ne peut pas se soustraire.

---

exemple remontant à 1932 : Mpia de Mbanja avait « acquis » pour son fils aîné Bọmpẹlí, la femme Bôngongo d'Ilángá. Mais le jeune homme n'en voulait point. Pour ne pas gaspiller son argent, le père incorpore la femme dans son harem. Après la mort du vieux Bôngongo est donnée en bosóló à ce même Bọmpẹlí. Cette fois c'est elle qui n'en veut pas, et pour comble de malheur toutes les veuves le refusent de même. Plus tard un petit-cousin de Bọmpẹlí, nommé Bosénjá, désire épouser Bôngongo. Mais par dépit, Bọmpẹlí ne veut la lui céder que contre une dot.

Même si, comme la chose se passe d'ordinaire, la femme ne fait aucune opposition et que, sans aimer le nouvel époux, elle l'accepte, soit par nonchalance, soit pour pouvoir sortir de sa réclusion, ou pour tout autre mobile, elle trouve toujours le moyen, si elle le veut, de quitter son mari pour un autre proche parent qu'elle préfère. Ceci indique que la stabilité de l'union de la bosóló, bien que théoriquement plus grande que dans un simple héritage, ne l'est point dans la pratique et n'atteint pas le degré de fixité du mariage par nkumbó. Probablement la raison doit en être cherchée dans l'identité foncière des deux unions, où les droits de la famille exercent une grande influence. Voici un cas récent : Ifungá, fille d'Esukúlu, de Bongangá (Boéndé), et veuve de Bọlékélá de Bongili, a été assignée comme bosóló au fils aîné de son mari, nommé Boongo. Plus tard elle a prétendu ne point l'aimer, mais désirer devenir l'épouse d'Ekamba, frère de Boongo. Ce dernier ne s'oppose pas. Seulement elle ne tarde pas à rompre la nouvelle union. Cette fois, le chef trouve qu'elle exagère, et pour faire plaisir à Boongo — qui s'est établi dans son clan maternel, clan auquel appartient aussi le chef — la condamne à quelques semaines de prison. Son attitude est approuvée par toutes les personnes raisonnables. Et malgré la répression des excès, — répression nécessaire, — la liberté de la femme se trouve sauvegardée.

Au point de vue moral, nous avons déjà indiqué qu'on peut mettre sur le même pied le mariage d'une bosóló et l'héritage d'une femme quelconque quand elle reste dans la proche parenté du défunt. Il n'en diffère que par une difficulté un peu plus grande de le rompre.

ARTICLE IV. — LE REMPLACEMENT OU SUBSTITUTION.

Lors de la rupture d'un mariage, au lieu de parfaire le divorce par la restitution de la dot, souvent on a recours à la pratique du remplacement de la divorcée par une parente (sœur, cousine, nièce, etc.). Cette femme substituée s'appelle bankitsá (¹), tout comme le remplacement. Ce nom est un substantif pluriel dérivé de kita=devenir, kitana=remplacer, succéder. Le singulier en serait linkitsá, mais il n'est jamais employé pour ce cas.

Généralement, la remplaçante ne fait pas d'objection contre l'obligation sociale qui lui incombe, à moins d'une répugnance exceptionnelle. On tâche alors de trouver dans la famille une autre personne. On va même jusqu'à enlever une parente à son mari pour la substituer, si, notamment, on ne trouve aucune autre remplaçante et qu'on tient davantage à l'alliance rompue qu'à l'autre.

Les Nkundó justifient la pratique de la substitution par les raisons suivantes :

1° La continuation d'une alliance heureuse vaut mieux qu'une nouvelle qui doit encore faire ses preuves;

2° Le désir d'éviter les palabres et tracas inhérents au procès de la restitution de la dot et de hâter l'acquisition d'une nouvelle épouse, ce qui vaut même lorsque le remboursement n'a pas été retardé outre mesure;

3° Le souci pour les enfants nés de l'union rompue.

(¹) Les Ekonda disent nkitsá.

Ce motif est très important, car les enfants ont tout intérêt à recevoir comme belle-mère une proche parente, qui les considère comme ses propres enfants et qui est donc préférable à une femme tout à fait étrangère.

Comme lors d'une substitution il n'y a aucune restitution dotale, ainsi il n'y a pas de nouvelle dot à payer. Mais les visites causées par les pourparlers ne se conçoivent pas sans cadeaux. Inévitablement, le remplacement entraîne donc une augmentation des valeurs dotales, car à l'ancienne dot viennent à chaque occasion s'ajouter de nouveaux paiements. Plus il y a eu de substitutions successives, plus le montant de la dot risque d'être élevé. Ainsi j'ai connu des cas où une dot qui au début était de 100 anneaux avait à la fin atteint la somme de près de 300.

Dans l'opinion des Nkundó la livraison d'une bankitsá est un mariage véritable et valide; mais elle n'est pas une nouvelle union, mais uniquement le transfert sur une autre personne d'obligations qui n'ont jamais cessé d'exister, et donc d'un contrat matrimonial qui n'a jamais été annulé. C'est ainsi qu'on dit de la femme pour laquelle le paiement dotal a été fait, qu'elle a débuté, fondé le mariage dans lequel l'autre lui a simplement succédé : X. ámangáki liála, Y. aósuluŋgana (manga= commencer, ou bondola= fonder, ou múmola= débuter [le tout premier début]; contre: kitana= remplacer, sulungana= succéder, mumola= continuer). Il s'agit pour eux d'une véritable succession dans un office, d'un remplacement, non pas matériel et extérieur, mais pleinement juridique, de la même façon qu'un prince héritier succède à son père dans la royauté; le pouvoir et la dignité royale sont uniques, et continuent d'exister dans la diversité des individus qui en sont investis; ou, comme en droit, lorsqu'il n'y a pas novation malgré le changement de débiteur (¹).

(¹) Nous reviendrons sur cette question à l'art. IX.

C'est à cause de cela que, dans le harem, la bankitsá occupe le même rang que la femme qu'elle remplace et que la livraison se fait par l'intermédiaire du même ndonga qui est intervenu dans l'élaboration du contrat initial.

Quelle est la valeur de cette union par remplacement devant la loi naturelle? Est-elle ou non entachée d'un vice radical? On discute le droit du pouvoir civil à rompre le mariage contracté légitimement (1). Supposons qu'il l'ait, et, d'autre part, que la femme consente réellement. Mais dans son idée, comme dans celle de tout son milieu, il s'agit de se soumettre à un devoir familial imposé par les lois qui régissent son peuple. On peut se demander si cette stipulation est défendable devant les principes fondamentaux du droit en général et devant la morale. En tout cas, l'opinion unanime des indigènes que ce remplacement est la continuation du mariage dans une autre personne est certainement fausse, car elle provient sans aucun doute de l'insuffisance de leur analyse, qui leur fait perdre de vue un point capital du problème, en concentrant l'attention spécialement sur la nature clanique de l'union matrimoniale (voir ci-après, art. IX).

Quoi qu'il en soit, on peut dire sans crainte que, dans la grande majorité des cas, si la femme indigène se soumet à cette loi, c'est parce qu'elle la considère comme une obligation à laquelle, pour le bien de la famille, il ne lui est pas permis de se soustraire.

Aussi la jeune génération commence-t-elle à faire de l'opposition. Ainsi il y a ici, chez les Sœurs, une jeune fille de Boímbo, Ngọngọ, qui depuis sa première enfance a été donnée à Bokungú, de Bongíli, en remplacement de sa sœur Ilumbé. N'étant pas encore nubile, elle vivait toujours chez ses parents. Ceux-ci devenant chrétiens, Ngọngọ a également été baptisée. D'autre part, un fils de

---

(1) A présent l'opinion affirmative est pratiquement délaissée par les philosophes, juristes et moralistes catholiques.

Bokungú, Longála, s'étant fait catéchumène, puis venu à l'école, et baptisé; son père lui laisse Ngọngọ comme future femme. Celle-ci (ayant maintenant vers les 17 ans) ne veut pas de ce mariage. Non pas qu'elle refuse Longála comme mari, mais elle ne veut pas être mariée en simple bankitsá; elle exige un mariage par versement de dot, et cela malgré les difficultés de la procédure, car c'est une opération doublement inutile et, pour les Nkundó, stupide.

Il existe une seconde forme de substitution : le remplacement après décès. Lorsqu'un homme a perdu sa femme et que tant lui-même que les parents de la défunte tiennent à leur alliance, il leur porte, par l'entremise du ndonga, 20 ou 25 anneaux, en vue de l'obtention d'une nouvelle épouse. Ce paiement s'appelle ibóleóko, dérivé de -ból = battre (par exemple l'argile du sol), et eóko = emplacement de maison. Les Injọ́lọ́ le désignent par un autre nom, qui a pourtant la même portée significative : sangólékojí = héritage de terrain à habiter.

Voici comment on procède : Le veuf ayant satisfait à toutes ses obligations funéraires, à la fin de la deuxième visite à ses beaux-parents, et au moment de prendre congé d'eux, ceux-ci lui demandent : « Eh bien, tu t'en vas; que comptes-tu faire maintenant? » Il répond : « J'ai beaucoup aimé votre fille. Elle est morte, et je l'ai enterrée. Voici que j'ai rempli tous mes devoirs. J'ai toujours vécu en bons termes avec vous et je désire continuer nos relations. Seulement, il faut que d'abord je consulte ma famille. Ensuite nous verrons. » De cette façon il exprime son désir de continuer d'être leur gendre. Après avoir pris l'avis de sa parenté, il retourne chez son beau-père avec l'ibóleóko. « Voici, je vous apporte l'ibóleóko; je viens pour battre l'emplacement de la maison; donnez-moi une épouse. » Le beau-père a déjà choisi la fille, sœur, etc., qui doit remplacer la défunte et en a déjà, en privé, référé à leur gendre. Il lui remet celle qui lui est destinée, en disant : « Voici ton épouse » [1].

Dans ce cas, comme dans celui de la substitution après divorce, les beaux-parents enlèvent parfois, à cet effet, une fille à son mari légitime, pour la constituer remplaçante.

Ces 20-25 anneaux de l'ibóleóko ne sont qu'un début de paiement. Tout comme pour le mariage par nkumbó, on exige le versement d'une dot complète. La dot à payer après est pourtant moins élevée que pour les mariages ordinaires. Malgré cela, l'idée de remplacement existe comme celle de la continuation de l'union préexistante, bien qu'elle soit moins apparente que dans la substitution pour cause de divorce. Et ainsi, dans le harem, la remplaçante occupe le même rang que la défunte.

Le remplacement après décès a les mêmes raisons d'être que la substitution pour cause de divorce.

Quoique les deux sortes de substitution se ressemblent par le fait que dans les deux cas il s'agit du remplacement d'une épouse par une autre, les différences sont pourtant considérables.

La substitution après divorce ne donne pas lieu au paiement d'une nouvelle dot, ni par conséquent à l'expression type du consentement de la femme. Le remplacement après décès, au contraire, requiert le versement d'une nouvelle dot et l'expression publique du consentement, qui a lieu au moment où le mari verse les valeurs de l'ibóleóko et qui se fait de la même façon que pour un mariage par nkumbó direct. Ces deux différences, mais la dernière tout particulièrement, font que le remplacement d'une décédée est, juridiquement, un mariage type.

---

[1] Chez les Ekonda, le versement de l'ibóleóko ne porte pas de nom spécial. En outre, avant de remettre au mari la remplaçante, les parents exigent 20 à 30 anneaux supplémentaires à titre de paiement pour le deuil de la mère, et pour cette raison nommés basáki ba nyangó.

ARTICLE V. — L'OFFRE D'UNE ÉPOUSE.

Cette sorte d'union « matrimoniale » sera plus aisément et plus clairement expliquée par un exemple que par une longue description. Un homme, Eale, a besoin de valeurs pour terminer une palabre quelconque (dette, amende, indemnité, dot à payer, etc.). Comme il n'en possède pas et que l'affaire est urgente, il emprunte à Ekamba, en lui offrant sa fille Wĕtsi. L'offre de la fille est le moyen de décider Ekamba à donner les valeurs demandées. De ce fait, Wĕtsi appartient à Ekamba, qui a sur elle tous les droits d'un mari. Elle n'est pas esclave. On pourrait la nommer gage, mais les Nkundó ne lui appliquent pas ce nom. Ils lui appliquent un terme spécifique : boóngá.

Le nom boóngá est en usage chez toutes les tribus envisagées (¹). Seuls les Injọ́lọ́ nomment une femme pareille, tout simplement wăjí óâ njélá = épouse amenée; donc non prise par dot et sans l'initiative du mari. La locution verbale employée pour « donner une femme en boóngá » est kúndela Ekamba boóngá. Elle nous donne l'origine du terme. Boóngá, en effet, signifie un morceau de bois, un stick. Dans le cas présent, il est fait allusion à une branche de grosseur moyenne qui est posée en travers d'un petit puits et qui, jointe à une deuxième de grosseur différente, peut faire fonction de lokolé. Le verbe kúndela est la forme objective (exprimant la relation avec un complément indirect) de kúnda : battre, frapper. La locution signifie donc primitivement : battre le boóngá pour appeler quelqu'un au secours. En ne parlant pas du lokolé, mais de son « ersatz », on veut exprimer l'impasse dans laquelle est engagé celui qui vient demander les moyens d'en sortir. Il s'agit d'une affaire grave et urgente; il n'a pas le temps de chercher l'instrument propre, mais dans son empressement il se contente du premier moyen de fortune qui lui tombe sous les yeux, pour appeler quelqu'un qui pourrait le tirer de son embarras.

---

(¹) Comme chez les Ekonda; mais selon la règle générale de variation dialectale, ils disent bowóngá.

Une autre expression employée est foma losáka, fomela N. losáka = battre un losáka, c'est-à-dire un battement de mains. L'idée est la même : l'homme qui ne voit pas d'issue à sa difficulté est représenté comme battant des mains, afin d'attirer l'attention de quelqu'un qui puisse l'aider. C'est un appel au secours. De là le mot losáka est parfois transféré à la femme, comme on le fait pour boóngá.

Bien que le mari ait sur la boóngá et sur son activité tous les droits conjugaux, elle n'est pas à proprement parler son épouse. On peut simplement dire qu'elle lui appartient et que c'est cette appartenance qui engendre les droits du soi-disant mari. Ce dernier n'a pas de devoirs envers elle, comme dans un mariage ordinaire. Ainsi, si la femme meurt chez Ekamba, même sans qu'aucun versement dotal ait été effectué, le père n'a rien à réclamer, puisque, de sa propre initiative, il lui a offert sa fille. Si la boóngá s'enfuit de chez son possesseur, celui-ci a droit, en plus du remboursement normal des valeurs prêtées, à un supplément de 10-20 anneaux (ou davantage, proportionnellement au montant du prêt), en dédommagement de la perte qu'il vient de subir. Ce supplément est dû même lorsque le possesseur a payé une dot au père de la femme. en vue d'un mariage légitime.

Car s'il aime cette femme, rien ne s'oppose à ce qu'il l'épouse régulièrement. Il le fait d'autant plus volontiers que la femme, aussi longtemps qu'elle reste simple objet de gage, est en butte au mépris et aux railleries de ses congénères. On lui dit : « Tu n'es pas une épouse; tu n'es qu'une boóngá; tu ne diffères point d'une esclave, car ton mari n'a pas versé de dot pour toi ».

Une fois la dot versée, la boóngá devient véritable épouse, et toutes les règles du droit s'appliquent à cette union, qui désormais est un mariage régulier, conforme en tout à un mariage par nkumbó. Quant au prêt, il est englobé dans le montant total de la dot.

La mise en gage d'une femme se fait aussi par l'intermédiaire d'un ndonga, qui, pourtant, porte le nom spécial de ndonga éâ ntsíkọọ́nda, ce qui, littéralement, se traduit : « témoin de je ne t'ai pas prié ». On l'oppose ainsi à un ndonga au sens propre. En voici la raison : le véritable ndonga est désigné par le mari; or, dans le cas présent, c'est au contraire le père de la fille qui demande son intervention. Par conséquent, l'homme qui prend la boóngá contre le prêt n'est pas obligé de reconnaître sa qualité de témoin officiel et régulier. Ce témoin n'est pas ndonga du mariage, mais doit témoigner du contrat de gage.

Lorsqu'une femme donnée en boóngá s'enfuyait de chez son possesseur, celui-ci s'attaquait au ndonga et, trouvant l'occasion favorable, il le faisait prisonnier. Si l'affaire ne s'arrangeait pas il pouvait le réduire en esclavage. Mais dans ce cas il avait à compter avec la vengeance de la famille du ndonga, bien que celle-ci, selon la norme régulière et légitime, devait plutôt exercer sa vengeance contre l'homme qui avait demandé l'intervention de leur parent. Car c'est lui qui est responsable de tout et doit, en droit, en endosser toutes les conséquences. L'exception, arrivant parfois réellement, était due à la loi du plus fort, qui, ici comme dans les pays « civilisés », est souvent la meilleure (1).

Lorsque l'homme qui a reçu la boóngá désire l'épouser régulièrement, il désigne son ndonga à lui, qui remplit toutes les conditions requises. Ce n'est donc pas le ndonga de la mise en gage qui est ndonga du mariage. Pourtant, comme il est intervenu dans la livraison en boóngá, on lui laisse généralement l'honneur d'être associé comme témoin supplémentaire au ndonga principal.

---

(1) L'intervention d'un ndonga éâ ntsíkọọ́nda n'est pas exclusivement réservée à ce seul cas. Elle se rencontre encore dans d'autres circonstances. Par exemple, Esalé de Bonkoso a été fait prisonnier par Isia de Bongili. Mpetsí est parent d'Esalé et lié d'amitié avec Isia. Il prie celui-ci de rendre la liberté à Esalé, se constituant garant du paiement de la rançon, et devient donc ndonga éâ ntsíkọọ́nda. Si le paiement est trop retardé, Isia se venge sur Mpetsí et a même le droit de lui ravir sa femme à titre de compensation.

De tout ce qui précède il ressort clairement que l'offre d'une boóngá, bien que possédant certains caractères extérieurs de l'union matrimoniale, ne peut nullement être considérée comme un mariage.

Un cas fort semblable, mais qui appartient désormais au passé, est l'offre d'une femme pour implorer la paix (bǫǫ́ndǫ). Citons un exemple historique (1) : au temps où les populations habitant actuellement cette région se trouvaient encore vers les sources de l'Ikelemba, il y avait une guerre entre la famille de Mpumo, ancêtre des Boéndé, et celle de Lonyango, ancêtre des Bonkoso. Ces derniers, vaincus, appellent à leur secours la famille de Bokungú, leur bǫ́nankáná, un des ancêtres des Bongíli, qui inflige à Mpumo une défaite cuisante.

Effrayé, Mpumo implore la paix en lui offrant sa sœur Mbálaka. Bokungú accepte. Mais comme cette femme lui plaît, il veut contracter avec elle un mariage en règle. Il paie donc une dot élevée. Mais Mbálaka, étant de bonne famille, déclare ne pas vouloir aller chez son mari toute seule, et exige que son père lui adjoigne une ebísa (2). C'est sa parente Węla de Ngǫmbę (Boímbo) qui lui est assignée. Le vieux papa, désirant faire ostentation de richesse, va même plus loin et ajoute encore, comme deuxième ebísa, Eúmé, fille de Bokelé de Bokátola, son oncle maternel. Enfin, pour compléter sa contre-dot, déjà riche, Mpumo donne à sa fille quelques hommes «Mpámá» (clients) « pour manier les soufflets dans les fonderies de fer de Bokungú », et parmi lesquels l'histoire cite : Bokuka, Líkitá, Engota, Lofalanga, etc.

---

(1) Nous décrivons cette histoire en détail, parce qu'elle montre sur le vif certaines manifestations de la vie sociale nkundó.

(2) Cfr. chap. VII, art. IV.

De la même façon, ce Mpumo reçut à titre de bǫǫ́ndǫ la femme Lifomí, fille d'Ikólé. Le frère de celle-ci, Ndyę̂ntíkala, ancêtre des Mbúngá (Lióko, Ekonda), l'offrit pour implorer la paix. Mpumo l'épousa régulièrement. Dans sa lutte contre les Ekonda, ce même Mpumo obtint encore de la même manière la sœur de Bangǫ́ndǫ́, de Mpę́njwá (Wâyá), nommée Bǫǫ́ngǫ́.

Comme le vainqueur de la guerre tenait d'ordinaire à épouser la femme régulièrement par paiement de dot, nous pourrions comparer la livraison d'une parente en bǫǫ́ndǫ à ce qui se pratiquait en Europe au Moyen Age, lorsqu'un prince mariait sa fille ou sœur à un compétiteur ou à un adversaire, afin de sceller la paix entre eux. Il s'agit donc ici d'une sorte de mariage politique.

ARTICLE VI. — ÉCHANGE.

Par le terme d'échange de femmes (yenjá, du verbe enja = échanger, terme générique), les tribus envisagées dans cette étude n'entendent pas toutes la même chose. Selon les cas nous pouvons distinguer plusieurs espèces d'échanges.

1° Les Nkundó purs connaissent l'échange de filles, sœurs, parentes. Cet échange se fait toujours par versement de dot et par l'entremise du ndonga. Ce sont donc deux mariages réguliers par nkumbó, qui ne méritent le nom d'échange que tout à fait improprement. Les deux hommes qui se donnent mutuellement leurs sœurs en mariage contractent chacun un mariage ordinaire selon les normes typiques.

2° Parfois le nom d'échange est appliqué à la pratique de l'ikâkelo, qu'un exemple fera mieux comprendre qu'un long exposé : Eale a épousé la femme Âmbá. Lokio, sœur d'Eale, est mariée à Isia. Ámbá abandonne son mari pour un parent d'Isia. A la première occasion qui se présente, Eale retient chez lui sa sœur Lokio, la ravit donc à son mari et, ne voyant pas revenir chez lui sa femme Ámbá, livre sa sœur Lokio en mariage à un autre homme. Ou bien Eale a épousé une parente d'Isia, qui, lui, a épousé une parente d'Eale. L'une abandonnant son mari, celui-ci reprend sa parente à lui et la donne en mariage ailleurs, en usant de son droit d'ikákelo (1).

Comme il appert de ces explications, cette coutume n'est pas un échange volontaire et spontané, mais forcé. Pourtant on le nomme parfois échange, parce qu'il n'y a pas, à proprement parler, de divorce; de part et d'autre aucune restitution de dot n'a lieu.

Ces deux cas ne correspondent donc à l'idée d'échange de femme que tout à fait improprement. Dans le premier cas on ne peut même pas parler d'échange d'épouses.

3° Chez les Bombwanja on trouve quelque chose qui s'en rapproche davantage. En voici un exemple historique : Ikété aime Eanga, veuve du père d'Ekɔfɔ. Celui-ci, de son côté, aime Ilonga, veuve du père d'Ikété. Ils échangent ces deux femmes, qui sont leurs épouses par droit d'héritage. Il se peut même faire qu'Ikété, tenant fort à Eanga, donne à Ekɔfɔ une femme de son propre harem, qui aime cet homme. Ces échanges ont lieu sans versement de dot, mais par l'intermédiaire des ndonga qui sont intervenus antérieurement, au moment du nkumbó initial.

Nous nous trouvons ici devant un cas de véritable échange de femmes. Comme nous venons de voir, deux cas peuvent se présenter : échange de veuves et échange d'une veuve contre une épouse réelle. Au point de vue droit et justice les cas sont identiques; les femmes échangées appartiennent aux échangeurs, qui sont, en droit, leurs maris. Mais il n'y a que dans le second cas qu'intervient l'échange d'une femme qui n'est pas seulement épouse de droit, mais aussi de fait, c'est-à-dire qui a tous les devoirs et droits d'une épouse. Toutefois, une épouse pareille n'est donnée que d'une part. Au sens propre et strict, ce n'est pas encore l'échange d'épouse contre épouse.

---

(1) Substantif dérivé du verbe kákela, garantir; ici : se garantir la possession des valeurs dotales, de son capital.

La distinction que nous avons posée entre épouse de droit et épouse de fait a son importance. La vie conjugale effective introduit un nouvel élément juridique. Cela ressort manifestement de la répugnance de ces mêmes Bombwanja, qui pratiquent l'échange que nous venons de décrire, contre l'échange pur et simple, dont l'explication va suivre.

L'échange de veuves se rencontre aussi chez les Elíngá, qui, tout comme les Bombwanja, connaissent également les deux sortes d'échanges impropres que nous avons décrites au début.

4° Par contre, le véritable échange d'épouses existe chez les populations riveraines Boóyá et Longa (1), qui, dans leur dialecte, l'appellent iengyá. Deux hommes échangent leurs épouses mutuelles. Si la dot de l'une surpasse celle de l'autre, l'excédent est remboursé. Cet échange se fait avec le consentement des femmes.

Voici la génèse ordinaire d'un cas d'échange. Supposons deux hommes, Bokulú et Mpolí avec leurs femmes respectives Mbindo et Baúná. Bokulú s'éprend de Baúná, femme de Mpolí, et ils se lient de relations adultères. Refroidissement de l'amour de Baúná pour son mari Mpolí, services de moins en moins fréquents, etc. Même situation de Bokulú envers sa femme Mbindo. Celle-ci est jalouse : sa patience est bientôt à bout. Elle en traite avec Mpolí, le mari de sa concurrente : « Vois comme ta femme te trompe; elle ne t'aime plus. Mon mari à moi me délaisse pour elle, il ne m'aime plus. C'est un défi envers toi comme envers moi. Si tu es un homme (1), relève le défi ».

---

(1) Habitant vers l'embouchure de la Salonga (Bonsela, Bomputú, Nkóle, Bombomba, Isakó, etc.).

Dans la conception indigène, l'homme doit à son honneur de prendre chez lui cette femme. S'il ne le faisait point, il s'exposerait à la risée et deviendrait le point de mire des allusions malveillantes et des railleries de tous, hommes et femmes. Il serait considéré comme un lâche, tout comme dans la société « cultivée » européenne on traite de lâche l'homme qui ne relève pas le gant que lui jette son adversaire.

La haine que de ce fait la femme reniée conçoit envers son mari se change en amour pour l'homme auquel sa rivale a infligé une injure identique. Le malheur commun engendre l'affection mutuelle. La femme est acceptée comme épouse et ainsi sauvée du déshonneur. L'homme de son côté affectionne la femme qui lui offre son cœur et sauvegarde sa bonne renommée. Tous les quatre étant finalement d'accord, les deux hommes arrangent la question de la dot, comme il a été dit, puis vivent en paix sans aucune inimitié.

Cette façon d'agir, si étrange pour nous, parce que aussi indéfendable en saine philosophie que devant la morale catholique, paraît normale aux indigènes. La conscience païenne s'en accommode parfaitement. Car pour elle aucune loi positive ne l'interdit, et puisque tout le monde se met finalement d'accord, c'est tout ce qu'elle demande. En fin de compte, aucun droit individuel n'est lésé, et comme la mentalité indigène ne se soucie pas de la moralité comme nous la concevons, la chose est pour elle toute naturelle.

Toutefois, les groupes ethniques qui ne pratiquent pas cet échange proprement dit, ne l'approuvent nullement. Non qu'ils n'en comprennent pas la psychologie : au contraire, le cas échéant ils l'admettent. Mais ils condamnent la procédure juridique. Ils exigent que les deux mariages soient rompus régulièrement et que deux nouveaux mariages soient contractés; c'est-à-dire ils réclament la restitution et le versement de dots par l'intermédiaire des ndonga et en passant par les parents respectifs des femmes. Pour eux donc, cet échange n'est pas un vrai mariage, mais une espèce de vente et achat. Aussi, à leur point de vue, ces femmes échangées sont des esclaves, et non des épouses, parce qu'elles vivent avec leurs hommes, alors que le premier mariage n'a pas été rompu et qu'un nouveau contrat matrimonial n'a pas été conclu.

---

(1) Homme au sens de vir (bonendé). Sens : si tu as du courage, montre que tu n'es pas un lâche.

Il résulte de ce qui précède que nous ne trouvons chez les tribus nkundó étudiées ici aucune confirmation de l'affirmation d'Engels (étude citée, p. 35) que chez les Wangata « son mari peut l'échanger... elle n'a pas à protester » (¹).

ARTICLE VII. — L'ACHAT.

L'achat de femmes n'est pas pratiqué par les tribus nkundó dont nous traitons ici, ni même par les Bombwanja. On ne le trouve que chez les Elingá. Il ne s'agit pas d'un mariage par dot, mais d'un réel achat, c'est-à-dire qu'un homme achète une femme à son mari pour un montant x. Il ne passe pas par les parents de la femme, ce qui serait un mariage ordinaire par versement dotal, mais il s'adresse directement au mari.

Généralement, c'est la femme qui fait la proposition et demande à un homme de l'acheter ainsi. Parfois, l'homme, désirant prendre cette femme, s'arrange d'avance avec elle. Avant l'arrivée des Européens, cela provoquait généralement une guerre entre clans ou villages. Puis, à l'armistice, la palabre était tranchée et l'acheteur payait au mari. Actuellement, comme on n'oserait plus se battre, à cause des sanctions judiciaires inévitables, la femme abandonnant son mari pour un autre, et celui-ci voulant l'acheter, ils portent la palabre devant les juges, et, comme la femme ne veut que le nouveau mari et que, d'autre part, guerre et punitions de femmes sont de fait abolies, le premier n'a qu'à s'incliner et s'arranger pour le prix à payer (1).

---

(¹) De même, les Ekonda ne connaissent comme lienjá que l'échange de filles ou sœurs. Ils connaissent un terme spécifique : mpéngé. Notons, en passant, que certaines tribus Mbólé, où l'on pratique l'échange réel d'épouses, désignent celui-ci par le même mot : émpéngé.

Le montant que l'acheteur doit payer au mari est le montant de la dot. Mais comme celle-ci ne passe pas par les mains de la famille de la femme, il n'y a pas rupture du premier mariage. On ne parle donc pas de jèngi, mais de liaómbi (du verbe -sómba : acheter), terme employé pour n'importe quel achat. On dit encore bíaómbana endé la njéngi : il fait un achat au mari (littéralement : au payeur de la dot). Ces valeurs payées à l'équivalence de la dot peuvent être remplacées par une femme vivante, que l'acheteur donne au mari, en remplacement de la femme achetée.

En règle très générale, le mari exige en outre une seconde femme, épouse ou parente de l'acheteur, en guise d'ebísa de la première. Ce ne doit pas être une véritable ebísa, parente de l'autre. Elle n'est ebísa que tout à fait improprement. Elle porte le nom spécial d'inakambénga = cueilleuse de poivre, pour indiquer cette qualité d'aide, au service de la femme qui a été livrée en paiement, ou acquise au moyen du prix d'achat.

Enfin, l'acheteur (boaómbi) doit nouer les relations d'alliance avec ses nouveaux beaux-parents. A cette intention il leur fait un versement de valeurs qu'ils touchent en plus de la dot primitive. Quoique pratiquement ce versement constitue une dot, il n'en porte pas le nom, parce qu'il n'en a pas le sens juridique. Son nom spécifique propre est iɔngyambóka, de -ɔngya = surajouter une nouvelle chose, et mbóka = chemin; le nouveau mari ajoute donc une nouvelle relation d'alliance. Le verbe ɔnga ou ɔngya est encore usité en d'autres circonstances : pour une nouvelle tuile ou feuille qu'on ajoute à un point endommagé d'un toit, pour une pièce de réparation sur un habit, ou pour une nouveauté introduite. Ce terme semble ainsi indiquer qu'il ne s'agit pas d'un nouveau mariage, mais d'une greffe modificatrice du mariage initial. En outre, il s'emploie souvent dans un sens péjoratif. Et ainsi on pourrait supposer que cette coutume n'est pas très ancienne. Mais ce n'est évidemment pas une preuve adéquate.

---

(1) Il est question ici de la situation qui a prévalu jusqu'à présent. Les tribunaux indigènes ont reçu pouvoir de punir les délinquants, et ils sont donc obligés de prononcer les peines prévues. A mon avis, si le mari légitime porte plainte, le tribunal devrait trancher en sa faveur, non seulement parce qu'il s'agit d'un achat de femme, mais encore parce qu'il y a polyandrie, vu que le mariage n'a pas été rompu.

Par ce qui précède il est clair que l'achat d'une femme est une opération difficile et coûteuse. Une sorte de seconde dot (iɔngyambóka) et une deuxième femme (inakambénga) constituent tout un capital. Autrefois, l'acheteur avait en outre à indemniser les familles des hommes tués au combat (ce qui pouvait monter jusqu'à près de 100 anneaux, le taux d'un « cadavre » étant de 15-20 bakonga, prix d'un homme (1). Aussi a-t-on l'impression que, tout en admettant, pour des raisons qui nous sont inconnues, l'achat des femmes dans leurs coutumes et lois, les tribus en question ne l'ont fait qu'à contre-cœur et que les tenants de l'autorité ont pour ainsi dire accumulé les difficultés, comme pour effrayer les amateurs et pour réduire les cas au minimum inévitable.

On pourrait se demander pourquoi des hommes n'hésitent pas devant ces graves difficultés financières. Il est tout à fait psychologique que si un homme s'est épris d'une femme d'autrui et qu'il possède les richesses voulues, sa passion le pousse à se jeter dans pareille aventure. Il en fut probablement ainsi à l'origine. Pourtant ceci n'explique pas l'existence de l'achat, car la rupture du premier mariage et l'engagement d'un nouveau pourraient tout aussi bien se faire par la voie ordinaire de versement et de restitution de dots.

---

(1) Si dans une « guerre » pareille il y avait cinq morts, c'était déjà énorme !

Actuellement, le cas devient de plus en plus rare. Ce changement est probablement dû à une plus grande division des richesses, qui produit un second changement, notamment que l'homme fait les propositions initiales, au lieu de la femme, comme dans la coutume ancienne.

L'invitation de la part de la femme est publique. L'homme doit à son honneur d'y répondre. Tout comme pour l'échange chez les Boóyá, ce n'est qu'en y donnant suite qu'il peut échapper aux railleries. S'il ne s'exécutait pas, il serait considéré comme un lâche; il serait traité comme un paria; sa (ses) femme(s) l'abandonneraient et il ne serait plus admis dans la compagnie et au repas de ses congénères.

Bien que, strictement parlant, la chose sorte du cadre de cette étude, il ne me semble pas dépourvu d'intérêt de noter ici, à titre de comparaison, que l'achat se pratique également chez les Ntómbá (Wángatá, Ikɛngo) et les Bolέngé (= Bofiji) d'entre Congo-Boloko. Ils le nomment du même nom : isómba, achat; et l'homme qui l'achète : bosómbi = acheteur. La femme invite toujours l'homme en lui envoyant un bonengé : morceau de nervure de feuille de bananier. Elle le fait publiquement; remettant le bonengé à un parent ou ami, elle lui dit tout haut et devant tout le monde : « Porte-moi ce bonengé à un tel, qu'il vienne m'acheter ».

La même coutume existe encore chez certains groupements Ekonda, dépendant du poste de Bikoro, tels les Lonyanyanga, Bosanga, Balingo, Babonje, etc., mais non chez les autres, qui dépendent du poste de Kiri (Buli). Elle y est appelée ehómbaka ou esómbaka (même radical et même sens que lisómbí et isómba). Comme ces populations sont voisines des Ntómbá précités et d'autres Ntómbá habitant près du lac qui porte leur nom (déformé) et que, d'autre part, le restant des Ekonda ne la connaissent point, on pourrait présumer qu'elle a été introduite de chez leurs voisins du Nord et de l'Ouest.

Comparant ces données sur la distribution géographique de cette coutume et la nature ethnique des tribus qui la pratiquent, nous pourrions supposer qu'elle n'est pas d'origine nkundó. Les autres groupes ne l'approuvent nullement chez leurs voisins; ils les en méprisent plutôt, car pour eux une femme achetée est une esclave. Aussi s'en moquent-ils : « Ils vendent leurs femmes comme des esclaves ou des chèvres ». Peut-on trouver ici un indice que les Ntómbá-Boléngé ne sont pas des Nkundó purs, ou bien qu'ils ont subi des influences étrangères? De même pour les tribus riveraines qui pratiquent l'achat de femmes?

ARTICLE VIII. — CONCLUSIONS GÉNÉRALES.

Après l'analyse détaillée des différentes formes de mariages et d'unions pseudo-matrimoniales, il est nécessaire d'en faire la synthèse.

Certaines espèces, considérées par les Nkundó comme étant des mariages légitimes, diffèrent pourtant plus ou moins du mariage type, parce qu'ils sont adaptés à des circonstances particulières. Tels sont le mariage de la veuve avec l'héritier et le mariage par remplacement après divorce. Quant à nous, nous pouvons nous ranger à l'opinion des indigènes; car ces unions, lorsqu'elles sont conclues d'une façon normale, ne comportent rien qui soit contraire à la nature d'un mariage valide tel que nous le concevons (¹).

Par contre, les Nkundó jugent les autres formes comme

(¹) Le remplacement après divorce uniquement quand la rupture est légitime et valide en tout droit.

ne répondant pas ou tout à fait imparfaitement à l'idée qu'ils se font d'un mariage régulier. L'union d'une veuve avec un parent éloigné du défunt n'est qu'une espèce de concubinage légitimé. L'offre d'une épouse comme gage, l'échange et l'achat sont considérés comme des formes absolument inférieures. Il est donc préférable que nous les désignions par le terme d'unions pseudo-matrimoniales. Car quoiqu'elles soient admises comme légitimes par les tribus qui les pratiquent, elles y semblent plutôt tolérées qu'approuvées.

Il y a donc place pour une action des tribunaux indigènes contre ces formes si inférieures, action d'ailleurs favorisée par le texte du Recueil à l'usage des Fonctionnaires et des Agents du service territorial au Congo belge (éd. 1930, p. 375).

Dans les lignes que nous allons consacrer à l'examen de la nature du mariage nkundó, nous pouvons donc nettement exclure ces unions pseudo-matrimoniales.

ARTICLE IX. — LA NATURE DU MARIAGE NKUNDÓ.

Arrivés à ce point de notre étude, il nous faut faire la synthèse des principales conclusions que notre analyse nous a fournies jusqu'ici et tâcher d'en déduire la notion de l'essence du mariage nkundó.

Le mariage, en ethnologie bantoue, se définit plus ou moins : le lien entre deux personnes de sexe différent, créant pour les conjoints un état social, une situation économique particulière et légitimant leur progéniture (1). Cette définition diffère assez bien de la définition philosophique, qui est plus restreinte, en exigeant un contrat stable entre homme et femme de livraison mutuelle des droits exclusifs sur les corps en vue des actes procréateurs.

En quoi le mariage nkundó se conforme-t-il ou s'oppose-t-il à ces définitions? Ou plutôt : quelle est la définition que nous devrions donner du mariage nkundó et en quoi sa nature juridique consiste-t-elle?

---

(1) Cfr. Recommandations pour l'étude de la famille, éditées par l'Institut international pour l'étude des langues et civilisations africaines.

Rappelons d'abord brièvement quelques données capitales pour le problème en ajoutant quelques constatations que les pages suivantes nous fourniront, mais qui sont indispensables pour obtenir une vue d'ensemble. Ensuite nous tâcherons d'en dégager la base juridique.

Pour la forme du mariage légitime, le droit nkundó requiert comme conditions indispensables :

1° Le versement d'une dot;

2° L'intermédiaire, pour ce versement, d'un ou plusieurs témoins qualifiés.

La stabilité est infirmée par l'admission du divorce. Dans une société comme celle-ci, la chose est inévitable. Mais tout est mis en œuvre pour en restreindre la fréquence : dot et contre-dot, opposition de la part des autorités familiales, etc. (1).

L'exclusivité des droits sur les corps sera examinée au chapitre VI. Disons seulement que l'adultère n'est pas reconnu légitime, quoique les Nkundó s'en fassent une idée toute différente de la nôtre, qu'ils admettent des dérogations au principe de la fidélité et qu'ils tolèrent certaines licences.

Une question de haute importance pour notre but est celle du consentement. Mais son examen est fort ardu, parce que cet élément est relégué par les indigènes à l'arrière-plan, tandis qu'ils font ressortir davantage le facteur dot; ce qui ne doit pas nous étonner, puisque de par sa nature matérielle et palpable celle-ci retient mieux leur attention (2).

Remarquons d'abord que, par les Nkundó, la validité d'un mariage n'est jamais mise en doute pour défaut de consentement. On rencontre bien des femmes qui refusent le mari auquel on les destine comme remplaçantes, en invoquant le fait que la dot n'a pas été versée pour elles, ce qui veut dire qu'elles ne se considèrent pas comme partie contractante. Mais, à ma connaissance, leur opposition n'est pas considérée comme rendant le mariage invalide. J'ajoute « à ma connaissance », parce que cette question étant fort embrouillée dans la mentalité indigène, j'admets la possibilité de découvertes ultérieures qui prouveraient que les Nkundó attachent au consentement plus d'importance que nous n'en apercevions pour le moment. D'ailleurs, le fait que tout mariage normal comporte une cérémonie d'expression du consentement est une indication dans ce sens.

---

(1) Cf. chap. VIII, art. I et II.

(2) Constatation qu'on peut faire également pour les profanes européens dans les questions d'ordre juridique et autres.

Examinons maintenant nos données sur la valeur du consentement et de son expression.

A moins d'un cas exceptionnel dont nous pouvons à bon droit omettre de tenir compte dans cette synthèse, puisqu'il n'influe en rien sur nos conclusions, il y a dans le mariage type toujours consentement des époux. Celui-ci est d'abord privé, puis porté à la connaissance des parents, qui y donnent leur approbation. Lors du premier versement dotal, la fiancée l'exprime par un acte public et officiel, tandis que le mari le manifeste en accompagnant son père dans toutes ses démarches et en prenant chez lui sa future. Aux yeux des Nkundó, cela est tout à fait suffisant.

Une seconde question se pose à ce propos. Le consentement est exprimé lors du versement de l'ikulá. Or, le véritable paiement dotal ne se fait que plus tard et sans renouvellement du consentement. L'expression du début, lors des fiançailles, peut-elle être considérée comme suffisante, parce que virtuellement persistante? A mon avis, rien ne s'y oppose.

Pour le mariage par héritage, les formalités ordinaires de l'expression du consentement sont omises, parce qu'aucune nouvelle dot n'y est versée. Toutefois, nous y constatons que l'héritier doit aller prendre la veuve dans sa famille en faisant un paiement spécial. Bien que les Nkundó expliquent celui-ci comme une marque de respect envers la famille de la veuve, nous pourrions interpréter ces actes comme l'expression, adaptée à ce cas, de la volonté du nouveau mari d'épouser la femme, tandis que pour celle-ci le fait d'accompagner l'héritier est en réalité la manifestation de son consentement à l'union. Cette interprétation est confirmée par la stipulation juridique que le paiement des bekooli doit être renouvelé par chaque membre de la parenté du défunt qui veut épouser la veuve, tandis que le contrat dotal demeure inchangé. Ce versement n'émane donc nullement, comme la convention dotale, de la famille, mais est bel et bien un acte personnel de celui qui veut prendre la veuve comme son épouse.

Pour le remplacement après divorce, l'extériorisation du consentement est plus vague, puisqu'elle se restreint aux démarches du mari auprès de son beau-père, d'une part, et, du côté de la femme, au fait d'accompagner l'époux. On doit en dire autant de l'héritage d'une bosóló (chap. III, art. III). Il serait toutefois contraire à la réalité de conclure de cette forme très réduite de son expression à l'absence du consentement de la femme : dans ces questions, leur mentalité diffère totalement de la nôtre. Etre remplaçante est considéré comme un devoir et accepté comme tel; psychologiquement, il y a souvent consentement, tout comme l'obligation de se soumettre aux commandements divins, aux lois religieuses ou civiles, n'exclut point du tout la volonté. Même la crainte révérentielle, la peur des châtiments, etc., n'enlèvent pas le libre exercice de la volonté, bien qu'elles le diminuent. Pourtant, il se peut trouver des cas où la peur ou la contrainte soient telles qu'elles enlèvent complètement la liberté.

Quant aux unions précoces (chap. IV), la question est encore plus ardue. Ce ne sont que les fiançailles qui s'engagent dans la prime jeunesse. De la part du mari le consentement est exprimé d'une manière absolument suffisante. Comme le stade provisoire ne passe à l'union définitive qu'à l'approche de la puberté, la jeune fille peut être considérée capable d'un consentement suffisant pour un mariage valide, consentement qu'elle exprime en se rendant chez son mari. Toutefois, si l'on compare l'expression du consentement dans ce cas avec celle que nous constatons dans les autres unions, on la trouve ici très atténuée et fort inférieure.

Nous pouvons donc admettre que, d'une façon générale et dans les circonstances ordinaires, la liberté est sauve et que le consentement est exprimé d'une manière suffisante.

Après avoir rappelé ces données générales, essayons de dégager la nature juridique du mariage nkundó. Dans le droit ecclésiastique et dans le droit civil européen, le mariage se fait par l'échange officiel des consentements mutuels. Pour le Nkundó, le mariage se fait par le versement officiel d'une dot, auquel versement s'ajoute le consentement des époux, manifesté d'une façon plus ou moins claire et explicite, d'après les cas, mais que nous avons reconnue comme étant suffisante.

Les versements dotaux sont un contrat passé entre les familles des époux. Cette convention est considérée par les Nkundó comme constituant le mariage. Pour eux le consentement n'en est qu'un accessoire, attitude bien naturelle, à cause de l'infériorité de leur analyse, comme nous l'avons vu ci-dessus. Dans le droit civil européen il existe, à côté de l'échange légitime des consentements, qui constitue l'union conjugale, le contrat de mariage ou convention, expresse ou tacite, réglant les questions pécuniaires, et qui n'est qu'un accessoire du mariage. C'est donc juste l'opposé de la pensée des Nkundó.

Toutefois, nonobstant l'idée que nos indigènes se font de la valeur du consentement comme tout à fait accessoire dans la constitution du mariage, nous pouvons approfondir cette question et en faire l'analyse juridique, en nous basant pourtant uniquement sur les faits observés.

La manifestation de la part des deux époux de leur consentement au mariage est, dans son essence juridique, un véritable contrat, que nous pourrions appeler pacte conjugal : ils expriment leur volonté de s'unir comme conjoints, et cela de la façon prescrite par la loi. Le fait que les Nkundó n'attachent qu'une importance inférieure à ce contrat ne détruit pas sa réalité.

Quelle que soit donc l'importance relative que les Nkundó attachent à ces deux éléments, nous pouvons admettre en toute sûreté que leur union matrimoniale comprend dans la réalité deux composantes : la convention dotale et le pacte conjugal ou expression des consentements.

En droit naturel éthique le mariage est un contrat passé entre les époux : c'est le consentement de ceux-ci qui constitue le mariage. Pour les Nkundó, au contraire, — c'est du moins ce qui ressort de leurs affirmations, explications, etc., — l'homme et la femme deviennent mari et épouse par le versement de telle partie de la dot. Si leur analyse épuisait la question, il y aurait une opposition catégorique entre leur système et la nature philosophico-juridique du mariage. Mais il existe de fait un pacte de consentement qui — bien que pour nos gens il soit accessoire — constitue un élément intégrant du complexe d'actes et de cérémonies dans lequel consiste leur contrat matrimonial, ce qui le rend conforme à la définition philosophique du mariage.

Comment devons-nous nous représenter la relation entre le pacte conjugal et la convention dotale ? Je pense qu'en allant au fond juridique de la question nous pouvons nous exprimer comme suit : les époux nkundó donnent leur consentement à l'union telle qu'ils la conçoivent; ils veulent devenir mari et femme d'après la pratique en vogue dans leur communauté et selon les règles prescrites par leur droit. Ils expriment leur volonté de s'y conformer. Dans le mariage par nkumbó, l'union est d'abord provisoire (fiançailles), définitive ensuite dès le versement du walo. C'est comme si les futurs se disaient : nous voulons être mari et femme, et nous le deviendrons effectivement du moment que nos familles respectives exécutent la partie essentielle de la convention dotale. Celle-ci est comme la condition indispensable du contrat matrimonial; mais, dans l'infériorité de leur analyse, les Nkundo l'expliquent comme en étant l'élément constituant unique. Juridiquement parlant, les fiancés font dépendre leur consentement définitif de la réalisation ultérieure de la convention dotale. Il en est foncièrement de même dans les unions précoces. Dans les autres formes de mariage, nous pouvons adopter — mutatis mutandis — une interprétation identique. Ainsi, dans l'héritage, l'héritier et la veuve ajoutent leur consentement à la convention dotale préexistante et persistante. Quant au cas de remplacement il ne diffère pas du précédent.

Contre tout cela on peut formuler l'objection que les Nkundó ne considèrent pas l'héritage et le remplacement comme de nouveaux mariages, mais bel et bien comme la continuation de l'union persistante malgré le changement de la personne des épouses. La réponse est incluse dans les principes que nous avons posés ci-dessus. En effet, à cause de l'insuffisance manifeste de leur analyse, ils ne s'aperçoivent pas de l'existence du contrat de consentement; ils ne distinguent pas ce pacte conjugal qui change, de la convention dotale qui seule persiste. Et par le fait que pour eux la convention dotale est l'essentiel, le pacte conjugal l'accessoire, il ne prêtent attention qu'à celle-là. Nous pouvons donc légitimement interpréter leurs affirmations sur la nature des unions par héritage et par remplacement comme se référant au contrat dotal. Ainsi, le fait que chaque parent du défunt qui désire épouser la veuve doit effectuer un paiement individuel (bekooli), tandis que le contrat clanique persiste inchangé, prouve la réalité effective de la distinction entre convention dotale familiale et pacte conjugal personnel.

Résumant toutes ces considérations, nous pensons être en droit de poser comme définition du mariage nkundo : un contrat conjugal entre un homme et une femme, contrat stable en soi et lié à une convention dotale, de nature et de formalités déterminées, entre leurs familles.

Nous pouvons donc conclure que dans sa nature intime le mariage nkundo est conforme à la définition que l'éthique donne de cette institution en général et qu'il en remplit toutes les conditions essentielles (¹).

(¹) Je suis très reconnaissant à M. le Procureur général A. Sohier pour avoir, d'une façon toute particulière, attiré mon attention sur le côté juridique de ce problème et m'avoir ainsi invité à l'approfondir.

CHAPITRE IV.

AGE DES MARIÉS.

Le Nkundó peut se marier à tout âge. Son droit ne contient aucune stipulation à ce sujet. Pourtant l'habitude courante voulait autrefois que la fille était mariée très jeune, tandis que les garçons ne pouvaient prendre femme qu'à un âge réellement avancé. Actuellement, l'époque du mariage a été retardée pour un nombre toujours croissant de filles, et pour les garçons elle a été fort avancée presque universellement. Examinons la situation en détail, en distinguant entre les sexes.

ARTICLE I. — LES FILLES.

La coutume nkundó admet le cas — autrefois très fréquent et encore bien en vogue à présent — de l'engagement d'une enfant attendue, non encore née, ou encore en très bas âge, mais déjà promise comme épouse à X... ou Y... C'est ce qu'on nomme banda bǫna, ou bǒmoto = littéralement : compter une enfant, ou une femme. L'ikulá est versé immédiatement. Plus tard l'affaire se poursuit de la façon ordinaire; les autres parties de la dot sont versées, soit pendant la jeunesse, soit, de préférence, au moment où la fiancée rejoint son mari.

Entre-temps, si une de ses parentes est déjà l'épouse du polygame, ou d'un parent de celui-ci, l'enfant est élevée, dès un âge plus ou moins jeune d'après les circonstances, dans la famille de son mari. Elle loge chez sa parente. Elle peut alors avoir, par exemple, 7 à 8 ans à peine. Si personne ne peut prendre soin d'elle dans le clan du mari, elle n'y passe qu'une ou deux semaines, pour faire peu à peu la connaissance des personnes et des lieux, visite qu'elle réitère de temps en temps. Sa mère l'y accompagne, car elle ne saurait s'y habituer toute jeune et seule, sans soutien, sans parents. Il faut donc attendre qu'elle atteigne l'âge d'une certaine indépendance où elle peut se tirer d'affaire elle-même. C'est en général vers les débuts de la puberté, donc entre 12 et 15 ans.

Tout comme les femmes adultes, elle est déjà nommée bompáka ou wálí, conformément avec la partie de la dot versée. Elle a tous les devoirs et tous les droits de l'épouse : relations sexuelles, préparation des aliments, soins du ménage, etc. Aucune date, aucun âge n'est fixé pour le commencement de la cohabitation. Cela s'arrange entre le mari et ses beaux parents. Ceux-ci n'ont pas le droit d'en retarder le moment, même si leur fille est encore trop jeune, mais ils peuvent user de leur grande influence sur le gendre. La génération moderne n'est pas choquée par les relations entre un adultère et une impubère. D'ailleurs, du point de vue juridique, tout est régulier; comme il a payé la dot, il est le mari légitime et a droit à sa femme. Tout dépend de sa mentalité individuelle, de sa passion ou de son respect pour le corps de sa jeune femme. S'il est raisonnable, il sera très prudent dans les relations ou s'abstiendra pour ne pas « abîmer » le corps de son épouse. Mais en droit, il lui est loisible d'agir à sa guise. Aussi trouve-t-on des adultes qui ont des relations suivies — de façon ou d'autre — avec leur femme, qui ne montre pas le moindre développement des seins. De sorte que là la fonction nuptiale s'exerce avant la nubilité (1). Les conséquences au point de vue natalité se laissent deviner sans peine. Il se peut aussi que le mari soit également impubère. Cela ne met pas obstacle à la cohabitation. Dès qu'il se sent devenir homme il construit sa case où ils habitent ensemble. Dans tous ces cas, la jeune fille rentre souvent chez ses parents, et parfois prolonge ses visites durant des semaines sans voir son mari.

---

(1) Remarquons ici que jeune fille non encore nubile ne se nomme pas filingo en lonkundo, comme dit ENGELS, loc. cit., p. 36. Ce mot n'est que la transformation nkundo du latin virgo. Il n'existe aucun terme spécifique pour (in)nubile. Une jeune fille qui n'est pas encore femme, et qui n'est plus enfant, se nomme ilembeleke.

Autrefois la chose ne se passait pas de la même façon. Il arrivait fréquemment que la jeune épouse refusait l'acte sexuel, surtout si le mari était notablement plus âgé. Sa pudeur et sa timidité natives, jointes à son éducation, en étaient la cause. Généralement le mari polygame respectait ses sentiments, jusqu'à ce que peu à peu elle se fût laissé amadouer et que le développement physiologique normal s'étant accompli et l'amour parvenu à un degré suffisant, elle commençât à suivre la pente de l'instinct. A la lumière de ce qui a été dit au chapitre I, II^{e} partie, article IV, § 2, A, nous n'avons aucune peine à admettre cette affirmation de nos informateurs; la chose n'a rien que de naturel.

Dans les fiançailles d'une enfant attendue, il peut arriver que les faits déçoivent les espoirs et que l'enfant pour lequel l'ikulá a été payé soit un garçon. Le contretemps est arrangé comme suit : ou bien le prétendant attend la naissance d'une fille, ou bien entre lui et le nouveau-né s'établit une alliance d'amitié et d'entr'aide (boseka, cfr. chap. I, I^{re} partie, art. III), qu'on nomme alors liála jă jwende = mariage d'homme (matrimonium viri). D'aucune façon l'ikulá versé n'est restitué. Si leur amitié n'est pas rompue plus tard, elle mènera au mariage de la fille de l'homme pour lequel l'ikulá a été payé avant sa naissance avec celui qui l'a versé ou avec son fils ou petit-fils. Dans ce cas, il n'y a pas lieu de payer un nouvel ikulá; il ne reste qu'à compléter la dot de la façon normale.

L'acquisition d'une jeune enfant se fait soit pour soi-même, soit à l'intention d'un fils, d'un frère puîné, etc. Le premier cas était autrefois le plus fréquent, car les vieux gardaient pour eux-mêmes les femmes et voulaient en profiter avant de les laisser en héritage aux jeunes. Mais le dernier cas se présentait aussi.

Le but était d'éviter que, en cas de décès prématuré du père, les héritiers n'accaparent à leur profit exclusif le harem et les valeurs dotales — ce que, en principe, ils ont le droit de faire — et enlèvent ainsi les moyens d'obtenir une épouse aux jeunes encore inexpérimentés et incapables de se défendre. C'est donc un moyen de favoriser les fils, etc. et de leur fournir une épouse plus tôt que dans la pratique courante. A présent ce motif vaut encore plus qu'autrefois, en raison du mariage plus précoce des garçons.

D'autres causes interviennent, et cela pour les deux cas indiqués. C'est la plus grande certitude d'en avoir pour son argent, car, pour diverses raisons, les valeurs peuvent disparaître au cours des longues années d'improductivité.

En outre, la raison, à mon avis la plus profonde, et d'ailleurs très souvent invoquée par les Nkundó, est celle de pourvoir personnellement à l'éducation de la future épouse. Il va sans dire que le mari a tout intérêt à s'en occuper lui-même : il pourra l'accoutumer, dès sa jeunesse, aux circonstances spéciales, aux lois claniques, aux habitudes particulières (qualités, défauts, façon de vivre, etc.) de sa famille et de ses épouses, sans oublier les siens propres. Il peut la façonner à ses goûts et désirs. S'il y réussit, il y a là pour lui d'énormes avantages. Ceci ne doit pas s'entendre comme s'il s'en occupait personnellement. Car il sait qu'il n'est pas éducateur né. Aussi en charge-t-il de préférence sa mère (tante, sœur), qui aime cette obligation et est contente d'aider son fils et d'intervenir d'une façon immédiate et intime dans son ménage.

Enfin, l'alliance d'« amis » donne souvent lieu à des fiançailles précoces entre leurs enfants respectifs. Si plus tard les enfants ne veulent pas du mariage, l'affaire en reste là. On procède à la restitution, ou l'on arrange une substitution. Tel le cas qui s'est présenté pendant la composition de ce travail. Il y a bien vingt ans, Lokóta de Bolíngo et Insílọ de Bọnjọku se sont liés d'amitié (boseka). Le premier engendre un garçon (Ituwó), et le second une fille (Lọkọkú). Les parents font les fiançailles de leurs enfants par versement de l'ikulá. Arrivé à l'âge de prendre femme, Ituwó n'a pas envie d'épouser Lọkọkú : son cœur s'est épris d'une autre. Mais il a un frère plus jeune : Itọkọ́, qui ressent de l'affection pour Lọkọkú; il s'en ouvre à sa mère (son père étant mort entre-temps), qui renoue les relations avec Insílo. Tous se mettent d'accord sans difficulté. Itọkọ́ a donc épousé Lọkọkú au lieu de son aîné, après versement de la dot.

Si l'union engagée ne satisfait pas la fillette, elle est toujours libre de la faire rompre selon les règles du droit et non simplement pour défaut de consentement. Il est à noter que dans ce cas le mari n'a droit à aucune compensation pour avoir élevé cette enfant.

Malgré l'intérêt que présentent, d'un côté, les unions précoces, il serait, d'autre part, utile de les contrôler rigoureusement, parce que, à cause du jeune âge, l'affection fait souvent défaut; en tout cas, il serait utile de mieux sauvegarder la liberté et de ne pas faire semblant d'encourager ces unions précoces, comme cela se pratique parfois par l'exemption de l'impôt supplémentaire des épouses non adultes de polygames.

Aucune loi ne prescrit que la sœur aînée soit mariée avant la puînée, mais c'est la pratique commune, et l'on n'y fait exception qu'à cause des circonstances, dont la principale est que la puînée trouve un prétendant avant l'aînée, motif qui comprend et résume tous les autres (dispositions psychologiques ou physiques défavorables de l'aînée).

Le changement qui commence à se manifester dans cette pratique du mariage précoce des filles est dû à la liberté plus grande introduite par la colonisation. Pourtant, comme il n'y a pas d'avantages spéciaux attachés à ce changement, il est encore très faible. L'éducation chrétienne des parents doit nécessairement faire retarder l'époque du mariage pour les filles, et elle le fera ipso facto dès que l'influence chrétienne sera assez forte dans la région.

ARTICLE II. — LES GARÇONS.

Hormis les rares cas de fiançailles de deux enfants en bas âge, il était autrefois de pratique normale et courante que les hommes restent célibataires durant de longues années après leur nubilité. Les vieux se servaient d'abord eux-mêmes, et les jeunes n'avaient qu'à attendre, comme leurs aînés, leur tour. Cela était trouvé tout naturel. Plus tard ils pourraient fonder un foyer et « profiter » de la vie. Entre-temps ils trouvaient moyen de se dédommager un peu avec les femmes de certains parents, ou d'autres, si l'occasion s'en présentait.

Pour expliquer cet état de choses on peut invoquer l'organisation politique de la société nkundó, basée sur l'âge. De ce fait il est naturel que les tenants de l'autorité en aient les marques extérieures, dont une des principales est la richesse manifestée par la possession de femmes. Mais la situation présente, que nous indiquerons plus loin, infirme beaucoup cette explication.

Il est plus naturel de considérer ce retard dans le mariage des jeunes gens comme une conséquence logique du mariage en bas âge des filles. Supposons un garçon de 15 ans, tandis que sa sœur, dont la dot devrait lui revenir, n'a que 3 ans. Elle est mariée à cet âge. Leur père commun n'a rien de plus pressé que d'employer le capital reçu, si minime soit-il, au lieu de le laisser improductif avec le danger de le perdre un jour pour une raison quelconque. Il s'en sert donc pour obtenir une femme, en bas âge souvent, pour lui-même ou pour son frère. Voilà donc le garçon privé, à l'âge adulte, des moyens de se constituer un foyer. Il devra attendre l'acquisition de nouvelles richesses, soit par son travail personnel, soit grâce à l'aide de parents divers; soit par la mort de son père et de ses oncles, ou — souvent — grâce à la dot d'une fille à naître de la nkita de sa sœur. Dans cette dernière hypothèse, autrefois toute commune, il doit forcément patienter de longues années. Ainsi, dans l'exemple cité au chapitre II, art. X, Bakutu aurait, si la chose s'était passée quelques décades avant, dû attendre la dot de sa cousine Wängi, plus jeune que lui d'au moins 25 ans. Si alors on lui avait laissé le début de dot, il aurait encore été forcé d'attendre plus de 10 ans avant de devenir époux au sens plein, car cet ikulá aurait servi aux fiançailles d'une enfant en bas âge. Plus probablement, il aurait été jugé trop jeune; la dot aurait été employée en faveur d'un autre et il aurait dû attendre une nouvelle période de x années. Une fois admise la pratique du mariage en bas âge des filles, il n'y a pas d'autres issue; tout s'enchaîne et s'entraîne inévitablement, si l'on tient compte de la mentalité de cette société.

Le pouvoir qu'ont les vieux d'agir de cette façon à leur profit provient de l'organisation patrimoniale collective de la peuplade (ch. II, art. X et XI, 3°, B). La dot revient à la famille; le droit des membres n'est pas personnel et exclusif, mais découle de leur position hiérarchique dans le groupe.

Toutefois, le fait qu'un homme peut, dans l'attribution de la dot de sa sœur utérine, évincer son frère né de mère différente semble indiquer qu'il était primitivement le principal titulaire du droit à ces valeurs, droit dont l'exercice est différé avec les transferts concomitants.

Nous avons parlé d'improductivité de la dot. C'est là le raisonnement des Nkundó, qui n'est exact que parce [illegible] les vieux veulent se servir avant leurs fils. En réalité, ils pourraient très bien concilier la productivité de la dot avec les aspirations des jeunes, du moins dans beaucoup de cas: ils n'auraient qu'à employer les valeurs reçues en faveur de leurs fils, en acquérant à leur intention des filles d'âge égal. La productivité bien comprise n'en serait pas diminuée, puisque les biens resteraient dans la famille. Au contraire, elle en serait augmentée par la naissance probable d'une plus nombreuse postérité. Mais les connaissances physiologiques de nos indigènes ne semblent pas avoir été assez développées pour leur permettre la formation d'un tel jugement. Et, explication bien plus vraisemblable, l'égoïsme a tellement obnubilé leur intelligence et a fait taire la voix du bon sens et de l'amour paternel, pour multiplier leurs femmes, et ainsi augmenter la satisfaction facile de leur sensualité, accroître leurs richesses et renforcer leur position sociale; après leur mort ce sera le tour de leurs fils.

Cette situation est aggravée par le fait que l'héritage des veuves est dévolu au frère, et — à l'exception de la bonóló — nullement au fils; elles restaient donc au pouvoir des vieux.

A cause de cette attitude des vieux, la plupart des femmes étaient accaparées par eux; ils se constituaient des harems importants, de sorte qu'il était très difficile pour les jeunes de trouver une femme à épouser; ils devaient s'estimer heureux si leur père leur fournissait une enfant.

Aussi était-il inouï qu'un jeune homme de 20 à 30 ans se mariât, si l'on excepte quelques cas d'acquisition d'une enfant destinée à devenir après des années son épouse. Les hommes avaient ainsi régulièrement atteint la quarantaine, ou davantage, avant de se marier.

Actuellement, la situation est complètement modifiée : l'attitude des vieux est devenue bien plus favorable aux jeunes, et presque normale. La grande majorité des pères procurent, s'ils en ont les moyens, une femme à leurs fils dès que ceux-ci sont en âge et en expriment le désir. Cette amélioration est due à la plus grande facilité de se marier. Un grand nombre de jeunes gens ont maintenant leur femme, qui, s'ils avaient vécu sous l'ancien régime, seraient toujours célibataires. La jeunesse s'expatriant pour aller travailler chez les Blancs, les parents ont pitié de leurs fils et n'aiment pas les laisser partir sans femme qui puisse en prendre soin et leur préparer la nourriture. Cela a infligé un coup sérieux à l'ancienne coutume. Et même pour les jeunes gens qui restent chez eux, il n'est plus si difficile de se procurer une épouse. L'amour paternel a ici repris le dessus sur l'égoïsme.

D'autre part, les vieux ont été forcés à plus d'humanité, car les jeunes femmes, avec la liberté que leur procure l'occupation européenne, s'enfuyaient vers les centres, délaissant leurs maris, pour aller rejoindre, sous la protection des Blancs, leurs amants jeunes comme elles. Il était donc bien plus intelligent de procurer d'une façon honnête une épouse à leurs fils, que de s'exposer à de grosses palabres de la part du mari abandonné.

Il appert de tout ce qui précède que l'homme était considérablement plus âgé que son épouse. Mais de par le fait de l'héritage des veuves, il arrivait — et arrive — aussi qu'un homme obtînt des femmes plus vieilles que lui. Même dans les mariage des jeunes gens à l'époque actuelle, nombre d'épouses sont nettement inférieures en âge à leurs maris; bien des adolescents ont reçu comme épouses des fillettes impubères.

En règle très générale, la femme nkundó n'aime pas que son mari soit beaucoup plus âgé qu'elle, et moins encore qu'il soit plus jeune. Actuellement, les unions entre personnes d'âge égal augmentent de plus en plus. Ceci est dû aux remariages de divorcées qui préfèrent des époux de leur génération aux vieillards qui les ont « payées » d'abord, plutôt qu'à des unions originales entre égaux. L'influence de ménages chrétiens est appelée à jouer un grand rôle éducateur dans ce domaine, pour rendre normale la situation des filles.

Par contre, les garçons doivent se marier à tour de rôle, selon leur âge, à cause de la loi d'ancienneté qui régit les rapports sociaux. Voilà la règle. Mais elle peut recevoir des accrocs de par une autre règle : celle des droits sur la dot, directe ou médiate, d'une sœur. Les fils d'un polygame n'ont pas des droits absolument égaux sur les dots de leurs sœurs. L'un d'eux peut s'opposer à ce que son frère, né de mère différente et non apparentée à la sienne, profite de la dot payée pour sa sœur utérine. Son droit prévaut incontestablement. Mais s'il a d'autres sœurs, l'amour fraternel lui fait un devoir d'aider son frère moins fortuné. Si chacun d'eux a une sœur utérine, il peut y avoir interversion des droits dotaux, puisqu'elle ne cause de préjudice à personne. Enfin, si le puîné seul a une sœur, il y a un droit strict et personnel, et il peut ainsi arriver qu'il se marie avant son aîné. Mais, à moins d'une opposition irréductible de la mère, on tâche d'ordinaire d'arranger l'affaire à l'amiable, en assignant au puîné la dot future d'une nièce ou cousine. Telles que nous venons de les expliquer, ces règles ne valent absolument que pour les temps actuels. Autrefois elles existaient pareillement, mais de par le retard du mariage des fils, comme nous l'avons vu, il se produisait un transfert des droits qui pouvait bouleverser tout cet ordre. En pratique, comme beaucoup d'hommes commençaient la vie matrimoniale après la mort de leur père ou oncle, donc avec des femmes héritées, les aînés en bénificiaient avant les puînés (1).

2: Hulstaert FO32 Mongo

Enfin, l'aîné peut être privé de son droit pour certaines raisons, comme un manquement grave aux devoirs de respect et de soumission à son père, qui, pour le punir, le maudit, le déclare publiquement déchu de sa position d'aîné et lui interdit l'acquisition d'une épouse. Cette pratique n'est plus en vogue à présent : elle n'aurait plus grand effet, car le jeune homme irait tenter la fortune ailleurs. Mais l'histoire nous en a laissé des exemples, comme celui d'Ikété yä Lonkinja, premier-né d'Ikété Elonɛɛma éá Longómbá, ancêtre de la famille Bombénga wä Bokenda (Bęsǫmbǫ).

---

(1) Cfr. aussi chap. II, art. 3.

CHAPITRE V.

EMPÊCHEMENTS AU MARIAGE.

Le lonkundo ne connait pas de terme spécifique pour « empêchement au mariage ». Comme dans nos langues européennes, on emploie des mots à sens général.

Nos gens ne font aucune distinction entre empêchements dirimants et empêchements prohibitifs. Nous parlerons donc simplement d'empêchements sans faire entre eux de distinction.

ARTICLE I. — LA « RACE ».

Au point de vue de la diversité de races, on ne peut faire entrer en ligne de compte que les Batswá. Avec eux, les mariages sont sévèrement défendus. Les règles du savoir-vivre nkundó sont très strictes pour les rapports entre Baotó et Batswá. Il est inouï que, même pour une simple conversation, les sexes des deux races se mêlent. A fortiori ne saurait-il être question de mariages.

Chez les Bilángi, tribu de Batswá des Injɔ́lɔ́ de la Salonga-Lofilaka (mais qui refusent absolument le nom de Batswá ou de Balómbę), on relève, à ma connaissance, deux cas d'union. Il s'agit de deux femmes Baotó et, coïncidence singulière, originaires toutes deux de Lotángonda (Injɔ́lɔ́, Engónjó). L'une, Njali, fille de Yɔlę et sœur de Lomálá; l'autre, Nsɔmbɔla, sœur de Limpęma.

Njali fut prise en mariage par Bakao d'Ikindatóló. Désirant ardemment des enfants et n'en ayant pas eu de ses deux maris nkundó successifs, elle s'enfuit chez les Bilángi, dans l'espoir d'une meilleure chance. Son attente ne fut pas déçue : elle donna la vie à quatre fils : l'aîné, Bọnkọ́nọ, décédé depuis plusieurs années; Bakao (Georges), mort en 1933, et deux encore en vie : Bọnkọm (Louis) et Jọkẹ (Henri). En 1933, leur descendance à eux quatre se composait de treize fils, six filles, quatre petits-fils et une petite-fille. Mais entre Bakao et Njalí il n'a jamais existé de mariage légitime, aucun versement dotal n'ayant été effectué. Et la descendance forme un petit clan Bilángi, dépendant du clan de l'aïeule (Ilongó de Lotángonda).

[p.241]

Le second cas est un peu plus récent. Il est arrivé au début de la pénétration européenne. Dans le bouleversement général de cette époque, les indigènes du village Bosúka (Bilángi de Lingọnjú), profitant de l'absence de beaucoup d'hommes adultes entraînés par les soldats à l'expédition contre les Mbole, purent saisir la femme Nsọmbọla et l'amenèrent chez eux. Elle aima un des hommes de Bosúka, qui, après de longues années, l'« acheta » au prix de deux esclaves. Elle y vivait heureuse, jusqu'en ces dernières années, où le désir de rentrer dans sa propre race a repris le dessus. (Elle ne laisse pas de descendance.)

Ici nous avons donc un cas où les Ŋkundó se sont inclinés devant la volonté de la femme et se sont rendus à l'inévitable, en acceptant la dot pour Nsọmbọla. Ce qui prouve que, éventuellement, ils savent plier leurs exigences coutumières.

Toutefois, ces exemples exceptionnels n'ont pas trouvé d'admirateurs ni d'imitateurs, et l'opposition reste entière contre les unions entre les deux races. On ne veut pas de mélange. La position occupée par la famille hybride de Bakao dans le village de Lotángonda est très significative. Car il y est fait exception à la règle applicable à pareil cas : que l'enfant sans père légitime est incorporé dans le clan de sa mère. Les descendants de Bakao et Njalí dépendent de Lotángonda, en font partie politiquement, mais autrement s'ils vivaient dans le milieu purement indigène, où ils seraient certainement assimilés aux Batswa.

L'introduction et l'entraînement des Batswá dans la vie économique de l'Européen peuvent occasionner et favoriser le mélange des races. Les richesses qui sont ainsi mises à leur portée peuvent leur servir à séduire certaines femmes Baoto plus lascives ou cupides, surtout les habituées chez qui le vice a éteint tout sentiment de convenance et d'honnêteté et qui rôdent toujours aux environs des centres, camps, marchés. Le danger augmente quand des Batswá célibataires, engagés comme travailleurs à quelque titre que ce soit, sont envoyés exécuter leur besogne à une grande distance de chez eux, et surtout si parmi leurs compagnons le taux des hommes mariés n'est pas suffisamment élevé. Ceci n'est pas la description d'une situation, — la cloison entre les deux races étant toujours fort étanche, — mais une conjoncture qui n'est pas impossible, comme l'indique le cas arrivé en 1932 et qui me fut communiqué par le médecin alors en charge du dispensaire de Flandria, d'un Bọtswa, coupeur de fruits au service des H. C. B., atteint d'une syphilis d'origine indubitablement sexuelle.

Contrairement à la race, la différence de peuple ou de tribu ne constitue pas un empêchement. Les Nkundó proprement dits, comme les Elingá, se marient dans les groupes voisins, là où la situation géographiqu le permet, par exemple avec les Ngombẹ, les Mbole, les Ekonda.

ARTICLE II. — CONDITION SOCIALE.

Chez les Nkundó la condition sociale n'est pas un empêchement au mariage. A proprement parler, ils ne connaissent pas de classes sociales. Ils distinguent des autorités, des inférieurs, des personnes ou familles qui n'ont pas le droit de dire leur mot dans la politique; mais ces notions n'interviennent pas dans les relations sociales non familialement. Car ils ont hérité de leur père la nature bilángi; et contrairement à la logique ordinaire, ils ne sont pas devenus la parenté de la famille de leur aïeule. Le « principe des races » a, ici aussi, prévalu contre le droit commun.

On n'entend pas parler non plus de relations transitoires ou de concubinage. Un seul cas m'est connu qui n'a pas été heureux et qui n'invitera personne à l'imitation. Il arriva vers 1913. Un certain polygame, Lokóta de Bɔkɛkɛ (Bombwanja), s'éprit de la femme de Bonkíngó, actuellement capita de Bosáola (Batswá de Ntómbá, Bombwanja). Il devint la risée de toute la région, mais l'amour passa outre. Seulement, dans son ménage, la chose était plus grave. Une de ses femmes (Ámbánaɛlɛ) ne tarda pas à le quitter. Les autres lui refusaient leurs corps et se préparaient au divorce. De la sorte, Lokóta fut bien obligé de cesser ses amours déraisonnables, et tout finit par rentrer dans l'ordre (7).

Des cas de mélange se sont produits à la faveur de la colonisation, en dehors du milieu coutumier, entre Batswá et individus de tribus qui ne connaissent pas cette race. A la Mission de Bokúma réside une femme Bɔtswa des Ekonda qui, ayant été amenée par des soldats étrangers, a eu deux enfants avec un homme Mbole. Ces enfants sont méprisés par les Baoto comme par les Batswá des environs, et ils ne trouveront à se marier que s'ils vont se fixer dans leur clan maternel.

Au village de licenciés d'Ingende habite un Bɔtswa de Boálama (Bombwanja) qui, étant soldat pendant la guerre, épousa une femme de l'Urundi, qui probablement ne connaissait pas la race de son mari. Revenus dans cette région, c'est un excellent ménage, et la femme est toujours restée très attachée à son époux. Leurs cinq jeunes enfants ne sont nullement méprisés. Il en serait sans aucun doute ordinaires et particulièrement le mariage. Ainsi un membre d'un clan inférieur, soumis, client, étranger, descendant d'esclave, peut toujours se marier avec une personne appartenant au clan même aîné du groupement. Ces différences sont du domaine de la politique; l'union matrimoniale est une affaire juridique, d'affection et de bonnes relations, basée sur un versement dotal.

---

(7) Ces relations n'ont donné naissance à aucun enfant.

Quant aux esclaves proprement dits, il existe une exception. Mais il faut distinguer entre les sexes. L'union avec une femme esclave était beaucoup pratiquée, mais il n'y avait pas de mariage au sens propre. La conclusion d'un mariage régulier était précédée par l'affranchissement. Plus de détails seront donnés au chapitre VII, article V. Quant aux hommes, la situation était différente. L'esclavage était une condition non seulement inférieure, mais même déshonorante, quoique à un degré bien moindre que chez les Anciens. Un amour particulièrement ardent pouvait passer outre, et il existe quelques clans issus d'une femme « libre » et d'un homme esclave, unis en mariage régulier et légitime, le maître payant la dot.

L'opposition n'existe plus contre l'union d'une personne « libre » avec un descendant d'un mariage mixte. Ces enfants peuvent toujours se réclamer de leur ascendance maternelle, qui, dans ce domaine, importe plus pour les Nkundó que l'ascendance paternelle (1).

Pour la première génération issue de conjoints esclaves tous deux, l'opposition est moindre que pour les parents et elle s'atténue progressivement avec le nombre de générations. Envers les petits-fils elle n'existe pratiquement plus. Cela semble provenir de ce que le fait de recevoir de son maître une femme en mariage régulier constitue pour l'esclave, non pas un affranchissement (naikò, naikola), mais une certaine adoption (udimya, -ímya).

---

(1) Pour un Nkundó il n'y a pas de honte de ne pas connaître la famille de son père. Mais l'impossibilité de citer le clan de la mère est un grand déshonneur, car elle prouve sa condition d'esclave.

ARTICLE III. — LA PARENTÉ.

Le mariage est défendu entre les membres d'une même parenté (isangeno, bosangema, du verbe -sangema = être apparenté). Mais jusqu'où celle-ci s'étend-elle? Il est impossible de donner une règle générale. D'un côté, il est certain que lorsque deux groupements même vivant à côté l'un de l'autre, ne descendent pas d'un ancêtre commun, aucun lien de parenté n'existe entre eux. D'autre part, on ne peut pas dire que tous ceux qui descendent d'un même ancêtre soient parents et que le mariage soit interdit entre les diverses branches de ce groupement. La question revient donc à savoir quel ancêtre est reconnu comme limitant le groupement exogamique. Ce n'est que l'examen de chaque cas particulier qui peut en décider.

On ne peut pas arguer du terme clan, car ce mot se définit généralement : groupement de familles unies les unes aux autres par la parenté. Cela ne nous avance guère. Les caractéristiques citées d'ordinaire pour le clan : nom générique, lien totémique (¹), responsabilité collective, exogamie, non plus ne donnent la solution. Car ces éléments de la définition doivent se compléter mutuellement pour obtenir une compréhension suffisante. Impossible de déterminer aussi les degrés limites qui existeraient chez les Nkundó.

Il nous faudrait donc dresser la liste de tous les groupements de la peuplade pour examiner lesquels correspondent à l'idée de clan exogamique. Or, cela n'est pas faisable. Toutefois, voici, à titre d'exemple, la généalogie des Bongili :

L'ancêtre Tólenjo eut d'une femme deux fils : Iloko et Bokongó, et une fille : Ambá. De deux autres femmes il eut Eángé, père des Ikongya, et Efoloko, père des

---

(¹) Le totémisme ne semble pas exister chez les Nkundó. En tout cas il n'y est pas apparent comme ailleurs.

Boléngé. Iloko donna naissance aux villages Ifutó, Mbángé et Lofelí; Bokungú, à Boambá (plus Ifoku), Ndọngó, Bọlọngwankọi, Etóontálé, Bọntọlẹ, Lokónola (partie de Imọmọ) et Betoló l'Ibeba (habitant avec les Boambá). D'Ámbá naquirent Elángá, Imọmọ et Elẹkẹ (formant avec Bọlọngwankọi le village de Lokongo).

Tólenjọu
|
Bokungú
|
Bengóngó
|
Ekéké
|
Longwokó
(décédé, très vieux, en 1933).

Nous avons ainsi cinq groupements, qui sont exogamiques; dans le groupe, le mariage est défendu, mais il ne l'est point avec les membres des autres groupes. La petite généalogie ci-dessus donne une certaine idée de l'ancienneté de la lignée et de la distance qui sépare les membres actuels de l'ancêtre fondateur de la tribu. Il est à signaler que chaque groupe exogamique est subdivisé en plusieurs villages, clans et familles. Dans la ligne maternelle on trouve la même limite : le mariage est défendu avec les descendants des frères et sœurs de l'aïeule, femme de l'ancêtre du groupement exogamique (*).

Dans l'examen de cette matière il faut donc tenir compte aussi bien de la famille de l'aïeule que de la ligne paternelle.

Pour pouvoir délimiter exactement un groupe exogamique, il faut ainsi étudier non seulement plusieurs villages, mais diverses tribus. Car un même groupe peut se composer de plusieurs familles qui habitent loin les unes des autres et qui parfois se sont jointes à des groupements apparentés seulement à un degré très éloigné, voire entièrement étrangers, de sorte que dans ce cas un même village comprend plusieurs groupes exogamiques.

---

(*) Notons que les relations de [illegible] se pratiquent dans chacun de ces cinq groupes exogamiques, mais pas entre descendants de la même aïeule, femme d'un des ancêtres et de ses enfants. Cfr. chap. I, art. VII, § 1.

Ainsi les Boéndé, issus de l'ancêtre Ilumbé yă Mpumo. De sa première femme, Eúmé, naquirent les groupes Etóo; des autres, les groupes Bongangá. Ils ne se marient pas entre eux, mais sont un bel exemple d'une composition complexe.

En effet, les Etóo sont répartis en quatre villages :

1° Etóo de Lotólá;

2° Etóo de Bakọ̀yọ́ ou Mbúlanẹ́nẹ, tous deux Basékâ Bombóngo;

3° Etóo de Mbómbé ou Basékâ Bofiíyolo;

4° Etóo de Bosánjo ou Basékâ Eóngo.

Les Bongangá habitent :

1° Bongangá, au sens strict (Basékâ Inanó, B. Bolaká, B. Bongéngé, B. Bandúwá, B. Lokókómyá);

2° Bongangá de Bakọyọ́, ou Bolíma;

3° Bongangá de Mbómbé ou Basékâ Botúna.

Donc Lotólá, Bakọyọ́ et Mbómbé ont chacun un groupe Etóo et un groupe Bongangá. Bongangá, au sens strict, a en outre un groupe « esclave », nommé Batsína, dont une autre fraction se trouve avec les Bosánjo. A Etóo de Lotólá est adjoint un clan étranger : Bofalambóka, descendant d'un homme Ekonda (Imbolo) et de sa sœur mariée à Mbete, esclave originaire de Bompángá (Wăngatá) et affranchi par son maître.

Nombreux sont les villages avec lesquels cohabitent des groupes étrangers, descendants d'esclaves (ekwála), ou autres (Ekonda, Bombwanja, alliés = likiló, mpámá ou bowélé, mbúsolá (1), etc.).

---

(1) Mpámá ou bowélé sont des étrangers quelconques invités, jadis, par le patriarche du groupe à rester chez lui pour l'exécution de certains travaux, surtout de forge. On nomme mbúsolá la descendance

Si l'on ajoute les descendants de parentes mariées dans d'autres groupements plus ou moins distants, les personnes avec lesquelles le mariage est interdit pour cause de parenté sont nombreuses. De par la loi de l'exogamie, une parenté pareille peut être très dispersée géographiquement, et l'on comprend qu'il n'est pas toujours aisé d'en démêler tous les fils. Aussi arrive-t-il que des jeunes gens nouent des relations en vue d'un mariage, ignorant leur parenté; ils ne sont avertis que par l'opposition et les explications consécutives des anciens.

Nous pouvons conclure qu'entre descendants d'un ancêtre commun le mariage est, de façon générale, interdit s'ils habitent le même village; fréquemment permis, au contraire, s'ils appartiennent à des villages différents, à condition qu'ils ne soient pas en outre parenté par l'une ou l'autre aïeule.

Comme on le voit, il est difficile de dire sur quel degré se base exactement la défense ou la permission du mariage entre descendants d'un ancêtre commun et où se trouve la limite du groupement exogamique.

Il appert encore de ce qui précède, — comme de l'examen de l'empêchement d'affinité, — que la descendance de mère commune est un élément plus important que la descendance de père. Ceci ne prouve pas une certaine forme de matriarcat, tout en pouvant en être un résidu ou un début, ou en fournir une explication partielle, mais dérive tout simplement des conceptions nkundó sur la génération, dont ils attribuent la part prépondérante à la mère, ainsi que de la honte plus grande qu'ils ressentent à s'unir à une personne issue d'une même femme, enfin de l'affection plus vive qu'ils portent à leur mère (senti-d'un enfant apportée par une femme hors de son mariage (chap. 1, 2e partie, art. IV, § 3). On l'appelle aussi [illegible] volants des maris, parce qu'ils sont, non enfants propres, mais comme attachés au mari de leur mère, à l'instar de ces animaux qui pour dormir s'accolent aux arbres.

---

ment augmenté par la polygamie); trois causes qui sont intimement connexes.

Signalons enfin que, parmi les Nkundó dont nous traitons, il existe un groupe qui est moins sévère en la matière. La parenté exclusive du mariage est nettement plus restreinte, c'est-à-dire que leurs groupements exogamiques sont plus limités. Ce sont les Bongale (cfr. Introduction). Le même phénomène se constate chez les Elíngá (¹).

Contre l'infraction à la loi de l'exogamie, aucune sanction n'est prévue. Tout se limite à l'opposition des parents et patriarches et à l'habitude quasi innée.

Remarquons encore que les membres de certains clans se marient fréquemment avec ceux de certains autres clans, dans lesquels ils choisissent de préférence leurs épouses. Il se fait ainsi qu'une forte proportion des femmes mariées dans une famille donnée appartient à un clan déterminé. Ainsi les Wafé (Bakáala) prennent un très grand nombre de leurs épouses chez les Bongale w'ɔ̃tɔ́lɔ́.

Nous pouvons raisonnablement supposer que les ancêtres des groupes apparentés qui actuellement se marient entre eux pratiquaient autrefois l'exogamie. Si cette supposition est exacte, il faut admettre qu'avec l'extension progressive des familles, cette règle s'est relâchée dans un certain sens pour en venir à la situation présente. Par conséquent, il ne serait pas étonnant que dans l'avenir ces dispositions juridiques perdent encore de leur rigueur. De fait, on a vu des jeunes gens commencer à enfreindre les prescriptions exogamiques et, par leur exemple, délier de leur observation toute la famille (²). Ainsi les Bokátola prétendent que leurs deux groupements, Bompela et Ilɔ́ngɛ́, qui à présent se marient, formaient autrefois une seule entité exogamique. Des cas modernes se présentent par-ci par-là, mais sont toujours très rares, même entre personnes apparentées seulement à un degré fort éloigné, et à plus forte raison entre proches parents (¹). Car les Nkundó tiennent encore fort à cette loi. La masse de la population est tout opposée aux relâchements et infractions, et les patriarches et notables réagissent de tout leur pouvoir. Mais comme la vigueur de leur intervention est fort affaiblie par le transfert d'une grande partie de leur autorité aux chefs investis par l'Administration coloniale et par toutes les contingences de la vie moderne; comme, d'autre part, la jeunesse rompt graduellement les cadres anciens pour conquérir une plus grande liberté, ils devront bien s'incliner un jour.

---

(¹) Les Batswá sont encore beaucoup plus larges et diffèrent très peu, sous ce rapport, des anciennes coutumes et lois européennes.

(²) Cfr. chap. I, art. VII, § 1.

ARTICLE IV. — L'AFFINITÉ.

L'affinité (likiló) nkundó ne doit pas être comprise au sens que lui donne le droit ecclésiastique ou civil européen. Le mariage est interdit avec toutes les personnes qui sont bakiló (sing. bokiló) (²). Il s'agit donc de savoir quelles personnes sont nommées bakiló, chose assez compliquée pour nous, Européens.

Avant de donner les règles générales, développons, pour rendre la compréhension plus facile, quelques considérations.

§ 1. Considérations générales.

1° L'empêchement d'affinité est moins rigoureux que l'empêchement de parenté. Il admet une espèce de « dispense »; dans beaucoup de degrés le divorce ou la mort annulent l'empêchement; enfin, on rencontre des transgressions, qui ne se constatent pas, dans les limites indiquées ci-dessus, pour la parenté.

---

(¹) Tel le cas récent d'Elimá et de sa femme [illegible], tous deux du groupe exogamique Bokonyola des Bonjoko, mais appartenant, l'un à la famille des Bosákà [illegible], l'autre aux Bosákà Nsoli.

(²) Contrairement à l'affirmation du R. P. [illegible] (Congo, 1927, I, p. 542).

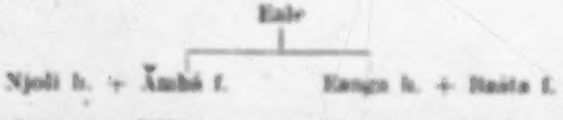
Parmi les raisons légitimes de « dispense » on cite : le danger de voir le patrimoine se disperser par l'infidélité de l'épouse qui ne veut absolument pas rester chez son mari, jointe aux difficultés d'une palabre de divorce et des remboursements conséquents ; et — se rattachant étroitement à la précédente — un amour passionné entre les deux personnes alliées.

La dispense est accordée par le ndonga avec le conseil familial, qui, souvent, surtout lorsque la seconde raison est en cause, s'inclinent devant le fait accompli (¹).

2° A l'encontre du droit européen, qui ne connaît que l'affinité directe entre l'époux et la famille de son conjoint, le droit nkundó connaît aussi l'affinité indirecte, c'est-à-dire qu'une personne considère comme alliés même les conjoints des parents de son épouse; ou toute personne a comme alliés, non seulement les parents de son conjoint, mais aussi les alliés de celui-ci. Ainsi, dans l'exemple ci-joint, Njoli et Baáta sont alliés réels, quoique indirects (²):



Il existe une différence notable entre les deux sortes d'affinité : la directe constitue un empêchement bien plus sévère que l'indirecte, et l'on n'y fait exception que rarement, et cela encore seulement dans certains degrés.

3° Il faut distinguer entre parents « supérieurs » et parents « inférieurs », c'est-à-dire entre ceux qui ont la

---

(¹) Dispenser = [illegible]. Un mariage contracté avec dispense légitime ou accordée de par la force des choses après le fait accompli s'appelle [illegible], c'est-à-dire une affinité non observée.

(²) Le Nkundó ne distingue pas les deux sortes d'affinité par des termes spéciaux. Nous leur donnons ces noms pour la facilité et pour la clarté de l'exposé.

préséance et ceux qui leur doivent soumission et respect. Les parents « supérieurs » sont les ascendants, les oncles, tantes, etc., bref, ceux qui ont titre de père ou de mère, ainsi que les frères aînés (sœurs aînées, cousins aînés, etc.), qui sont des batómóló (sing. botómóló). Les inférieurs sont les descendants, ceux qui sont nommés « enfants » (bána) : fils et filles, petit-fils, neveux, nièces, frères ou sœurs cadets et ceux qui leur sont assimilés et qui sont bakúné (sing. bokúné).

4° La polygamie et l'héritage des veuves introduisent un autre élément. Ainsi nous verrons que dans certains degrés l'affinité constitue un empêchement qui est pourtant levé quand il s'agit de permettre l'héritage des veuves.

5° Les termes « alliés » et « bakiló » ne se couvrent nullement, même pas dans l'affinité directe. Lorsqu'ici nous parlons d'alliés, nous nous exprimons à la façon nkundó. Ce peuple ne considère pas comme alliés certaines personnes que nous jugerions telles. Elles font bien partie du groupe d'individus qu'en bloc on désigne par le mot likiló, bakiló, mais qui, quand on s'exprime au sens propre et exact, sont nommées bóme = mari ou wáli = épouse, parce que leur affinité n'en est pas une au sens strict, puisqu'elles peuvent se marier entre elles. Cela veut dire qu'à proprement parler, l'affinité est pour le Nkundó la relation entre une personne et les (seuls) parents de son conjoint avec lesquels il lui est défendu de se marier. Il est utile de bien avoir présente à la pensée cette double signification du terme.

§ 3. Règles.

1° AFFINITÉ DIRECTE.

A. — En ligne directe les mariages sont défendus. Toutefois, selon la considération n° 4, le fils ou le petit-fils peuvent hériter et épouser les veuves de leur père ou de leur grand-père, mais pas inversement.

Ex. 1.	Bakando f. Mbóyó h. + Esalé f.	Mbóyó ne peut jamais épouser Bakando.
Ex. 2.	Esle h. + Boóná f Mbélá f.	Esle ne peut jamais épouser Mbélá.
Ex. 3.	Bombembi h. Ikété h. + Basáé f.	Bombembi ne peut jamais épouser Basáé (¹).
Ex. 4.	Esalo h. + Longá f. Loféte h.	Lofété peut épouser Longá.

N. B. Les mêmes règles valent pour les grands-parents et les petits-fils.

B. — En ligne collatérale mixte : Le mariage est interdit avec les parents aînés, « supérieurs » du conjoint. Les Injóló y font parfois exception pour une tante de l'épouse après la mort de celle-ci; mais la chose est très mal jugée.

Avec les parents inférieurs, cadets, du conjoint le mariage est permis.

Ex. 5.	Insilo h. Eambela f. Wenga h. + Wetsi f.	Wenga ne peut pas épouser Eambela (sauf l'exception citée).
Ex. 6.	Elomi h. Bokánga f. Boóla h + Bekombe f.	Cas identique au précédent.
Ex. 7.	Eloko h. Bonjembo f. ou Eloko Bonjembo Esalo h. + Elili f. Benteke f. + Lokóná h	Mariages toujours interdits.

(¹) Si Bombembi voulait, après la mort de son fils Ikété, prendre sa veuve, la mère du défunt, excédée par la colère et la honte, l'abandonnerait irrémédiablement. Durant la vie du fils, une conduite pareille du père donnerait au lésé tous les droits de vengeance (assassinat, guerre avec l'aide de son clan maternel, etc.); car la conduite de Bombembi équivaudrait à un véritable désaveu de son fils. Mais le cas est purement hypothétique.

Ex. 8. Boáté h. Bolefó h. + Wanga f.
Lofeka h.

ou Boátó h. Bolefó + Wanga Lofeka.

Lofeka peut épouser Wanga.

Ex. 9. Bosenge f. Bonyeme h. + Eámé f.
Boaési h.

Boaési peut épouser Eámé.

Les mêmes règles valent également pour les grands-oncles, grand'tantes et entre cousins de degré inégal (relations de « père » à « fils »; cfr. tableau des relations et terminologies familiales) (en annexe).

C. — En ligne collatérale égale : Le degré n'a aucune importance : cousines et sœurs, par exemple, suivent les mêmes règles. Le mariage est défendu avec la sœur (cousine) aînée de l'épouse, mais il est permis avec la cadette. Pour les femmes, la même règle vaut; mais après la mort du mari on admet parfois une exception en faveur de l'aîné, afin de faciliter les arrangements de l'héritage. Seuls les Boángi — comme les Elángá de Losanganya — ne font pas la distinction entre aînés et cadets et permettent toujours le mariage. Ils commencent même à être imités par les Injóló.

Ex. 10. Bongoso h. + Mbola f. Bokófo f.

Bongoso peut épouser Bokófo.

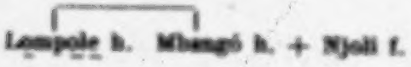
Ex. 11. Mpoku f. Boongi f. + Njamba h.

Njamba ne peut pas épouser Mpoku.

Ex. 12. Bakókó f. + Wanja h. Wai h.

Wai peut toujours épouser Bakókó.

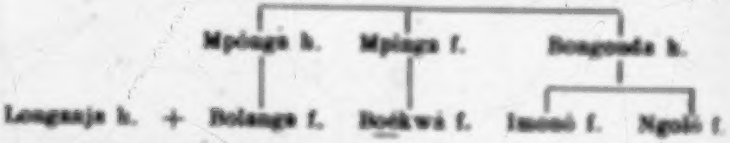
Ex. 13.



Lompole h.
Mbangó h. + Njoli f.

Lompole ne peut pas épouser Njoli. Une exception rarissime est parfois admise.

Ex. 14.

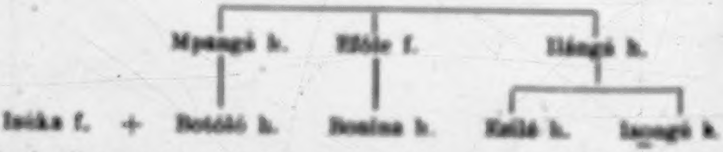


Mpiaga h.
Mpiaga f.
Bongonda h.
Longanja h. + Bolanga f.
Boákwá f.
Imonó f.
Ngolo f.

Longanja ne peut épouser les cousines aînées, mais seulement les cadettes, exceptée Boákwá qui est bɔ́nankáná et donc a rang de « père » (Cfr. supra sous B.)

De même :

Ex. 15.



Mpangá h.
Ekóle f.
Ilóngá h.
Isóka f. + Botóló h.
Bonina h.
Ealá h.
Isongó h.

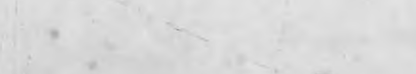
Seuls les cousins cadets de Botóló peuvent épouser Isóka. Bonina est bɔ́nankáná, donc « père » et par conséquent assimilé aux oncles (Cfr. supra sous B).

Notons, enfin, que la rigueur de l'empêchement s'atténue dans la mesure où les degrés sont plus éloignés; c'est-à-dire qu'on admet d'autant plus facilement les dispenses et les exceptions.

2° AFFINITÉ CHARNELLE.

A. — En ligne directe le mariage est défendu, mais on admet certaines exceptions. Deux cas peuvent se présenter : avec la femme du père (exemple 16) et avec la femme du fils (exemple 17).

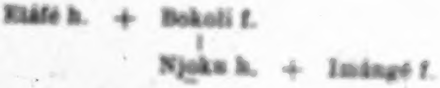
Ex. 16.



Mbembe h. + Ekila f.
Ilóna h. + Bokóna f.

Après la mort ou le divorce de Bokóna, Ilóna peut épouser Ekila mais l'exception est peu courante, parce que fort exposée aux critiques désobligeantes.

Ex. 17.



Etáfé peut épouser Imángé après la mort de Bokolí, mais le cas est toujours très mal interprété. On est plus indulgent si Etáfé a lui-même payé la dot pour Imángé, puisque, alors, il sauvegarde son capital. Cette considération a encore de la valeur pendant la vie de Bokolí, si Imángé ne veut pas rester chez Njoku. Pourtant la mère de ce dernier s'oppose de toutes ses forces. Si Etáfé n'entend pas raison, il peut s'attendre au divorce et même à une guerre de la part du clan de Bokolí. Car il leur est fait une grave injure par Etáfé du fait qu'il a ainsi enlevé la femme de son beau-fils. Après le divorce la nouvelle dot de Bokolí peut être refusée à Etáfé et donnée à Njoku directement, pour qu'il se procure une épouse en remplacement de celle qui lui a été ravie.

Pour les oncles et tantes, les mêmes règles sont applicables, mais elles sont moins rigoureuses :

Ex. 18. (comparable à l'ex. 16) :

Ex. 19. (comparable à l'ex. 17) :

B. — En ligne collatérale provenant d'un mariage entre leurs parents en ligne directe.

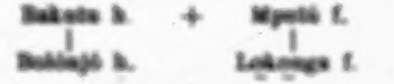
a) Entre descendants le mariage est strictement défendu. Ainsi les enfants de deux conjoints ne peuvent pas se marier ensemble; ils sont considérés comme frères et sœurs. La même règle vaut pour deux demi-cousins (exemple 21).

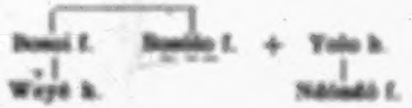
Ex. 20.



Bakuta h.
+
Mpela f.
Bolónjó h.
Lokonga f.

Mariage sévèrement interdit entre Bolónjó et Lokonga.

Ex. 21.

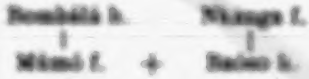


Bomai f.
Bosongo f.
+
Yolo h.
Weyé h.
Ndóndó f.

Entre Weyé et Ndóndó le mariage est interdit.

b) Entre ascendants le mariage est défendu, mais on admet des exceptions lorsque par la mort l'affinité est rompue :

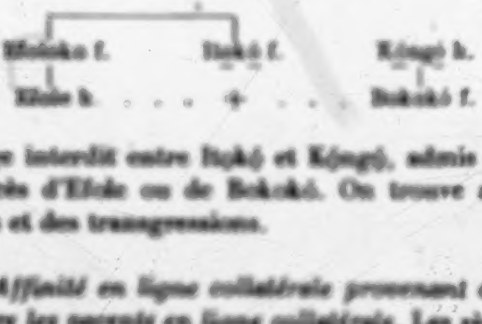
Ex. 22.



Bombálá h.
Nkanga f.
Mbomó f.
+
Baóso h.

Mariage défendu entre Bombálá et Nkanga.

Ex. 23.

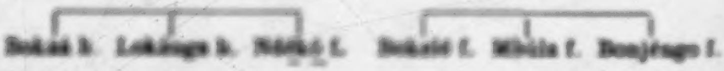


Efotóko f.
Ilokó f.
Kóngó h.
Elóko h.
+
Bokokó f.

Mariage interdit entre Ilokó et Kóngó, admis pourtant après décès d'Elóko ou de Bokokó. On trouve aussi des dispenses et des transgressions.

C. — Affinité en ligne collatérale provenant d'un mariage entre les parents en ligne collatérale. Les règles sont celles de l'affinité directe en ligne collatérale (cfr. ci-dessus, n° 1°, C).

Ex. 24.

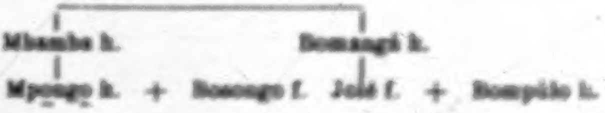


Bokaá h.
Lokánga h.
Nsókó f.
Bokálé f.
Mbála f.
Bonjéngo f.

Bokaá est marié avec Bonjéngo. Ni lui ni Lokánga ne peuvent épouser Bokálé. Et Nsókó ne peut épouser Mbála. S'il avait épousé Bokálé, Nsókó pourrait se marier avec Mbála. Si en outre Bonjéngo était l'aînée de Mbála, Lokánga pourrait l'épouser également.

La même règle vaut pour cousins et cousines :

Ex. 25.



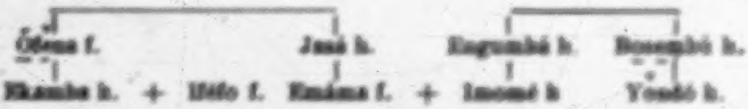
Mbambe h.
Bomangá h.
Mpongo h.
+
Bosongo f.
Jaá f.
+
Bompúlo h.

Mariage interdit entre Bompúlo et Bosongo.

Plus les degrés deviennent éloignés, plus l'empêchement perd de sa force, et par suite plus facilement les exceptions sont admises.

Il reste à noter que — nous l'avons déjà dit à plusieurs reprises — les cousins ou cousines qui sont bɔ́nankána sont, dans le droit nkundó, des « pères » par rapport à leurs cousins, et par conséquent ils sont traités comme oncles ou tantes. L'empêchement est très rigoureux pour eux, surtout lorsqu'ils sont nyangökiló = mère de l'allié. Ainsi l'

Ex. 26.



Ótema f.
Jaá h.
Engumbá h.
Bosembé h.
Ekamba h.
+
Iféfo f.
Emáma f.
+
Imomé h
Yondó h.

Ekamba est bɔ́nankána de Jaá, donc « père » d'Emáma. Iféfo, sa femme, est donc la « mère » d'Emáma. Celle-ci est « bokiló » d'Yondó. Par conséquent, Iféfo est la mère de la bokiló, ou nyangökiló de Yondó. Entre ces deux-là le mariage est strictement défendu, bien qu'il ne le soit pas entre Emáma et Yondó (cfr. exemple 18).

Quant aux relations adultères entre ces diverses personnes, il en sera question au chapitre VI, article VI, § 2.

CHAPITRE VI.

LA VIE CONJUGALE.

Dès que les fiancés vont cohabiter, comme il est décrit ci-dessus, ils ont tous les devoirs et droits des époux. Aucune cérémonie spéciale ne marque la consommation du mariage.

Pour traduire « vie conjugale », les Nkundó emploient le substantif ibálelo, du verbe bálana, forme réciproque du radical -bál = se marier. Comme le verbe, le substantif est usité tant au sens matériel qu'au sens moral, social. Notre terme « ménage, famille » n'a pas d'équivalent exact dans leur langue. Ils ne possèdent que le mot ilɔngɔ, qui signifie la famille au sens large, c'est-à-dire toutes les personnes apparentées, mais qu'on pourrait bien adopter pour rendre nos termes européens (*).

Dans ce chapitre nous examinerons la position des époux entre eux : Division du travail, Propriété, Devoirs et Droits divers; puis les relations des conjoints avec leurs familles ou alliés; enfin, les relations sexuelles extraconjugales.

ARTICLE I. — DIVISION DU TRAVAIL.

Les soins du ménage : conservation et préparation des aliments, nettoyage de la case et de la cour, plantation et entretien des champs, des cultures diverses, soins des enfants, incombent à la femme. Elle s'adonne à la pêche par écopement et fait des travaux de vannerie (nattes, paniers, ramassettes). Chez les Elinga, elle moule et cuit les pots. C'est la femme encore qui va chercher le menu bois de chauffage, besogne à laquelle le couteau et la machette suffisent, tandis que le gros bois, pour lequel on doit se servir de haches, est apporté par le mari. C'est elle encore qui procure les légumes, les champignons, les chenilles. Elle fait l'extraction de l'huile, fabrique le sel et va aux marchés. Elle donne encore ses soins à la basse-cour.

---

(*) De l'absence d'un nom spécifique, nous ne pouvons pas conclure à l'absence de la chose. Les Nkundó connaissent la famille au sens de ménage, quoiqu'ils s'en fassent une autre idée et lui aient donné une autre organisation que beaucoup de peuples. D'ailleurs, le mot familia avait chez les Romains un sens bien différent de celui du mot français, qui, lui aussi, a une double signification.

[p. 210]

L'homme, de son côté, outre ses occupations politiques et sociales diverses, vaque aux travaux plus durs, plus dangereux, plus conformes à sa nature et à sa constitution, tels que la chasse, la pêche, la coupe des régimes de noix de palme, le travail du bois et du fer, la construction de la case et de ses annexes, le tressage des nasses et claies de pêche, l'abatage de la forêt pour l'installation des cultures (que la femme brûle, plante et entretient ensuite).

La division du travail est donc bien réglée. Chacun s'occupe de la besogne qui convient à sa nature. Ne nous étonnons pas trop de ce qu'un homme n'aide jamais sa femme, ni vice versa : tous deux se cantonnent dans leur propre domaine. Il serait honteux pour eux de se mêler des travaux de l'autre sexe. Ils ne s'en font mutuellement aucun grief. D'ailleurs, il est conforme à la nature des choses que la femme reçoive, dans le ménage, la majeure part des tracas, surtout si elle a quelques enfants. Par conséquent, nous jugerions mal en traitant la femme de bête de somme et le mari de profiteur paresseux (*).

(*) Comparez ce qu'écrit le R. P. [illegible], dans les Missions catholiques, LIV^e année, n° [illegible], août [illegible], p. [illegible] : « A part quelques rares privilégiées de la fortune, la femme, chez les Noirs que nous avons connus, vaque aux occupations de son ménage à peu près comme une bonne paysanne de chez nous. Elle nous a paru rarement la bête de somme qu'on se plaît à décrire ».

ARTICLE II. — PROPRIÉTÉ.

Par le mariage, la femme ne devient pas membre du clan de son mari. Si elle est née dans le clan de Bofékola, par exemple, elle reste toute sa vie bonà Bofékola = membre du clan Bofékola, et son cadavre doit être enterré dans sa terre natale. En cas de divorce et de remariage, le nouvel époux ne restitue pas la dot au premier, mais paie aux parents de la femme, qui, eux, remboursent le mari abandonné.

Pourtant, toute l'activité de l'épouse est dirigée vers le bien de son conjoint et de la famille de celui-ci, et cela dès le versement de l'ikulá. Les parents n'ont plus droit sur leur fille. Tous les fruits de son travail sont la propriété de son mari.

Si elle trouve des objets sans propriétaire, par exemple des défenses d'éléphants, des anneaux de cuivre enfouis dont personne ne réclame la possession, ils ne lui appartiennent pas, ni à sa famille, mais uniquement à son mari. Si celui-ci partage avec ses beaux-parents, c'est là un effet de son affection et de son respect envers eux. Il n'y a aucune obligation de justice, mais un certain devoir de bienséance et de bonne entente cordiale.

Les bénéfices de la vente des produits de son industrie (vivres pour le marché, nattes, sel, pots, paniers, etc.) ne lui appartiennent pas, mais au mari.

Même ce qu'elle acquiert lors d'une visite à ses parents, tout ce qu'elle trouve pendant un retour dans sa famille, les poissons qu'elle y pêche, les chenilles qu'elle y ramasse en forêt, tout cela appartient uniquement à son mari.

Il peut arriver que, dans ce domaine, une femme outrepasse ses droits. Généralement, le mari bienveillant la laisse faire. La sévérité serait attribuée à un manque d'affection envers son épouse, ou de délicatesse à l'égard de ses beaux-parents, et, ce qui est plus grave pour le Nkundó, serait même critiquée comme avarice (jamais comme injustice !). La conduite malhonnête de la femme peut cependant donner origine à des incidents, et même à des incidents sérieux. Tel le cas historique d'Efoloko d'Ikengya (Bongili), mariée à Mpokú d'Imomo. Etant allée à la pêche chez elle, elle donna tout son poisson à son frère Bolómadingá. Le mari n'insista pas. Mais à une réunion, aspergée de bière, ses compagnons le raillèrent à cause de son indulgence excessive, en l'expliquant comme une faiblesse. Là-dessus, Mpokú se mit en fureur, et la suite fut une guerre sanglante entre les deux clans.

Le mari doit entretenir sa femme et réserver une juste part des bénéfices réalisés à son habillement et pour lui procurer les ustensiles, etc.; ou bien lui remettre de quoi pourvoir à ses besoins et aux nécessités du ménage.

Bien donc que le mari soit seul légitime propriétaire des produits de l'activité de sa femme, de par une autre loi il lui doit la part raisonnablement requise pour son entretien. Si la femme s'approprie ces bénéfices sans en informer en préalable le mari, il y a infraction. Si le mari n'accorde pas à sa femme le nécessaire et l'utile qu'il peut lui donner, il y a également infraction.

Les poissons pêchés par la femme sont préparés et le reste est fumé pour la conservation à l'usage commun du ménage. Si le mari n'est pas trop mal disposé, il lui en cède une partie à l'intention de sa famille à elle. .

Les champs que les époux ont établis en commun (l'homme en abattant la forêt, la femme en brûlant, nettoyant, plantant et entretenant) sont la propriété du mari. Les fruits servent à leur entretien mutuel et à celui des enfants. Les bénéfices de la vente partielle sont destinés à leur usage commun. Ils s'arrangent entre eux comme dans les familles ordinaires d'Europe. Il est évident qu'ici encore des infractions se commettent et que l'un ou l'autre exagère quelquefois sa part en sa faveur, ou au bénéfice de ses parents, ou qu'il en dispose sans avoir communiqué à son conjoint ses intentions. Mais tous les honnêtes gens désapprouvent une telle conduite (1).

Si un jour le mariage est rompu, la femme n'a plus aucun droit à faire valoir sur les champs, ustensiles, habits, etc. Elle n'hérite pas de son mari. A sa mort à elle, sa famille n'a aucun droit sur ce qu'elle aurait laissé, excepté, évidemment, les valeurs qu'elle a reçues lors du mariage d'une de ses filles (2).

Cette situation de la femme au point de vue propriété a encore une autre conséquence : le mari est responsable du dommage causé par sa femme. C'est lui qui doit payer l'indemnité. Il en est de même des dettes qu'elle aurait contractées. Si elle a emprunté, le créancier réclame son dû, non à la femme, ni à la famille, mais au mari. C'est uniquement ce dernier qui est reconnu civilement responsable, puisque c'est lui seul qui possède et a droit à l'activité économique de son épouse, en bénéfice et en déficit. Après quoi il est en droit de gronder et même de battre sa femme qui lui a causé ce tort financier. Il faut pourtant excepter le cas où la famille de la femme reconnaît officiellement, c'est-à-dire par versement public, devant témoins, d'un ndanga, qu'elle-même est en faute, et enlève ainsi au mari la responsabilité.

Nous pouvons donc conclure :

1° La femme n'est pas propriétaire.

2° Elle a pourtant droit à une part raisonnable pour ses besoins divers. Ce droit n'est pas un droit de propriété strict (jus in re), mais un droit à ce qu'il faut pour sa sustentation (jus ad rem).

3° Il n'y a donc pas possibilité pour les parents de la femme d'hériter des biens que le mari a mis à sa dispotion.

---

(1) Une fable enseigne la bonne attitude à adopter dans ces cas.

(2) Cfr. chap. II, art. V. Pour de plus amples détails, cfr. chap. VIII, art. V, et chap. IX, art. IV et VII.

4° La femme n'agissant jamais en son nom propre, mais comme préposée du mari, la responsabilité « civile » incombe à celui-ci.

ARTICLE III. — RELATIONS DES ÉPOUX ENTRE EUX. DEVOIRS ET DROITS DIVERS.

Les conjoints ont l'obligation de s'acquitter des devoirs et d'exécuter les travaux qui leur incombent.

Il est difficile de dire jusqu'où va, chez les Nkundó, la conscience du devoir de rendre le debitum conjugale. D'ordinaire ils se le rendent très souvent. Mais après une bonne querelle ils s'en abstiennent, de consentement mutuel, ou par le refus de l'un. Si des manquements graves et continuellement réitérés sont commis par l'une ou l'autre partie, la question sera résolue par le divorce. Pour des manquements passagers, tout se borne à des réprimandes, disputes, coups et autres réactions communes. Ajoutons que la continence s'impose pendant la période de l'ekelé après la naissance d'un enfant et après l'établissement d'une nouvelle clôture de chasse (lokombo) ou d'un nouveau barrage de pêche (bosaka), avant la capture de la troisième pièce.

§ 1. Repas.

Les repas ne sont jamais pris en commun par les conjoints. Le mari mange seul ou avec ses grands fils, ses parents ou amis, les aliments que l'épouse lui a préparés et lui sert. Elle-même mange avec ses enfants en bas âge, ses filles, ses parentes. Les deux sexes ne se mêlent jamais dans la réfection.

La même règle vaut pour les causeries, mais elle est bien moins sévère : il n'est pas rare que pour une raison ou une autre des femmes participent à la conversation des hommes.

Par l'influence du christianisme, on ne tardera guère à admettre les femmes dans les conversations de l'autre sexe, d'une façon générale. La chose ira beaucoup plus difficilement pour les repas mixtes; pratiquement la brèche n'est pas même entamée.

Aussi trouve-t-on, à côté de la chambre à coucher, ou à part de la case, une cuisine, qui non seulement est destinée à la préparation des aliments, mais est encore le local où la femme se tient pendant la journée. Ici la cuisine forme une construction isolée de l'habitation proprement dite; là elle est une partie de la maison, séparée de la chambre à coucher par une paroi pourvue d'une porte. Les polygames, et certains monogames, possèdent une sorte de hangar où ils reçoivent leurs amis, traitent leurs affaires, prennent leur repas, etc. (*).

Un homme qui se trouve souvent à la cuisine ou aime à s'y reposer s'attire la risée des autres, hommes et femmes; on le traite d'ikómbelinga (dérivé de bolinga = fumée, et kómba = faire des mouvements pour éviter, détourner la tête pour protéger les yeux contre la fumée).

§ 3. Maladies.

L'épouse est obligée de soigner son mari malade, de concert avec les autres épouses, s'il est polygame, et aidée, dans les cas sérieux, par des parentes à lui (mère, soeurs). Même mariées ailleurs elles viennent soigner leur fils ou frère. Que leur mari soit raisonnable et ne cherche pas à leur interdire cette absence, ni à contrecarrer l'exercice de ce devoir, car il risque fort de voir sa femme le quitter définitivement, outrée par le manque d'affection dont il fait preuve envers sa famille à elle.

Solidairement elles cherchent les médicaments et préparent les potions.

A la maladie de la femme, comme les parentes du mari

(*) Ce local est surtout connu par les Bombwanja, imité par les autres tribus. Les [illegible], comme les [illegible] et Bolenge d'entre Congo-[illegible], disent [illegible]. Les Ekonda = [illegible].

sont, en règle générale, bien disposées envers l'épouse de leur fils, frère, etc., elles ne manquent pas de venir la voir, la consoler et lui administrer les soins qu'elles sont à même de donner. Le mari doit, de son côté, chercher les médicaments et aider la malade. J'ai connu une grosse palabre relativement à cette matière. Un certain Bokangá avait, pendant la maladie de sa femme Efętsi, eu des rapports dans sa case avec une autre femme. L'affaire devint publique. Le coupable dut rétablir la paix et la bonne entente par un bojindo considérable, pour avoir manqué de donner ses soins à son épouse et pour s'être montré d'une insouciance et d'une indifférence absolues.

Si l'affection se prolonge ou se montre grave, ni le mari ni ses parentes n'ont les loisirs de la soigner et de s'occuper d'elle. Pour remédier à ces inconvénients et en même temps pour donner aux parents de la femme la satisfaction de pouvoir assister eux-mêmes leur fille, le mari l'envoie chez eux. Il la conduit personnellement, ou il les appelle pour venir la prendre. Il leur fait parvenir la nouvelle en envoyant son ndanga muni d'un paiement de témoignage (ndanga, loikalo): couteau, anneau de cuivre, etc. Ce ndanga est un gage, une preuve pour la famille de l'épouse que leur fille était malade à son arrivée, et qu'elle n'a pas contracté l'infirmité chez eux. Sans ce gage, ils ne voudraient pas la prendre; ils préféreraient la traiter chez son mari. Ou, si le mari l'envoyait chez elle sans ndanga, ils appelleraient le ndanga comme témoin de l'infraction. Ou encore le fait serait considéré comme répudiation pure et simple. De toute façon le mari serait en tort, et la responsabilité juridique du décès de la femme, dans ces conditions, lui incomberait totalement (cfr. plus loin, chap. IX, art. X).

Après la guérison les parents envoient au gendre un message pour l'engager à venir reprendre son épouse.

Même non invités par le mari, les parents de la femme, ayant reçu avis de la maladie de leur fille, viennent la voir pour l'emmener avec eux, afin de la soigner. Généralement elle les suit. Mais elle n'en a pas l'obligation, car elle appartient à son mari. On cite même des noms de femmes qui, malgré toutes les instances de leur famille, n'ont point voulu se faire traiter chez elle, mais ont préféré mourir dans les bras de leur mari, pour ainsi dire. Ainsi, Bokámbá w'Ikɔfɔ de Bombóngo w'Ikonda (Bɔyɔndɛ), mariée à Iɔmbɛ y'Ilongo de Engónjó; Balɛkɔ de Nsɛkó, mariée à Eanga éá Jéfá de Nkóiengo; Iombe de Bosió, mariée à Bokálóambwá de Iélé; Balɔngɔla de Nkémbá (Bombwanja), mariée à Lompoko de Mbelé; Mpámbɛ de Bongeanda (Bonkoso), mariée à Imbeamba de Bɔnjɔkɔ; Efɔla de Longa, mariée Ilɔlí de Bokányola (Bɔnjɔkɔ); Bandɛ de Mbelé, mariée à Nkɔngɔ de Lɛlɛlí.

Si la femme s'est rendue en bonne santé dans sa famille et qu'elle y contracte une infirmité, la responsabilité en incombe à ses parents. Ils sont obligés de la soigner et de prendre sur eux tous les frais causés par le traitement. Après guérison, ils la renvoient en lui remettant une quantité de nkɔpɔnɔ à l'intention du mari. Généralement l'affaire en reste là. Si pourtant les relations ne sont pas très bonnes entre les deux familles, l'époux réclame une indemnité, qui varie selon les cas et à laquelle, de toute façon, il a droit, même s'il s'abstient de la réclamer.

Cette stipulation du droit vaut même lorsque la femme est allée voir sa mère, son père, etc., lors d'une maladie ou pour tout autre motif.

Au contraire, elle ne vaut pas si l'épouse s'est rendue chez ses parents sur l'ordre exprès du mari ou si elle a fui le toit conjugal pour mauvais traitements ou manquements graves du conjoint, comme nous expliquerons ci-dessous au § 8. La maladie est, dans ces cas, imputable civilement au mari.

Certains cas intermédiaires peuvent donner lieu à d'âpres discussions. Ainsi, par exemple, une visite de la propre initiative de l'épouse, mais pour le bien du mari. Théoriquement, celui-ci doit gagner le procès. Enfin, il reste à signaler qu'un séjour de vingt-quatre heures seulement n'est pas reconnu suffisant pour faire retomber sur la famille de la femme la responsabilité de la maladie.

La colonisation a donné origine à un cas tout nouveau. La législation octroie aux femmes supplémentaires des polygames la liberté de se rendre dans une Mission afin de s'y faire instruire dans la religion chrétienne et de contracter un mariage monogamique (moyennant l'observation des règles coutumières qui régissent la dissolution des mariages). Une telle femme peut tomber malade à la Mission. Si cette affection n'a pas de suites fâcheuses spéciales, elle ne donne pas lieu à contestations. Il en est autrement si elle devient chronique et nuisible de quelque façon au conjoint abandonné.

Les polygames se déclarent libres de toute responsabilité qu'ils font retomber sur la famille de la femme. Mais la famille n'y est pour rien : il est injuste de la mêler à cette question. Comme la législation veut combattre la polygamie, il est naturel que ce soit le mari polygame qui en pâtisse.

Tel le cas récent que voici : Mbóyó Julienne, sœur de Botúma Jean de Bekondó, mariée au polygame Inséŋ de Bokenyola (Bonjoku), s'était rendue à la Mission de Bokúma, où elle contracta une maladie inguérissable (*). De ce fait elle ne put trouver à se remarier. Quittant donc la Mission, elle ne fut plus admise par son mari coutumier et force lui fut d'habiter chez son frère. Inséŋ exige de celui-ci le remboursement de la dot, prétendant que la femme a divorcé en se rendant à la Mission, en réalité toutefois parce qu'elle est devenue inapte aux devoirs conjugaux. Puisque Mbóyó n'a pas contracté la maladie au foyer conjugal, il en rend la famille responsable.

(*) Il s'agit d'une sorte d'affection à symptômes nerveux. Scientifiquement parlant, il est plus que probable qu'elle était déjà auparavant atteinte de la maladie, qui ne fit que se manifester à la Mission. Mais les indigènes ne font pas cette distinction, qui n'importe donc pas pour notre sujet.

§ 3. L'abandon du toit conjugal.

Dans les manquements graves de la part du mari, l'arme ordinaire de la femme est l'abandon du toit conjugal pour rentrer dans la maison paternelle. Si elle s'est enfuie dans un cas sérieux, c'est au mari d'aller la reprendre. Elle ne rentre pas de sa propre initiative. L'époux ne peut invoquer son tort à elle. S'il refuse de faire le premier pas, tant l'opinion publique que ses beaux-parents l'accusent de ne pas aimer son épouse, et la rupture deviendra inévitable. Il est donc de son devoir de se rendre chez les parents de sa femme. Ceux-ci l'invitent à exposer le cas. La femme aussi dit sa façon de penser. Les parents tranchent le différend. La présence ou l'absence du ndonga dépend de la gravité du cas. En règle très générale les parents de la femme jugent avec impartialité, parce qu'ils tiennent à la stabilité du mariage. Si le mari se croit lésé, il peut toujours faire appel au ndonga, ce qui, d'ordinaire, n'est pas nécessaire, de sorte que l'affaire s'arrange à l'amiable et en privé. Si la femme est reconnue avoir tort, ses parents la grondent et lui font la leçon. Ils la renvoient munie de quelque cadeau (deux, trois bakonga, par exemple) à son mari, en lui conseillant de se conduire à l'avenir d'une manière plus convenable. Si elle regimbe, les parents ne reculent pas devant les menaces et les malédictions, qui manquent rarement leur effet. Actuellement, la femme étant déjà plus émancipée, il arrive qu'elle en fasse fi, notamment lorsqu'elle a un amant quelque part en dehors de l'atteinte de la justice familiale. Si le tort est du côté du mari, l'épouse ne l'accompagne qu'après qu'il l'en ait suppliée, en payant, d'après la gravité du cas, quelques anneaux de cuivre ou autres valeurs. C'est ce qu'on exprime par le verbe bifenda et le substantif bojindo, qui ne sont pas propres et réservés à ces seuls cas, mais s'emploient dans toute circonstance où il s'agit de se faire pardonner une offense grave. Ce paiement n'a pas le sens d'une amende, ni d'une indemnité, mais est plutôt l'équivalent des excuses et des rétractations parmi les Européens.

A présent certaines femmes rentrent dans leur famille pour des motifs très peu sérieux. La liberté et la plus grande facilité des communications, jointes au désir d'émancipation, qui n'est plus retenu par le frein des sanctions ancestrales, sont la cause de cet état de choses. Ce qui les retient encore un peu c'est le danger de rupture, éventualité qu'en général on préfère ne pas voir se réaliser, surtout si le montant de la dot est assez élevé.

Autrefois, lorsque la femme était mariée à une faible distance, elle pouvait toujours s'enfuir chez ses parents à l'occasion de palabres conjugales. Même si le chemin passe par d'autres villages, il y a toujours moyen de prendre le sentier direct par la forêt. Car cette sorte de sentiers existe partout : ils contournent les villages intermédiaires, pour que, en cas de conflit, ou d'un danger d'assassinat, le voyageur puisse poursuivre sa route sans être aperçu. La situation était différente quand la femme était mariée dans un village éloigné. Non seulement elle courait en route de nombreux et graves dangers, mais son clan n'avait pas la facilité d'intervenir en sa faveur et d'appuyer par la force le respect de ses droits. On comprend aisément que si l'épouse se trouvait seule et isolée, sans soutien effectif de la part de sa famille, son mari et ses beaux-parents pouvaient se permettre beaucoup d'injustices à son égard, s'ils étaient mal disposés envers elle, à moins que le ndonga ne fût assez influent pour les maintenir dans de justes bornes. D'où le proverbe : bol'ôsîkâ, enkîla ngâ lîkoolo = si le village natal est éloigné, la paix (dans le ménage) est comme un esclavage.

Dans les querelles de ménage il arrive quelquefois que le mari exaspéré crie à sa femme : « Va-t-en, rentre chez toi. » Celle-ci se contente d'aller attendre chez une parente quelconque le retour du calme. Mais d'autres fois aussi elle prend ces paroles à la lettre et part chez elle. Ses parents, ayant pris connaissance du cas, donnent tort à leur fille. On ne peut prendre la chose au tragique. Le conjoint a agi dans un moment de mauvaise humeur, d'indignation exagérée. Ce n'est pas un renvoi ni une répudiation. Il n'y a pas question de haine ni d'indifférence. La chose n'est donc pas prise au sérieux, et, l'épouse s'étant calmée, ses parents la persuadent de rejoindre son mari. Si celui-ci l'aime bien, l'affaire en reste là; elle est pardonnée et oubliée. Même si la femme, étant ainsi partie dans sa famille, y tombe malade ou y meurt, la responsabilité lui en incombe à elle-même C'est donc que ce renvoi n'est nullement considéré comme sérieux et n'a rien à voir avec une répudiation ni même ne peut être comparé à la fuite de l'épouse pour cause de mauvais traitements.

En résumé, si la femme abandonne le toit conjugal pour une affaire sérieuse, qu'elle ait tort ou raison, n'importe, le mari est obligé d'aller la reprendre. Au contraire, dans la fuite pour futilités, les parents renvoient leur fille trop irascible. En général, sont reconnus motifs sérieux et justes de fuite : manquements graves aux devoirs conjugaux, châtiments ou répressions sans cause juste, excès dans les châtiments justes.

Ajoutons que dans certains ménages des difficultés surgissent assez facilement à l'occasion de visites des parents ou des beaux-parents : susceptibilités, incompatibilité des caractères, mécontentement d'une partie qui juge l'autre en défaut d'impolitesse, d'indélicatesse, d'irrespect, de chicheté envers les visiteurs ses parents. Il en est de même pour ce qui regarde l'éducation des enfants.

§ 4. Sanctions.

La loi nkundó permet au mari d'infliger à son épouse certaines corrections (bikánjoá, s. ekánjoá), qui varient de nature d'après la gravité des cas. Il est évident que ces sanctions, expressément permises par la loi, ne peuvent donner lieu à des réclamations de la part de la femme, ni entraîner l'obligation de verser un bojóndo. A moins, bien entendu, que le mari, outrepassant ses droits, n'exagère plus que ne le comporte la gravité de l'affaire. Car dans ces conditions, l'épouse, soutenue par sa famille, attaque le conjoint, qui sera obligé de reconnaître et de réparer ses torts au moyen d'un bojóndo. En cas de blessure, elle peut réclamer un paiement supplémentaire, nommé lipombo (verbe bomba), c'est-à-dire bandage (de la plaie) et qui consiste en cinq anneaux ou davantage selon les cas. Est assimilé à une blessure grave le fait d'enlever ou de casser une dent. Car c'est un tort réel fait à la femme et, pour les dents de devant, à sa beauté (*). Evidemment, comme il a été dit ci-dessus, l'épouse a commencé par s'enfuir chez elle, et c'est là que le différend est examiné.

Pour permettre une plus claire compréhension, entrons un peu dans les détails des stipulations pénales de la loi nkundó par rapport à la vie commune des époux.

D'ordinaire, dans une simple querelle de ménage, les conjoints se contentent de se dire mutuellement les vérités, généralement en assaisonnant de quelques gros mots leurs discours. Si la femme va plus loin, le mari lui administre une bonne gifle, mais il ne peut se permettre sur elle d'autres exercices de ses muscles.

Si la langue de la femme est trop déliée et qu'elle se permette des injures graves sans raison proportionnée, ce manque de respect est jugé punissable. Il n'est pourtant pas de mise de redresser le tort au moyen de coups, quoique dans la pratique les jeunes hommes fougueux ne se retiennent pas toujours. La sanction prônée par la sagesse tribale est l'abstention des aliments préparés par la coupable et le refus de l'acte conjugal. La femme nkundó y est très sensible. Si elle est reconnue avoir réellement tort et si la paix ne se rétablit pas promptement, sa famille supplie le mari de se calmer en lui offrant un bọ́ọ́ndọ, qui peut monter à la valeur d'un chien.

---

(*) De par le limage, les incisives sont beaucoup moins résistantes que les dents normales. Le limage se pratique pour obtenir un effet de beauté.

Lors d'une dispute, la femme nkundó, au lieu d'insulter et de maudire son époux directement, a parfois recours à un détour : elle s'adresse à un animal domestique qui passe devant elle. L'homme ne s'y trompe évidemment pas, et l'effet est identique.

Nous parlons ici d'insultes ordinaires, comme de souhaiter la mort : owé = meurs; nkọi ékokumbé = le léopard te prenne; njoá ékọkọ́ọ́ = qu'un serpent te morde; ójówé é ? = ne meurs-tu pas?; ọ́kọna = deviens malade; bákokimbé ndá ngọ́lo = qu'on te porte au cimetière; bákokundé = qu'on t'enterre. Il en est de même des invectives basées sur des défauts corporels, ou des humiliations, en le traitant de bolólé ou etula = homme de rien; ímpọmọ́lọ = idiot; ímpumpuma = bête, etc.

Au contraire, si la volubilité de la femme s'attaque aux parents du mari, l'affaire devient plus sérieuse. Car le Nkundó supporte très mal les débauches de la langue envers eux. Soit qu'il s'agisse de railleries sur leur compte ou d'injures comme : mange ta mère, ton père, ou d'obscénités à leur égard, ou qu'on « déterre » les parents défunts en évoquant leur souvenir (*), l'effet ne varie pas beaucoup. La seule différence dans l'intensité de la fureur et des réactions provient du tempérament individuel des intéressés.

---

(*) A titre de documentation psychologique et morale, voici le texte latin de quelques expressions à la mode : vulva matris tuae; comede excrementa in clitoride; [illegible] [illegible]. Le même genre, [illegible] [illegible], est employé pour le père, frère, sœur, etc. Pour « déterrer » : [illegible] ([illegible], [illegible], [illegible], etc.) = déterre ta famille, père, mère, etc. [illegible] [illegible] = tes cadavres, c'est-à-dire tes parents défunts (expression très [illegible]).

Le Nkundó est gravement outragé par les obscénités que son épouse lui lance à la tête, particulièrement si cela se fait en public. La réaction est toujours violente. D'ordinaire on en vient aux coups, à la rossée, parfois au couteau. Seulement, si le mari veut se contenir dans les limites de la légalité, il ne peut blesser, ni, à plus forte raison, tuer sa femme de sa propre autorité. Au préalable il doit porter le cas devant le ndonga. Sa famille est invitée à la réunion, et si possible aussi le père de la femme. Le mari outragé expose sa palabre et avertit l'assemblée qu'un jour ou l'autre son exaspération le poussera à saisir le couteau. Par le fait d'avoir porté le cas devant les personnalités compétentes, l'époux peut aller de l'avant et désormais il lui est loisible de se venger des opprobres que lui infligera sa femme. Si la coupable recommence, nul ne pourra accuser le mari de lui faire tort, puisqu'elle-même est en faute et qu'il l'a avertie selon toutes les règles du droit.

La jeunesse moderne n'observe pas toujours cette procédure. Mais son esprit révolutionnaire lui attire des blâmes, et souvent le met dans de grands embarras. Ces vieux sont jaloux de leur autorité, — et personne ne peut leur en faire un reproche. Aussi abandonnent-ils souvent leur fils dans une pareille palabre. Puisque le jeune fougueux n'a pas voulu observer la coutume ancestrale et a jugé sa force supérieure au droit, sa façon d'agir est injustifiable. Il faut louer chez beaucoup de vieux indigènes ce sentiment inné de justice et d'impartialité, qui leur fait désapprouver et condamner leurs propres enfants. Aussi, si l'ardent vengeur de son honneur ne change pas de conduite et ne combat pas la violence irréfléchie de son tempérament en la remplaçant par un peu de pondération, son mariage ne tiendra point. Et c'est lui-même qui sera accusé d'avoir causé la rupture. La chose est claire : il est bien vrai que la femme a commencé. Le mari avait donc en main tous les atouts. Pourquoi ne s'en est-il pas servi? S'il avait suivi la procédure imposée par la loi, il aurait eu gain de cause sur toute la ligne.

L'avertissement préalable du nkonga et de l'autorité familiale ne prouve pas que le mari n'ait pas droit de punir sa femme d'une manière violente. L'observation de cette conduite est exigée pour éviter les excès et les abus. On ne laisse pas à l'époux la liberté d'agir à sa guise. Le recours aux représentants de l'autorité familiale peut être considéré comme une sorte de délégation de leur pouvoir.

Ces dispositions juridiques des Nkundó sont réellement sages. Tout en donnant au mari outragé le droit de châtier sa femme et, par retour, de retenir celle-ci, la loi impose un frein à l'impétuosité de la colère irréfléchie. En outre, en exigeant la publicité, elle évite des palabres et discussions interminables sur des indemnités, etc., à payer.

Autrefois, tel et tel pouvaient être exaspérés par l'opprobre au point de ne plus savoir maîtriser leur fureur. Des femmes ont été tuées pour cette raison. L'homme, disent les Nkundó, ne se laissait entraîner à cette extrémité que poussé par le grand amour qu'il portait à sa femme. Cette remarque a sa valeur psychologique. Pourtant, le fait n'était pas loué et pouvait même donner naissance à une guerre.

Il arrivait qu'un homme en fureur, voulant tuer sa femme dans ces conditions, en était empêché parce que la condition d'efficacité (nsimbo) d'une pratique (boté) en sa possession lui interdisait l'assassinat. Il avait alors recours à l'aide d'une tierce personne, qui — contre rémunération s'entend — se chargeait de l'exécution de son projet. Cette besogne était généralement confiée à des Batswa, qui ne dédaignaient point ce genre de travail, tout à fait adapté à leurs goûts.

Les châtiments que la loi donne au mari le droit d'infliger pour ce genre d'art oratoire imposaient à la femme une certaine mesure de prudence dans le choix de ses expressions. Par crainte des réactions violentes, elle prononçait souvent les injures plus graves à voix basse.

Depuis la pénétration européenne, les femmes osent davantage. Car les maris craignent la justice européenne, qui suit de tout autres principes que leur droit ancestral. Aussi se plaignent-ils amèrement de l'insolence de leurs épouses : « Nous sommes devenus des esclaves; les femmes sont maintenant toutes-puissantes; elles peuvent agir à leur guise, car nous ne pouvons plus rien leur faire. » Mais dès que les tribunaux indigènes seront suffisamment éduqués et se seront libérés de ce qu'un éminent juriste colonial a appelé « la juridiction des palabres » (1), ils apporteront indubitablement un changement salutaire dans cette situation.

Cette émancipation des femmes est une des causes qui ont augmenté la fréquence des divorces. Car l'homme qui ne peut se venger des outrages continuels reste sous l'empire de la honte; et la présence de celle qui en est la cause doit à la longue lui devenir insupportable, d'où indifférence, antipathie, haine et les suites inévitables de ce trouble permanent dans le ménage.

Des hommes chez qui le sentiment de la pudeur était particulièrement développé allaient de honte se pendre, au lieu de s'attaquer à la coupable. C'est ce que beaucoup d'indigènes m'ont prétendu. Je n'ai pourtant connaissance d'aucun exemple actuel. Dans cette éventualité, la famille de la femme n'intervenait plus contre sa fille. Elle n'était d'ailleurs pas obligée de payer une indemnité, quoique leur enfant eût occasionné ce décès. Elle devait simplement s'acquitter des obligations ordinaires et communes à la mort d'un gendre. Faut-il voir là une sorte de condamnation implicite du suicide ?

---

(1) Cfr. A. Sohier, Bulletin des Séances de l'Institut Royal Colonial Belge, VI, 1935, 1, p. 40 et passim.

La sagesse des vieux recommande à la jeunesse de ne point se laisser entraîner par la colère à des actes de brutalité, même là où, en droit, il est loisible de recourir à la manière forte. Ils n'agissent pas ainsi par politique d'adaptation au régime actuel. Même avant l'arrivée des Blancs ils donnaient des leçons de calme et de maîtrise de soi. Car les coups graves, les blessures et surtout l'homicide peuvent avoir des suites déplorables au point de vue juridique, voire politique (guerre). Ils préféraient le recours aux punitions, qui, tout en étant moins violentes, ne sont pas dépourvues d'efficacité, telles l'abstention des aliments et le refus du débitum conjugale. Cela leur évitait en même temps des ennuis de la part des beaux-parents, dont la pitié était excitée par les blessures et la souffrance corporelle de leur enfant ou sœur.

Une chose qui mérite des coups et une bonne rossée parce qu'elle est considérée comme un manquement grave aux devoirs de la vie conjugale est l'insouciance et la négligence dans les travaux du ménage. En toute sûreté, le mari peut y aller de la manière forte, quoiqu'il doive au préalable avertir l'autorité compétente. Voici quelques exemples des manquements de ce genre : la femme ne donne pas les soins voulus à la cuisine, à ses enfants, au nettoyage de la case et de la cour; elle néglige ses cultures, ne va pas à la pêche, ne fait pas d'efforts pour avoir du sel, etc.; bref, elle ne donne pas aux travaux qui lui incombent le temps et les soins qu'ils requièrent. Alors qu'elle-même, ses enfants, sa maison sont dégoûtants et sales, que les champs et bananeraies sont envahis par les ivraies et que son garde-manger est dépourvu d'ustensiles et de vivres, elle gaspille son temps à ne rien faire, ou plutôt à courir tout le village, entrant chez une telle, causant avec telle autre, passant une belle partie de sa journée à des commérages. Or cela le Nkundó ne le supporte pas, et nul ne pourrait lui en faire un reproche. Même d'autres hommes, voire des compagnons, condamsent pareille conduite. Souvent la femme est ridiculisée, et à l'une ou l'autre occasion elle peut entendre des propos peu flatteurs, comme : bônsaf'ba'amôi, efafa ǹfóngaemaka = (une) commère, (sa) pièce d'étoffe se trouve de côté, c'est-à-dire les causeries interminables auxquelles elle s'adonne, assise sur une couchette ou une bûche, absorbent tellement son attention, qu'elle ne s'aperçoit plus de ce que son étroite pièce d'habillement ne se trouve plus dans la position convenable et pudique, exposant ainsi la commère à la honte et à la risée.

En surplus d'une bonne raclée, le mari sort son vocabulaire d'invectives et de sarcasmes. La femme ne se hasarde pas à porter plainte, car elle sait d'avance qu'elle sera mise en tort. Toutefois, la prudence conseille à l'époux de ne pas exagérer. Les vieux recommandent à la jeunesse de mitiger la violence de ses expressions. Car, disent-ils, la femme y est plus sensible que l'homme; elle pourrait aller se pendre en forêt : Ilikinya âyakâma lôi la nsônyi = (la fourmi) Ilikinya se pendra un jour par excès de honte (allusion à la façon d'agir de cet insecte qui, mordant dans un brin d'herbe ou tel autre objet, y meurt plutôt que de lâcher). Et surtout n'étendez pas les injures aux parents de votre épouse, car ils pourraient inciter leur fille à vous abandonner.

Pour ce qui regarde l'adultère, les châtiments prévus par la loi nkundó seront examinés plus loin, à l'article VIII.

Il ressort de ce qui précède que les Nkundó n'attachent qu'une importance relative à ces flots d'éloquence loquace propre au sexe faible, aussi longtemps qu'ils ne franchissent pas les bornes et ne dégénèrent en injures outrageantes et ignominieuses. Les vieux enseignent à la jeunesse le calme devant ces démonstrations d'art déclamatoire dans lequel la plupart des négresses sont aussi versées que les poissardes de chez nous.

C'est que, disent-ils, la femme est comme un éléphant : bômoto ala é njoku. Il n'y a rien à y faire. On a beau lui parler avec douceur, elle n'écoute même pas. Lui imposer silence : impossible. Vouloir la ramener au calme, lui faire entendre raison : peine perdue. Tout comme l'éléphant : on a beau le chasser à force de cris et de tapage, il n'en détruit pas moins les plantations.

D'ailleurs, une femme qui ouvre facilement la bouche n'est pas considérée comme n'aimant pas son mari. Les Nkundó osent même prétendre que c'est un signe d'affection si elle use de sa langue à propos; tandis qu'une femme qui se lamente plutôt doucement et à basse voix : ngoya ôkela lâi l'ômi'ọnẹ nâ ? = maman, que vais-je faire de ce mari ?, ne restera pas longtemps avec lui. Elle se plaint plutôt par égoïsme, tandis que l'autre cherche le bien de son conjoint et du ménage.

Comme nous l'avons déjà indiqué, la punition idéale et beaucoup appliquée pour les cas ordinaires est le refus de manger la nourriture préparée par la femme, ou de se laver avec l'eau qu'elle a puisée ou bouillie. C'est une correction à laquelle elle est sensible. Pourtant le mari ne peut pas exagérer en prolongeant son aversion. Car cela pourrait provoquer la rupture, d'autant plus qu'à la fin la femme commencerait à soupçonner — comme cela arrive — des infidélités.

Que la loi nkundó ne laisse pas au mari une liberté absolue et circonscrive nettement ses droits n'exclut nullement les infractions. La masse des humains se montre toujours inférieure à l'idéal moral que la législation lui impose. Mais les dispositions du droit nkundó protègent la femme contre les excès du mari. En fait de réactions à sa disposition nous avons déjà cité : l'abandon du toit conjugal, les excuses juridiques (bojindo), l'indemnité pour blessure (likambo). En outre, l'épouse préjudiciée s'abstient des vivres (viande, noix de palme) que son conjoint lui présente, et surtout lui refuse son corps. Or, pour ces gens, c'est là un grand affront. Pour rétablir la situation normale et paisible, le mari doit souvent amadouer son épouse au moyen d'un bọjịndọ. Sans parler des injures, dont toute indigène possède une collection riche et variée.

Personne ne saurait condamner ni réprimander une femme qui invective son mari paresseux. S'il ne va pas à la chasse, n'apporte pas de gibier, s'il est négligent dans la construction ou la réparation de la maison, s'il traîne trop, s'il n'abat pas la forêt pour l'établissement de cultures vivrières, c'est lui-même qui est nettement en tort, et il ne trouvera personne pour approuver sa conduite et condamner son épouse. S'il se montre incorrigible, la rupture ne tardera pas de se produire, selon l'axiome : elóng'éy'ómoto ńk'okáfo = la victoire de la femme c'est le divorce.

Si pendant une querelle la femme blesse son conjoint, celui-ci ne peut aucunement lui rendre la pareille, car elle est reconnue inférieure et plus faible. L'arme du mari est l'abstention de la nourriture, boisson, bain, etc. présentés par l'épouse, qui pour rétablir la paix devra payer un bọjịndọ. Pourtant, à présent, certains hommes fougueux n'aiment plus à observer ces règles; de toute façon ils voudraient réagir violemment. Mais ils en sont fort réprimandés par les vieux, qui prétendent qu'il est indigne d'un homme de rendre la pareille à un être plus faible. Cette attitude ancestrale des Nkundó me semble dénoter une sorte de noblesse chevaleresque, basée sur deux sentiments : la justice et la fierté. Elle est plus compréhensible quand on sait qu'une conduite analogue est tenue à l'égard des Batswa, des inférieurs, des clans assujettis (bauló, sing. jauló), chacun dans sa sphère (*). Ainsi un Bonkó ne peut appliquer la loi du talion à un Botswa. Le clan jauló peut, dans certaines circonstances, prendre impunément ce qui lui plaît dans la bananeraie du clan maître, etc.

Signalons encore qu'il est très déplacé qu'un homme

(*) Cfr., plus loin, art. V, VI et VII, § 1-8.

frappe sa femme, ou la punisse d'une façon quelconque, en présence de ses parents, frères, etc., à elle. En effet, c'est une offense extrêmement grave. Et le frère (cousin, etc.) doit, selon la loi du point d'honneur, relever le gant et se battre contre son beau-frère pour venger l'injure. Dans beaucoup de cas, l'affaire se termine par le divorce. Car le sentiment de pudeur-gêne (nsóni) que les deux partis doivent normalement ressentir l'un à l'égard de l'autre s'est évanoui par cette conduite.

Il reste, enfin, à noter que les paiements divers à titre de bojindu sont comptés dans le montant global du jéngi et du nkomí, respectivement.

Afin de mieux illustrer la mentalité nkundó sur les relations entre époux, il ne me semble pas dépourvu d'intérêt de citer ici quelques proverbes qui ont trait à ce qui précède :

1. Basingá bakóndaka wǎj'ǎ mbaka ; Lombóimbé afókónda Ntéfá la ngango = Tous les autres donnent à leur femme des gifles (mais) Lombóimbé bat Ntéfá à coups de bâton. (Allusion à un fait historique.)

2. Ofókó'lóló, wǒ ok'onjemba = Tu ne supportes pas les excès de langage (de ta femme), tu (resteras) célibataire. (Parce que ce défaut est inné à toute femme, et il n'est pas capital.)

3. Ofókób'ónwa, afè mbóka = Ne réponds pas à la bouche, c'est une route (elle n'a pas de terme).

4. Bobé 'á wǎli, ófóka'ompólo = Méchante femme, tu ne refuses (pourtant) pas le bain chaud (qu'elle t'a préparé). (N'attache pas grande importance à ses propos désagréables. Que sont-ils en comparaison des services qu'elle te rend ?)

5. Ék'em'ólámbáká la wǎli w'ókóndyá, jomó ò wéfima ójóyo'amo ólangá ókónda bólákó botéá ? = Lorsque je préparais (la nourriture) au clair de lune, tu n'en étais pas content, à plus forte raison (maintenant qu'il fait) noir et

(que) tu ne vois personne, tu voudrais que je prépare six paniers ? (La femme est supposée interpeller son mari qui est mécontent de la nourriture, mais qui veut néanmoins qu'elle en prépare davantage).

6. Itéké lokɔnɔ ek'ɔm'afɔlanga — Un petit panier (à nourriture) est fort loué si seulement le mari l'aime. (L'amour apprécie même la moindre chose. Le mécontentement provient du manque d'affection.)

7. Ekoka lɔlɔŋɔ, wɔj'ɛky'ɔwɔ — Une veuve tapageuse, (mais c'est parce qu'elle est) la femme d'un (autre qui est) mort. (Tu la critiques; mais ne la traites-tu pas comme la femme d'autrui ? Alors, de quoi te plains-tu ?)

8. Ekɔkɔmbɔlɔ wɛ jɔmde, baiso ng'ɔnkɔmɔ; ekito nd'ilɔmbe, baiso ng'ɔnkɔlɔi — Quand un homme te prend en mariage, (ses) yeux (sont) comme (ceux d'un) bɔmbɔjɔ (chat sauvage); tu arrives dans sa maison, (ses) yeux (sont) comme (ceux d'un) inkɔlɔi (espèce de grenouille à yeux proéminents). (Au début du mariage le mari est d'une prévenance et gentillesse extrêmes; mais après quelque temps il te montre figure maussade et colère à la moindre occasion.)

9. Emangá liɔla, mpɔkɔ ekangola — Les débuts du mariage sont les lunes de miel. (Mais ensuite...)

10. Wali nd'ɛtɔ, wɔkɔnda wɔkɔka — Une épouse est une étoffe, frappe-la, couvre-la. (C'est un objet délicat; frappe-la quand elle le mérite; mais fais-le avec mesure et calme; d'une main tiens le bâton, de l'autre couvre son corps.)

ARTICLE IV.

RELATIONS ENTRE L'ÉPOUSE ET SA FAMILLE.

Par le mariage la femme n'entre pas dans la famille de son mari. Elle continue à appartenir à son propre clan d'origine et reste soumise aux prescriptions particulières de sa famille (bokumo) (1). Est pourtant excepté le bokumo qui regarde la parturition, car dans ce domaine elle doit, à cause de l'enfant, observer le bokumo du clan de son conjoint.

Bien que pour tout le reste, — industrie, propriété, etc., — l'épouse soit entièrement dépendante de son mari, elle demeure pourtant soumise aux devoirs de respect, d'amour et d'aide à ses propres parents. De temps en temps elle doit leur rendre visite. Mais il est très mal vu qu'elle les multiplie. Donner pour ceci une règle est impossible. C'est le bon sens qui doit être consulté. Les gens sérieux préfèrent que l'épouse n'exagère pas ces déplacements. Même ses propres parents le désirent ainsi. Car ces attentions répétées sont considérées comme un manque d'amour et d'attachement au mari.

Il arrive que des femmes qui, étant très fidèles à garder leur foyer, ne font des visites à leurs parents que très rarement, succombent devant les railleries de leurs compagnes. Car le Nkundó est extrêmement sensible à ces sortes d'allusions malveillantes. Parmi celles qui sont en vogue il en est une qui est devenue un dicton populaire et est parfois chantée dans les danses : ótswáká liála otswák' olá, bálíkolaka mbók'ěy'olá la ngom'a nkólé. = Si tu es mariée rentre chez tes parents, afin qu'on ne t'enseigne le chemin de chez toi avec des tambours et gongs; c'est-à-dire quand tu seras morte (2).

Dans les circonstances spéciales (accouchement, maladie, accidents graves, décès) la femme mariée ne peut pas se soustraire au devoir d'assister sa parenté. Cette obligation ne se restreint pas aux père et mère, mais s'étend à tous les parents; elle est d'autant plus stricte que le degré de parenté est plus proche.

---

(1) Les bekumo sont des prescriptions particulières et propres à un clan déterminé, spécialement des défenses permanentes ou occasionnelles de certains aliments (animaux ou végétaux). La transgression est punie par une espèce de gale qui couvre tout le corps. On pourrait penser au totémisme; mais l'idée de parenté avec l'être défendu est entièrement absente.

(2) La femme est enterrée dans son propre clan natal. On y transporte son cadavre avec accompagnement de tambours et de cors. Le gong tokolé annonce le décès.

D'ailleurs, l'amour familial est assez développé pour qu'il n'y ait pas danger de voir la femme s'oublier trop dans ce domaine. Et le mari qui voudrait l'empêcher de satisfaire à ces devoirs élémentaires serait fort critiqué par tous et devrait s'attendre à une rupture.

Plus haut il a été dit que le mari construit pour sa femme une case. Dans cette besogne il est souvent aidé par ses parents. Mais il arrivait aussi — jadis, car actuellement la possibilité en a été enlevée par la colonisation — que le père de la femme voulait lui-même construire la maison de sa fille ou du moins en faire le pavement au moyen d'argile apportée de sa terre natale. C'était une démonstration de richesse et d'influence politico-sociale, en même temps qu'une preuve d'affection paternelle. Le mari, de son côté, était glorifié d'avoir épousé la fille d'un homme si important et ne l'en aimait que davantage. On cite ainsi plusieurs femmes qui « ne faisaient la cuisine que sur la terre ancestrale ». Cette terre était apportée en paniers à des distances parfois de 50 km., par les Batswa et les hommes du clan ou du village de la femme. Le père pouvait le faire à cause de sa grande influence, et des gratifications royales (bokóndo, v. kónda) distribuées au cours d'une fête (nlękę) donnée aux travailleurs et à leurs parents après achèvement de la besogne. Il en a été fait ainsi pour Bompęli, fille de Bokombę de Litúli (Bombwanja), mariée à Bonyęmę w'enyuka des Basékà Mbangó (Bonkoso); pour Beluka, fille d'Iongo de Bokákyá (Boselo, Bombwanja), mariée à Bokaa is'Ifonda de Bowélé; pour Mbalaka, fille de Bolękęla wa Imangaiso des Basékà Lokuli (Bongili), mariée à Mbuli is'ea Wela de Bombóngo w'Etefa (Bongale) (¹).

(¹) Elle portait ce nom de Mbálaka (qui signifie indemnité), parce que son père avait solennellement proclamé (-békye) son intention et pris

ARTICLE V. — RELATIONS ENTRE LE MARI ET LA FAMILLE DE SA FEMME.

Comme il a déjà été dit, la parenté par alliance s'appelle likiló, et les alliés : bokiló, bakiló. Un terme respectueux est mbótaolé, qui est donné aux alliés tout proches (beau-père, belle-mère; parfois beau-frère, belle-sœur). Lorsqu'il existe une différence considérable d'âge entre deux alliés, l'aîné nomme parfois le plus jeune bokilówalé. Ceci a surtout lieu quand le gendre est si jeune qu'il peut être considéré comme enfant. Il s'applique même d'un frère aîné à l'égard de la jeune femme de son cadet (1).

Dans la pratique courante on exclut des bakiló les personnes alliées avec lesquelles le mariage est permis. On les nomme plutôt « mari » ou « épouse ».

L'opposé de bokiló est bokanga. Les bakanga sont les membres de la famille qui a reçu la dot, tandis que les bakiló sont ceux qui l'ont payée. Dans la pratique usuelle, on emploie souvent le mot bokiló pour bokanga, mais jamais inversement. L'expression collective est bokiló l'okanga.

§ 1. Beau-père et belle-mère.

Le mari doit respect, amour et assistance à ses beaux-parents. C'est un point capital pour la bonne entente dans le ménage. Dans ce domaine, la femme supporte très mal l'engagement public de se mettre en cas, un jour, de devoir payer une indemnité à cause de sa fille, comme preuve de son amour. En effet, lors du mariage de Mbelaka, il tua une de ses femmes, la coupa en morceaux et envoya la « viande » à son gendre en guise de « première poule » que son épouse lui préparerait. Seulement il n'a pas dû payer d'indemnité, car le clan de la victime étant trop faible pour tenter une guerre, n'a pas osé réclamer et, afin d'éviter de plus grands malheurs, s'est résigné à cette révoltante ignominie.

---

(1) La deuxième componente du terme est employée par certains Elinga comme synonyme de bokiló. Qu'on la rapproche de walé, qui chez les Mbole et Bakutu signifie une fille bolémbá ou une femme qui vient d'accoucher (id. chez les Ekonda).

des oublis et encore moins la malveillance. Des allusions désobligeantes, des injures à leur adresse, même en leur absence, donnent naissance à de graves difficultés. Parfois le mari exprime sa mauvaise humeur ou sa colère envers son épouse de cette manière-là. Ces façons d'agir ne sont jamais approuvées, à moins que l'autre partie n'ait commencé. Car ici la loi du talion s'applique intégralement : ôtswá mbóngó l'ôndamba ôkóngaka ôk'ôndamba = celui qui répond à de méchantes allusions a raison contre celui qui a commencé. Pour le reste, voir ci-dessus (art. III).

Pour entretenir les bonnes relations avec ses beaux-parents, le mari doit de temps en temps leur rendre visite. De par la nature même des choses, ces visites sont moins fréquentes que celles de sa femme. Ce qui ajoute un certain obstacle à leur multiplication, c'est l'obligation de donner de cadeaux de visite (belonga). On ne se rend pas chez ses beaux-parents les mains vides. La richesse apportée varie avec les circonstances. Certaines personnes cupides aspirent à des gros cadeaux, si le mariage de leur fille se prouve stable. D'autres préfèrent ne pas recevoir trop, de peur de devoir rendre la pareille et — s'ils ne sont pas particulièrement riches — de se voir impliqués un jour dans d'énormes difficultés financières. Car les belonga sont ajoutés au montant total de la dot et, le cas échéant, doivent donc être restitués.

Les beaux-parents ne laissent pas repartir leur gendre sans lui avoir offert des contre-cadeaux en guise d'adieux (belíngako), sous forme de poules et de canards, dont la valeur est ajoutée au montant total du nkomi.

Gendre et beaux-parents n'aiment pas à se voir surpassés en générosité par l'autre partie, à part quelques cas exceptionnels. C'est d'ailleurs une politique très intelligente : on garde l'égalité des deux côtés; on n'aura pas à se faire des reproches mutuels pour convoitise ou chicheté; enfin, lors d'une rupture éventuelle, l'équilibre sera facilement rétabli.

D'après les cas et selon ses moyens, le gendre doit assistance à son beau-père. Elle s'exerce en abattant pour lui la forêt où il puisse établir un champ, en construisant une maison, ou encore en lui faisant une clôture de chasse (lokombo), etc. Un bon gendre ne manque jamais à ces obligations, et le beau-père ne le congédie pas sans lui avoir remis quelque présent.

L'épouse tient énormément à ce que son mari s'acquitte consciencieusement de ces devoirs de visite et d'assistance. Les abstentions suscitent de graves palabres avec leurs suites ordinaires.

De son côté, le beau-père ne manque pas d'aider son gendre dans ses travaux divers. Après achèvement, ce dernier le congédie avec un bolingako de quelques anneaux de cuivre, qui sont assimilés aux belonga.

Les visites sont plus nombreuses des parents de la femme à leur gendre. C'est leur façon de prouver leur amour envers lui et leur fille et de manifester l'intérêt qu'ils portent à leur ménage. Ces visites peuvent durer des semaines et des mois, que les parents viennent ensemble, ou que ce soit seulement l'un d'eux. Si elles se prolongent trop, elles sont acceptées avec moins d'enthousiasme. Lors des adieux, il faut toujours sortir des cadeaux (bolingako).

Même si l'union des parents a été rompue et que la mère se soit remariée, elle ne laisse point de visiter sa fille et son gendre. Si son nouveau mari fait mine de ne pas être d'accord, il y aura des difficultés. Et s'il ne change pas, sa façon d'agir peut amener la femme à l'abandonner pour retourner chez son premier mari, père de sa fille.

Les visites sont donc accompagnées d'échange de présents, de la part du gendre : belonga; de la part du beau-père : valeurs de nkọmi. Les cadeaux d'adieu sont belonga et donc partie de la dot, s'ils sont donnés par le gendre; s'ils sont donnés par le beau-père, ils sont nkomi.

Ces mêmes règles valent, mutatis mutandis, pour les parents divers de part et d'autre, pour les visites et services qu'ils se rendent et pour les présents remis à ces occasions.

Dans les relations entre gendre et beaux-parents il reste à signaler une loi très sévère : il est interdit à un homme de voir la face de la mère de son épouse. Cette prescription est scrupuleusement observée par tous. Il ne peut la voir qu'au début du mariage, une fois, « pour apprendre à la connaître, afin qu'ils puissent s'éviter ». Si, par exemple, en voyage ils se rencontrent en forêt, ils doivent se tourner le dos. Généralement c'est la femme qui tourne la figure vers le bord du sentier, afin de laisser passer son gendre. Ils se saluent de bouche, se demandent des nouvelles, mais ne se donnent pas la main, ni ne se regardent. Il est comique, pour nous, de voir une femme venir visiter son gendre; chacun se poste d'un côté de la paroi ou d'un coin, ils se parlent ainsi, se demandent des nouvelles, discutent, etc., sans se voir. Il arrive que belle-mère et beau-fils se trouvent en présence l'un de l'autre, à l'improviste, sans qu'ils se soient vus approcher, ni que personne ne les ait avertis, par exemple en forêt ou dans les champs. Immédiatement ils se tournent le dos; l'homme s'excuse et s'esquive en toute vitesse, dût-il se jeter en forêt dense à lianes épineuses et enchevêtrées.

Cette loi est étendue aussi aux tout proches parents du mari, ses frères puînés, par exemple (qui sont « maris » eux aussi), et à toutes les femmes auxquelles on donne le nom de mère : sœurs de la mère, femmes du père. Il semble qu'elle ne s'applique pas proprement à elles, mais qu'il s'agisse d'une extension. Par contre, elle n'existe pas pour la femme envers son beau-père.

La transgression de cette prescription suscite une grosse palabre, car elle est considérée comme manque grave de respect. Elle peut produire une brouille sérieuse dans le ménage. L'épouse refuse l'acte conjugal à son mari qui a regardé sa belle-mère. C'est pourquoi les gens s'entr'aident en s'avertissant réciproquement du « danger » de l'arrivée de leur belle-mère.

La réparation de l'offense se fait au moyen d'un bojondo de quelques bakonga à la belle-mère. Tant qu'il n'a pas été remis, la femme ne remplit pas ses devoirs conjugaux. Après paiement, tout rentre dans l'ordre. S'il est avéré que le cas s'est produit involontairement, il n'y a pas palabre ni obligation de payer. Actuellement, on constate chez les meilleurs chrétiens une tendance à donner une fois pour toutes un bojondo pour arranger définitivement toute palabre future possible et pour éviter de devoir se soumettre aux prescriptions de cette coutume, dont ils commencent à entrevoir l'inutilité.

Il est même interdit à un homme de prononcer le nom de sa belle-mère en sa présence, fût-ce simplement pour apostropher ou appeler un homonyme. Il doit, dans ces cas, recourir à un surnom ou à une périphrase. Généralement, il l'interpelle du nom de mbétaolé. L'infraction entraîne la même punition que pour le regard.

Si l'on demande aux Nkundó la raison de cette coutume, à notre point de vue si étrange, ils répondent qu'ils ont honte ou qu'ils sont gênés de voir la femme qui a engendré leur épouse, et que c'est une grave offense envers elle. C'est une façon d'exprimer le respect qu'on lui doit, et l'on évite ainsi le sans-gêne, la familiarité trop grande. C'est là toute l'explication qu'ils donnent. Pour notre esprit philosophique elle n'épuise pas le sujet. On voudrait trouver une connexion entre les rapports intimes des époux et l'acte de la procréation de l'un d'eux. Peut-être cette idée est-elle latente dans la conscience indigène, ou du moins se trouve-t-elle à la base de cette règle. Le fait qu'elle est restreinte à la belle-mère de la femme n'infirme pas cette hypothèse; car aux yeux des indigènes, les autres cas sont d'une nature toute indifférente (¹).

Une seconde prescription dans cette matière exige que la belle-mère — et toutes les femmes auxquelles, dans le langage courant, on donne le même titre — ne se montre dans le village de son gendre que revêtue d'un bǫlęlękę, qui est une feuille de bananier, verte ou sèche, déchirée à plusieurs endroits, dans le sens perpendiculaire à la grosse nervure centrale, et qui constitue le signe premier et principal du deuil. D'autre part, les femmes Batswá doivent également s'habiller de cette façon primitive lorsqu'elles viennent dans une agglomération de Baotó. Voici la raison qu'on donne pour la dernière application de cet usage : le vêtement de la femme Bǫtswá est un lolimba : ceinture de petites cordes tressées, longues d'environ 10 centimètres. Quoique le lolimba protège assez bien, dans les attitudes ordinaires, il est pourtant jugé insuffisant pour arrêter d'une façon absolue tout regard indiscret. Or, la croyance populaire veut que si un Bootó voit les parties d'une Bǫtswá, celle-ci en mourra. Pourrait-on conclure de cette dernière explication à une connexion fondamentale entre les raisons imposant le port du bǫlęlękę dans ces trois cas? Ou est-ce que la belle-mère doit imiter la femme Bǫtswá et marquer ainsi une certaine dépendance à l'égard de son gendre?

§ 2. Parentes.

Aussi longtemps qu'elles sont libres, c'est-à-dire qu'aucun paiement dotal n'a été effectué pour elles, les sœurs ou cousines de sa femme sont considérées par le mari comme ses épouses, et il les nomme ainsi (badili). Ce terme ne s'applique qu'aux parentes qui sont d'une génération inférieure, ou, dans la même génération, moins âgées que l'épouse véritable et avec lesquelles le mariage est permis. Il ne s'étend donc jamais aux parentes à l'égard desquelles il existe empêchement, telles les nièces bána-bóki, qui sont les « mères » de l'épouse (1).

---

(¹) Voir, par exemple, chap. II, art. X, et chap. V, art. II et III.

Lorsque ces parentes de la femme sont mariées, la situation change. Elles appartiennent à un autre homme, et nous nous trouvons alors devant des cas d'adultère, qui sont considérés comme très graves. Il existe pourtant des différences selon les degrés de l'affinité. Outre les sanctions générales contre l'adultère, d'autres mesures de réaction peuvent être prises, spécialement la rupture du mariage. Un cas particulièrement grave, mais plutôt hypothétique, serait l'adultère entre l'homme et l'épouse de son beau-père : un sentiment spécial de honte s'y attache; les deux personnes sont comme un bó453 et son maître, disent nos Nkundó. Très grave aussi est la méconduite d'un homme avec l'épouse de son beau-frère (ou beau-cousin). Ce dernier peut ravir sa sœur (cousine) au mari coupable et ainsi rompre l'union. De même pour l'adultère avec une nyangólólé (2).

§ 3. Affaires de justice.

Il nous faut examiner ici la façon dont s'arrangent entre beaux-parents et gendre les manquements à la justice. Comme il est connu, chez ces populations, la justice, au sens strict du mot, est un des points culminants de la législation sociale. Le vol est un des principaux sujets de la honte et était autrefois sévèrement puni. Le voleur, surtout s'il récidivait, était exposé à être vendu comme esclave.

Si un(e) parent(e) de la femme était convaincu(e) de vol chez son allié, ou même chez un parent à celui-ci, on réunissait le tribunal familial. Par égard pour les liens de parenté entre le voleur et l'épouse, et pour ne pas attrister celle-ci et sa famille, le coupable n'était pas vendu comme esclave. On le remettait simplement à la femme et sa famille, en leur disant : « Voici, il a été trouvé coupable de vol. Il aurait dû être réduit en esclavage. Pourtant, par respect pour vous, nous ne le vendons pas; mais nous le renvoyons (-kilimola) vers vous. Prenez-le comme dot et ajoutez-le au montant du bɔnjingɔ. » L'affaire était arrangée ainsi à l'amiable. Dans le cas d'un divorce ultérieur, outre la dot payée précédemment, la famille de la femme devait restituer encore un esclave supplémentaire pour ce membre de leur groupe que le mari leur avait cédé de cette manière. Ce n'était donc nullement une opération fictive.

---

(1) Cfr. chap. V. art. IV et les exemples y cités (par ex. 25, 26, 27).

Inversement, la même façon de procéder était adoptée envers un(e) parent(e) du mari qui avait enfreint les règles de la justice au détriment d'un membre de la famille alliée. Mais, dans ce cas, l'extradition du coupable était considérée comme l'ajoute d'un esclave au montant du nkomi.

D'où le dicton : bokilô ntáwáká ndá ngond'ěy'ékanga = le beau-parent ne peut pas mourir dans la forêt de son allié.

Actuellement il n'en va pas autrement. La seule différence est que, au lieu de restituer un esclave lors d'une rupture éventuelle, on rembourse sa valeur équivalente en anneaux de cuivre, etc.

La même conduite était tenue à l'égard des prisonniers de guerre. Par exemple, dans une guerre, Eale se rend maître de Bombolo, dont la cousine est mariée à Iloko, proche parent d'Eale. Iloko intercède auprès d'Eale pour obtenir la libération de Bombolo, qui est renvoyé chez lui, mais à titre de bɔnjingɔ. Le prisonnier libéré fait alors fonction d'esclave donné en dot, tout comme dans le cas précédent, dont il suit toutes les règles.

§ 6. Félonies.

Entre alliés la perfidie et la trahison n'étaient pas rares. Bomóng'ôsulu nd'ôkilô, dit le proverbe, la trahison existe surtout de la part d'un allié. Non pas que cela se fît, à part peut-être quelque rare exception, par méchanceté foncière. Mais un parent par alliance n'hésitait pas, dans le cas d'une guerre et surtout d'une vendetta, à trahir son allié et, par là, le vouer à la mort.

Bornons-nous à citer deux cas historiques, que la génération présente a très bien connus (1).

Du temps où le poste d'Ingende était occupé par le Blanc « Bombambilo » et celui d'Ikóngó par « Bosónjá », des hommes de Boálá (Ikékoma y'Isolo, Bombwanja) avaient surpris un habitant de Bokuká (Wángatá) et l'avaient tué et mangé. Peu après, un homme de Boálá, Lokwa jw'Iyolé, va rendre visite à sa sœur Eámé, mariée à Imbólé la'éy'onda, d'Ikonji. Or, il se fait que celui-ci est un oncle maternel de la victime des Boálá. Lokwa ignorait-il cette parenté? Ou avait-il confiance en son beau-frère? Quoi qu'il en soit, il y est bien reçu. Imbólé n'a pourtant pas oublié l'assassinat de son neveu et va annoncer à ses proches cette bonne occasion de tirer vengeance du meurtre. Un soir ils font irruption dans la case mise à la disposition du visiteur, qui s'y trouve avec sa sœur Eámé et sa femme Lompoko. Les deux femmes parviennent à s'échapper. Mais Lokwa est pris, tué et mangé. Evidemment, sa sœur Eámé n'a plus rejoint son mari et il n'a pas été question de rembourser la dot.

Le second cas date de la même époque. Deux Batswa de Mbálanga (Elóontálé, Bongili) : Bɔkɔ́ngɔ et Boléyɔngɔ́, avaient surpris en forêt, tué et mangé Mbɔkɔ Ilombé de Boálá. Quelque temps après, un homme du village Ndɔngɔ́ des Bongili, le nommé Bengóngó, se rend à Boálá visiter sa sœur Bosáka, mariée à Eale éá Bofekó. Celui-ci lui dit que le village est en fureur à cause de l'assassinat d'un des leurs par les Batswa des Bongili. Il lui conseille d'aller se cacher dans une jachère de peur que les hommes excités ne le découvrent et ne se vengent sur lui. Lui-même y conduit son beau-frère. Connaissant donc exactement l'endroit de la cachette, il court le dénoncer aux autres. Ceux-ci encerclent la jachère et sans peine trouvent le pauvre Bongingi, qui est massacré impitoyablement et mangé. Sa sœur Bosika n'a jamais su la félonie de son époux : elle pensait que malgré toutes les précautions prises par lui les autres habitants avaient découvert la cachette de son frère (1).

---

(1) L'époque exacte à laquelle ces faits se sont produits m'est inconnue. En tout cas ils remontent aux temps de l'Etat Indépendant et aux débuts de l'occupation.

Cette hypocrisie du mari vis-à-vis de sa femme et de son beau-frère résulte de la présence en lui de deux sentiments opposés : d'une part, l'amour familial, la solidarité qui engendre la haine et le désir de vengeance, et, d'autre part l'amour conjugal. Comme ils sont en contradiction absolue, il ne saurait les concilier. Mais du moins il sauvera les apparences.

C'est à cette situation que se rapporte le proverbe : bokiló ákwɔ́bɛká, wóngoyak'eyalo = si ton bokiló t'a caché, change d'abri. Et cet autre, plus cru : bokiló tótswɛ ok'ɛlɛ́; bafumba bálɛ́kɛ mbá, emi dikɔlɛ́kɛ wɛ = allié, allons à la palmeraie; les fourmis bafumba (Dorylus wilverthii) mangent des noix de palme; moi je te mangerai, toi. Et celui-ci qu'on applique à quelqu'un qui, voulant toujours se disculper, s'accuse plutôt involontairement: Mpɔ́jí'ókiló, ótóála é mpɔ́ngo; mpɔ́ngo y'ókiló nsako ngá mbwá = je ne mange pas mon allié; au contraire, je sauce (des aliments) dans la graisse; la graisse de l'allié est savoureuse comme celle d'un chien.

---

(1) Il ne faut pas s'étonner trop de ce que, à cette époque-là, les Européens n'intervenaient pas dans ces guerres, vendettas, tueries, actes d'anthropophagie. Ils laissaient faire les indigènes entre eux; ils en exigeaient seulement qu'ils les laissent tranquilles eux-mêmes et qu'ils leur rendent service et tribut. Ils avaient d'autres choses à faire en ces temps-là. Ce ne sont que les Blancs Amisá et Baiakakoi, dont les indigènes parlent encore avec une crainte respectueuse, qui, les premiers, ont commencé dans cette région à punir les actes de barbarie.

Toutefois, un homme ne se laisse jamais aller à provoquer la mort du mari de sa sœur, de sa fille, d'une parente quelconque. Ou, comme disent les Nkundó, on ne tue point celui par lequel on a été enrichi. La raison de cette différence? Selon nos gens : l'affection qu'on porte à sa sœur, fille, etc.; on l'aime trop pour lui causer la douleur de lui ravir son époux.

Cette conduite félonne et barbare est donc tenue par le bokilo envers le bokanga, c'est-à-dire par ceux qui ont payé la dot envers ceux qui l'ont reçue; mais jamais inversement.

ANNEXE.

Cette annexe se rapporte à chacun des trois articles précédents. Elle peut donc raisonnablement se placer ici. Elle ne traite d'aucune loi spéciale, ni d'une coutume légale, universelle ou commune. Il s'agit de cas isolés. Mais comme ils montrent bien la psychologie qui peut se rencontrer chez ces populations, il me semble que les quelques lignes qui suivent ne sont pas dépourvues d'intérêt.

Il peut arriver qu'une femme ait à se plaindre ou estime avoir des motifs d'être mécontente d'un de ses parents, son frère, par exemple. Soit qu'à son avis il ne se montre pas assez charitable et généreux à son égard, soit qu'il la traite d'une façon qu'elle ne juge pas équitable. Dans un moment de colère elle s'en ouvre à son mari et l'incite à la venger, en blessant ou même en tuant celui qui l'a offensée.

Tel le cas arrivé, il y a plusieurs décades, à Bosela w'ǒmpwengé, de Boléngé (Bongili) (mort en 1922, à un âge très avancé). Sa femme Bumbé était extrêmement mécontente de ce que son frère ne lui faisait pas assez de cadeaux. Elle interpelle son mari : bejwó bękę, ǒnomělé nkâna, alekí ǒmpímaka tóma : les cadavres (parents défunts), tue-moi mon frère, il me refuse toujours des cadeaux (*). Là-dessus Bosela prend ses armes et s'en va. En bon psychologue il ne se trompe nullement sur les sentiments intimes de sa femme. Il sait qu'il est engagé dans une impasse dangereuse : s'il déçoit l'attente de son épouse, elle sera furieuse; si, au contraire, il ravit la vie à son beau-frère, elle le sera plus encore. Aussi s'agit-il d'user de ruse. Entré en forêt, il a la bonne fortune de rencontrer une antilope bgende, qu'il abat. Il enlève le foie et rentre chez lui tenant dans sa main l'organe encore frais et chaud. Il le présente à son épouse, en disant : « Voici le foie de ton frère que tu m'as prié de tuer. » Là-dessus, scène violente. La femme, hors d'elle, se met à pleurer son frère mort, et, dans sa colère, elle s'enfuit en criant à son mari : « Ah! tu ne m'aimes donc plus, puisque tu as assassiné mon frère; tu ne me reverras plus. » Arrivée dans sa famille, elle trouve tout le monde aux occupations ordinaires; aucun signe d'un décès, ni surtout d'un meurtre. Son étonnement croît encore quand elle trouve son frère bien portant et plein de vie. Elle n'en croit pas ses yeux. En un clin d'œil toute la famille est alertée et réunie. Elle explique ce qui lui est arrivé. On la calme et la console : on loue le mari d'avoir agi si intelligemment. On l'en félicite. Car il aurait pu exécuter l'intimation qu'elle lui avait faite, et elle doit donc se réjouir qu'il l'aime si bien et si sagement. Aussi, quelques jours après, elle réintègre tranquillement son foyer.

Un cas tout différent et fatal fut celui de Bok'Elea de (*) Une des plus graves intimations. Mais celui à qui elle est adressée considère comme un devoir de donner suite à l'ordre ou l'invitation lui fait dans ces termes. C'est une sorte de serment imposé. On l'appelle : ôma ndéi, ajepe (ôtela) Z. ndéi. L'application de ces termes s'étend à beaucoup d'autres cas : appel au secours dans une guerre, aide pour l'application d'une ordalie; assistance dans l'ilpé (société des non-observants du jeûne funéraire), etc. Une personne peut se l'adresser à soi-même; dans ce cas, cette expression correspond à notre mot « serment », faire un serment.

Bompele (Bokátola), marié avec Elángé de Boálá (tous deux sont encore en vie). La femme rentrait continuellement dans sa famille. Le mari, exaspéré, la menaça un jour de lui tuer son frère Ekále; celui-ci disparu, elle resterait mieux chez elle. De fait, il exécuta sa menace. L'épouse s'est mise dans une colère terrible, mais néanmoins elle est restée fidèle à son conjoint. L'arc qui a servi à tirer la flèche meurtrière est toujours conservé, en souvenir, par le propriétaire.

ARTICLE VI. — RELATIONS ENTRE LA FEMME ET LA FAMILLE DE SON MARI

Evidemment, la femme doit entretenir les meilleurs rapports avec la famille de son mari, avec laquelle elle est en contact continuel. Elle doit le respect à ses parents et aînés. Si elle ne parvient pas à vivre en paix avec eux et avec les sœurs, etc., de son époux, l'union ne tiendra pas. Ce seront des malentendus, des disputes, des rixes, surtout des insultes et des allusions malveillantes qui la forceront à s'en aller. Aussi peut-on ranger ces éventualités parmi les motifs qui amènent la famille de l'homme à intervenir lors du mariage. Le souci d'éviter que l'union ne soit rompue par des incompatibilités trop grandes se retrouve constamment chez les Nkundó, car toute rupture suscite d'énormes difficultés, comme nous le verrons suo loco.

Pour les menus services que la femme doit rendre à la famille de son mari, il est fort malaisé de démêler si ce sont des obligations de justice ou simplement des convenances sociales. Un manquement passager provoquera de la part du mari et de ses parents des réprimandes qui évidemment dégénèrent aisément en querelles. Si les manquements sont de telle fréquence et nature qu'il n'est plus permis de les mettre sur le compte d'un simple oubli, d'un caprice, d'un accès de mauvaise humeur, mais qu'ils indiquent la malveillance ou la grossièreté, l'affaire sera portée devant le nkonga (aidé souvent par le tribunal familial) ou rapportée devant l'autorité des parents de la femme. Si, malgré tout, l'amélioration attendue ne se produit point, la rupture devient inévitable.

Le père et la mère du mari étendent à l'épouse de leur fils l'affection qu'ils lui portent à lui-même. Ils la considèrent comme leur propre enfant, et il n'est pas rare que leur amour envers la femme égale celui qu'ils ont pour leur propre fils. Elle est leur alliée, mais par affection ils l'appellent enfant. Elle, de son côté, ne leur donne pas le nom de bokango (ou bokilo), mais par respect filial les nomme père et mère. Des exceptions peuvent pourtant se rencontrer.

Si le père (et ceux qui lui sont assimilés : oncles, frères aînés, etc.) a tué du gros gibier, il doit donner à l'épouse de son fils (ou frère, etc.) un morceau de viande, plus ou moins grand d'après le nombre des brus, et qui consiste en une ou plusieurs côtelettes (bokálaka) (1) et la pièce sous la nuque (bokóndyá).

Des relations coupables entre le père du mari et sa bru seraient un méfait inouï. Il en serait de même de la part de tous les parents « supérieurs » (2). Les lois qui règlent les relations entre l'épouse et les parents de son mari se rattachent étroitement aux règles sur l'empêchement d'affinité et semblent découler de la même source. Il est donc utile d'avoir en vue ce que nous en avons dit au chapitre précédent, article IV.

Les frères aînés du mari traitent son épouse comme leur sœur. La femme nomme les sœurs de son mari :

---

(1) Lifio chez les Bolingo et les tribus de Losangenya.

(2) Seuls les Boângi — comme les Ekóngá de la région de Losangenya — permettent les relations du frère avec l'épouse de son puîné, et ils commencent déjà à trouver des imitateurs en leurs voisins du Sud-Est, les Injólo.

bokiló, mais par respect elle leur donne souvent le titre de mère (¹).

Après le décès du mari, son père ou son frère peut épouser la veuve, comme il a été dit suo loco. Mais ce n'est pas vu de bon œil et n'est permis que rarement, notamment lorsqu'on redoute la perte ou la dispersion du patrimoine familial, ou encore lorsque les deux intéressés se portent un amour exceptionnel.

La situation est toute différente quant aux enfants ou frères puînés et tous ceux qui leur sont assimilés. Les relations coupables avec les épouses de leur père, grand-père, oncle, frère aîné, cousin aîné sont jugées bien moins sévèrement. En général, les fautes ne donnent pas lieu à la réclamation d'un paiement, ou bien celui-ci est exigé « pour la forme » et consiste en une poule et un régime de bananes. Par ce paiement, le coupable reconnaît sa faute et rend hommage au droit de son aîné.

L'opinion publique, d'une façon générale, condamne ces relations, et cela souvent avec une grande sévérité. Le degré de parenté et d'autres considérations introduisent beaucoup de diversité dans les cas que nous allons donc étudier séparément, en distinguant chaque fois la réaction du mari et celle de l'opinion publique.

1. — La méconduite de la femme avec le fils de son mari ne donne pas lieu à une indemnité. Pourtant, le lésé réagit : il défend ses droits et sévit, s'il est tant soit peu sérieux et surtout s'il est monogame. S'il a plusieurs femmes, il laisse plus facilement passer l'affaire, à moins qu'il ne s'agisse de sa favorite. Parfois il se venge en frappant la mère du coupable, en lui ravissant ses poules, etc. Mais cela peut donner naissance à des complications : le frère de la femme ainsi traitée pourrait intervenir, et si la réaction du mari lésé est trop violente ou se répète trop souvent, elle peut mener au divorce. En tout cas, le père ne fait jamais de mal à l'épouse de son fils étourdi, parce qu'il l'aime comme sa propre fille.

---

(¹) Chez les Ekonda, elle les appelle aussi bongóla (pl. bangóla); elles la nomment bómongóla, pl. bámongóla. L'épouse nomme souvent la mère de son mari : ngoyangóla. Bámongóla l'ómangóla signifie : les épouses du frère et leurs belles-sœurs.

Comme sanction directe contre le délinquant, le père peut lui retarder l'acquisition d'une épouse et — chose toujours grave encore dans les milieux purement indigènes — lui refuser sa bénédiction dans ses voyages et ses entreprises.

Par l'opinion publique ces relations sont toujours fort critiquées, et cela même lorsque les parents interviennent en faveur du coupable. Celui-ci en est déconsidéré; on se moque de lui en lui appliquant l'épithète d'ekionjólá, à laquelle on ajoute souvent la phrase explicative : l'óála banyangó b'ánángá. Ekionjólá est dérivé de ekío=vêtement masculin, au figuré : virilité au sens physique, et de bólá=force. Donc homme d'une virilité si forte qu'il va même jusqu'à s'unir aux mères de ses frères.

Après le décès, le mariage avec la veuve du père est justifié. Pourtant, si cette veuve a laissé des enfants, l'opinion publique, tout en atténuant la sévérité de son jugement, ne l'abandonne pas entièrement, et l'on peut encore entendre la critique précitée. Tel le cas — bien connu dans la région — de Yoká de Bokenyola (Bǫnjǫku), qui a épousé Lǫkǫkú, veuve de son père Inselǫ y'Ókátola et mère d'Inselǫ Antoine, chef actuel des Bonkoso (1).

Les relations coupables entre le fils et l'épouse du père sont jugées avec une sévérité particulièrement grande si la propre mère du jeune homme est encore en vie. On les lui reproche dans des termes clairs et crus : « Oóy'ôsanganya mbindo lkę la mbindo y'la'á nyangó=tu unis tes taches (tes impuretés) avec celles de ton père et de ta mère. Outé òk'ôkí wǫ wìmàmáká = tu retournes là d'où tu proviens. Ówa lóí é! cékí likpka, lui ajoutera-t-on souvent : tu mourras à cause de ta trop grande méchanceté. Cette dernière remarque est dans la mentalité nkundó une espèce d'imprécation, et si elle est répétée par plusieurs personnes elle ne manquera pas son effet, ou, pour parler comme nos gens, si tous se lamentent beaucoup sur et contre cet homme, il mourra effectivement (1).

---

(1) Ici il faut toujours faire exception pour l'héritage d'une veuve par droit d'aînesse, boelió (chap. III, art. III). De préférence, on évite de donner une veuve qui soit dans la situation signalée.

Si le fils en question n'est pas marié, surtout lorsqu'il a atteint déjà un âge relativement avancé, l'affaire est considérée comme plus bénigne, s'il approche des femmes de son père polygame. Ce dernier ne peut pas trop se courroucer, particulièrement quand il ne s'agit que de cas isolés; car d'autres parents laisseraient parler leur affection pour le jeune homme, dont ils connaissent la passion et dont ils comprennent donc les tentations et les incartades. Ils interviendraient pour calmer le père et l'inciter à éviter le retour de pareils faits, en procurant une épouse au fils. Exceptionnellement, le conseil familial peut même donner tort au père, à cause de sa rigueur envers son fils, et permettre à celui-ci de ravir au père la femme aimée — (jamais pourtant la première, la favorite ou la bolámbá); — tel le cas que nous avons relaté au chapitre II, article XI, 2°. Mais c'est là loin d'être une situation idéale aux yeux des Nkundó, et elle n'est admise que lorsque le fils porte un amour ardent à la femme et que, d'autre part, le père tarde trop à lui procurer une épouse.

Ici nous constatons donc un conflit entre deux sentiments : la jalousie du mari et l'affection du père et de divers parents. C'est ce qui rend difficile — comme dans beaucoup de cas — la délimitation entre ce qui est permis et ce qui est défendu. Nous pouvons pourtant conclure de ce qui précède et des explications générales des indigènes que : 1° les relations sont défendues et jugées avec sévérité, mais qu'on est bien plus indulgent ici que pour les parents « supérieurs »; 2° le père ne peut pas exagérer la répression des fautes, ni exiger de son propre fils le paiement d'une indemnité; car ce serait s'enrichir de par la méconduite de son enfant, qui, d'ailleurs, n'a de quoi payer que grâce à lui ou au clan de sa mère, à qui il serait injuste et très mal à propos de le faire recourir.

---

(1) Dans cette opinion des Nkundó on pourrait voir un des motifs qui, dans l'héritage, font assigner les veuves, non au fils, mais au frère du défunt.

B. — Un frère puîné nomme la femme de son aîné wǎli=épouse, et elle le traite de bǒme=mari, parce qu'ils peuvent se marier. On trouve donc aussi des relations adultères. Mais dans la pratique des distinctions sont à faire.

Si le puîné n'est pas marié et que l'aîné possède un harem, — cas assez fréquent autrefois, mais très rare à présent, — nous revenons au cas précité du père, avec seulement plus de bénignité envers le coupable.

Si l'aîné est monogame et le puîné célibataire, les relations avec la femme sont interdites en présence du mari. Si le puîné se laisse tout de même entraîner par la tentation, il est condamnable. Le mari ne peut pas réclamer d'amende. Mais, à titre de vengeance, il peut se procurer « une indemnité feinte » (nyongo éá bolǎambo) en abattant l'un ou l'autre bananier du coupable, en saisissant ses poules, en transportant sa case, et autres actes similaires. Le but en est, selon nos gens, d'inspirer au jeune homme un peu plus de respect envers son aîné. Ce dernier ne peut pourtant pas exagérer les répressions (par exemple en se battant contre son cadet), de peur de se voir condamner pour manque d'affection fraternelle (¹). D'ailleurs, les valeurs avec lesquelles il s'est acquis la femme appartiennent en somme aux deux frères, sous un certain aspect. S'ils sont de mères différentes, l'aîné a beaucoup plus d'atouts dans sa main. Et si la dot en entier ou en majeure partie provient de son clan maternel, il obtient entièrement gain de cause pour ce qui regarde le point de vue indemnité, bien que le devoir d'affection fraternelle, donc d'indulgence, subsiste toujours. Pour des manquements isolés, cette indulgence doit toujours intervenir. Pour des cas répétés souvent, les excuses du coupable n'ont plus beaucoup de poids.

---

(¹) Une petite correction fraternelle, surtout si le puîné est notablement plus jeune, n'implique aucune gravité et est permise, particulièrement pour des fautes réitérées.

Si le puîné est marié, lui aussi, l'affaire prend un tout autre aspect. Puisqu'il a lui-même son épouse, il n'a plus aucune excuse pour la satisfaction adultère de sa passion. Le mari lésé garde, il est vrai, l'obligation de mitiger sa colère et ses manifestations; mais le côté financier reçoit plus de relief. L'indemnité qu'il peut réclamer doit toutefois être ajoutée à la dot de la femme coupable; car il serait inouï qu'il s'enrichît aux dépens de son propre frère. S'il a lui-même procuré à son puîné l'épouse, il peut la lui ravir pour la donner à un autre frère, un cousin, etc., voire la prendre pour lui-même, nonobstant l'empêchement d'affinité. Ce cas est pourtant exceptionnel et n'est appliqué qu'à cause de manquements graves et réitérés, joints à une attitude insolente du coupable.

En l'absence du mari, le puîné a entière liberté, que le conjoint soit parti ou que le frère rencontre sa belle-sœur dans sa famille ou ailleurs en voyage. Si la femme refuse les relations, son beau-frère rapporte souvent son mauvais vouloir au mari, qui la semonce, même la frappe parce qu'elle n'aime pas son frère à lui, et l'inculpe d'avoir des amants : ótóna bộn'ǒâ ngóya, ólangakě ńk'aend'ǎnkíná. L'affection étant plus vive entre frères de même mère, la colère du mari est d'autant plus grande. Le manque d'affection de la part de l'épouse engendre chez le mari des soupçons sur sa fidélité, parce que la femme nkundó se laisse entraîner à la tentation avec une extrême facilité; si elle refuse son propre beau-frère-mari, c'est donc qu'elle se satisfait ailleurs. Ce raisonnement peut porter à faux; mais il se base sur la fréquence des cas. L'attitude du mari ne prouve pas l'absence de jalousie, mais, au contraire, en démontre l'existence.

Le puîné rencontre-t-il sa belle-sœur dans sa famille à elle, les parents interviennent. Ils adjoignent à leur fille de bien recevoir « son mari », de lui préparer à manger, de nettoyer la case lui destinée. Ils la forcent même de cohabiter avec lui tout le temps de son séjour dans leur village. Par là ils veulent éviter des palabres avec leur gendre. Si l'antipathie de la femme est si grande qu'elle ne veut d'aucune façon se soumettre, ils donnent parfois à leur visiteur une autre de leurs filles (cousines, etc.), plus jeunes, pour lui rendre les devoirs d'épouse.

Sont assimilés au frère puîné tous ceux que la terminologie nkundó désigne sous le nom de bakúné (donc aussi les cousins plus jeunes). La gravité plus ou moins grande du conflit et des conséquences est en proportion avec le degré de parenté.

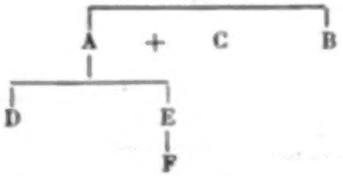
C. — La situation du neveu (bǫ̌nankáná) vis-à-vis des épouses de son oncle maternel est assez comparable à celle du fils à l'égard des femmes de son père. Le caractère dotal du mariage donne même au neveu une liberté plus grande; car l'oncle s'est enrichi par l'union de la mère de son neveu. Il n'y a pas question d'indemnité, excepté celle des « égards », pour marquer la soumission, et qui consiste en une poule et un régime de bananes. Si le neveu refuse cette preuve de déférence et de soumission, il est mis en tort, et toute la famille se ligue contre lui pour sauver la hiérarchie et l'autorité familiales : « Tu outrages ton oncle; sans doute désires-tu qu'il meure pour que tu puisses prendre sa place et profiter de son héritage. » Et l'oncle offensé peut, après quelques jours de patience, réclamer une véritable indemnité.

Mais alors interviennent d'autres considérations, et une nouvelle situation se crée :

En effet, souvent — pas toujours pourtant — la mère du jeune homme prend parti pour son fils et fait des scènes à son frère. Deux cas peuvent se présenter :

1° L'oncle et la mère du neveu ne sont pas nés de même mère. Dans ce cas la mère s'abstient rarement d'intervenir en faveur de son fils. Elle reproche à son frère sa dureté, son manque d'affection pour elle, et cela particulièrement si l'épouse adultère est sa nkita à elle, c'est-à-dire si elle a été acquise avec la dot payée pour elle. « A qui dois-tu cette femme? Et tu exiges encore de la richesse de la part de mon fils! Rends-moi ma dot, que je lui procure une épouse. » L'oncle se mettant en colère, lui aussi donne parfois suite à l'injonction de sa sœur courroucée en lui rendant la dot. De ce fait, toute relation entre frère et sœur est rompue. Mais cette éventualité n'est qu'exceptionnelle; presque toujours on arrange les affaires avant qu'elles n'en arrivent à cette extrémité.

2° Si frère et sœur sont de même mère, la paix est toujours rétablie avant cette exaspération, et tout se borne à quelques reproches, à un peu de colère transitoire. Car, dit le proverbe, bâsangí nyangó báfomb'ilángá = la haine que se portent les enfants d'une même mère n'est que mensongère, feinte; elle n'est pas véritable et réelle.



L'oncle (voir ci-dessus : D) n'a les mains absolument libres pour guérir la passion de son neveu (F) que lorsqu'il est le nkóló de sa sœur (E), c'est-à-dire lorsque la mère (C) de sa sœur (E) est la nkita de sa tante (B) = la sœur de son père (A). Dans ce cas, en effet, sa sœur n'a pas à réclamer; elle lui doit respect et soumission; sa dépendance vis-à-vis de son frère-maître est plus grande que la reconnaissance que celui-ci lui doit pour l'enrichissement dont elle est la cause ou l'occasion.

D. — S'agit-il d'un petit-fils (bonkáná) vis-à-vis des épouses de son grand-père, la liberté devient entière dans la pratique. En effet, chez les Nkundó, l'affection du grand-père (nkǫ́kǫ) pour son petit-fils dépasse souvent l'amour porté au propre fils et dégénère complètement en faiblesse (1). Il supporte tous ses agissements, tous ses caprices, toutes ses railleries, injures, etc.

Après des relations coupables, le petit-fils pousse parfois l'insolence jusqu'à envoyer spontanément à son grand-père une indemnité « de dérision » sous forme d'un panier rempli de pierres, au lieu d'anneaux de cuivre.

Malgré la débonnaireté du grand-père à l'égard de son petit-fils, l'opinion publique n'est pourtant pas favorable à cette conduite, quoiqu'elle soit plus indulgente que pour les cas antérieurs. Ce qui prouve — comme le fait d'envoyer l'amende « de dérision » — qu'en principe ces relations sont condamnables et condamnées. De par les circonstances actuelles, — mariages plus précoces, — la différence d'âge entre petit-fils et épouses du grand-père a passablement augmenté en des cas toujours plus nombreux; ce qui fait diminuer leurs rapports dans la même proportion (2).

---

(1) Comme d'ailleurs en Europe, très souvent. Cfr. chap. I, 1e partie, art. I, § 2.

(2) Plus haut nous avons vu que d'autres tribus nkundó sont encore moins sévères dans cette matière. Par contre, la moralité — à notre sens — est plus élevée chez les Ekonda, groupe nkundó du lac Léopold II, où la question des relations ne semble même pas se poser entre la femme et le fils, frère puîné, etc. de son mari. S'agit-il d'une influence de quelque population voisine ? Ou faut-il admettre la décadence chez les tribus dont la morale est, dans ce domaine, inférieure ?

De ce long exposé se dégagent les conclusions suivantes :

1° Les relations entre un homme et l'épouse de son fils, frère puîné, etc.; bref, de tous ceux qui lui sont inférieurs dans la hiérarchie familiale, sont toujours sévèrement interdites et ne se rencontrent jamais.

2° Au contraire, elles existent entre un inférieur et l'épouse de son aîné et supérieur. Le degré de parenté entre le mari et le coupable influe beaucoup sur la gravité ou légèreté de l'infraction, de la sanction, des suites diverses. Certaines relations sont admises, d'autres condamnées avec plus ou moins d'indulgence, d'autres encore impitoyablement critiquées.

3° Dans cette matière, deux aspects sont à distinguer nettement :

a) la réaction du mari et la répression;

b) le jugement porté par l'opinion publique;

ou :

a) l'aspect financier;

b) l'aspect moral, — pour employer ce qualificatif, — à défaut d'un meilleur.

Parfois un troisième élément s'y ajoute : l'intervention de la famille prenant parti pour le coupable contre le mari lésé, qui pour l'une ou l'autre raison s'est mis en tort lui-même.

a) La sanction ordinaire de l'adultère est, pour l'homme, l'indemnité à payer. Or, celle-ci ne peut avoir lieu, puisqu'aucune transaction financière — au sens strict, du moins — ne peut avoir lieu dans la proche parenté, vu que les biens appartiennent, sous un certain angle, à tous les membres, l'un devant tôt ou tard recevoir ou hériter de l'autre. Mais dans les cas où d'autres sanctions sont possibles, elles sont reconnues légitimes.

b) Si l'on excepte les relations entre frère et belle-sœur, — dans les limites décrites ci-dessus, — l'opinion publique est sévère dans son jugement, plus sévère même que pour les adultères ordinaires, qui, de par la nature plus palpable de leurs sanctions, paraissent plus graves superficiellement et font souvent cette impression même sur beaucoup d'indigènes. Ou, du moins, cette impression se dégage spontanément et de prime abord de leurs explications : dans la pratique courante ils mettent en vedette l'indemnité — et dans leurs relations sur les procédés anciens, les sanctions violentes — et ils oublient l'autre aspect. D'autres ne distinguent pas ou très mal les deux faces du problème. Ce n'est qu'en allant au fond des choses qu'eux — comme nous — se rendent compte de l'existence du double aspect et de l'importance qu'il y a à ne pas les confondre.

L'indulgence que, dans certains cas, nous constatons de la part des intéressés lésés, et parfois dans l'opinion publique, ne nous semble pas devoir être expliquée comme une indulgence de principe, ni comme une légitimation de ces rapports (excepté pour les frères, dans les limites indiquées). Elle provient plutôt de l'affection qu'ils portent au coupable, de la compassion pour son état de célibataire, d'une certaine communauté d'intérêts, enfin de l'estimation de certains autres éléments en cause (comme la jalousie foncière dans le cas des frères).

La grande différence que, en cette matière comme en d'autres, les Nkundó mettent entre parents inférieurs et parents supérieurs repose sur leur conception de l'autorité, qui, chez eux, est patriarcale, donc paternelle. Il est bien moins question de peur pour la force que de crainte révérentielle, — bien que la première ne doive nullement être exclue. L'inférieur n'est pas à leurs yeux pour le profit et l'intérêt du supérieur, mais inversement : la raison d'être de l'autorité est le bien de l'inférieur, qui lui, pour sauvegarder la hiérarchie et l'ordre, doit se soumettre au supérieur. C'est sur cette même idée que se base le devoir d'aide du supérieur envers l'inférieur (dans ses difficultés, ses palabres, son indigence), de libéralité et de générosité, donc de communication des biens, d'indulgence en matière de justice et de propriété et de complaisance en matière conjugale, — pourvu que le principe d'autorité reste sauf. L'exploitation de l'inférieur par le supérieur est tout à fait contraire à la nature fondamentale de l'autorité nkundó, tandis que l'inverse y est entièrement conforme (¹).

ARTICLE VII. — L'ADULTÈRE.

L'adultère est, pour les Nkundó, une union illicite entre un homme et une femme mariée. Dès le versement de l'ikulá, on parle d'adultère.

§ 1. Terminologie.

En lonkundo il n'existe pas de terme unique et spécifique pour traduire notre mot « adultère ». La langue en possède plusieurs qui ne s'en rapprochent que partiellement.

1° Tout d'abord on parle de bǫngǫmbę, qui exprime les relations constantes et continues avec une femme tout étrangère, c'est-à-dire à laquelle on n'est apparenté d'aucune façon. Le mot désigne tant la relation que les personnes. Cette sorte d'adultère est aussi nommée : wisamaka ou linsámbá jă njisámá, c'est-à-dire secret (verbe : ísama), par opposition au linsámbá proprement dit (dont il sera question à l'article suivant). Les Bombwanja, Ionda et Injǫ́lǫ́ l'appellent lǫ́ngǫla= acte (quelconque) fait en cachette (du verbe ǫ́ngǫla). Les Ionda emploient encore le terme ekundé=chose enterrée ou cachée sous un amas (verbe : kunda enterrer).

---

(¹) Cet état d'esprit peut rendre compte — du moins dans une certaine mesure — de la liberté que les indigènes prennent facilement envers l'Européen, leur supérieur ou maître : larcins domestiques, demandes importunes, cette espèce de mendicité, le manque du respect que nous sommes habitués à voir observer à l'égard de l'autorité, etc.

Actuellement, on a tendance à appliquer à l'adultère ainsi conçu, du moins s'il ne se limite pas à un seul acte, le nom de linsámbá, sans aucune ajoute spécifiante. Tant la femme que l'amant portent le nom de bonsámbá (pl. : bansámbá).

2° S'il ne s'agit que d'un acte isolé, on parle de yĕtsí (du verbe éta=appeler). Mais ce mot peut s'appliquer également à des célibataires. A proprement parler, il désigne une conjonction unique et non des relations suivies. Certaines tribus (Injǫ́lǫ́, Elángá) ont encore le nom efongo (par exemple : nyong'ĕ'efongo=indemnité pour un seul cas).

3° Le lonkâna (chez les Bombwanja : bombaká) désigne l'adultère entre personnes d'une même entité exogamique et, par extension, entre personnes appartenant à des familles différentes, mais qui ne forment qu'une seule agglomération.

Comme le mot le dit, il s'agit de rapports entre « cousins », au sens le plus large du terme.

Les indigènes m'ont donné un essai d'étymologie des termes bǫngǫmbę et lonkâna, qu'il est peut-être utile de relater ici. Ils auraient été inventés par les épouses volages et leurs amants, afin de cacher leur amours illicites. Même anciennement, il y avait des relations entre Nkundó et Ngǫmbę. Un Ngǫmbę arrivant dans un village nkundó était l'objet de la curiosité de toute la jeunesse. Un homme se rendant chez son amante (ou vice versa) ou en revenant à des heures indues et motivant des soupçons pouvait répondre qu'il venait de voir le Ngǫmbę. Pour le lonkâna, même truc. Quoi qu'il soit de la valeur de cette explication, — (pour lonkâna, par exemple, l'étymologie que j'ai citée au début est bien plus naturelle), — je la donne pour ce qu'elle m'a coûté : il peut toujours être de quelque intérêt de l'avoir signalée et conservée par écrit.

4° Pour indiquer le penchant à l'adultère (spécialement chez les femmes) on emploie le verbe fǎfoka, qui, au sens matériel, se dit d'habits trop larges, voletant au vent; et le substantif loyǒ ou boyǒ.

Découvrir un cas d'adultère s'appelle tẹ́mbọla, substantif ntẹ́mbọ́.

L'adultère occasionnel ou permanent a toujours été très fréquent. Ceci est dû sans aucun doute à la facilité relative d'éviter la découverte et les sanctions. La femme allant voir sa famille ne peut décidément être suivie et surveillée par son mari : les distances rendent difficile ce contrôle, qui, en outre, aurait des conséquences désastreuses pour la stabilité du mariage, car ni la femme ni sa famille ne le supporteraient. D'autre part, nous pouvons donner comme causes partielles : la lascivité, la polygamie, etc., comme nous le verrons encore plus loin.

§ 2. Cadeaux.

L'homme et la femme adultères s'envoient des cadeaux; celui-là de la viande, des flèches, etc., celle-ci de la nourriture, divers menus objets. Les cadeaux de la femme à son amant sont nommés botúmo (substantif employé avec le verbe tumba = faire brûler (1). Les intermédiaires sont généralement des parents en bas âge. Notons que la femme n'envoie que rarement son fils. Car elle peut redouter avec raison que le cadeau n'arrive pas à destination : le garçon s'en régalera lui-même. Mieux peut-elle se fier à sa fille.

Le cadeau de la part de l'homme s'appelle du nom générique de mpató = cadeau envoyé, envoi.

---

(1) Notons que le substantif et le verbe n'ont entre eux aucune connexion étymologique. Peut-être botúmo se rapproche-t-il de túma = montrer, désigner ? Les Ekonda nomment ce cadeau elika. Cfr. encore le chap. II, art. 1.

Pour le cas isolé (yëtsí), l'homme donne une flèche, un petit objet, des perles, de la viande, etc. Actuellement tout cela est remplacé par de l'argent ou des étoffes. D'ordinaire la femme exige une rémunération. Il existe pourtant des exceptions, fréquentes ou rares, d'après la région et la nature des personnes. Elles sont dues à la passion extraordinaire ou à l'amour de la femme envers son amant (1).

§ 3. Les preuves de l'adultère.

Elles peuvent être plus ou moins fortes.

1° La plus importante est la flagrance du délit. Là-contre, aucune objection ne tient, et elle justifie l'application des plus sévères sanctions. La constatation doit en être faite par le mari. Le témoignage d'une tierce personne n'est jamais produit. Si elle découvre le fait, et qu'elle soit favorable à l'époux, elle l'avertit pour qu'il prenne ses précautions afin d'attraper personnellement les coupables. Si le fait est découvert par le père ou un proche parent de la femme qui est favorable au mari, il le lui signale et, si possible, l'appelle pour venir constater lui-même l'infraction. Dans cette dernière éventualité, l'indemnité doit être donnée par le mari au beau-père. Ce n'est pas une obligation de justice, mais de bonne entente, de convenance, puisque le beau-père fait preuve de bonne volonté et d'affection à l'égard de son gendre.

2° Presque d'égale importance et toujours péremptoire est l'aveu de l'épouse. Dans ce cas, le mari mitige sa colère contre elle et la dirige surtout contre le complice. Aussi la plupart des femmes n'hésitent-elles pas à dénoncer ce dernier, si elles se sentent tant soit peu acculées. (Par contre, entre elles, les femmes ne se dénoncent jamais.)

---

(1) Cfr. chap. I, 1e partie, art. IV.

3° Une troisième preuve est de surprendre les amants pendant qu'ils projettent une rencontre. Sur le fait, le mari les accuse, et tâche d'extraire à sa femme une confession complète sur le passé ou sur le futur. Si possible il s'assure le concours de témoins. Prévoit-il que la femme niera, il laisse passer le cas pour chercher une occasion favorable de surprendre les coupables sur le fait. Souvent, quelles que soient les dispositions de la femme, il n'intervient pas immédiatement; ne laissant rien percer, il cherche adroitement l'occasion de constater la flagrance du délit contre lequel il pourra réagir plus violemment. Cette attitude s'impose absolument lorsqu'il n'a que de simples soupçons, fussent-ils fondés. Agir autrement ne mènerait pas à grand résultat, et serait une marque de légèreté, — qui existe souvent chez des maris jeunes et inexpérimentés ou d'un tempérament trop irascible. Surprendre un message d'invitation ou d'acceptation a la même valeur pratique.

Cette preuve est moins forte que les deux précédentes et — à moins que celles-ci ne s'y ajoutent, — ne légitime que certaines sanctions.

4° La vue des amants se livrant des cadeaux, de main à main ou par intermédiaire (« avec les compliments d'Untel »), a aussi sa valeur comme preuve. Mais ici encore la meilleure méthode est d'en faire un moyen de faire avouer la femme. C'est la seule valeur pratique de la découverte de cadeaux quelconques entre les mains de l'épouse. Si celle-ci ne trouve aucune explication qui puisse tranquilliser le mari, elle se voit forcée d'avouer et de dénoncer.

§ 4. Sanctions.

Le droit nkundó connaît plusieurs sanctions contre l'adultère, applicables soit aux époux, soit à leurs complices, soit à un intermédiaire (ekímá). Il existe des différences dans l'application d'après la gravité du cas (par exemple : récidive, habitude), la disposition ou le tempérament des personnes, la valeur de la preuve. Bien que légitimées par la loi, la plupart sont appliquées de l'initiative du conjoint, mais dans certains cas l'autorité familiale comme celle du ndonga doivent intervenir. Nous distinguerons donc les divers cas :

A. — Sanctions du mari contre la femme adultère. — a) Dans le cas d'un délit flagrant, le mari peut battre la femme, la blesser, la tuer même. Ni elle, ni sa famille n'auront le droit de réclamer. S'il l'a tue, il n'a plus droit au remboursement de la dot, pas plus que dans le cas d'un décès naturel. Généralement, aux temps jadis, la mort dans ces circonstances donnait lieu à une guerre interclanique. D'ailleurs, cette extrémité était très rare et n'arrivait qu'à un homme excessivement jaloux, ayant d'autres femmes, ou possédant des richesses pour s'en procurer, ou encore aigri par une infidélité persistante et incorrigible. Le plus souvent, le mari, retenu par la prévision de la perte qu'il subirait en fin de compte, se borne à battre ou à blesser la coupable, ou à lui appliquer d'autres châtiments et punitions (infra sous b); cfr. supra, art. III, § 2.

Hors le cas de flagrance, si le mari possède des preuves suffisantes, comme nous l'avons vu ci-dessus, la coupable peut s'attendre à une bonne rossée, accompagnée de toute une litanie de gros mots et d'injures diverses (femina foetidissima, tempore menstruationis putor tuus venit in nares omnium hominum, etc.), plus un tas d'obscénités ayant trait au sexe féminin. L'époux agissant de cette façon n'est pas réprimandé; au contraire, il le fait par jalousie; c'est une colère d'amour, disent nos Nkundó.

Dans ces punitions, les Nkundó reconnaissent surtout l'exaspération d'une légitime jalousie. C'est pourquoi le mari agit de son initiative privée. D'ailleurs, se trouvant devant le fait, il lui serait psychologiquement difficile de se calmer pour d'abord aller avertir le ndonga.

Il était extrêmement rare qu'un homme tuât sa femme de propos délibéré et dans le calme. La chose arrivait seulement lorsque ses infidélités étaient continuelles et qu'un tas d'autres graves défauts s'y ajoutaient. Et encore ne trouvait-on cette conduite que dans certaines familles plus cruelles. Le fait est connu d'Iloko is'Okungú et de Bengóngó byǎ Kundú, tous deux de Bongilá (Bẹsọmbọ́), famille qui se glorifiait, dans les chants, de manger leurs propres épouses.

b) Tortures. Le mari peut encore avoir recours à plusieurs tortures dont voici les principales :

1° L'etáka, qui est, pour ainsi dire, la torture type. C'est une lourde fourche en bois attachée au cou. Elle empêche les déplacements. C'est la prison nkundó. Mais en outre, si l'application perdure, elle devient une réelle torture : la peau devient douloureuse et se détache, des inflammations se produisent facilement, et souvent des punaises s'y logent.

Dès que la famille de la femme apprend (par le ndonga) la nouvelle, elle vient souvent prier le mari de la libérer. Pour le calmer et le rendre propice, on lui offre un paiement ad hoc, c'est-à-dire un bọọ́mbọ de quelques anneaux de cuivre. D'ordinaire, il cède à leurs instances : la bonne alliance et le sentiment de respect envers eux exigent qu'il ne reste pas insensible à leurs supplications, d'autant plus qu'il a besoin d'eux pour la stabilité de l'union et la bonne marche du ménage.

2° Les byẽngẹlanyi ou menottes, qui sont des bâtons liés, soit aux poignets, soit aux chevilles (pour empêcher la marche), ou tant aux bras qu'aux pieds. On employait deux bâtons, — un dessus et un dessous, les membres étant posés entre les deux, — qui étaient liés par des cordes attachées et fixées dans une entaille faite dans chaque extrémité des bâtons. Les poignets étaient rarement croisés. Afin d'augmenter la douleur et l'immobilisation, les cordes étaient rétrécies et durcies en y versant de l'eau. D'ordinaire, ces menottes s'ajoutaient à l'etáka, et jamais n'étaient appliquées seules.

3° L'exposition aux morsures des fourmis nkongôtó. Dans la région dont nous traitons, je n'ai jamais entendu dire qu'on expose aux bafumba (Dorylus), ni même aux vénéneuses benkŏnkómo, en opposition avec la pratique d'autres tribus Mǫ́ngo, et avec les données de certaines fables (évolution ?).

4° L'infusion d'eau poivrée dans la voie génitale. Parfois les parties étaient frottées de poivre pilé.

5° L'exposition des organes sexuels au feu : une bûche brûlante étant tenue à proximité.

Ces deux dernières tortures étaient les plus atroces.

Nous pouvons ajouter une dernière punition, qui, bien que n'étant pas une torture, relève des mêmes règles juridiques :

6° La nudité, le mari arrachant à la coupable ses vêtements et l'exposant ainsi à la honte publique. Même si elle a recours à des feuilles, personne ne s'y méprend et la honte n'en est diminuée qu'en partie.

Pour rendre légitime l'application d'une de ces peines, n'importe laquelle des preuves indiquées ci-dessus est suffisante. Toutefois, le mari doit, au préalable, avertir ses anciens et le ndonga. Ceux-ci ne lui permettent d'agir qu'après des fautes réitérées. La facilité plus ou moins grande d'accorder la permission dépend du tempérament des intéressés et d'une quantité de circonstances, dont les influences sociales respectives des parties en cause sont les principales.

La nécessité de demander la permission des « pères » et du ndonga, dont nous avons déjà rencontré d'autres applications (supra, art. III, § 4), n'infirme pas le droit du mari, mais en limite l'exécution. Elle n'est pas une obligation de justice, mais est imposée pour des raisons familiales, qui sont :

1° Le respect dû aux « pères », ici comme en toute matière d'importance;

2° Le respect dû au ndonga, qui, dans le domaine matrimonial, est son supérieur, et dont l'intervention doit être invoquée en tout cas grave;

3° La répercussion sur toute la famille d'une action inconsidérée ou imprudente (inimitiés, guerres, etc.).

Si la longanimité et la patience restent infructueuses, personne ne pourra plus condamner le mari. Et la famille même de la femme, comparant la conduite condamnable, d'un côté, à la générosité de leur gendre, est naturellement inclinée à lui donner raison, et d'ordinaire n'intervient pas contre lui.

Signalons encore que pour justifier l'obligation d'avertir l'autorité, les Nkundó invoquent le besoin du maintien de leur honneur. Ils doivent pouvoir avertir le clan de la femme infidèle et sauvegarder leur bon renom de défenseurs de l'ordre et de la paix publique.

Une femme beaucoup aimée par son mari n'était soumise qu'à l'etáka. Il la semonçait et la battait, et tâchait de la corriger à force de douceur et de clémence.

Comme nous le verrons suo loco, le mari exaspéré par l'infidélité incorrigible de sa femme recourt parfois au divorce, si par ailleurs elle ne s'acquitte pas convenablement de ses autres devoirs conjugaux; ou encore à la vente en esclavage, rarement à l'immolation.

La colonisation a aboli les tortures, l'esclavage, l'immolation et la légitimité de l'assassinat. Il ne reste au mari d'autre sanction contre sa femme infidèle que de l'insulter et de la battre. Et encore la juridiction européenne l'oblige à se maîtriser, afin de ne pas commettre d'excès qui puissent l'impliquer dans un procès devant le tribunal du Blanc. Heureusement pour la fidélité conjugale, les derniers temps, suite à l'institution officielle des juridictions indigènes, la réaction a commencé en faveur de la répression de l'adultère et elle aboutira, dans un avenir plus ou moins prochain, par le retour à la loi ancestrale adaptée aux circonstances actuelles.

B. — Contre le complice, le mari lésé a droit à l'emploi de deux sanctions : la violence et le paiement d'une « indemnité ».

1° Si le mari surprend le complice sur le fait, il est toujours en droit de le blesser, voire de le tuer, ou de le réduire en esclavage. Les deux dernières vengeances ne se pratiquaient que lorsque les villages respectifs du mari et du coupable étaient assez éloignés l'un de l'autre et n'étaient pas unis par des liens particuliers (amitié, entr'aide, alliance). Ceci avait sa raison d'être dans la considération qu'on avait pour les parents du délinquant, ne voulant pas les attrister outre mesure. Un autre mobile de prudence et de calme est l'infériorité économique ou militaire du clan du mari, et la hardiesse, la valeur guerrière, la force, en un mot, de la famille du coupable. Un cas exceptionnel qui fait s'évanouir toutes les autres considérations est l'adultère avec une favorite, aimée par son mari d'un amour particulièrement passionné et jaloux.

Lorsque l'adultère ne se limitait plus à quelques actes isolés, mais devenait une véritable habitude, ou que le délinquant avait déjà séduit mainte femme et ainsi causé à sa famille force palabres, le mari, quelle que fût sa situation ou la position de son clan, pouvait être plus hardi. Car les proches du débauché étaient finalement exaspérés par sa méconduite incorrigible et désastreuse, et préféraient être débarrassés de lui (¹).

(¹) Cfr. aussi chap. VIII, art. II, § 2, A.

Le danger des blessures, de l'esclavage, de la mort refroidissait souvent le désir d'adultère. Aussi, plus le mari se montrait hardi, violent, fort de physique ou de position sociale, plus ses femmes et leurs amants se tenaient sur leur garde. Certains hommes étaient tellement jaloux d'une de leurs épouses et si bien décidés de se venger avec une extrême rigueur, que les tentateurs n'osaient même pas penser à s'approcher d'elles,

2° Le paiement d'une indemnité semble être la sanction type. A présent, c'est la seule qui est restée légale, et par conséquent elle se place de plus en plus sur l'avant-plan.

N'importe laquelle des preuves étudiées ci-dessus justifie la réclamation d'une indemnité.

L'indemnité peut être minime : 2-5 anneaux de cuivre; ou forte : 20-30 ou un esclave. Ce maximum est toujours exigé pour l'adultère avec une favorite. Le montant est plus ou moins élevé d'après les personnes en cause, les relations qui les unissent, la fréquence des fautes, la nature du fait constaté; par exemple, la surprise de l'arrangement d'une rencontre, la remise d'un cadeau donnent lieu à une petite indemnité; la flagrance du délit, au contraire, à un indemnité élevée.

Un homme qui exige une indemnité élevée doit s'attendre à se voir rendre la pareille le cas échéant. L'application, dans ce cas, de la loi du talion est pleinement approuvée par l'opinion nkundó.

Outre les cas étudiés à l'article précédent, il en existe un autre qui ne donne pas lieu à la réclamation d'une indemnité. C'est lorsque le coupable appartient à un clan esclave ou autrement dépendant et inférieur (mpámá ou bowélé) [1]. Même si le mari surprend le coupable sur le fait, il le prie poliment de s'esquiver et de lui laisser maison et femme : « óntsíkél'ílǫmbę, njôyá é! » C'est là la pratique de la véritable politesse nkundó. Il pouvait bien arriver qu'un mari par trop jaloux et impétueux blessât, tuât ou vendît son rival. Mais c'était une exception toujours blâmée, parce que manquant absolument de chevaleresque. En tout cas, il ne peut jamais être question d'exiger une indemnité, ce qui serait absolument indigne.

---

[1] Etrangers qui, sans être apparentés de quelque façon, sont fixés dans une tribu ou un groupe.

La réclamation de l'indemnité est portée à la connaissance du coupable par le ndonga, assisté, dans les cas difficiles, par divers notables. Si le mari prévoit une forte opposition de la part du débiteur, il fait au ndonga un cadeau spécial d'un régime de bananes plus deux poissons (ou une poule), « pour qu'il ne soit pas forcé de manger la nourriture du rival ».

Le refus catégorique et persistant de payer l'indemnité est rare. Car il peut avoir des suites graves : arrestation, puis réduction en esclavage du coupable pour cause de dettes, ou compensation sur la personne de sa femme, d'une parente, ou rétention d'une parente du créancier mariée dans le clan du débiteur (ikákelo). Ces pratiques d'otages et de contrainte par corps ayant été abolies, il reste encore l'intervention des tribunaux secondés par la police.

Quelle idée les Nkundó se font-ils de la nature de ce paiement que, pour la facilité de l'exposé, nous avons nommé indemnité? Question difficile à résoudre. Comme éléments de solution, voici les données linguistiques :

Le paiement pour adultère s'appelle nyongo, employé avec le verbe ka= donner. Il équivaut au verbe lingala fúta (d'où dérive le substantif bofúto). Il signifie paiement dans son sens le plus large et couvre donc aussi nos mots « paie, salaire, rémunération ». Outre son application à l'adultère, il s'emploie encore dans beaucoup d'autres circonstances : rémunération pour un travail ou pour la prestation d'un service, etc. Nyongo ne signifie pas compensation, qui se dit lowáála, ni paiement de réparation et d'excuses pour une offense ou bọọ́ndọ, ni indemnisation (mbálaka). Il a en commun avec ce dernier mot l'idée de paiement dû en justice, et, faute d'une expression adéquate pour le rendre, « indemnité » est encore la traduction la moins inexacte (1).

Reste à noter que les deux genres de punition : violences et indemnité, ne peuvent pas être cumulés, principe qui est d'une application universelle (2). Faut-il voir là-dedans une condamnation implicite des mesures violentes ? Ou bien y a-t-il ici exercice d'un système de composition ? La question est difficile à trancher, les deux explications se couvrant d'ailleurs au moins en partie.

Il n'est pas dépourvu d'intérêt de signaler encore que comme justification des sanctions contre le complice les Nkundó invoquent la part, souvent prépondérante, qu'il a dans l'adultère. En effet, raisonnent-ils, de sa nature la femme est faible : le sentiment prédomine, elle se laisse aisément entraîner et ne résiste que difficilement à la sollicitation. L'homme, au contraire, est plus raisonnable, sait mieux se maîtriser. Édicter des sanctions et les appliquer uniquement à l'épouse, non seulement exclurait de la punition un des deux coupables, mais encore serait insuffisant pour sauvegarder l'ordre social, puisque, malgré les peines, la femme est toujours exposée à succomber par faiblesse. La rigueur que malgré cela le droit nkundó met dans les châtiments corporels de l'épouse s'expliquent par sa nature sensible et par le pouvoir que le conjoint a sur elle et qui lui fait défaut vis-à-vis du complice.

C. — Contre le mari et sa complice. — Contre l'adultère du mari, le droit nkundó ne prévoit aucune sanction pénale propre. Mais l'épouse outragée peut se venger sur lui comme sur sa rivale. Ses armes contre le conjoint sont : les invectives, le refus de la nourriture, de la boisson, du bain, enfin du debitum conjugale. Ce sont là des punitions sensibles contre lesquelles le mari ne peut nullement réclamer, car il serait nettement mis en tort. La femme, en effet, agit par jalousie légitime. Parfois ce sentiment est si véhément, qu'elle s'arrache les habits et reste toute nue devant son mari, ce qui cause à celui-ci une grande honte et constitue un reproche cinglant. Les invectives sortent de la bouche par torrents : ilolé inę́, itutula inę́, inyanyama iné, owá lóí ô ndá nyongo, ndá ntę́mbǫ́=cet imbécile, ce vaurien, cette bête, tu mourras un jour par les amendes, par la surprise en flagrant délit; plus toute la série des insultes ordinaires. Plus les injures sont abondantes, plus grand est l'amour de la femme, disent nos Nkundó. Cela peut durer des jours, voire des semaines. Ses réactions contre son mari adultère sont donc du même genre que celles dont elle use dans d'autres circonstances.

---

(1) Pour récompense on emploie : bọkóndọ = récompense pour une prestation sortant du commun, comme la capture d'un léopard ou d'un autre animal « royal » (nyam'ě ekofo, tels le python, l'aigle, etc.), une belle danse ; et : mbuteji = récompense pour menus services.

(2) Cfr., par exemple, encore chap. VIII, art. III, § 1.

Si l'épouse jalouse met le feu à la case où son conjoint s'est livré à sa passion, personne ne peut lui en faire un reproche. Le dommage causé est pour le compte du mari.

Contre la femme complice, l'épouse outragée peut employer des moyens plus violents. Elle se bat contre elle, la frappe, la blesse même. Pour les blessures le mari de la rivale exige un paiement « pour coups et blessures » ou liǫmbǫ, qui ne doit pas être effectué par la famille de la femme, mais par le conjoint coupable. De sorte que, en fin de compte, c'est lui encore qui est puni. Si la délinquante est tuée, c'est toujours au mari infidèle qu'incombe l'obligation d'indemniser le veuf. (Cfr. art. II.)

Un châtiment auquel l'épouse aime à recourir pour se venger sur son mari adultère et sur sa complice qu'elle surprend sur le fait est de leur verser sur le corps un pot d'eau chaude ou bouillante.

D. — Contre l'entremetteur (¹). — Le droit nkundó permet toutes sortes d'invectives, des coups, une bonne rossée. L'appel direct de la femme était considéré comme le cas le plus grave. Autrefois, dans les circonstances favorables (pensez surtout à l'influence sociale des familles en cause), certains hommes plus jaloux ou plus crânes arrêtaient l'entremetteur et le vendaient comme esclave. Cette répression était parfaitement légitime, bien que le mandant soit le premier coupable et donc que la famille du prisonnier puisse l'attaquer de ce chef. On cite le cas historique pas trop ancien de Bonkéké is'Īloko, d'Ikẹngọ (Ntómbá, Wǎngatá), qui pour cette raison vendit comme esclave le Bọtswa Bompáte qui avait apporté à sa favorite Wǔfya le cadeau d'un amant.

E. — Conclusion. — Dans l'examen des diverses sanctions prévues par la loi nkundó contre les adultères et leurs complices, une différence notable entre les cas saute aux yeux. Bien que la femme possède certains moyens de répression, elle est incontestablement moins bien armée que le mari. La chose est une conséquence logique de la nature du mariage nkundó. Le mari défend sa « propriété », tandis que l'épouse n'est pas « propriétaire ». Ensuite, dans ce domaine on est plus exigeant envers la femme qu'envers l'homme. Même en Europe on juge très différemment la faute commise par un homme et la faiblesse d'une femme, celle-ci étant considérée comme plus grave et plus déshonorante, bien que — absolument parlant — les deux infractions se valent. Enfin, le régime polygamique y entre pour une part, car il tend à diminuer l'amour de l'épouse et par conséquent sa jalousie, et ainsi l'habitue aux relations de son mari avec d'autres femmes quelconques; de sorte que la réaction du sexe féminin en général contre l'adultère est beaucoup moins forte que celle des hommes. En outre, de par ce même régime, la femme est plus exposée aux faiblesses et il faut donc des sanctions plus rigoureuses pour assurer la fidélité conjugale.

---

(¹) Généralement, pour inviter les femmes, les Nkundó se servent d'entremetteurs, particulièrement d'enfants de 6 à 14 ans. On comprend sans peine la funeste influence que pareille pratique a sur l'éducation de la jeunesse. Dans certains milieux, c'est une véritable plaie morale.

Enfin, il existe un dernier motif pour considérer la faute de la femme comme plus grave : c'est le risque d'une conception adultérine, avec toutes ses conséquences: dangers pour l'enceinte, continence forcée du mari, etc. (1).

Il appert de l'exposé des sanctions que la loi nkundó, nonobstant l'infériorité de la femme, ne laisse pas aux maris la pleine et entière liberté qui, d'après les auteurs, leur est accordée chez d'autres peuplades. Même si les moyens de répression que possède la femme ne prouvent pas de façon incontestable l'obligation du mari à la fidélité conjugale, — la situation juridique de l'épouse expliquant beaucoup, — il reste que le ndonga et l'opinion publique appprouvent ses réactions même violentes, preuve de son droit à elle contre le tort du mari.

§ 5. L'opinion publique.

Elle est assez indulgente pour les cas isolés (yĕtsi, efongo). Elle reconnaît bien la faute qu'il y a à léser le droit conjugal d'autrui, mais elle l'attribue à la faiblesse humaine. Pour l'habitude, la situation est différente. Elle est critiquée et souvent sévèrement. Les consuétudinaires sont traités d'efáfóká (du verbe fâfoka=voleter, et au figuré : « papillonner »), d'ebóngá ou ebábóngá (du verbe bâbonga) ou ebábǫ́á (de bâbǫa)=voleter, être léger et volage. Ces épithètes s'appliquent surtout aux femmes, plus sujettes à ce défaut que les hommes.

La honte qui, dans les bons milieux d'Europe, s'attache à la découverte de pareilles fautes, est inconnue chez les Nkundó. C'est naturel, puisque les cas isolés sont facilement excusés. Pour les consuétudinaires, ils sont sensibles aux épithètes mentionnées, mais ne se corrigent pas pour autant, — pas plus qu'ailleurs au monde.

---

(1) Cfr. ci-dessous, § 6; ainsi que le chap. I, 2e partie, art. IV, § 3, et le chap. X, art. II, § 3.

La critique s'attaque aussi bien au mari qu'à la femme, et cela malgré la différence que le droit pose entre leurs moyens de répression.

L'opinion publique corrobore donc la conclusion indiquée par l'examen de sanctions, que l'adultère est condamné par les Nkundó. Cette opinion n'est pas basée sur l'existence de la sanction, mais semble provenir de la mentalité innée pour laquelle l'adultère apparaît comme un désordre.

§ 4. Circonstances aggravantes.

L'adultère devient particulièrement grave lorsqu'il est suivi d'une conception, et cela tant pour le conjoint que pour le père naturel. Ce dernier, en effet, doit en supporter toutes les conséquences. Lorsque les circonstances le permettent, le mari oblige sa femme à dénoncer son complice, ce qu'elle ne refuse pas de faire. Il convoque une assemblée et se fait remettre un gage (ndanga) par le coupable, qui, de la sorte, reconnaît sa faute et manifeste sa volonté d'en assumer toute la responsabilité. Si l'enfant n'arrive pas à terme, ou meurt à l'accouchement, le père naturel doit indemniser le père juridique, en payant un « esclave » ou davantage (parfois 50 anneaux); l'indemnité est moindre pour un enfant seulement difforme ou débile. Si la mère y laisse la vie, l'indemnité monte à un esclave plus 50 anneaux, et peut même atteindre jusqu'à 100 anneaux.

Entre-temps, le mari n'approche plus de sa femme. Il la laisse à son amant, qui doit « conserver le foetus » et observer tous les rites et pratiques de la période de gestation et d'accouchement, puisque, physiquement, il est le père (1).

---

(1) Cfr. de plus amples détails au chap. X, art. II, § 3. Pratique analogue pour une jeune fille mère, chap. I, 1e partie, art. III, § 3.

L'adultère revêt encore un caractère spécial de gravité durant l'époque des interdits de l'enfantement, parce qu'il met en danger la vie de l'enfant et de la mère, comme nous l'expliquerons au chapitre X, article III.

§ 7. Remarques et conclusions générales.

1° Le délit d'adultère, même sous sa forme la plus bénigne, c'est-à-dire l'acte isolé, était autrefois une des causes principales des « guerres » entre villages. Parfois, l'un et l'autre faisant appel au secours de leurs alliés, on pouvait se trouver devant une conflagration générale.

2° Généralement, le mari tient à la fidélité de son épouse. Sans doute, il existe des exceptions. La plupart des cas, pour ne pas dire tous, se rencontraient autrefois chez les vieux polygames. Leur âge les avait dégoûtés des palabres continuelles, et leur expérience des hommes leur avait enseigné que souvent ils se mettaient en colère et compliquaient leur petite vie inutilement. Ils préféraient fermer les yeux. Comme ce bon Bọnọí w'Īkọlọngọ́, d'Itẹkọ (clan Bombwanja des Boóyá). Il vint me voir au village chrétien de Bombomba, où j'étais de passage, au début de mars 1933. Comme je lui demandais pourquoi il était orné d'une telle abondance de sonnettes, il me répondit naïvement : « Je les mets toujours. De cette façon, mes femmes s'aperçoivent de mon retour déjà au loin. Ainsi elles ont le temps de cesser leurs médisances sur mon compte et de congédier leurs amants. » Comme j'exprimais mon étonnement qu'il ne voulait pas les surprendre sur le fait pour les punir et mettre fin à leurs infidélités, il me répondit en souriant : « Non, Père, la jalousie..., passe pour les jeunes. Moi, j'en ai vu tellement que je n'ai plus envie de me mettre en colère et faire des palabres pour ces bagatelles. »

Depuis l'arrivée des Européens, certains hommes peu scrupuleux — des polygames surtout — s'adonnent à une espèce de proxénétisme. Ils envoient leurs femmes commettre l'adultère de façon à pouvoir les surprendre sur les faits et ainsi s'enrichir. Ou bien ils les louent pour une ou plusieurs nuits à des travailleurs ou soldats, célibataires de droit ou de fait.

Certains hommes, connaissant la nature fragile et sensuelle de leur femme, conservent — aujourd'hui comme autrefois — les anneaux provenant des indemnités. Lorsque le capital est suffisant, ils l'emploient à l'acquisition d'une nouvelle épouse. Celle-ci est en quelque sorte la nkita de l'autre et on la nomme assez crûment : nkita é'efufa, efufa étant la pièce d'étoffe (tablier) portée par les femmes. Cela ne signifie pas chez le mari un désir de spéculation sur l'immoralité. Tout simplement il profite du fait. Mais cette attitude peut aisément dégénérer; dans la situation actuelle, le danger n'est plus imaginaire, quoique, pour le moment, on n'en soit pas encore arrivé si loin. Pour éviter toute exploitation de l'infidélité conjugale, la surveillance des autorités administratives et judiciaires peut empêcher l'éclosion du mal ou l'enrayer là où il existerait déjà.

D'après les cas, on rencontre de très grandes divergences dans l'attitude adoptée à l'égard de l'adultère du conjoint. Elles proviennent non seulement du tempérament de la personne lésée, — la chose va de soi, — mais aussi de la façon dont l'adultère s'acquitte des autres obligations conjugales. Cela vaut surtout pour les « faiblesses » de la femme. Si par ailleurs elle se montre épouse dévouée, prévenante, respectueuse, laborieuse, prenant à cœur les intérêts de son conjoint et de ses enfants, en un mot bonne compagne et bonne ménagère, son mari est bien chagriné de ses infidélités, mais il prête une moindre attention à ces errements, compensés par beaucoup de bonnes qualités qui prouvent que la femme l'aime sérieusement et qu'elle se laisse entraîner uniquement par faiblesse. Si, au contraire, l'épouse devient négligente, maussade, irrespectueuse, ce changement prouve qu'il y a autre chose que la pure faiblesse et que son amour envers son mari s'est refroidi et s'est choisi un autre objet.

Voilà la saine philosophie de la vie conjugale chez les Nkundó, proclamée et enseignée par tous les vieux et sages du peuple.

3° Malgré les terribles sanctions contre l'adultère, ce délit semble avoir toujours été fréquent. Certains événements favorisent particulièrement le relâchement, comme les décès, les fêtes et danses se prolongeant tard dans la nuit. Mais, même dans les circonstances ordinaires, l'obscurité vespérale est une forte sollicitation. Un attroupement tumultueux de jeunes personnes des deux sexes est provoqué intentionnellement dans le but de protéger leurs ébats. Ce sont surtout les femmes qui déclanchent la scène (nommée iole). On commence par des « jeux », des pincements, etc. Parfois, certaines, plus hardies, lancent en guise de signal le cri d'iole o ! Ces irrégularités sont parfois concertées d'avance; d'autres fois elles sont provoquées sans accord préalable. Les maris interviennent, mais il leur est très malaisé de surprendre les coupables.

4° Dans l'idée des Nkundó, l'adultère ne paraît pas être une faute morale, même au sens le plus large du mot, punissable par une puissance extra-terrestre, religieuse ou superstitieuse, qui interviendrait pour rétablir l'ordre bouleversé. On a plutôt l'impression de se trouver devant une loi purement sociale. Non que je veuille affirmer que cette loi et ses sanctions ne proviennent en dernière analyse d'une idée morale; mais cette idée morale, si elle existe, est extrêmement vague et confuse et n'est pas exprimée par nos gens. Pratiquement, toute l'attention est portée sur les sanctions, à cause de la lésion du droit de propriété. Jamais on ne saisit la moindre allusion à une idée morale religieuse.

Et voilà, probablement, la raison principale de la fréquence des adultères, malgré les sanctions, qui freinent sans doute, mais qui sont impuissantes à enrayer le mal. Ceci d'ailleurs n'est pas propre à notre peuplade. Toute loi est un idéal. Les sanctions tâchent d'en assurer l'observation. Mais la masse n'atteint jamais le but proposé. Si des individus sont supérieurs à l'idéal imposé par la loi, c'est que la société est inférieure à sa tâche, comme on le constate dans l'Europe actuelle. Chez les Nkundó, la loi et la société sont supérieures à la moralité des individus. D'ailleurs, de tout temps, les sanctions, quoique nécessaires, se sont montrées insuffisantes pour assurer l'observation parfaite des lois : nihil leges sine moribus. Or, ces bonnes mœurs doivent provenir de considérations qui sont supérieures aux lois particulières et qui en sont le fondement.

Si, comme nous le voyons, les Nkundó ne mettent aucune relation entre leurs connaissances religieuses et les prescriptions concernant la présente matière, comment expliquer la conduite louable de maint individu ? A mon avis, si le Nkundó ne se rend pas compte de la relation entre la loi et son législateur ultime, il n'est pas dépourvu d'un certain sentiment vague, inné, de l'immoralité de l'adultère, corroboré par celui de l'injustice personnelle qu'il cause. Mais il ne raisonne pas ces sentiments : il les suit spontanément, aveuglément.

La conscience du mal social qu'est l'adultère est plus vivace. Mais elle est basée, non sur des considérations philosophiques de cette malice en soi, mais sur les conséquences qu'ont les cas individuels sur la bonne marche de la société : palabres, embarras financiers, inimitiés, rixes, guerres.

Voilà, me semble-t-il, l'état présent des idées. Cela n'empêche pas que la loi et les sanctions contre l'adultère ne puissent reposer sur la base ultime d'idées morales. Et de façon plus particulière, il est bien possible que l'idée morale n'ait agi que sous la forme du sentiment des grands principes de la loi naturelle fondamentale innée à toute raison humaine.

5° Nous n'étonnerons personne en affirmant que l'adultère, loin de diminuer avec la colonisation, en a, au contraire, reçu une extension considérable. L'abolition des peines et châtiments indigènes, jointe à la grande liberté de circulation, ont dû, naturellement, conduire à cet état. Tout colonial averti et en contact intime avec les indigènes s'en rend compte. « L'interdiction des châtiments corporels qui sanctionnaient, selon la coutume, l'adultère de la femme a entraîné une licence qui se mesure au degré de notre occupation; nulle part l'oubli, sinon le mépris, des engagements conjugaux n'est poussé aussi loin que dans les milieux complètement soustraits à la discipline coutumière. » (Maj. Engels, Bulletin Soc. Belge Et. Col., cité dans Congo, III année, tome I, p. 77, avril 1922). C'est pourquoi, à maintes reprises et par diverses personnes, des sanctions ont été réclamées contre l'adultère, en remplacement des répressions ancestrales abolies.

Mais les décrets souhaités ne sont jamais sortis de l'état de purs projets. Heureusement, entre-temps, un autre pas, qui est un pas fondamental, a été posé par l'institution des juridictions indigènes (1926). Guidées et contrôlées de près par les autorités européennes, elles renverseront la barre en faisant demi-tour vers les anciennes sanctions, tout en les adaptant à la situation nouvelle créée par la colonisation et par l'introduction d'idées plus humanitaires. Toutefois, il faut une extrême prudence pour ne pas exagérer celles-ci au point de vouloir traiter à l'égal des communautés européennes une société qui ne commence à sortir du paganisme barbare que par la présence d'une civilisation à base chrétienne. La société indigène doit évoluer graduellement, harmonieusement. Brusquer est souvent synonyme de briser, et toujours c'est une grande faute. Or, dans la matière qui nous occupe, l'abolition des sanctions qui se sont montrées, malgré leur imperfection et leur insuffisance à tout obtenir, d'une réelle efficacité, enlève au droit nkundó toute valeur coercitive. Un humanitarisme sentimental et excessif doit céder devant le droit qu'a la société indigène au respect de ses institutions vitales — à moins qu'elles ne soient absolument condamnables — et donc devant la nécessité de répressions sévères dont, pour le moment, elle ne peut pas encore se passer. Car nos indigènes ne sont pas encore mûrs pour l'abolition intégrale de leurs sanctions coutumières, puisqu'ils manquent encore d'une nouvelle base qui remplace leur crainte des pénalités anciennes. Gardons-nous donc d'enlever aux conjoints toute faculté de répression, celle-ci fût-elle, à notre mentalité, un peu violente. Enfin, rien ne sert d'exagérer le respect pour le sexe faible, qui, de par sa nature même, a besoin parfois d'une correction sensible pour le plus grand bien de la communauté entière. D'ailleurs, à ce respect, nos Nkundó ne comprennent rien du tout; tel que nous le concevons, il est tout à fait opposé à leur mentalité et à leurs lois. Or, tout cela ira plus facilement s'il est laissé aux juridictions indigènes assez de latitude pour agir dans l'esprit de leur droit ancestral et si, d'autre part, leur activité est guidée par un contrôle constant, avisé et sympathique, n'ayant en vue que la saine évolution de la société indigène.

Appliqué dans ces limites et sous ces conditions, le droit nkundó peut redresser beaucoup de torts et aider à sauver la société indigène de l'abîme où elle menace de sombrer. Malgré ses défauts et ses imperfections, il est préférable, non seulement au système de liberté (ou de libertinage) qui a régné de longues années, mais aussi à une législation nouvelle qui émanerait du pouvoir européen, système très lent et complexe (la loi contre l'adultère réclamée depuis des décades est toujours restée dans le domaine des études et des projets), manquant de flexibilité et de puissance d'adaptation aux circonstances si diverses des peuplades congolaises. Une loi n'est nécessaire que pour les personnes qui ne tombent pas sous la compétence des juridictions indigènes, et cela pour sauvegarder l'harmonie et l'impartialité dans l'exercice de la justice, puisque la société indigène en subit nécessairement le contre-coup.

ARTICLE VIII. — RELATIONS PERMISES A L'ÉPOUSE.

Dans cet article, nous examinons les relations qu'une épouse peut se permettre — sous certaines conditions — avec diverses personnes. Notre droit les traiterait d'adultères. Mais la loi nkundó ne les considère pas comme telles. D'où la distinction entre cet article et le précédent. Ces relations peuvent être : 1° transitoires; 2° permanentes (concubinage).

§ 1. Relations transitoires.

Avec les compagnons d'âge (baníngá, sing. boníngá) du mari, les relations sexuelles sont permises (1). Si en voyage ils viennent l'un chez l'autre, l'hôte prête au visiteur ses épouses, en lui disant : « Voici ta maison, voici tes femmes ». S'il est monogame, il laisse le visiteur disposer de sa maison et de sa conjointe et s'en va seul coucher ailleurs. Si une femme en voyage arrive dans le village d'un compagnon d'âge de son mari, dès que celui-ci en prend connaissance, il l'invite à loger chez lui pendant tout le temps de son séjour. A l'adieu, il lui remet un cadeau pour son époux, « avec les compliments du boníngá ». Pendant le temps de la visite de l'un à l'autre il y a souvent échange de femmes.

Voilà la pratique d'une sérieuse et bonne entente entre compagnons d'âge. L'usage des femmes est libre et ne peut être l'objet de réclamation ni d'amendes. Si l'un d'eux est, à la façon indigène, plus « avare », l'autre ne peut non plus lui faire de palabres. Mais cela produira un refroidissement dans la cordialité de leurs relations et la réciprocité du refus.

---

(1) Cfr. chap. I, 1e partie, art. III.

Entre compagnons d'âge on n'exige pas d'indemnité, parce que il ne sied pas que l'un s'enrichisse aux dépens de l'autre. Cela vaut même pour des relations « privées », pour le simple « appel », sans qu'il y ait eu prêt, comme décrit. Mais si l'un d'eux exagère, c'est-à-dire s'il use de la femme deux ou trois fois sans que l'autre fasse de même, une palabre peut surgir. Le mari se croit lésé et exige l'indemnité réglementaire. Si son compagnon refuse en invoquant la nature des relations qui les unit, il peut recevoir une réponse comme celle-ci : « iningá átswẽngela ndé baálí é ? = est-ce que la relation de compagnons d'âge nous fait acquérir des épouses ? » Une bataille en règle peut s'ensuivre, et devant le tribunal c'est le mari qui obtient gain de cause.

Il n'existe pas de relations permises entre un homme et une femme compagnons d'âge. Ce serait un adultère caractérisé.

Les relations entre un homme et l'épouse de son compagnon d'âge ne sont donc pas permises en elles-mêmes, mais de par la volonté du mari. En outre, celui-ci n'est pas strictement obligé de céder sa femme. C'est une question de bonne amitié, d'entente, de prestation de service, de respect et d'affection mutuels. Au point de vue strictement matrimonial, c'est un terrain neutre, libre; puisque, disent-ils, il s'agit de relations purement privées entre eux, chacun fait comme bon lui semble.

A côté du boningá, le Nkundó connaît le boseka = amitié, ami (bokandeko chez les Bombwanja) (¹). Le pacte d'amitié n'a rien à voir avec les épouses, contrairement à ce qui se pratique entre compagnons d'âge. Si l'amitié entre les deux est très forte, il se peut bien que l'un prête sa femme dans l'une ou l'autre circonstance. Mais le cas est plutôt rare. Le boseka, disent les Nkundó, est uniquement pour l'entr'aide.

---

(¹) Cfr. chap. I, 1ᵉ partie, art. III.

Si un cas d'adultère se présente, le mari exige, en tout droit, une indemnité que, pourtant, à cause de leur amitié et pourvu que le cas demeure isolé, il n'exagère jamais et souvent réduit à 2-3 anneaux. Si les cas se répètent sans réciprocité, le mari en fait souvent une grosse affaire : il exige une indemnité élevée et rompt le pacte d'amitié.

Au lieu d'exiger une indemnité, certains hommes donnent à l'ami un cadeau (mpǫ́lí), en le priant de cesser les relations coupables. Souvent, ce n'est qu'un détour pour endormir la vigilance de l'autre, qui, se croyant plus libre, se fera pincer d'autant mieux.

Quant aux homonymes (ndoí, pl. bandoí) (¹) il n'y a pas d'usage libre de la femme, ni ne sont jamais considérés comme ndoí des personnes de sexe différent. Ce serait le concubinage ou l'adultère pur et simple.

En résumé, une certaine liberté de l'usage des épouses existe entre les compagnons d'âge; mais elle est sujette au consentement exprimé ou tacite des maris respectifs. Ces relations ne sont pas qualifiées d'adultères. Cette liberté n'existe pas à l'égard des autres catégories de personnes, qu'il fallait pourtant mentionner ici, à cause de l'erreur éventuelle qu'une certaine analogie entre leurs rapports mutuels pourrait provoquer dans l'esprit du lecteur, et encore parce que, dans certaines régions du Congo, ces personnes se trouvent — pour ce qui concerne notre sujet — dans la situation des compagnons d'âge chez les Nkundó.

§ 2. Concubinage.

Le concubinage (linsámbá chez les Bokote, isǫkę chez les Bombwanja, comme chez les Ekonda) est une union

---

(¹) Cfr. chap. I, 1e partie, art. III.

légitime, réglementée, officiellement reconnue et admise entre un homme et la femme d'autrui. Ce n'est pas un mariage : il n'y a pas de dot, ni de témoins autres que la femme elle-même; l'épouse n'appartient pas au mari secondaire, et en cas de rupture il n'y a pas de restitution des valeurs payées, si nombreuses soient-elles. L'homme qui achète ainsi le droit de cohabiter avec l'épouse d'autrui le fait par pauvreté : il n'a pas de quoi verser une dot pour cette femme ou pour une autre. Aussi est-il en butte au dédain et aux railleries de ses congénères. Le mari et l'amant vivent d'une certaine vie commune; ils se remettent des cadeaux, de la nourriture, s'entr'aident, mangent ensemble, se nomment bakalé, du même nom que se donnent entre elles les femmes d'un polygame.

Ce concubinage peut durer plus ou moins longtemps. D'ordinaire il est difficile à rompre, car le mari légitime prend cette rupture de mauvaise part, la considère comme une injustice. S'il est très riche et influent, elle est dangereuse pour le partenaire : il aura à tenir compte du courroux du mari. Aussi, autrefois, cette sorte d'union pouvait persister pendant de longues années (on la nomme alors ẹkọ́kọ́), jusqu'à ce que le « concubinaire » (bonsámbá, pl. bansámbá) ait assez de fortune pour s'en libérer. Souvent elle durait toute la vie, le partenaire allant s'établir dans le loánjá (emplacement occupé par un homme avec ses femmes) du mari (linsámbá jă njeléngwá, enjwáki): ainsi il devenait comme son enfant. Actuellement, la liberté introduite par la colonisation ainsi que la possibilité plus grande d'acquérir des richesses font beaucoup diminuer cette coutume. Preuve que cette situation n'est pas idéale, même aux yeux de l'indigène, et qu'elle n'est qu'un pis-aller dû à l'état de la distribution des richesses.

Un homme qui désire vivre en concubinage avec l'épouse d'autrui, après quelques relations secrètes avec elle, rend la chose publique. A cet effet, il donne à la femme un couteau, ou quelques bakonga à remettre à son mari. Ou bien lui-même convoque l'assemblée des patriarches et devant eux paie à l'époux. Rendre ainsi le concubinage public s'appelle ója linsámbá = faire sortir le concubinage (intrans. : óla) ou ieja (iela) linsámbá = faire venir au clair, rendre public.

Le paiement pour obtenir droit au concubinage s'appelle lọnyọ́ọ́ngu, quoiqu'il soit aussi désigné simplement par le terme de linsámbá (isọkẹ). Pour marquer son accord, le mari fait remettre au partenaire un chien, ou quelques poules (2, 3, 5 et plus, d'après sa richesse ou sa satisfaction). L'intermédiaire est non la femme en question, mais une de ses coépouses. Jamais non plus un enfant du mari n'est chargé de cet office. Ensuite, les deux partenaires continuent à se remettre régulièrement des cadeaux. Ceux du mari portent tous le nom de botúmo (terme générique donné à tout présent fait par une femme à son amant), tandis que ceux de l'autre sont désignés par le terme, aussi générique, de mpató = envoi, cadeau envoyé.

Souvent la femme presse elle-même l'amant de rendre leur concubinage public, parce qu'elle désire régulariser la situation, dont elle redoute les conséquences possibles. Parfois elle menace de rompre toute relation; mais d'ordinaire elle succombe malgré cela à la tentation.

Dès que le concubinage est rendu public de la façon décrite, il est du fait même légitimé. L'expression employée pour contracter une union pareille est kọta linsámbá.

Si l'amant officiel prend la femme en flagrant délit d'adultère, il ne le dénonce pas au mari, mais exige personnellement une indemnité comme s'il était lui-même l'époux légitime. Si le coupable refuse le paiement, l'amant, rompant les relations avec la femme, le dénonce au mari. De sorte que dans n'importe quel cas l'adultère se trouve puni. Et de son point de vue il est préférable de payer au bonsámbá, qui se contente d'une indemnité moins élevée.

Comme la femme n'appartient pas à l'amant, celui-ci n'a aucun droit aux produits de son industrie ni aux enfants. Ces derniers sont considérés comme enfants du mari. Mais le partenaire a droit à ce que la femme lui prépare la nourriture. L'époux, de son côté, a droit à l'aide de la part de son partenaire. La situation sociale est donc tout en faveur du premier. L'amant y gagnait seulement de pouvoir jouir d'une femme qu'il n'aurait pu obtenir autrement. Pourtant, le respect dû au mari légitime défend d'user librement de la femme pendant sa présence au village. Certains hommes sont sévères sur ce point, tandis que d'autres sont plus tolérants. La tactique de ces derniers est évidemment la plus fine. Plus il laisse de liberté à l'amant de son épouse, plus grande est la chance que d'autres femmes, préférant à leur mari un jeune homme qu'elles affectionnent ardemment, demandent au polygame de les épouser. Un homme assez riche et influent peut ainsi se constituer un harem, dont il ne profite pas physiquement, mais qui lui assure une position sociale prépondérante.

Cette coutume n'existe pratiquement que dans la polygamie. Les cas peuvent toutefois se présenter également chez des monogames. Et dans les tribus plus « civilisées », comme les riverains du Bas, une tendance se dessine dans ce sens.

La demande en concubinage par un parent du mari n'est pas assimilable au cas que nous venons d'examiner. Il est plutôt apparenté à la demande d'une femme héritée. (Cfr. chap. III, art. II.) La différence saute aux yeux. La seule chose qu'ils ont de commun est la cohabitation légitime avec l'épouse d'autrui. On n'a qu'à les comparer entre eux pour s'en apercevoir immédiatement.

ARTICLE IX.

ROLE DE LA FAMILLE DANS LE MARIAGE.

Nous avons trouvé des cas où la femme est considérée et traitée, dans une certaine mesure, comme épouse non seulement du mari, mais encore de certains parents à lui (art. VI). D'autre part, au chapitre II, nous avons vu la grande part que les familles prennent dans l'engagement et la continuation du mariage de leurs enfants. La question de l'héritage des femmes nous a montré que la proche parenté du défunt a des droits sur la veuve : l'un d'eux peut l'épouser sans obligations envers l'héritier principal, la nouvelle union n'étant pas un nouveau mariage, mais la continuation du mariage préexistant et non rompu malgré le décès du premier mari. (chap. III, art. II). Une constatation analogue a été faite pour le remplacement (chap. III, art. IV).

Tout cela nous amène à poser la question : Dans quelle mesure peut-on dire que la famille a sur l'épouse des droits communs? Voici la réponse qui me semble conforme à la réalité :

La femme s'acquiert par versement de valeurs. Ces valeurs appartiennent en premier lieu et principalement à celui qui les a obtenues, soit par le mariage de sa fille ou sœur, soit par son activité individuelle. Dans cette dernière éventualité, le mari a sur l'épouse des droits plus stricts et plus personnels. Dans l'autre, plus la parenté est proche avec la femme qui, par son mariage, a fourni la dot, plus forts aussi sont les droits sur l'épouse. Pourtant, à raison des liens de parenté qui les unissent au mari comme descendant tous du même ancêtre et par là participant tous, dans une plus ou moins grande mesure, aux devoirs et droits de l'entité morale basée sur la communauté de sang, d'autres membres de la famille ont subsidiairement des droits proportionnels sur la femme.

La raison de cette participation aux droits du mari est située dans le caractère économique du contrat matrimonial, d'une part, et de l'autre, dans la solidarité clanique et familiale.

C'est pourquoi le mariage persiste nonobstant le décès. Au point de vue personnel, il est rompu, — la femme, par exemple, devenant ensuite épouse légitime d'un autre individu, ce qui ne pourrait se faire durant le premier mariage; — mais du point de vue financier et social il continue d'exister. De même pour ce qui est du remplacement. Quant aux relations permises au frère puîné avec la femme de son aîné, elles ne le sont que dans certaines conditions bien déterminées et limitées. Ce qui prouve qu'on ne peut le nommer mari que tout à fait improprement. Cette femme n'a pas deux maris; elle n'en a qu'un seul : le frère aîné. Les relations permises ne le sont pas au point de vue du lien personnel, mais uniquement à cause de la communauté d'intérêts financiers entre les frères et par pitié pour le cadet célibataire.

Somme toute, et malgré tout, la femme n'a qu'un seul mari. Compte tenu des explications données et de la description des formalités et des degrés de l'intervention que certains peuvent se permettre dans le ménage de leur parent, il appert qu'au fond les droits du mari sur son épouse sont personnels et exclusifs, et cela nonobstant la faculté qui lui est reconnue de les céder à d'autres.

CHAPITRE VII.

LA POLYGAMIE.

Sauf pour certains cas qui ont avec elle une vague ressemblance et que nous avons étudiés au chapitre précédent, les Nkundó ne connaissent pas la polyandrie. La polygamie dont nous traitons ici doit donc s'entendre de la polygynie. Elle est la règle courante. La monogamie existe de fait, mais — à quelque exception rarissime près — elle n'est pas volontaire. Dès que le monogame a les moyens de s'acquérir des femmes supplémentaires, il ne manque pas de profiter de l'occasion. Nonobstant tous les nombreux dictons critiquant la difficulté de vivre en paix avec plusieurs épouses, les Nkundó cherchent malgré tout à se constituer un harem (sémbola ndǫngǫ́, umba ndǫngǫ́ = aligner un harem, abattre un harem).

La grande polygamie, « à lopango », est inconnue. Il serait intéressant de voir publier les statistiques gouvernementales sur le nombre proportionnel des polygames et des femmes composant leurs harems. Pour autant qu'on peut s'en rendre compte à la simple vue, les bigames sont nombreux. Une dizaine de femmes est déjà une grande quantité.

Des femmes constituant le harem seules ont un nom spécial : la première (bomátsa), la favorite (nkóndé) et la femme de rang (bolúmbú), auxquelles on peut ajouter la catégorie des bibísa. Les autres sont tout simplement appelées baálí = épouses.

ARTICLE I. — LA BOMATSA.

La bomátsa est la première femme que le polygame a épousée. Elle est la maîtresse de maison. Le soin et la surveillance du loánjá (emplacement avec cases et annexes) lui incombent. C'est chez elle que le mari dépose le gibier, les régimes de fruits de palme et qu'il les partage. En l'absence du mari, c'est à elle que revient le droit et le devoir de partager tout. Elle règle les différends qui surgissent entre les femmes pendant l'absence du mari. S'il est parti seul et tarde à rentrer, elle lui envoie l'une ou l'autre des femmes pour prendre soin de lui et lui servir de compagne. Enfin, elle doit chercher à augmenter le nombre et l'importance du harem.

La bomátsa prend sa besogne à cœur. Car la gloire du mari est sa gloire à elle. Malgré la présence d'une favorite, la bomátsa est consciente de son rôle, qui est moins celui de l'épouse, au sens sexuel du mot, que celui de l'épouse mère de famille; il est d'un ordre plus élevé que celui des autres femmes : il est plus sérieux, plus désintéressé, basé sur un amour plus profond et sur une volonté plus réfléchie; il l'autorise, d'après la mentalité indigène, à une légitime fierté; il est un honneur, tandis que la situation de favorite est plutôt un objet de vanité. Aussi aime-t-elle à faire montre de son importance.

Il peut nous paraître étrange que la bomátsa travaille avec cœur à augmenter le nombre des femmes du harem. Mais pour les Nkundó, cela est tout naturel. C'est un titre de gloire, et depuis sa jeunesse elle a été éduquée dans cet esprit. Après les premières ardeurs, son affection devient plus grave. Elle se fait parfaite matrone à la romaine. Tout en conservant des rapports avec son mari et s'occupant du soin de ses enfants, elle s'adonne surtout à ses devoirs de maîtresse de toute la famille. Son mari l'aime d'un sentiment plus profond et plus raisonné que celui qu'il témoigne à ses autres épouses. Il ne cesse de lui marquer son attachement et sa considération. Si elle est stérile, il lui donne souvent un enfant de sa famille ou d'une autre femme qui l'a quitté, pour qu'elle l'éduque comme si c'était le sien propre.

La maison de la bomátsa est située à l'extrémité droite de la rangée des cases des épouses. Elle mérite cet emplacement à raison de sa fonction de « bomóngó loánjá » = propriétaire, maîtresse de l'agglomération du polygame. Comme disent les Nkundó, « ébéla loánjá » = elle étire, elle étend le groupe des habitations du mari, pour l'agrandir.

Le mari polygame n'entreprend rien d'important (création d'une bolámbú ou nkóndé, acquisition de nouvelles épouses, etc.), sans consulter au préalable la bomátsa. Il la respecte et la traite avec déférence, comme si elle était sa mère, disent nos gens.

Parmi toutes les épouses du polygame, la bomátsa seule joue un rôle dans l'acceptation de la pratique de magie offensive et défensive des Nkundó, nommée yoli. Elle seule prend part aux cérémonies qui l'accompagnent : avec son mari elle mange la moitié de la poule tuée à cet effet; et cette nuit-là, elle seule peut partager sa couche. Enfin, ce n'est qu'avec elle seule, à l'exclusion des coépouses, que le mari peut manger le poisson węngę́ et c'est encore elle qui doit et peut seule en brûler les restes. Sinon la pratique se retournerait contre son possesseur.

Au partage d'une pièce de gibier, la bomátsa a droit au lintála (partie inférieure de la poitrine), qui, si l'homme était célibataire reviendrait à sa mère (ou à la femme de son père ou de son frère aîné).

En son absence, la bomátsa est remplacée par son ebísa (cfr., plus loin, art. IV), sinon par la femme qui la suit en ancienneté. A sa mort, sa succession est réglée de la même façon.

Le nom de bomátsa dérive probablement du radical mátsa = débuter. C'est elle qui a fondé la famille. Parfois on la nomme aussi ikókóyǒnjemba = littéralement: amour de célibataire. Les Bombwanja disent itókóyǒnjemba (les Ekonda : nkámukǫlǫ).

A côté de la bomatsa on entend parfois parler de bomátsa w'láli=bomátsa de gauche, à laquelle, alors, la bomátsa au sens propre est opposée comme bomátsa w'ilóme (=de droite). La bomátsa de gauche est la deuxième femme du polygame. Elle est ainsi dénommée parce que sa maison se trouve à l'extrémité gauche du loánjá. Pourtant, elle n'a aucun devoir ni droit spécial, sinon celui de surveiller cette partie par délégation de la bomátsa proprement dite. Si le harem est nombreux, il arrive que le mari lui réserve sa part propre du gibier : l'itómbantáta ou nuque, qui, à son défaut, revient à la fille aînée.

ARTICLE II. — LA FAVORITE.

Tout polygame un peu important a son épouse favorite ou nkóndé. Mais il n'y a que les riches et les notables qui ont une nkóndé véritable. Les petits polygames imitent bien les autres (nkóndé éá węǫ́lí ou éá itsió=sans grande importance), mais le font sans grandes cérémonies, parce qu'ils ne possèdent pas la richesse nécessaire.

La bomátsa n'est jamais nkóndé. Mais avant de créer nkóndé une de ses femmes, le mari doit d'abord demander le conseil et l'approbation de la bomátsa. A cet effet, il lui offre un bompángá (chien, chèvre, anneaux), par lequel il reconnaît son droit et son autorité, et par là même se la rend propice. Si la bomátsa n'est pas d'accord, l'affaire ne se poursuit pas. Mais ce n'est qu'une hypothèse. En pratique, la bomátsa s'incline devant les préférences du mari, puisqu'il a reconnu ses droits en due forme.

Pour la création d'une nkóndé, le mari, ayant achevé tous les préparatifs, brassé la bière de canne à sucre et réuni les richesses destinées à être distribuées à l'assemblée, invite les villages environnants et convoque sa parenté. Au jour convenu, l'assemblée étant réunie, l'élue met ses plus beaux vêtements et s'orne de ses plus riches parures. Elle s'assied devant le public sur un somptueux boánga (couchette transportable) ([1]). Le mari annonce à l'assemblée que cette femme sera désormais sa préférée : malheur à l'homme qui aura la témérité de la séduire, voire de lui marquer de l'affection; il sera un homme mort (ou il devra payer une indemnité énorme : 25-50 bakonga). Autrefois il arrivait fréquemment que le séducteur était tué sans autre forme de procès, ou réduit en esclavage. Après paiement à la famille de la femme de 25 anneaux et davantage et la distribution de cadeaux aux patriarches réunis, l'assemblée ratifie ses paroles, et désormais le contrat est passé entre lui et eux. Suivent les danses, les chants et la boisson.

La favorite n'a pas d'accoutrement spécial. Elle porte les vêtements communs à toutes les femmes et ne met de fourrures qu'aux danses.

Elle ne fait pas de cultures, ni ne s'occupe de la cuisine. Elle a toujours une ebisa à son service. Si la famille n'a aucun membre à lui céder, elle emprunte une ebisa à un parent éloigné ou ami.

En voyage la nkóndé ne va pas à pied. Elle est portée dans un hamac (filet de chasse). Son mari, pourtant, l'accompagne à pied. Cela ne se faisait pourtant que pour la véritable nkóndé d'un homme riche. Actuellement, cette coutume disparaît.

La favorite ne peut pas se séparer de son mari, pas même pour aller voir ses parents. Certains hommes en étaient tellement jaloux autrefois, qu'ils ne lui permettaient même pas de satisfaire ses besoins les plus secrets sans qu'eux-mêmes ou une sentinelle (généralement un Bọtswá) ne montassent la garde. Un homme ne pouvait même pas s'aventurer dans la proximité de sa case, qui est construite juste derrière le hangar du mari; car celui-ci, complaisant parfois pour les passions de ses autres femmes, montre toujours une jalousie intransigeante lorsqu'il s'agit de sa préférée. Jamais il ne va en voyage sans être accompagné d'elle.

---

[1] Voir un excellent dessin dans ENGELS, Les Wangata (REVUE CONGOLAISE, vol. I, n° 4, p. 483, 1910).

A la favorite revient l'honneur de rendre à son mari les menus services de toilette : elle lui tond les cheveux, l'aide à l'épilation, lui gratte les pustules de teignes ou de bourbouille, l'enduit d'huile, le farde de ngóla, en un mot, lui administre tous les soins de beauté et d'hygiène.

Par amour pour sa préférée, le mari peut acheter son cadavre au prix d'un esclave (en nature ou en argent). De ce fait il a droit à ce que le cadavre soit enterré à côté du sien propre, contrairement à ce qui se passe pour les autres femmes, qui doivent être enterrées dans leur clan natal. C'est pourquoi, dans certaines régions, le mari l'appelle son ikundaka (de kunda=enterrer). Il peut pourtant arriver que, le mari étant mort avant elle, les héritiers ne se soucient plus beaucoup de son désir et n'exigent plus l'inhumation de la favorite sur leur cimetière. Tel le cas arrivé à Bongóla de Bongíli, pour laquelle ce droit avait été payé par son mari Ikilinganya de Bongangá (Boéndé) pour le prix de deux esclaves. Lorsque le mari a tué du gros gibier, la préférée a, comme la bomátsa, le privilège de recevoir une part personnelle et déterminée (boando); la sienne est le cou ou une côtelette, portion qui, à son défaut, reviendrait aux fils ou à leurs épouses. Les autres femmes n'ont pas le même droit, et n'obtiennent chacune qu'un morceau ordinaire (liondo).

La favorite est donc en tout l'objet des préférences du mari. Avec elle il partage tous les cadeaux qu'il reçoit, tandis que les autres femmes sont exclues de cette libéralité. Mais pour les rapports sexuels, en dehors des voyages, il se doit à toutes. Le plus qu'il puisse faire, est d'ajouter une nuit au nombre commun. (Cfr. infra.)

Les coépouses s'accommodent assez bien de ce régime préférentiel. Cela n'empêche que, entre elles, les médisances sont fréquentes sur son compte. Il se peut aussi que l'une ou l'autre soit jalouse au point de ne pouvoir la supporter. Les marques de son dépit se multipliant, le divorce finira par se produire.

La nkóndé n'est tenu au deuil que pour son mari. Encore, n'enlève-t-elle pas ses vêtements. Ni pour ses parents, ni pour ses propres enfants elle n'est tenue aux prescriptions du deuil.

Comme les autres femmes, la favorite est transmise par héritage. Seulement elle ne peut être prise en bosóló que par le frère aîné du défunt.

Nkóndé est le terme spécifique pour la favorite. Son étymologie m'est inconnue. Le mot est employé partout. Pourtant les Injọlọ disent beaucoup lokílo (étymologie également obscure). Un autre nom, moins commun (plus ancien ?), mais connu des Bonkoso, Bongíli, Wàngatá, Bakáala, est bongilí ou bongijí (¹). Outre le terme d'ikundaka, déjà cité, on parle aussi d'ebéléké, terme générique signifiant : préférence, prédilection, et appliqué à un enfant, un esclave, un objet dont on ne veut pas se défaire. Elle est encore nommée áfókítámé=intouchable, parce que les autres hommes ne peuvent pas avoir de rapports avec elle.

Au nom de nkóndé on ajoute parfois des déterminatifs, comme éá boánga=allusion au boánga sur lequel elle s'est assise pendant la cérémonie de création; et éá kọnjọ =véritable. Ces termes sont employés par opposition à une nkóndé éá wẹólí, établie sans cérémonie spéciale, par imitation de la véritable favorite reconnue officiellement.

L'expression pour « faire une nkóndé » est ója nkóndé = faire sortir, parce qu'on la proclame telle devant l'assemblée publique. Actuellement on entend beaucoup téna nkóndé, terme qui est très probablement transféré de la botámbá. (Cfr. art. suivant.)

(¹) Les Ekonda la nomment bokólo. Les Elángá de Losanganya disent bofíí, nom qui est porté par certaines femmes chez les Nkundó d'Entre-Jwalé-Boloko. Serait-ce là encore un nom ancien ?

ARTICLE III. — LA BOLUMBU.

Le polygame qui, par sa naissance ou par son influence, est reconnu le primus inter pares d'un groupe de clans, celui qui, pour employer le terme nkundó, est le jọkọ j'èsé (1), a le droit exclusif de constituer bolúmbú une de ses femmes. Ce n'est donc pas, comme pour la favorite, une question de richesse et de préférences, mais un signe d'influence et d'autorité.

A ce sujet, voici un épisode historique où une atteinte à cette loi a entraîné une punition mystérieuse, interprétée par les indigènes comme une intervention d'outre-tombe pour protéger l'ordre ancestral. La chose se passa à Bẹsọmbọ́ (Bombwanja), dans la famille Bongilá. Bọnkọsọ w'Ikumwa avait épousé la femme Eyeke de Bokúma et en avait eu son fils aîné Ikunjwèkulu (2). Mais avant son mariage avec Bọnkọsọ, Eyeke avant déjà donné la vie à un autre garçon, Mbéo, qu'elle apporta avec elle « dans la bandoulière » (3). Plus tard, Mbéo acquit beaucoup de richesses et se constitua un harem nombreux. Voulant faire ostentation de sa position importante, il décida de créer bolúmbú une de ses femmes. Là-dessus, colère de son frère utérin Ikunjwèkulu, qui convoqua les trois autres chefs de familles de Bẹsọmbọ́ : Elongama éà Longómbá, de Bokenda; Embọmbọ́, d'Ikolé, et Esola, de Befósola. Il leur dit : Venez voir la chose extraordinaire et étonnante qui se passe. Mbéo est venu avec ma mère dans la bandoulière. Dès lors, comment ose-t-il créer des belúmbú ? Ils examinèrent les faits et en furent très courroucés. Ils convoquèrent en assemblée les chefs de famille de tous les villages environnants, pour leur exposer le cas. Assis sous l'arbre des délibérations, tous les hommes attendirent longtemps l'arrivée de Mbéo. Comme il tarda par trop à paraître, on envoya une de ses femmes le prier de se hâter. Elle le trouva mort, tout raidi déjà.

---

(1) Actuellement on dirait le chef. Mais en réalité il n'était pas chef, mais simplement le plus respecté et le plus influent dans l'oligarchie des patriarches de clans, qui était le régime politique des Nkundó, avec de temps à autre une personnalité éminente qui s'imposait.

(2) Cfr. sa généalogie au chap. III, art. II. Un arrière-petit-fils de cet Ikunjwèkulu a, j'estime, environ 50 ans.

(3) Cfr. chap. I, 2e partie, art. IV, § 3.

La création d'une bolúmbú se fait longtemps après celle de la favorite, car ce n'est qu'à un âge déjà passablement avancé que le polygame peut conquérir la position sociale voulue.

Le choix de la bolúmbú n'est pas une question d'amour préférentiel. Il ne s'agit pas de relations à l'intérieur du harem, mais de l'affirmation de l'importance sociale du mari. Généralement, celui-ci choisit une femme appartenant à un clan influent et qui est un modèle de vie conjugale et de savoir-vivre. Elle est bien l'objet de sa part d'une affection particulière, mais non d'un amour de préférence. Notons encore que jamais la bomátsa ne peut devenir bolúmbú, mais elle doit être consultée et son avis est décisif. Aussi, est-ce fréquemment sa propre ebísa qui est choisie comme bolúmbú.

Au jour indiqué pour la constitution de la bolúmbú, il y a grande fête. Tous les clans et villages voisins invités se réunissent chez le polygame en question. Il leur présente la femme et harangue l'assemblée : « Voici la femme dont je veux faire ma bolúmbú comme je vous l'ai déjà annoncé. Aujourd'hui je rends publique la décision que j'ai prise depuis longtemps. Sachez tous qu'aucun homme ne peut la toucher, sinon il sera gravement puni ». Puis deux femmes (rarement deux hommes) la tiennent et le mari lui délie la ceinture et lui arrache tous les vêtements. Ensuite les assistantes lui lient une corde ou la ceignent d'une ceinture de peau de mpangá (antilope rayée), à laquelle elles attachent diverses fourrures de valeur. Désormais, jusqu'à sa mort, elle ne pourra plus mettre d'habits (bitóo) comme les autres femmes; elle ira toujours vêtue de fourrures. D'où son nom : bolúmbú wă bikótó = bolúmbú aux fourrures. Puis le mari lui présente des pots d'huile de palme avec laquelle elle devra s'enduire. Deux hommes s'approchent, choisis parmi les plus beaux du village (1) (mariés ou célibataires), richement ornés de fourrures, de ceintures de mpangá, de perles, d'étoffes en raphia aux bords dentelés, d'anneaux de cuivre aux chevilles, etc.; ils la conduisent, en cadençant le pas, dans la maison qui lui est destinée, et qui est entourée d'une enceinte de pieux de bọfẹkọ (Ricinodendron africanum), fermée au moyen de palmes. Cette case avec enclos s'appelle ilẹkẹ.

C'est là que la bolúmbú va résider pendant des mois et des années (jusqu'à trois et plus, dit-on). Elle y est pour ainsi dire recluse (-ulama) et ne peut en sortir. Si elle doit se rendre dans la bananeraie pour ses besoins intimes, elle se couvre et s'entoure d'une natte, pour n'être aperçue de personne. Dans cette maison, elle vit en compagnie de son ebísa, de ses filles, de quelques parentes, ou encore d'une autre femme de son mari, qui doivent la servir, lui préparer les aliments, etc., et qui, elles, sortent et entrent librement. Le mari, lui aussi, entre à son gré et passe avec elle les nuits réglementaires. Aucun autre homme n'est admis à franchir l'enceinte.

Pendant sa réclusion, la bolúmbú ne peut faire le moindre travail. Elle ne se lave pas à l'eau, mais uniquement à l'huile de palme. Elle ne marche que sur des nattes. Elle est encore dispensée du deuil pour ses parents. (Comparez au chap. I, Iᵉ partie, art. II.)

Le terme de la réclusion touchant à sa fin, le mari annonce la fête de sortie. Il y a des réjouissances, danses et boisson. Des nattes ont été étendues depuis la porte de la case de réclusion jusqu'en pleine rue. Les deux hommes qui l'y ont introduite viennent à nouveau la prendre par le bras à l'entrée de l'enceinte et la conduisent sur les nattes. La cérémonie se termine ainsi sans autres ajoutes.

---

(1) Donc parents du mari. La loi nkundó veut qu'aucun étranger n'exerce une fonction quelque peu importante, pas même celle d'imposer silence à une assemblée; selon le dicton : bofaya áfọtẹlẹ lokánga = un étranger ne dépièce pas une pintade.

Dorénavant, la bolúmbú est libre et fait comme toute autre femme, excepté pour le port des fourrures. Elle peut travailler, puiser l'eau, faire la cuisine, aller en voyage, visiter ses parents, etc. Mais le mari doit à son honneur et à sa réputation d'homme riche de donner à sa bolúmbú un ou plusieurs esclaves, ou Batswa, ou, plus souvent, une ou deux bibísa, qui devront s'occuper de ses travaux domestiques et ainsi en libérer la princesse.

L'adultère avec elle — après la réclusion — n'est pas plus sévèrement puni que la méconduite avec une femme ordinaire, pour ce qui regarde l'indemnité à payer. Mais l'outrage est considéré comme extrêmement grave, moins comme lésion du droit marital, que comme atteinte à l'honneur de tout le clan ou groupe de clans en cause. Aussi, alors que l'adultère d'une nkóndé, par exemple, est chose privée, excitant la jalousie et le courroux du mari, la méconduite avec une bolúmbú est une offense publique, qui met en fureur tout le clan — car il s'en estime attaqué dans son honneur — et pousse solidairement tous les membres à tirer vengeance de cet outrage (nkęlę elekí éy' olúmbú). C'était donc une sorte de déshonneur national. Entre autres, cette constatation caractérise nettement la grande différence qui existe entre la favorite et la bolúmbú.

Une coutume à mentionner à ce propos est la suivante : si un homme quelconque, même étranger, même venant de très loin, vient avec son elefó (¹) frapper, par-dessus l'enceinte, le toit de l'ilękę de réclusion d'une bolúmbú, en signe d'appel à la guerre, le village entier est obligé de prendre les armes pour le défendre. Tous les hommes l'accompagnent et s'unissent à sa famille contre le clan ennemi, quelle que soit la distance. Les Nkundó disent que le fait de toucher à la case de la bolúmbú met tout le clan en fureur : cet outrage leur fait prendre les armes sans hésitation (¹).

---

(¹) Sonnette en bois. (Cfr. Congo, 1935, t. II, p. 366, f. 4 et 5.)

Une dernière preuve du caractère social de cette institution est que la bolúmbú a le droit de siéger à côté de son mari dans les assemblées publiques et aux fêtes, prérogative qu'elle possède à l'exclusion de toute autre femme. Elle a avec elle un garçon ou une fille qui lui sert de boy et porte pour elle le siège (boánga) sur lequel elle s'assied.

A la mort de la bolúmbú, le mari peut la remplacer par une autre. Il répète alors la cérémonie décrite. C'est ce qu'on nomme : sangoja bolúmbú = faire succéder au titre de bolúmbú.

Comme nous l'avons vu au chapitre I, 1re partie, article II, un homme peut constituer bolúmbú même sa fille.

Le nom de bolúmbú paraît provenir de la nudité dans laquelle la femme est mise un instant lors de la cérémonie de son installation. Ce mot, en effet, signifie nudité dans certains dialectes.

Ce même nom est maintenant très communément porté par des femmes nkundó (rarement des hommes), sans que pour cela elles soient bolúmbú. C'est en souvenir d'aïeules ou parentes qui l'ont été, et ainsi ce nom se transmet dans la famille comme tout autre nom.

Toutes les tribus dont il est question ici emploient le même nom bolúmbú. Seuls les Bombomba disent boálé (²).

Après tout ce que nous venons de dire, il est clair que nkóndé et bolúmbú n'ont rien de commun entre elles.

(¹) Comparez le résultat et l'effet d'un grave outrage tout en faveur de l'offensant, à des cas analogues déjà vus antérieurement, par exemple, chap. III, art. VII; chap. VI, art. V, § 4, annexe; et plus loin : chap. VIII, art. II, § 3, n° 2.

(²) Ailleurs on nomme la bolúmbú : ekila (= défense, tabou), comme dans les tribus de la région de Losanganya, chez les Bosaka, etc.

Les deux institutions sont nettement différentes. Actuellement, pourtant, on commence à les confondre. C'est que l'installation de la bolúmbú est devenue extrêmement rare, et dans certaines régions elle a déjà disparu. Le Gouvernement de la colonie a constitué des chefferies et y préposé des chefs. Ceux-ci, très souvent, ne sont pas ceux qui, dans l'ordre purement indigène, auraient été les plus influents, les maîtres, ceux qui auraient eu le grand mot à dire dans la société, qu'on dit avoir le jọkọ, la première place.

Les autres tribus de l'Équateur connaissent aussi, pour autant que j'ai pu le constater, les deux sortes d'épouses à situation spéciale portant des noms qui varient selon les dialectes.

Les Ntómbá et Boléngé d'entre Boloko-Congo ne connaissent-ils que la bolúmbú? C'est la conclusion qui se dégage de l'étude d'Engels, sur les Wangata (Revue congolaise, II, n° 1, p. 33). S'il en était ainsi, les communications fréquentes avec cette population pourraient avoir encore aggravé la confusion. Des indigènes, étrangers à la tribu des Boléngé, mais qui y ont résidé de longues années comme catéchistes, m'ont pourtant prétendu que cette population distingue très bien la bolúmbú et la favorite. Ils ont même ajouté que, pour ce qui est des nkúḿ, ils ne jouissent d'aucun privilège dans ce domaine (1).

Lors d'une visite personnelle aux Boléngé-Ouest (en septembre 1933), j'ai appris qu'un homme d'une position spéciale pouvait avoir deux belúmbú : la bomátsa posant la candidature de son ebísa, et la seconde femme en faisant autant pour la sienne. Ainsi on avait bolúmbú w'Ilóme et bolúmbú w'láli (cette dernière prenant plus particulièrement le nom d'ekila). Je constatai aussi la distinction très nette qu'ils faisaient entre bolúmbú et nkóndé, tout comme les populations dont traite cette étude.

---

(1) L'institution des nkúḿ n'est pas fort répandue dans les tribus dont traite notre étude. (Cfr. Les Coutumes funéraires des Nkundó, dans ANTHROPOS) (sous presse).

Quant à la charge de messagère que lui attribue M. Engels (comme aussi le R. P. Kaptein, dans Congo, 1922, I, p. 532), elle n'appartient pas plus en propre à la bolúmbú qu'à n'importe quelle autre femme du harem : chacune d'elles peut être chargée d'une mission, sans distinction de rang ni de date du mariage. La seule coutume qui dans ce domaine existe chez les Boléngé-Ntómbá d'entre Congo-Boloko est la suivante : un homme influent envoyait parfois sa ou ses belúmbú arrêter une rixe, même une bataille entre deux villages. Elle représentait son mari dans sa qualité d'homme influent. Les deux partis antagonistes faisaient la trêve sur son intervention, en attendant l'arrivée et la décision du mari en personne.

ARTICLE IV. — L'EBÍSA.

L'ebísa est la femme prise comme épouse par le mari d'une de ses parentes : sœur, tante, cousine plus âgée. C'est celle-ci qui l'amène au mari. Elle est en même temps ndonga dans le versement de la dot, qui a lieu comme pour toute femme ordinaire. La locution est : X. aôlutela bokúné Y. ebísa = X. répète sa sœur Y. ebísa.

En cas d'absence ou après la mort de son aînée, l'ebísa la remplace ou lui succède dans tous ses droits dans le ménage.

L'aînée tient beaucoup à avoir son ebísa; cela la fait monter dans l'estime du mari, et elle-même se procure ainsi une aide dans ses travaux et une confidente sûre dans ses peines. L'ebísa elle-même a l'avantage de ne pas se trouver seule et délaissée au début de son mariage, mais de pouvoir compter sur une protectrice et une guide et, si son aînée occupe un rang privilégié dans le harem, d'avoir la certitude de participer à ses prérogatives et la perspective de lui succéder un jour.

Le terme d'ebísa est employé par les Nkundó d'Entre-Jwalé-Boloko et par les Ionda. Les Bombwanja la désignent sous le nom de loambwá ou loambyá. Les Boángí et les Injǫ́lǫ́ la nomment aussi loambyá (¹).

Ebísa peut être en connexion avec le radical bís, dont dérive le verbe bísingana=être uni. Loambwá ou loambyá dérive de bamb qui signifie : 1° être uni; 2° suivre (en ordre, en rang).

Ces noms indiquent la qualité de ce mariage qui ne procède pas de relations directes entre le mari et la femme, mais est constitué par l'intermédiaire d'un autre mariage précédent. Ou, pour l'exprimer en lonkundó : áfa liála j'ěndé móngó, áamana l'eóto mbamáná=ce n'est pas un mariage d'elle-même personnellement; elle s'attache à sa parente, la suit, dans son union matrimoniale.

Le nom d'ebísa, comme ses fonctions, peut être étendu improprement à une parente qu'une femme va chercher pour devenir l'épouse, non de son mari, mais d'un parent de celui-ci. Parfois elle est destinée même à un homme appartenant à un autre clan, allié, mais pour lequel l'interdit de mariage existe. Par exemple, Bolúmbú w'ŏfuwa de Elękę (Lokongo) qui chercha sa sœur Eengé pour Bompata w'ĭsęlęma, appartenant au clan de Befósola, qui fait partie, comme le clan de son mari (Bombénga), du même village Bẹsọmbọ́.

ARTICLE V. — FEMMES ESCLAVES.

Un polygame peut avoir dans son harem — du moins aux temps jadis — une ou plusieurs esclaves qu'il traite comme ses épouses. Ce sont des prisonnières de guerre, capturées par lui-même ou achetées à autrui ou reçues en bǫsǫ́ngǫ. D'ordinaire, aucune dot n'était payée pour elles et, partant, elles gardaient leur condition d'esclaves. Ce qui n'empêchait pas le mari de les aimer comme ses épouses réelles. Seulement, leurs rivales les respectaient moins et surtout, à l'occasion de querelles ou de disputes, leur rappelaient leur infériorité.

---

(¹) Les Bonyanga disent : mbambwá ou loambwá. Par respect ils la nomment parfois bongili, et la femme qui l'a cherchée : nyangôngili. (Cfr. aussi chap. II, art. X, et chap. VI, art. VI.) Les Ekonda la nomment bombúha ou bombúsa (mbúsa = dernier).

Depuis que l'esclavage a été aboli par la colonisation, beaucoup d'anciennes esclaves sont rentrées dans leurs familles respectives. D'autres, par contre, n'ont pas voulu profiter de la liberté octroyée et ont préféré demeurer fidèles. Le mari a payé alors pour elles la dot usuelle selon toutes les formalités. Encore dernièrement (1932) un homme de Belondó (Bǫnjǫku), Ifolí, a ainsi payé la dot de 63 bakonga à la famille de sa femme Àmbá, originaire de Bokukú (Boángí), ravie au début de l'occupation européenne, et qu'il avait héritée de Bakónongo des Baséká Mbangó (Bonkoso), grâce à l'intervention de son grand-oncle Mpętsí, qui avait payé pour lui sept anneaux de bompángá de nsăsangó, comme de coutume.

Une femme esclave peut être choisie comme favorite. Comme c'est une affaire de prédilection, rien ne s'y oppose. Il en est autrement du rang de bolúmbú : une esclave ne peut jamais l'obtenir, comme le montre clairement l'exposé de cette situation éminente. Des esclaves qui ont été créées nkóndé par leur mari, on cite entre autres : Bǫlǫ́ngę chez Bakengó bă Lǫkǫlí de Nseké; Bǫkę́tu chez Ekányaka éy'ondókó d'Etóontálé; Ntsimbo chez Bǫmbęngę́lá d'Etóontálé.

Lorsqu'il portait à l'esclave un amour tout spécial et qu'il en avait les moyens, le polygame la faisait affranchir et ensuite payait la dot réglementaire. Pour cela, l'intervention de la famille de la femme était nécessaire, soit qu'elle agît de sa propre initiative, soit qu'elle y fût invitée par le mari. La rançon payée, la femme était libre; elle rentrait chez elle, le mari l'y suivait pour verser la dot, et ainsi elle devenait épouse régulière au même titre que toute autre. La procédure ne varie pas, qu'il s'agisse d'une esclave capturée personnellement par le mari, ou qu'il l'ait achetée ou acquise comme partie d'une dot ou à quelque autre titre.

Tel est le cas de Bolúmbú, fille de Bọékwá de Boéndé (Bombwanja), prise par Esalé d'Ekúkola et achetée par Efoloko de Lofelí. Elle fut affranchie à l'initiative de son père, qui ensuite la maria régulièrement. Une autre : Etáka, fille d'Elongama éâ Longómbá de Bẹsọmbọ́, mariée à Bonyongela de Bowélé. Dans une guerre, elle fut faite prisonnière par Betúkú d'Ekúkola, qui, voulant l'épouser en due forme, appela Elongama. Celui-ci arrangea l'affaire de la rançon et prit sa fille avec lui. Puis Betúkú se rendit à Bẹsọmbọ́ pour verser la dot (1).

A présent, à cause de l'abolition de l'esclavage, on ne peut plus payer de rançon. Le maître, voulant affranchir une femme esclave qui lui est restée fidèle, donne simplement la dot à sa famille, puis avec son épouse se rend chez elle pour y recevoir la contre-dot.

ARTICLE VI. — LA VIE DANS LE HAREM.

Entre elles, les femmes du même mari s'appellent bakalé (sing. bokalé). Le mari les nomme toutes baálí

---

(1) Presque toutes les femmes esclaves étaient réduites à cette condition — directement ou indirectement — par le fait d'une guerre. Si elles étaient mariées déjà, le mariage était du fait même considéré comme dissous. De par la force des circonstances, il ne pouvait en être autrement. Dans ces affaires, chaque groupe ne s'occupait que de ses propres intérêts; aucune procédure usuelle de rupture de mariage n'était observée. Le mari avait pourtant droit à une indemnisation, en personnes ou en valeurs, de la part du membre de son clan, fauteur de la guerre, qui était reconnu responsable de toutes les conséquences de l'aventure, de quelque façon qu'il l'eût provoquée. Le cas échéant, il pouvait y être forcé; et s'il n'avait de quoi payer les indemnités, il était lui-même réduit en esclavage, si les influences des familles en cause n'empêchaient pas cette opération. Après paiement d'une nouvelle dot à la famille de la femme affranchie, celle-ci devait rembourser au mari précédent.

= épouses. Toutes, à l'exception des véritables esclaves, sont mariées par dot. Les fils d'une femme appellent les bakalé de leur mère : baálí = épouses, mais par respect ils emploient, du moins envers les plus âgées, le nom de banyangó = mères. Les filles ne les désignent que par ce dernier nom. (Cfr. chap. VI, art. VI.)

Le polygame peut avoir une maison personnelle, mais souvent il se contente d'un hangar, où il se tient pendant le jour, quand ses occupations ne l'appellent pas ailleurs; il y prend ses repas, reçoit les visiteurs, etc. Ce hangar s'appelle ingómba (ou esamba) (¹), rarement jǒjá. Ce dernier terme fait allusion à l'emplacement de ce « salon », qui, en effet, se trouve en vedette devant la rangée des cases des femmes, parfois au milieu de la rue; rarement du côté opposé de la rue, en face des cases des femmes.

Chaque femme a sa case particulière, composée d'un espace assez vaste, ouvert par-devant, et servant de cuisine, et d'une chambre plus petite avec le lit; ou bien elle possède une cuisine en forme de hangar, et à une petite distance une maison séparée comme chambre à coucher.

Les cases sont disposées en rangée qui s'étend des deux côtés de la maison du mari, s'il en a une. La maison de la nkóndé se trouve juste à côté de celle du mari ou derrière son hangar. Celle de la bomátsa est à l'extrême droite, celle de la deuxième femme à l'extrême gauche, et ainsi de suite. La bolúmbú n'a pas d'emplacement spécial. L'ebísa a sa case à côté de celle de sa parente.

Certains polygames commencent à construire des maisons doubles : de chaque côté d'une cuisine commune se trouvent les chambres à coucher, sous un même toit, de deux femmes. Ainsi Bokwála, chef actuel des Boángí à Bokála (²). Dans chaque case double il a installé une femme déjà âgée et une plus jeune. Ainsi, m'expliqua-t-il un jour, les vieilles surveillent les jeunes, ce qui fait diminuer les occasions d'adultère.

---

(¹) Selon les dialectes. D'autres noms, voir chap. VI, art. III, § 3, note.

(²) Décédé depuis.

Le mari se doit à toutes ses femmes. A chacune il lui faut apporter le bois de chauffage et prendre soin que chacune ait ses terrains de culture. Les vivres qu'il a pu se procurer (chasse, pêche, fruits de palme, etc.) doivent leur être distribués avec impartialité par la bomátsa. Il est obligé de manger de la nourriture préparée par toutes, soit le même jour, soit plutôt par chacune à tour de rôle.

Il en est de même pour les relations intimes. Il doit partager ses nuits avec chacune à égalité et à tour de rôle (-kafa mpóngó). Généralement, il passe trois ou quatre nuits de suite avec la même. Il ne lui est pas permis de favoriser l'une plus que l'autre. S'il ajoute une nuit supplémentaire au nombre commun, il ne peut le faire qu'en faveur de la bomátsa ou de la préférée. S'il désire avoir avec celle-ci des relations suivies, il va avec elle en voyage pour une raison vraie ou inventée.

La partialité est vivement critiquée et suscite de violentes querelles de ménage. Elle peut causer la dislocation et la dispersion de son harem. Surtout en matière sexuelle, elle est extrêmement mal supportée. Il doit donc bien se surveiller et respecter les droits de toutes et de chacune. Ne sont exceptées que les femmes qui dans le harem occupent un rang spécial, et cela uniquement pour ce qui concerne les privilèges ou devoirs de leur position.

Les femmes viennent cohabiter avec le mari, à leurs nuits fixes, dans sa maison à lui. Rarement il se rend lui-même chez elles, à moins qu'il n'ait de case personnelle. Toutes connaissent leur tour de rôle respectif, et elles n'ont aucune honte d'en donner communication aux autres. Au contraire, parfois elles ont de l'intérêt à le faire.

Entre coépouses, — si l'on excepte les cas de bibísa, — aucune communauté de biens n'existe. Chacune s'occupe de son propre ménage, fait sa propre cuisine, soigne ses propres enfants, s'adonne à ses propres cultures. Chacune a ses propres ustensiles et outils. Elles peuvent pourtant s'entr'aider si elles veulent. Pour la pêche, notamment, elles s'associent souvent, particulièrement pour l'écoppement d'étangs.

ARTICLE VII. — LA MONOGAMIE.

La monogamie n'est pas estimée des Nkundó. Leur désir va vers la polygamie. Si un homme n'a qu'une femme, c'est par pauvreté. Aussi se moque-t-on de lui et le traite-t-on d'etula ou bololé=homme de rien, de bọsú=homme faible. Fréquemment on peut entendre des chants sur ce thème dans les beuveries, surtout chez les Elinga. Tout cela constitue un énorme obstacle à la lutte contre la polygamie. Non seulement le Nkundó est tenté par les avantages matériels, mais il ne supporte pas la raillerie; il est extrêmement sensible à l'humiliation et est esclave du respect humain.

Malgré tout cela, et en dehors de l'influence de la religion chrétienne, les mariages monogamiques, non seulement imposés par la nécessité, mais voulus spontanément, existaient et existent encore, quoiqu'ils soient extrêmement rares. Voici les noms de quelques hommes qui, bien qu'ayant les moyens de se constituer un harem, ont voulu rester unis à une seule femme. Je les ai choisis au hasard dans deux villages : Bọnjọku-Bonkoso (27 contribuables en 1931) et Bongíli wǎ Ndọngọ́ plus clan allié Ilẹkọ́ (47 contribuables en 1931).

Bọnjọku-Bonkoso :

Esalé éâ Ekutu, de Bokenyola + lombe de Nkélengo;
Bokató, de Bokenyola + Wanga de Likolí;
Bofanga w'ǒfóngé, de Bokenyola + Baléngola;
Itéú yǎ Lokékola de Bofétola + Nkúḿ de Bongale.

Ils sont tous décédés avant 1895.

Bongili :

Nsẹngẹ (encore en vie) + Toyôngwa de Elángá. Même veuf, il n'a pas voulu se remarier, par attachement à sa femme morte.

Efoloko éâ Bọnkọ́ngyá + Bambúla de Boálá;

Bọngẹlé + Bakúkú de Bompángá;

Bolúmbẹ w'Embengá + Bokelé de Ekúkola;

Lofalanga d'Ilẹkọ́ + Imọtẹ de Bẹsọmbọ́; après le décès de sa femme, il est resté veuf jusqu'à sa propre mort.

D'autres se remarient après le décès de leur femme, mais restent toujours monogames de fait, comme Eanga éâ Jatá de Nkélengo, qui est maintenant marié pour la troisième fois.

Demandez aux indigènes pourquoi ils veulent rester monogames malgré leurs richesses et alors que tous se font polygames et se moquent d'eux. « Je ne veux qu'une femme », répondent-ils. « Mais, enfin, pourquoi n'en veux-tu qu'une seule? » « Bosisé wâ Njakomba » = « ordination de Dieu, c'est-à-dire : c'est que Dieu m'a fait ainsi. »

Il n'existe pas de terme pour indiquer la monogamie. Pourtant la femme qui est seule épouse de son mari est nommée impómbonjemba, mot dont la dernière constituante signifie célibataire. Le monogame est parfois appelé ɏunama, substantif dérivé du verve unama = être incliné, être courbé vers, parce que toujours il est courbé vers cette femme, qu'il est continuellement à ses côtés. C'est un terme employé comme raillerie, mais qui exprime très bien, au figuré, l'affection particulière que le mari porte à sa femme, et qui mériterait ainsi d'être conservé et remis en honneur.

ARTICLE VIII.

ATTITUDE DE LA FEMME ENVERS LA POLYGAMIE.

Avant l'arrivée des Européens la polygamie n'était pas sujette à une opposition ou contradiction quelconques. Elle était considérée comme une situation toute naturelle et normale. Je m'imagine que les Nkundó qui ont entendu les premières attaques contre cette coutume enracinée ont dû être plus qu'étonnés. Mais il est difficile de juger ce que les femmes pensaient dans ces vieux temps. Aussi examinons plutôt les faits courants et actuels pour en déduire ce qu'elles pensent à présent de leur situation dans le harem, et cela malgré la délicatesse de cette question d'ordre psychologique.

Remarquons d'abord qu'il est impossible de donner une règle générale : tous les hommes ne sont pas faits sur le même patron. Il y a des femmes qui aiment à faire partie d'un harem. D'autres préfèrent la monogamie, soit qu'elles s'opposent à être livrées à un homme déjà marié, soit qu'après coup elles s'arrangent avec un amant en vue d'un mariage en règle, soit qu'elles quittent le polygame, sous la protection des Blancs, pour se rendre dans un centre ou dans une Mission.

§ 1. Préférence pour la monogamie.

Nous ne nous occupons pas des filles de parents chrétiens, sinon nous fausserions le problème, que nous traitons du point de vue psychologique et non religieux.

1° Les femmes qui s'opposent à être livrées en mariage à un homme déjà marié sont rares. Le refus peut avoir pour cause : le désir d'être bolúmbú (ou éfótswéla) (¹), un désir naturel d'entière liberté, l'antipathie contre le prétendant, une constitution anormale. Ces cas doivent être éliminés, comme ne prouvant rien pour ou contre la présente question.

---

(¹) Cfr. chap. I, 1e partie, art. II, et 2e partie, art. III.

Mais il y en a d'autres où l'ajournement du mariage est clairement voulu en vue d'un mariage monogamique. Seulement, dans les circonstances présentes, le désir d'embrasser la religion chrétienne n'en est pratiquement jamais absent. J'ai connu quelques cas de femmes adultes et célibataires venues à la Mission afin de s'y marier, tout en se préparant au baptême. La plupart n'ont pourtant pas eu le courage de persévérer.

D'autres, plus nombreuses, demeurent chez leurs parents, même si elles désirent l'admission dans l'Église. La vie de femmes célibataires à la Mission n'est pas précisément ce qu'il y a de plus aisé, ni du point de vue matériel, ni du point de vue liberté. Car le désir même sincère de s'engager dans une union monogamique n'exclut pas la faiblesse humaine et ne constitue pas un brevet de sainteté. Ces filles restent soumises à l'impulsivité des passions. Il est bien vrai que, même à la Mission, elles peuvent trouver les moyens de les satisfaire; car il est absolument impossible d'exercer une surveillance telle qu'elles ne sauraient y échapper. Mais, précisément, à cause de cette surveillance, étroite malgré tout, elles ne sauraient se laisser aller librement. Alors que chez elles on ne prête aucune attention à leurs écarts, la découverte d'une faute entraîne, à la Mission, au moins une semonce toujours désagréable et souvent un ajournement plus ou moins prolongé de l'admission au baptême ardemment désiré. Ces femmes préfèrent donc d'ordinaire contourner la difficulté en attendant qu'un jeune homme chrétien ou catéchumène les demande en mariage.

2° La majorité des jeunes filles ne s'opposent pas à la polygamie. L'habitude ancestrale et l'éducation ne perdent pas leur influence en quelques années. D'ailleurs, au moment de la demande en mariage elles ne se rendent pas bien compte, très souvent, de la situation exacte. Plus tard, lorsque la vie dans la polygamie ne les satisfait plus, elles tâchent d'arranger un mariage avec un célibataire.

Dans plusieurs cas, le motif déterminant est le désir de devenir catholique. Dans d'autres, la religion n'entre pas en considération. Ce sont seulement ces dernières que nous pouvons envisager ici; car la valeur démonstrative des premiers est beaucoup infirmée par l'ajoute du motif religieux.

Si la femme quitte son mari par antipathie personnelle contre lui ou contre certaines de ses coépouses, et non par opposition contre le régime polygamique, elle prend le chemin plus direct et plus facile de se rendre chez un autre polygame qui possède de quoi rembourser la dot. Ce cas arrive plus fréquemment que les précédents, et nous permet ainsi de faire la démarcation entre les deux éventualités et de conclure à une préférence pour la monogamie lorsque la femme quitte le polygame pour se marier à un célibataire.

3° Profitant de la liberté produite par la colonisation, d'autres femmes encore se rendent dans les centres chez un célibataire. Divers motifs peuvent les déterminer : le désir du luxe, le désir de s'unir à un homme qu'elles aiment, mais qui ne possède pas la richesse nécessaire pour se marier avec elle régulièrement, le véritable désir d'une union monogamique (1). Ce dernier motif est, actuellement, plutôt rare.

4° La femme qui, abandonnant son mari polygame, demande son admission dans une Mission peut être poussée, soit par l'aversion de la polygamie, soit par un motif religieux. Tout d'abord il faut distinguer ici entre Mission catholique et Mission protestante. Si la femme se rend dans cette dernière, seul le premier motif peut être en cause. Car la Mission protestante admet au baptême les femmes de polygames, sans exiger la rupture avec cette coutume. Seul le mari est exclu (¹). Elles ne le quittent donc pas, mais tout en devenant chrétiennes, continuent la vie du harem comme auparavant. Si donc d'aucunes se rendent quand même à la Mission protestante, nous pouvons conclure qu'elles le font uniquement par préférence pour la monogamie. Je ne sais pourtant pas si des cas se présentent en réalité, ni quelle est leur proportion. Il serait souhaitable qu'un missionnaire protestant examinât cette question hautement intéressante.

---

(1) A présent la fugue vers les centres est déjà devenue difficile, mais elle peut encore se pratiquer. Tout dépend de la surveillance plus ou moins sévère des autorités. Dans les grandes agglomérations la tâche de celles-ci n'est pas toujours facile.

Quant aux Missions catholiques, l'un et l'autre motif peuvent être en jeu. D'ordinaire ils sont unis dans la même personne, car la religion catholique n'admet pas la polygamie, ni de la part de l'homme, ni de la part de la femme, qui, de par la législation coloniale congolaise, possède le droit de rompre l'union polygamique en faveur de la monogamie. La femme de polygame qui demande la résidence à la Mission veut devenir catholique et en même temps contracter mariage monogamique. Elle vise conjointement les deux objets. Ces personnes doivent donc être exclues de notre thème. D'ailleurs, les femmes qui ne veulent pas devenir catholiques suivent la voie expliquée sous 2° ou 3°.

5° Il y a même des femmes qui empêchent leur mari de devenir polygame. Si celui-ci les aime beaucoup, il cédera à la fin, même si personnellement il a grande envie de se constituer un harem. Ainsi faisait Mputú (décédée récemment : 3 février 1933), femme du chef d'Ekúkola, Boféndа. Celui-ci, étant riche, a plus d'une fois essayé d'acquérir d'autres femmes; il en a même pris chez lui et payé la dot, comme pour Ilɔa de Bongíli. Mais alors Mputú leur rendait la vie insupportable et les forçait ainsi à s'en aller. Elle voulait absolument garder pour elle seule son mari, à qui elle avait d'ailleurs donné deux garçons et trois filles.

---

(¹) Je parle uniquement de la région déterminée dont traite notre étude. Qu'on veuille donc bien ne pas généraliser.

Nous pouvons donc conclure que de réelles préférences pour la monogamie existent chez une minorité de femmes nkundó, même abstraction faite de tout motif religieux. Mais la plupart ne s'opposent nullement à la polygamie.

§ 2. Préférences pour la polygamie.

La plupart des femmes Nkundó aiment la polygamie et la préfèrent à la monogamie. Elles se moquent de l'impómbonjemba et se glorifient du nombre considérable des épouses qui composent le harem de leur mari.

Leur indifférence ou aversion pour la monogamie pourrait s'expliquer par l'habitude et l'atavisme. Mais sur quoi se base leur préférence marquée pour la polygamie, malgré tous les inconvénients ? J'ai posé la question à plusieurs femmes de polygames. Evidemment, elles commencent par invoquer la coutume (¹), excepté celles qui me connaissent depuis quelque temps. Mais la raison qu'elles donnent, au sérieux, est la vie plus commode dans le harem. Comme elles sont nombreuses, elles ont beaucoup moins de besogne pour préparer la nourriture du mari, soit que les coépouses se partagent les jours, soit qu'elles fassent chaque jour la cuisine pour lui. La chose est évidente. Donc des champs moins étendus à établir et à entretenir, moins de bois de chauffage à chercher, moins de manioc à rouir, moins de légumes à cultiver, etc. Si, par contre, le mari monogame reçoit des visiteurs, son épouse n'a jamais fini de peiner.

En dehors de cette raison, il y en a une autre, inavouée, mais que les indigènes qui sont hors de cause affirment catégoriquement : la liberté ou la licence. La femme d'un monogame est toujours liée à son mari, ne peut s'absenter que difficilement. Son époux tient à l'avoir près de lui, tant pour la nourriture que pour les relations conjugales. La femme du polygame est bien plus libre. Son absence même prolongée ne gêne pas le mari, à moins qu'il ne soupçonne des infidélités ou qu'il ne soit par trop jaloux. Ensuite, comme les diverses épouses ont leurs nuits déterminées, elle a plus de liberté de se donner à ses amants. Aussi pour beaucoup de femmes est-ce là la raison principale de leur préférence — nous parlons toujours de la situation actuelle — pour la polygamie.

---

(¹) C'est d'ailleurs l'explication type que l'indigène sert à l'étranger, à celui qu'il ne connaît pas ou dont il pense être inconnu.

ARTICLE IX. — LES ENFANTS DE POLYGAME.

Les divers enfants du polygame demeurent chez leurs mères respectives, qui doivent prendre soin de leur subsistance et de leur éducation. Généralement les autres femmes sont pour eux des étrangères, avec lesquelles ils n'entretiennent pas beaucoup plus de relations qu'avec n'importe quelle femme du village. Si une affection particulière lie leur mère à ses coépouses, l'enfant y est associé, comme il l'est également aux antipathies, dissensions, rivalités. D'ordinaire, il respecte les femmes de son père, surtout si elles sont âgées. Mais plus tard il se laisse parfois emporter par la passion à des rapports coupables avec l'une ou l'autre des plus jeunes.

Comme chaque enfant reste chez sa propre mère, à laquelle le père ne fait que des visites intermittentes, il porte à ce dernier moins d'affection. Plus le harem est nombreux, plus grand est l'éloignement entre les enfants et leur père. Pourtant, ils le respectent et l'aiment, et l'un ou l'autre peut s'attacher très fort à lui. Mais l'autorité paternelle et l'affection pour lui peuvent se développer beaucoup moins facilement que dans un ménage monogamique.

Entre eux les enfants se traitent comme frères et sœurs. Mais ceux de même mère s'aiment beaucoup plus intimement que les autres. Les enfants de chaque femme forment un petit groupe à part, plus unis entre eux. Toute leur vie ils feront la distinction entre « frères et sœurs de père » et « frères et sœurs de mère ». Mais à part cela, ils s'aiment réellement et sincèrement. Les rivalités de leurs mères respectives se communiquent bien à eux, mais l'affaire arrangée, l'incident est clos et ils se sentent toujours du même sang par leur père.

Dans un avenir plus ou moins éloigné, leurs descendances formeront des familles séparées et distinctes, parce que, quoique du même père, ils sont issus de mères différentes. Dans les tribus envisagées, le rang que les aïeules ont occupé dans le harem ne produit aucune distinction particulière dans leurs descendances, comme cela se trouve dans d'autres groupes nkundó (par exemple Boyéla), où l'on distingue toujours les familles ilóme et iáli (c'est-à-dire de droite et de gauche). La distinction posée à ce sujet par le R. P. Schebesta (Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 234) est erronée. Les termes elóo et nkásá ont uniquement la signification qu'il donne en premier lieu, c'est-à-dire lignée masculine et lignée féminine.

Les enfants d'une femme et ceux de son ebísa se considèrent comme frères et sœurs utérins. Aussi, — même après le décès de leurs mères, — continuent-ils à recevoir — comme elles — une même part commune et unique dans le partage du gibier, etc.

Dans les menues querelles domestiques, les enfants de la bomátsa aiment à se prévaloir du rang primordial qu'occupe leur mère. Plus tard, ils passent de droit avant leurs frères pour les questions d'héritage et d'autorité familiale.

Les enfants de femmes esclaves sont aimés par leur père comme leurs frères et sœurs. Pourtant, de la part des autres, ils sont souvent l'objet de marques de mépris et d'humiliation, surtout en paroles, mais cela uniquement à l'occasion de disputes ou de contestations. Ils doivent particulièrement subir l'injure de s'entendre traiter comme dépourvus de bonyangó = clan maternel, un des plus graves outrages qu'on puisse infliger à un Nkundó. Toutefois, leur père les protège tant qu'il peut.

L'enfant d'une esclave n'a pas droit à l'héritage. Évidemment, rien ne lui manque. Mais il ne jouit d'aucun droit politique, fût-il le premier-né de son père.

La descendance d'une esclave n'est plus considérée comme telle au point de vue matrimonial, comme nous l'avons dit au chapitre V, article II. Après extinction des groupes issus des femmes libres, c'est la descendance de l'esclave qui hérite des droits dans le clan, et cela à l'exclusion des clans apparentés, entièrement libres dans leur origine.

Quelle est l'influence du régime polygamique sur la natalité ? La question a été beaucoup débattue, car elle est très difficile à résoudre. Il faudrait des statistiques complètes et bien faites, mais des listes détaillées et raisonnées. Car il est un fait que dans beaucoup de ménages monogamiques la femme est une ancienne femme de polygame qui, pour cette raison, ne peut plus être comptée comme femme de monogame. En outre, il faudrait exclure des ménages monogamiques les femmes qui n'ont été mariées qu'à un âge avancé, après avoir vécu un temps plus ou moins long dans la liberté, comme dans les centres.

A mon avis, le danger pour la natalité est situé avant tout dans le besoin d'amour individuel et dans la disproportion d'âge, inséparable du régime polygamique tel qu'il existe. La femme de polygame cherche instinctivement un autre homme qui correspond mieux aux désirs de son cœur. Autrefois, du moins dans la petite polygamie, la situation n'était pas la même qu'aujourd'hui : la contrainte des lois ancestrales, la liberté restreinte, le manque de communications sûres, le respect du mari pour le corps de sa jeune femme et l'absence de maladies vénériennes font que la situation devait être bien plus favorable pour la natalité.

ARTICLE X. — CAUSES DE LA POLYGAMIE.

Sous ce titre il est possible de traiter de deux choses bien distinctes et différentes : 1° les motifs qui poussent les Nkundó à la polygamie; 2° les causes qui ont donné origine à cette pratique.

La première question peut être résolue par l'observation raisonnée des faits. La seconde, au contraire, relève du domaine de l'histoire. Elles ne coïncident donc nullement, et il serait erroné de les confondre.

Seul le problème ethnographique tombe dans le cadre de cette étude. Mais ses conclusions peuvent aider à expliquer les documents historiques, s'il en existe, ou à éclaircir l'hypothèse de l'origine dans le passé.

Par quels motifs les Nkundó justifient-ils leur pratique de la polygamie ? Ce sont : 1° l'influence sociale; 2° la renommée; 3° le souci de conserver dans la famille les capitaux; 4° les précautions contre la maladie, la mort ou le divorce d'une épouse; 5° le désir d'augmenter le nombre d'enfants.

1° L'influence sociale croît en proportion du nombre de femmes; car celles-ci multiplient les alliances avec d'autres clans, tant par elles-mêmes que par le mariage de leurs enfants. D'où affermissement de la position militaire du mari. En outre, par le système du concubinage officiel, — impossible en régime monogamique, — il peut s'adjoindre des clients.

Un homme est d'autant plus estimé, écouté, craint qu'il a plus de femmes. La corrélation n'est pourtant pas nécessaire et infaillible, car un polygame à caractère faible peut avoir moins d'influence qu'un mono- ou bigame intelligent et hardi. Et dans les circonstances actuelles on peut rencontrer des monogames qui, soit par leur situation économique, soit par leur position sociale ou politique, jouissent d'une autorité beaucoup plus considérable que nombre de polygames. De leur côté, la supériorité intellectuelle et morale commence à faire sentir sa valeur.

2° La renommée et la vanité. De par la nature même du régime matrimonial, — intimement lié à, pour ne pas dire basé sur des tractations financières, — le nombre de femmes détermine le degré de richesse. Et, comme partout, la fortune exerce une fascination; elle est considérée comme une marque de supériorité. La vanité s'en empare. Et comme la possession de femmes est l'expression la plus manifeste de la fortune, le Nkundó y voit un moyen de premier ordre pour l'acquisition d'une grande renommée et d'un nom brillant.

3° Le souci de conserver les biens de la famille. La richesse mobilière réside presque entièrement dans les métaux (surtout le cuivre) et les animaux domestiques. Aussi sont-ce ces capitaux qui interviennent dans les tractations financières du mariage et qui, de cette façon, sont placés avec intérêt (enfants, travaux, influence).

Comme toute population païenne, le peuple nkundó est essentiellement intéressé et égoïste. Il n'aime pas à donner, mais veut tout pour lui-même. A l'exception des personnes auxquelles il est attaché par des liens naturels ou par une sincère affection, le Nkundó n'aide les autres que par interdépendance ou par espoir de réciprocité, sous une forme quelconque. Lors donc qu'il possède un excédent de richesse, fût-il considérable et entièrement superflu, il ne le cède pas. Jamais il ne lui viendra l'idée, par exemple, de donner gratuitement quelques anneaux de cuivre à un célibataire indigent, s'il n'y est obligé par l'interdépendance familiale. Si donc il a plus de filles que de garçons, l'excédent dotal sera employé par lui pour augmenter le nombre de ses propres épouses. Car afin de ne pas priver de sa nkita une fille, la dot reçue doit être réemployée comme dot. Ce raisonnement, notons-le, n'a qu'une valeur réduite. De fait, dans l'habitude ancienne, le père prenait pour lui toutes les dots de ses filles, comme nous l'avons vu au chapitre IV. Ce n'était pas à cause des excédents qu'il se faisait polygame; il l'était avant que ses fils se marient.

Même si la fortune a été acquise par des efforts personnels, le propriétaire s'en voudrait de laisser ses capitaux improductifs pour lui-même. Et dans les circonstances données, le placement le plus sûr est la possession d'un harem.

Enfin, comme la femme représente une valeur financière, le Nkundó aime à hériter de celles de ses parents décédés, pour les incorporer à son harem ou pour se procurer par elles les moyens de l'agrandir.

C'est ainsi que s'explique l'affirmation des Nkundó que les biens de la famille (lokutu) ne peuvent pas passer dans des mains étrangères. Non seulement le désir individuel les pousse à cette façon d'agir; ils sentent derrière eux la volonté collective de la famille. Et c'est dans celle-ci et dans les semonces et les railleries que susciterait inévitablement une attitude plus indépendante qu'il faut voir une des causes principales de tant de défaillances de la part d'hommes qui semblaient définitivement gagnés à la pratique de la monogamie.

4° LA PRÉCAUTION CONTRE LES ACCIDENTS : maladie, divorce ou décès. Ce motif est très souvent allégué : « Que ferai-je, dit-on, avec une seule femme, si un jour elle tombe malade, m'abandonne ou meurt? Je serai seul. Plus personne pour me soigner et me nourrir. Les Blancs ont leurs boys. Mais nous autres Noirs, nous n'avons que notre femme. » Ce raisonnement n'est pas dépourvu de valeur, mais il ne me semble pas exprimer toute la vérité, car, bien que pour les repas, rien ne surpasse son foyer, le célibataire peut toujours compter sur l'assistance bienveillante de ses parentes et de ses belles-sœurs. La prépondérance est plutôt dans le côté sexuel. Les femmes ne sont même pas rares qui dans cette éventualité conseillent à leur mari de prendre une seconde épouse. Dans le cas de divorce ou de décès, la difficulté peut être résolue par le remariage. Mais celui-ci impose un certain délai pour la réunion des valeurs dotales et surtout pour les pourparlers. Quant à la maladie, la difficulté est bien plus grande.

En tout cas, ces accidents ne peuvent pas justifier la véritable polygamie, car la bi- ou trigynie suffiraient amplement à éviter les inconvénients allégués. Et pourtant on ne voit personne qui se contente de deux ou trois femmes quand il possède les moyens d'en acquérir davantage.

5° Le désir d'augmenter le nombre d'enfants est une des raisons qu'on entend le plus fréquemment, et la principale, et parfois l'unique, citée par les ethnographes. Elle a sans contredit une grande valeur; car le Nkundó aime avoir beaucoup d'enfants; c'est un des motifs de sa gloire comme aussi un moyen puissant pour renforcer sa position sociale (et ceci nous ramène au motif cité en premier lieu).

La question de savoir si la polygamie favorise réellement la natalité n'a rien à voir ici, même si la comparaison était nettement en défaveur de ce régime et s'il était avéré que « plus il a de femmes moins le polygame a d'enfants ». Car le Nkundó ne fait jamais ce calcul statistique. Il ne voit que ce principe : plusieurs femmes donnent plus d'enfants qu'une. Et par là tout est dit. En outre, l'intérêt général de tout le peuple en bloc ne pénètre pas dans l'horizon de ses pensées et de ses sentiments : il n'a de soucis que pour lui-même; son égoïsme ne lui fait envisager que son propre intérêt.

6° A tous ces motifs allégués par les Nkundó pour justifier la pratique de la polygamie, nous devons en ajouter un sixième qu'ils ne citent jamais : La sensualité. Sans la colonisation, nous aurions eu difficile d'affirmer ceci.

Mais le nouvel état de choses manifeste plusieurs défauts dans l'argumentation de nos gens. Nous avons déjà attiré l'attention sur quelques-uns. En outre, tous les motifs mentionnés jusqu'ici ne rendent pas suffisamment compte de l'existence de la polygamie. Ils n'expliquent pas pourquoi, autrefois, les vieux voulaient se réserver toutes les femmes, ni pourquoi tel ou tel individu devient polygame. Il est un fait que pour plus d'un homme aucun des motifs allégués n'est intervenu. Il est connu aussi que plusieurs indigènes se sont acquis une fortune au moyen de travaux à l'européenne (clercs, commis, commerçants, etc.), afin de pouvoir se constituer un harem, sans que les motifs de vanité ou d'influence sociale aient pu agir. De par ma connaissance des circonstances de personnes et de lieux, je suis convaincu que même pour certains indigènes vivant dans leurs villages, l'intention primordiale était nettement sexuelle. Plus d'un cas pareil m'est connu.

Ceci se comprend d'ailleurs sans peine. La polygamie, en effet, constitue un moyen légitime et facile d'avoir la jouissance de plusieurs femmes sans être molesté par des palabres, embarras, etc. La psychologie de beaucoup d'hommes peu soucieux des lois morales et la tendance de l'instinct déréglé à multiplier ses objets ne font que confirmer cette constatation. Souvent on voit des hommes qui étaient d'abord monogames commencer par prendre une deuxième femme, par passion. Peu à peu leur passion, au lieu de s'apaiser, s'accentue et progressivement le harem se constitue.

Les changements que la colonisation a introduits dans la vie économique de cette population n'ont pas fait diminuer la polygamie. Dans certaines régions on a l'impression — à défaut de chiffres exacts nous devons nous contenter de simples constatations à vue — que les harems sont devenus moins peuplés, mais que, par contre, le nombre de polygames a augmenté et que, par conséquent, le désir de la polygamie, l'affectus, n'a pas diminué. L'impôt supplémentaire, non plus, n'effraie ni n'arrête les polygames. Le grand moyen pour changer la mentalité dans ce domaine restera toujours l'action des Missions et la pénétration de la morale du Christ, secondées par l'attitude du Gouvernement favorisant la monogamie (¹).

Un autre moyen, accessoire sans doute, mais cependant important, est l'exemple des ménages européens. Les Noirs ont l'esprit d'imitation; la femme indigène envie le sort de la femme blanche; si bien que les ménages européens sont une propagande pour la monogamie, quand ils se conduisent bien.

(¹) La faveur du Gouvernement colonial à l'égard de la monogamie s'exerce avant tout par la permission accordée aux femmes supplémentaires des polygames d'abandonner leur mari aux fins de s'engager dans une union monogamique, de préférence dans une Mission, sous le contrôle des missionnaires.

CHAPITRE VIII.

LE DIVORCE.

Le droit nkundó connaît deux manières de rompre le mariage : le divorce et la mort. Nous allons les étudier dans deux chapitres distincts.

Dans le divorce, le mariage est rompu, soit par le remboursement de la dot, soit par la substitution d'une autre épouse.

Dans le cas de décès, au contraire, il n'y a pas de remboursement dotal. Le décès de la femme rompt le mariage ipso facto. Par contre, le décès du mari ne le rompt pas; le mariage persiste dans la veuve jusqu'à sa propre mort ou jusqu'au divorce (¹).

ARTICLE I. — LES MOTIFS DU DIVORCE.

Le Nkundó considère le mariage comme dissoluble. Non pas au libre gré des contractants, mais à la suite d'une procédure qui comporte essentiellement l'intervention du ndonga. Non pour des futilités, mais uniquement pour des motifs graves, ou tout au moins des motifs qui ont ce caractère de gravité au jugement des indigènes.

Les raisons valables du divorce peuvent être ramenées à l'impossibilité pratique de continuer la vie commune. Telles sont : 1° manquements graves et réitérés aux devoirs conjugaux, surtout tendance incorrigible à l'adultère; 2° incompatibilité des tempéraments, source de disputes, de querelles et de rixes; 3° maladie grave et inguérissable.

(¹) Ceci est à comprendre dans le sens expliqué au chap. III, art. IX.

[p. 376]

Les deux premiers motifs amènent le divorce inévitablement. Quant au dernier, il faut distinguer :

Si c'est le mari qui est malade et qu'il est abandonné pour ce motif par sa femme, le divorce sera consommé dès qu'elle aura un nouveau mari.

Si c'est la femme qui est malade, il faut encore envisager deux cas : elle peut être devenue malade chez son mari ou ailleurs. Dans la première hypothèse, il n'y a pas cause de divorce, car la responsabilité de la maladie retombe entièrement sur le mari. Au contraire, si la femme contracte la maladie étant rentrée dans sa famille, c'est celle-ci qui endosse la responsabilité; et si la maladie est inguérissable, le mari peut recourir au divorce. Mais ceci ne vaut pas lorsque la femme s'est rendue chez ses parents sur l'ordre exprès du mari, ou encore si elle a fui le toit conjugal pour des motifs justes et raisonnables. Certains cas peuvent donner lieu à d'âpres discussions. Ainsi, par exemple, une visite à ses parents de la propre initiative de l'épouse, mais pour le bien du mari. Théoriquement, celui-ci doit gagner le procès. En outre, un séjour de vingt-quatre heures n'est pas reconnu suffisant pour faire retomber sur la famille de la femme la responsabilité de la maladie (¹).

La distinction entre maladie du mari et maladie de l'épouse est d'ordre pratique. Le mari souffrant d'une maladie incurable ou trop longue à guérir est généralement (pas toujours, pourtant) abandonné par sa femme. Si un autre homme ne verse pas de dot pour elle, le mariage persiste. Si la femme trouve un amant, celui-ci paie la dot, qui est remise au premier mari, et le divorce est ainsi consommé. Non pas qu'on puisse dire que la maladie de l'homme soit, en droit, une cause de divorce. Car l'épouse a l'obligation de soigner son mari malade.

(¹) Pour les détails, cfr. chap. VI, art. III, §§ 3 et 4. Voir aussi chap. IX, art. X.

Mais en pratique aucune des deux familles n'exige l'application de la loi. Tous cèdent à la volonté de la femme, qui refuse de continuer une union si peu attrayante pour sa sensibilité.

La maladie ne constitue donc pas un motif de divorce valable en droit. Mais elle est reconnue, dans la pratique, comme pouvant donner lieu à une rupture.

Quoique le Nkundó désire ardemment avoir des enfants, il n'invoque pas la stérilité comme motif de divorce. Pourtant les femmes stériles sont nombreuses. Pour obtenir la réalisation de ses désirs, l'homme a recours à la polygamie. Il tâchera de se procurer les valeurs nécessaires pour acquérir une autre femme. S'il n'en a pas les moyens financiers, il pourrait, par de petites tracasseries, des mesquineries, etc., qui ne lui fassent pas trop encourir le danger d'être mis en tort, rendre la vie difficile à sa femme et la pousser ainsi à le quitter pour rentrer dans ses frais de dot. Ceci n'est pourtant qu'une pure supposition; elle se réalise peut-être ici ou là, mais je n'en connais aucun cas. De toute façon, le mari n'invoque jamais la stérilité pour faire rompre son mariage. Contrairement donc à ce qui se passe ailleurs, il n'en est pas question dans le droit nkundó.

On peut ranger dans les motifs qui rendent impossible la continuation du mariage le fait d'exposer la femme au danger de mort par la transgression des interdits sexuels pendant la gestation ou après l'accouchement. Car, par sa méconduite, le mari se rend coupable d'une répudiation implicite et le père de l'épouse use de son droit à protéger la vie de son enfant (1).

Restent donc les motifs cités au début, qui peuvent être ramenés tous à l'impossibilité causée par l'incompatibilité des tempéraments, le refroidissement de l'amour, des offenses graves, surtout si elles sont réitérées, des manquements sérieux et continuels aux devoirs, des défauts qui jettent le déshonneur sur le coupable (1). Dans cette dernière catégorie, il faut mentionner spécialement l'habitude du vol. Des femmes sujettes au défaut de voler, fût-ce de menus objets (manioc, poisson, viande), arrivent, si elles ne se corrigent, à être antipathiques à la majorité des maris, puis se font détester. D'où palabres et querelles interminables, qui mènent infailliblement à la rupture. Car ce défaut est considéré comme très honteux. Notons encore la paresse ou l'insouciance d'un des conjoints.

---

(1) Cfr. chap. X, art. II, § 3.

⁂

Les divorces sont fréquents chez les Nkundó. Ces gens ne s'imposent guère de contrainte pour corriger leurs défauts. Peu à peu le premier amour devient moins passionné et le contact continuel et journalier manifeste plus clairement les côtés moins agréables du tempérament. S'ils ne sont pas supportés ou s'ils donnent naissance à des torts graves, la rupture devient inévitable. La quantité de divorces est plus grande dans les mariages par héritage et par substitution que dans les mariages par versement direct de dot.

Ce qui précède prouve que la loi nkundó, tout en admettant la légitimité du divorce, ne le fait, pour ainsi dire, que contrainte par la nécessité. D'ailleurs, avant qu'on en arrive là, des difficultés ont surgi depuis longtemps, et plus d'une fois déjà les parents et surtout le ndonga ont dû intervenir pour rétablir la paix troublée et renforcer l'union chancelante. Ils ne s'inclinent que devant l'impossibilité d'arranger la situation.

---

(1) Cfr., par exemple, l'adultère avec un parent par alliance : chap. VI, art. V, § 2, et chap. V, art. IV, n° 2, ex. 17.

ARTICLE II.

MANIÈRES DE ROMPRE LE MARIAGE.

La manière la plus simple et, pour ainsi dire, idéale de rompre le mariage est la séparation avec l'assentiment des familles et spécialement des ndonga. Actuellement — à part les fugues à distance — c'est l'unique façon de procéder admise. Seulement, depuis la réorganisation des chefferies, les chefs et les tribunaux se sont vu attribuer, ou accaparent de plus en plus les fonctions de témoins officiels (¹).

Avant la colonisation, les Nkundó y allaient souvent par d'autres voies.

Avant d'étudier la question du remboursement de la dot, nous examinerons ces diverses manières d'agir. Pour la plus grande clarté de l'exposé, distinguons entre la coutume du régime pré-européen et la pratique actuelle. Nous terminerons par deux procédés particuliers.

§ 1. Autrefois.

Distinguons encore :

A. — PREMIÈRE HYPOTHÈSE : La femme quitte son mari. Elle s'enfuit dans sa famille en passant par le ndonga. Si elle omet cette procédure et se rend chez elle directement, le ndonga s'en trouve méconnu. D'où conséquences graves. Le ndonga donne, en effet, inévitablement tort à la femme. C'est pourquoi le cas n'arrivait que très rare-ment. La femme s'explique au ndonga. Celui-ci a le devoir de la réconcilier avec son mari. Le divorce n'a jamais lieu sans des interventions multiples du ndonga.

---

(¹) Il n'est pas dans mon intention de nier le droit du chef et des tribunaux à intervenir dans les litiges matrimoniaux. Car ce droit leur est reconnu par la législation écrite qui leur attribue les fonctions exercées autrefois par les « pères » des familles. Mais ils sont obligés d'agir en conformité avec la loi coutumière et donc d'entendre le ndonga et de lui en référer.

1° Si après tout la femme ne veut absolument pas rester chez son mari et qu'elle le quitte définitivement, c'est la guerre la plupart des fois. A moins, évidemment, que le mari, lui aussi, ne tienne plus à continuer l'union malheureuse. Car, dans ce cas, il se contente de réclamer le remboursement de la dot. La guerre se terminait, comme toutes les autres, par la paix et l'indemnisation; on ne parle plus d'autre chose. Cette guerre était faite au clan de la femme, s'il ne la renvoyait pas ou s'il tardait à restituer la dot. Pourtant, si la femme s'était rendue chez un autre homme sans passer par sa famille, le mari abandonné déclarait la guerre à son rival et laissait ses beaux-parents en paix.

2° Parfois le mari délaissé se vengeait de son rival en l'assassinant. Si la chose lui était possible, — ce qui était généralement le cas, — il le ne faisait pas personnellement, mais en chargeait quelqu'un d'autre. C'était son fils, son frère puîné, neveu, etc. Mais, de préférence, il engageait un Bǫtswá. Le prix de ce service était une vingtaine d'anneaux de cuivre, montant de la dot pour une femme Bǫtswá. Le droit nkundó impose au mandant l'entière responsabilité de l'assassinat et de toutes ses suites. Certains Batswa étaient spécialisés dans ce domaine, tels que (chez les Bombwanja) : Esenge de Bokengé; Mbólókó de Bombembe; Wai w'Ītúmola de Bakǫyǫ́; Lŭwá jw'Ītómbengándá (décédé en 1933), également de Bakǫyǫ́; Botómba wă Lokio et Mpótó éy'Ilókó (encore en vie), de Mbanja.

Le mari méprisé disposait encore d'autres moyens de se venger ou de s'indemniser. Il en usait quand l'occasion lui était favorable ou quand il n'était pas de taille à se jeter dans l'aventure coûteuse d'une guerre ou d'un assassinat. C'étaient :

3° L'ikákelo (1) : il empêchait le retour chez son mari d'une de ses parentes, mariée dans le clan de l'épouse infidèle.

4° L'arrestation d'une épouse de son beau-père récalcitrant ou d'un parent de celui-ci. Ceci se nomme du terme générique lowáála, qui signifie : compensation (2). Généralement la prisonnière était mise à l'etáka (fourche en bois, liée au cou) (3), afin de lui empêcher la fuite et de hâter le remboursement de la dot. Si l'affaire ne s'arrangeait pas, elle devenait esclave.

De façon comme d'autre, on était ainsi quitte des deux côtés.

Le terme universellement employé pour la rupture du mariage de la part de la femme est bokófo, du verbe kófa. Il n'est pas employé pour la répudiation par le mari. Il n'est donc pas l'équivalent de divorce, mais signifie : rompre l'union avec le mari. La forme transitive-causative (kófya) signifie : provoquer cette rupture. Il arrive, en effet, que la famille de la femme fasse rompre le mariage en vue d'une union plus avantageuse. Ceci doit s'entendre dans le sens de ce que nous avons expliqué sur les motifs du divorce. Il s'agit avant tout de manquements graves aux devoirs du mari envers ses beaux-parents. Pour le remariage d'une divorcée, on emploie le terme général : kumbwa=être mariée avec quelqu'un.

B. — DEUXIÈME HYPOTHÈSE : le mari voulait se défaire de sa femme. — Les indigènes âgés affirment très catégoriquement que cette façon d'agir du mari n'était pas due au refroidissement de son amour, mais causée par la conduite incorrigible de la femme. Il était réduit à cette extrémité par l'impossibilité de continuer la vie conjugale avec elle.

---

(1) Cfr. chap. III, art. VI.

(2) La femme qui en était l'objet était nommée nginda. Sa descendance, le cas échéant, s'appelle bonginda.

(3) Cfr. chap. VI, art. VII, § 4, A, b) 1°.

Il mettait tout en œuvre pour empêcher la fuite de l'épouse en prenant les devants. Après avoir vainement tâché de la ramener à de meilleurs sentiments par l'intervention de ses parents et surtout du ndonga, il avait recours à un des moyens suivants, qu'il pouvait, d'ailleurs, utiliser successivement. Mais au préalable, il était obligé d'avertir le témoin et d'obtenir son approbation, ainsi que celle des autorités familiales. Ces moyens étaient :

a) La mise à l'etáka = lourde fourche en bois liée au cou. Le ndonga communiquait la nouvelle aux parents de la femme. Ceux-ci pouvaient alors venir délivrer leur fille en restituant la dot. Si le mari appliquait l'etáka contre la volonté du témoin, celui-ci pouvait délier la prisonnière. Mais de ce fait il se portait garant du remboursement de la dot : il en devenait personnellement responsable.

Le mari était autorisé à garder la femme dans cette torture pendant des mois. Si ses beaux-parents ne voulaient ou ne pouvaient pas le faire rentrer dans ses droits, il avait recours au deuxième moyen :

b) La réduction en esclavage (bonyamó, verbe nyamola). Il avait le droit d'employer directement ce moyen, sans avoir préalablement essayé l'étáka. Mais la chose était mal vue et n'arrivait que lorsque la famille de la femme était elle-même exaspérée par les interminables procès et la honte continuelle que leur causait cette fille indigne.

Généralement, la réduction en esclavage était la cause d'une guerre, le clan de la femme ne supportant pas pareille injure. Il arrivait pourtant qu'il ne se vengeait pas, soit par crainte, ne se sentant pas de taille à résister, soit parce qu'il reconnaissait le bon droit du mari.

Après coup, les parents pouvaient la racheter (1). Parfois, ne voulant plus s'exposer à de nouvelles palabres ou à une nouvelle honte que leur fille leur causerait en continuant sa méconduite après son rachat, ils l'abandonnaient à son sort. L'amour de leur enfant et le désir de sauvegarder l'honneur et le bon renom de la famille étant en conflit, il dépendait des circonstances d'hommes et de choses, lequel des deux sentiments l'emportait. Comme dans les cas de vols ou d'autres habitudes déshonorantes, il n'était pas rare (et il ne l'est pas encore maintenant) de voir le désir de sauvegarder l'honneur l'emporter sur l'affection ou l'intérêt financier.

Dans l'emploi de ce moyen, plus encore que dans celui de l'etáka, le mari devait, au préalable, communiquer ses intentions au ndonga. Sinon, celui-ci, de sa propre autorité, lui déclarait la guerre, l'injure étant considérée comme très grave. On peut supposer que cette prescription avait pour raison d'être de laisser à la famille le temps d'intervenir, afin d'éviter à leur fille l'esclavage en remboursant la dot.

c) Exceptionnellement, le mari exaspéré recourait à l'immolation de la femme, à l'occasion d'un décès. On cite le cas de Bengóngó, de Bongilá (Bẹsọmbọ́, Bombwanja), qui, lors du décès de son père Bengóngó byâ Yese, fit décapiter à l'ikwei sa femme Litúli de Bọntọlẹ.

Le mari pouvait être empêché d'exécuter ses desseins violents par la présence d'enfants déjà en âge d'intervenir en faveur de leur mère. Mbótai ntáwúkí = une mère ne périt point, dit le proverbe. Si la femme avait une sœur ou très proche parente comme coépouse (ebisa), le mari s'abstenait également, soit par un sentiment de honte, soit par crainte de réactions peu souhaitables. Parfois, pris entre son désir d'employer l'eláka et la honte ou la crainte de l'ebísa, le mari cachait la femme enfourchée. De préférence il demandait pour elle l'hospitalité d'un beau-frère. De cette façon, la difficulté était en bonne partie tournée. En effet, de par la loi de l'exogamie, la femme était ainsi logée dans un autre village, se trouvant parfois à une distance appréciable. Cette pratique s'appelait : isángyá; lómba wálí isángyá.

---

(1) Lorsque les Nkundó vendaient comme esclave une femme Elinga, ceux-ci ne les inquiétaient jamais par une guerre. Ils ne savent pas attaquer, supportent mal les marches, sont étrangers en forêt et inférieurs en valeur militaire. Ils se contentaient donc de racheter leur parente.

Au lieu de recourir aux procédés cités, le mari pouvait aussi remettre sa femme entre les mains du ndonga. Ceci était pourtant un cas tout à fait exceptionnel. Il était dû — prétendent les indigènes — au manque d'affection pour l'épouse, joint à la certitude de rentrer facilement dans ses droits, parce qu'il était rassuré sur les sentiments bienveillants de son beau-père (remboursement ou substitution), ou bien sur la possibilité d'user de l'ikákelo.

La répudiation directe était, comme nous l'avons dit, extrêmement rare. Nous ne voulons pas parler ici de la répudiation causée par la méconduite incorrigible de la femme, — nous venons d'en traiter, — mais de la répudiation contre le gré de l'épouse. Si pourtant le cas se présentait, le mari devait la remettre au ndonga, qui, voyant qu'il n'y avait plus moyen d'arranger la situation, la rendait à ses parents. Aucune violence n'était exercée contre elle. Et il n'y avait pas lieu de réclamer le remboursement direct et immédiat de la dot. Au contraire, l'époux devait attendre que la femme répudiée ait trouvé un nouveau mari et que celui-ci ait payé la dot pour elle. Si pourtant il y avait mauvaise volonté de la part de ses beaux-parents, ils pouvaient s'attendre à une guerre.

La conclusion qu'on peut tirer de ce qui précède est que le droit nkundó, tout en étant très sévère pour la femme qui ne s'acquitte pas de ses obligations matrimoniales, ne laisse cependant pas au mari la liberté absolue d'agir à son gré. La loi ancestrale exigeait une raison grave, et son application était bien réglementée. La différence entre les divers cas le montre éloquemment.

Comme on l'a vu ci-dessus, le terme bokófo ne s'applique pas à la répudiation dans sa double possibilité. On dit que le mari atóna=ne veut plus d'elle; dont le substantif est lotóno. Ce terme n'est pas spécifique; il est employé pour n'importe quel objet ou personne dont on ne veut pas. La forme spéciale de remettre la femme au ndonga s'appelle également d'un nom générique : émola=faire se mettre en marche, faire s'en aller, dont le substantif est njémó.

§ 2. Actuellement.

La colonisation a introduit des changements considérables. Guerres, tortures, immolation, esclavage ont été abolis. Tout se réduit maintenant à la fuite de la femme, en passant ou non par le ndonga, ou à la répudiation pure et simple. L'omission de l'intervention du ndonga est assez rare. On y tient encore. D'ailleurs l'intérêt financier conseille de ne pas se le mettre à dos. La femme abandonnant son mari rentre chez elle, ou bien elle se rend directement chez un autre homme, ou encore va se donner à la licence dans quelque grand ou petit centre. Il ne reste qu'à procéder au remboursement de la dot. Tout est donc réduit à sa plus simple expression.

La femme nkundó n'est retenue que par la crainte des châtiments et autres suites de son acte, ou bien par l'amour qu'elle porte à son mari. Autrefois, cet amour commençant à se refroidir, ou devenant moins passionné, la crainte lui faisait faire des efforts et souvent tout rentrait dans l'ordre. La liberté moderne, au contraire, l'invite à briser toute entrave. De fait, un froissement passager, qui autrefois aurait été arrangé, ou une difficulté quelconque de ménage, qui, sous l'ancien régime, aurait été aplanie, suffit à présent pour causer une rupture définitive.

On comprend ainsi que le remplacement des coutumes anciennes par l'état actuel des choses a fait augmenter les divorces dans des proportions scandaleuses.

L'arrivée de soldats nègres (étrangers ou congolais) a donné à l'organisation familiale le premier coup, qui fut un coup presque mortel. Dès le début l'autorité indigène, qui était familiale, patriarcale, fut abolie. Les chefs investis ensuite par le pouvoir européen avaient d'autres soucis que celui de sauvegarder la moralité conjugale. Si même (comme cela en a été malheureusement trop souvent le cas) ils ne tendaient pas à favoriser la facilité des divorces, afin de pouvoir s'approprier eux-mêmes des femmes pour se constituer un harem. L'Administration coloniale se trouvait devant l'inconnu. Il lui fallait du temps pour apprendre à connaître la situation présente et passée. D'autre part, elle était absorbée par d'autres problèmes : pacification des tribus, stabilisation de l'occupation, aide à la colonisation naissante, au commerce, aux Missions; organisations diverses, chemins à ouvrir et à entretenir, etc. En outre, les travaux d'établissement et de développement des centres, la Force publique, les Transports divers, l'installation des Compagnies, les Missions religieuses, ont fait sortir de leur milieu un grand nombre de jeunes gens, auxquels il fallait des compagnes, épouses régulières ou dérivatoires pour la passion. Tout cela a causé d'énormes ravages dans la société indigène. La moralité en a gravement pâti, et en conséquence la natalité.

Cependant, au cours des dernières années la marche des choses étant devenue plus normale et stable, l'Administration coloniale a commencé à réparer les torts causés. On ne peut qu'applaudir de tout cœur à ce revirement. On ne saurait qu'approuver entièrement les efforts qu'elle fait pour freiner et remettre de l'ordre dans le chaos familial.

Malgré l'opposition de plusieurs chefs vieux modèle, les tribunaux indigènes reconnus ou institués par le décret de 1926 ont commencé à user des pouvoirs que le Gouvernement leur a attribués. Ils sont appelés à jouer un grand rôle dans le redressement, surtout si leurs travaux sont surveillés de près et contrôlés régulièrement. Pour cela, il faut que ces juridictions continuent à agir dans l'esprit de l'ancien droit, en tenant compte seulement de la modification des circonstances (1).

La mesure principale préconisée par les indigènes pour la restauration de l'ordre est l'emprisonnement de la « divorceuse ». Cette pratique serait la continuation de l'application de l'etáka et son adaptation aux circonstances présentes. Comme celle-ci, il aurait un double effet : d'une part il freinerait la légèreté et la licence et, de l'autre, il assurerait le remboursement de la dot dans les cas impossibles à arranger. Seulement, l'exécution en serait soustraite au mari, pour être dévolue au chef. Les Européens, en contact avec les indigènes et soucieux de l'ordre social, sont également favorables à cette évolution de la loi coutumière.

Un autre moyen de réaction serait la pression sur les parents de la femme coupable, et cela principalement par l'emprisonnement de sa mère. Ce moyen ne trouve aucun point d'appui dans l'ancien droit; hormis la guerre — qui ne touchait pas la mère et dont l'utilité n'était d'ailleurs que très relative — et le système de la compensation (lowáála) — qui était un moyen de fortune employé de par l'initiative privée du mari. On ne saurait donc approuver cette pratique comme telle; mais elle pourrait être admise dans les cas où les parents sont réellement en faute. Ceci arrive, par exemple, lorsque, de façon ou d'autre, ils ont incité leur fille à rompre son mariage sans raison admissible. Ou encore lorsque, le divorce ayant été légitimement prononcé, ils refusent de restituer la dot (1). Et ici il faut signaler que, au lieu de manifester ouvertement leur refus, certains y vont par un détour hypocrite. Voici comment ils s'y prennent : la femme ayant réellement abandonné son mari, et celui-ci, pour des raisons justes, comme celles que nous avons citées ci-dessus, ne tenant plus à l'épouse avec laquelle il ne saurait plus vivre (surtout s'il est monogame), la question du remboursement se pose. La femme, de connivence avec ses parents, qui ne veulent pas restituer la dot, déclare publiquement et officiellement qu'elle ne quitte pas son mari et qu'elle désire réintégrer le foyer conjugal, alors que son unique intention est d'éviter à ses parents le déboursement de valeurs dotales. Elle saura bien — à son heure — se tirer d'affaire de l'une ou l'autre façon.

---

(1) Cfr. chap. VI, art. VII, § 7.

§ 2. Cas particuliers.

Il nous reste à décrire les cas un peu spéciaux dans la rupture du mariage. Le premier a augmenté avec la colonisation, tandis que le dernier a pratiquement disparu.

1° NJANGÓ. — Ce mot est le substantif du verbe angola, qui signifie débaucher (la femme d'autrui, son travailleur, son esclave, etc.). Le terme est donc générique. Pourtant il s'applique particulièrement à la séduction d'une femme mariée, pour la faire quitter son mari, et indique donc l'action de l'homme. De la femme on dit simplement qu'elle a abandonné son mari (aôkófa) et qu'elle a été prise en mariage par X (aôkámbwa éka Ɓóngóló). Cet homme s'étant épris de la femme d'autrui, et voulant l'épouser, tâche de gagner ses bonnes grâces; si elle consent, il réunit les valeurs nécessaires pour la dot. Alors il invite la femme à venir chez lui et paie la dot comme pour n'importe quel mariage.

---

(1) L'application radicale et indiscrète de cette règle pourrait pourtant froisser les sentiments religieux des indigènes chrétiens et obtenir un effet à rebours. Le mariage religieux, en effet, est indissoluble. L'obligation de restituer équivaudrait, dans ces cas, à la reconnaissance de la dissolubilité de l'union religieuse. Or, non seulement cela serait considéré par l'indigène comme une opposition entre les pouvoirs publics et la morale chrétienne, mais en outre causerait un tort immense à la stabilité des mariages en général.

Au lieu de se rendre chez son séducteur directement, la femme peut également passer par chez ses parents, si, notamment, ceux-ci sont favorables à son projet. Dans le cas contraire, elle ne réussirait point, car ils en empêcheraient l'exécution.

Le cas de njangó était rare autrefois, parce que hasardé. En effet, il constituait un casus belli. Celui qui s'y aventurait devait être de taille à résister et à subir les conséquences de son acte, surtout en matière d'indemnisation à payer. Actuellement, au contraire, ces faits sont bien plus fréquents, même si le nouveau mari n'a pas de quoi payer la dot immédiatement. Pourtant le revirement dans la politique gouvernementale commence à produire ses bons effets. L'emprisonnement est souvent appliqué à la femme, ou à sa mère, rarement au séducteur. Cette peine suffit souvent à faire revenir l'ordre. Toutefois, afin de ne pas s'exposer à de nouvelles difficultés de la part de celle qui ne l'aime plus, le mari délaissé refuse parfois de reprendre l'épouse infidèle.

La rareté du cas dans l'ancien temps, ainsi que le fait qu'il constituait un motif légitime de guerre démontrent que le njangó n'était pas approuvé par la loi nkundó et qu'il était plutôt une infraction.

2° Refuge. — Le refuge — qui n'est plus en vogue actuellement, à cause du changement des circonstances — se pratiquait comme suit : une femme veut absolument quitter son mari, mais elle n'en trouve pas la possibilité : aucun homme ne l'a demandée et ses parents sont impuissants à l'aider dans ses projets. Elle se rend, en cachette, chez un homme influent et riche, qu'elle aimerait bien avoir pour époux. Elle arrive à l'improviste, se poste devant lui, ou même se jette sur lui, en lui criant : Bejwó bèkę! ónjéngé, tonjójáké! (¹)=les parents défunts ! paie la dot pour moi, ne me chasse point ! Dans ces circonstances, cette insulte par les parents défunts est comme un ultimatum et impose une obligation à laquelle celui qui en est l'objet ne peut se dérober (²). L'homme en question ne peut donc pas chasser la femme et doit la prendre sous sa protection. Il convoque sa parenté et lui expose le cas. Ses proches étant d'accord, — c'est leur devoir et honneur, — ils lui enjoignent de payer la dot pour elle. Mais le mari délaissé intervient pour empêcher cette transaction. Ou bien il déclare la guerre, ou bien il prie son rival de lui rendre son épouse. Dans le premier cas, les hostilités étant terminées, les deux adversaires payaient, chacun de son côté, les indemnités pour les guerriers tombés au champ de bataille; puis, la paix ayant été conclue, les choses s'arrangeaient quand même, et la femme avait réussi dans son dessein. Dans l'autre cas, si l'homme qui avait accueilli la fugitive était disposé à donner suite à la requête, il exigeait du mari un paiement (nyongo) pour être délié de l'obligation lui imposée par le « serment » de la femme. Ce paiement était une sorte d'indemnisation pour l'insulte et pour l'accroc fait à son honneur. Aussi le montant en était assez élevé : 20 à 25 anneaux de cuivre, le prix d'un esclave.

La reddition de la femme avait lieu, soit parce que l'homme auquel elle s'était adressée ne l'aimait point, soit parce que lui et sa famille ne voulaient pas s'attirer des difficultés.

Pour le mari, la guerre était un mauvais moyen : il y perdait nécessairement. La façon correcte, idéale était de tâcher de se faire rendre sa femme. Ce qui indique que le recours aux armes était une contravention à la loi, plutôt qu'un moyen légitime.

(¹) Ou termes analogues.

(²) Cfr. chap. VI, art. V, § 4, annexe.

Il pouvait se faire aussi que l'homme, gardant chez lui la femme, ne payait pas la dot immédiatement. Ceci arrivait, ou bien lorsqu'une inimitié continuelle existait entre son clan et celui du mari, ou bien lorsque celui-ci lui devait une créance importante, sensiblement égale à la dot de la femme. Dans le premier cas, on allait presque inévitablement à une nouvelle guerre. Plus tard, la famille de la femme se mettait en rapport avec son nouveau gendre. Les cadeaux qu'elle lui apportait étaient considérés comme contre-dot, et lui-même commençait à verser la dot. Mais il n'était pas question de restituer la dot au premier mari; les relations entre celui-ci et le clan de la femme étaient totalement rompues. C'est précisément dans l'omission de la restitution qu'est située la différence entre ce cas et la procédure régulière décrite ci-dessus. Dans le cas de dette, il n'y avait non plus de restitution de la dot. La fuite de la femme constituait une compensation (lowáála), dans ce cas, qu'on désignait pour cela par ce même terme (N. aǒkęnda ndá lowáála). Si le mari réclamait, les juges lui envoyaient un morceau de bofofó (1), pour lui signifier qu'ils ne voulaient pas s'occuper de son cas, dont lui-même connaissait très bien le mal-fondé. Même les membres de son propre clan l'empêchaient de faire la guerre : ils savaient parfaitement que le tort était uniquement du côté de leur parent.

Le refuge, tel que nous venons de l'expliquer, s'appelait simplement bejwó, bǒmoto áótswá bejwó, parce que ce mot était le terme principal de l'ultimatum.

Comme nous l'avons dit ci-dessus, la coutume décrite a disparu avec la colonisation. Bien que cette étude ne s'étende pas aux Nkundó fixés au Nord de la Tshuapa, il peut être intéressant de noter que dans la région de Losanganya se dessine une évolution de cette coutume. Si une femme condamnée pour abandon du toit conjugal est emprisonnée, elle invite — si la possibilité lui en apparaît — quelqu'un à l'épouser. Si cet homme agrée, il produit devant le chef la dot qu'il a réunie. Avec l'assentiment de cette autorité, il la verse aux parents de la femme, qui la restituent au mari (¹).

---

(1) Le bofofó est une pièce de feuille de bananier sèche, qu'on enroule sur elle-même et dans laquelle on fait deux nœuds (ou plus, si le cas l'exige). Pour signifier la fin d'une palabre, le bofofó est coupé en deux morceaux (ou plus), chaque morceau ayant un nœud. On en remet un à chaque intéressé.

3° GUERRE. — Un dernier cas particulier de rupture d'un mariage est le suivant : Si une femme était capturée dans une guerre et non affranchie, et devenait donc esclave, son union était du fait même rompue. De par la force des circonstances il ne pouvait en être autrement, puisque chaque groupe ne s'occupait que de ses propres intérêts. Comme nous l'avons vu dans le chapitre précédent, l'esclave était incorporée dans le harem d'un des membres du clan qui l'avait faite prisonnière, ou elle était vendue à cet effet à un homme quelconque. Le véritable mari, n'ayant pas les moyens de l'affranchir, — nous parlons dans cette hypothèse, car dans le cas contraire il n'y avait pas rupture de l'union, — était dans l'impossibilité de s'y opposer. Toutefois, il avait droit à une indemnisation de la part du membre de son clan, fauteur de la guerre, droit qu'il pouvait appuyer par la force. Si le possesseur payait, après affranchissement de la femme par sa famille, à celle-ci une dot afin de contracter un mariage régulier, l'ancien époux avait droit au remboursement de la dot (cfr. chap. VII, art. V).

⁂

Pour clore cet exposé, il nous reste à signaler qu'une femme ayant abandonné son mari, pour se rendre chez un autre homme, peut retourner chez le premier après

---

(¹) Cfr. aussi le chap. III, art. VI.

un laps de temps plus ou moins long. La raison de ce retour peut être double :

Ou bien la femme ne trouve pas chez le nouveau mari ce qu'elle y cherchait. Elle se voit trompée dans ses espérances. Comparant sa situation actuelle avec la vie qu'elle menait précédemment, elle regrette son acte. Connaissant l'amour que son ancien époux lui a toujours porté, elle se hasarde à rentrer chez lui, et généralement elle n'est pas rebutée.

Ou bien le nouveau mari, après le versement d'une part de la dot, se trouve dans l'impossibilité de satisfaire à ses obligations. Comme la femme ne veut pas être épouse sans dot — hormis les exceptions modernes, — elle fait demi-tour.

Il est évident que ce retour n'est pas une conséquence nécessaire et fatale des causes précitées. La femme peut, en effet, aussi se rendre chez un troisième. Mais le retour au premier mari n'est pas extrêmement rare, sans que pour cela il faille le tenir pour fréquent (1). Il constitue, par l'accueil que la femme reçoit au retour, une preuve de ce que le divorce est causé, la plupart du temps, par la femme.

ARTICLE III. — RESTITUTION DE LA DOT.

§ 1. L'obligation de restituer.

Les deux principes primordiaux sont :

1° La rupture du mariage doit se faire par la restitution de la dot;

2° L'obligation de la restitution incombe à la famille de la femme.

Le second principe est clair et sans difficultés d'application. Il n'en est pas de même du premier.

---

(1) Chez les Européens aussi, le mariage de divorcées, sans être fréquent, se pratique cependant.

Tout d'abord, c'est par la restitution de la dot que le divorce est consommé. Aussi longtemps que le mari n'a pas été remboursé, la femme continue à lui appartenir. Seulement, comme il peut s'écouler un intervalle plus ou moins long entre le paiement de la nouvelle dot et la restitution au mari abandonné, il n'est plus loisible à celui-ci, dans la pratique actuelle, d'exercer ses droits sur la femme aussitôt que le second versement a eu lieu. Dès ce moment il a droit au remboursement et il ne dépend que de lui d'aller prendre son dû. Autrefois il lui restait la guerre. Mais, comme nous l'avons vu précédemment, le cas théorique tel que nous venons de le présenter était d'une extrême rareté, le mari disposant de moyens efficaces pour empêcher la nouvelle union avant le remboursement. Dans les cas où la femme avait la possibilité matérielle de se rendre chez un nouveau mari avant la restitution de la dot (répudiation directe, fuite à l'insu du mari, refuge), ce remariage était illégitime. Le nouvel époux était, devant la loi, un simple voleur, puisqu'il retenait auprès de lui une personne sur laquelle il n'avait aucun droit. Pour cette raison le mari pouvait lui déclarer la guerre, ce qui ne lui était pas permis dans les autres cas, la question de son mariage étant une affaire entre lui et la famille de sa femme.

Une autre conséquence de cette règle juridique est la suivante : Dans le cas où la « divorceuse » veut retourner chez son mari légitime, elle peut l'avertir de son dessein par un message secret. Elle l'invite à venir la prendre au moment où son amant versera la dot (ndanga ou walo d'après le cas). Elle presse ce dernier de satisfaire à ses obligations financières. Au jour fixé, le mari légitime, accompagné de son ndonga, va se cacher à proximité de l'endroit où se fait le paiement. Au moment opportun, il sort de sa cachette et s'empare des valeurs déposées, en disant à son rival : « Je t'ai surpris en adultère avec mon épouse; ces valeurs m'appartiennent à titre d'indemnité. »

La famille de la femme prend parti pour lui, et le mari débaucheur, se trouvant en infériorité, est renvoyé bredouille, sans autre forme de procès; car il est clairement en tort sur toute la ligne.

S'il en voyait la possibilité et s'il appartenait à une famille influente, le mari légitime se risquait parfois à assassiner son rival. Mais cela compliquait la situation par une guerre.

En outre, si la fugitive devient enceinte de par ses rapports avec son amant, avant la procédure régulière d'un nouveau paiement dotal-remboursement, l'enfant appartient, non au père naturel, mais au mari abandonné, qui en reste le père juridique.

Actuellement tout a changé. Légitimement, la femme quittant son mari ne peut pas cohabiter avec un autre homme. Seulement, pendant les années précédentes il n'existait plus aucune sanction. L'emprisonnement de la « divorceuse » (dont question ci-dessus) pourrait faire revivre l'ancienne loi, en l'adaptant aux circonstances. En outre, le mariage n'étant pas dissous, le prétendu second mari pourrait être condamné par les tribunaux indigènes pour cause d'adultère-complicité.

Malgré la rupture, le mari et ses beaux-parents tâchent de continuer l'alliance, dans la plupart des cas. Si, malgré la pression, les instances, les malédictions même de sa famille, la femme persiste à ne pas vouloir rejoindre son mari, ses parents la remplacent par une sœur ou parente (bankitsó). A moins, évidemment, qu'il ne se trouve aucune parente disponible. Car, dans ce cas, il faut bien qu'on se résigne à la restitution de la dot et à la rupture définitive. Aucun nouveau versement de dot n'a lieu pour la remplaçante, l'ancienne dot comptant pour la nouvelle union, comme nous l'avons expliqué au chapitre III, article IV.

Enfin, le principe général comporte une exception : la restitution de la dot n'a pas lieu, lorsqu'il y a une compensation équivalente, à titre ou de nature quelconques. De nos jours cette exception ne se rencontre plus que rarement, comme il appert des cas détaillés qui suivent : Ainsi, lorsqu'il y a eu exercice du droit de l'ikákelo, ou la mainmise sur la femme d'un des beaux-parents. Même si le montant d'une dot surpasse celui de l'autre, l'excédent n'est pas restitué. Il n'y a non plus aucune obligation de restituer la dot si la femme a été réduite en esclavage ou si elle a été tuée. Tels encore les cas de rupture cités au chapitre V, article IV, § 2, n° 2, ex. 17 et au chapitre VI, article V, § 4. Si la rupture a causé une guerre et que de part et d'autre le nombre de tués est assez considérable (trois, cinq, six cadavres), l'affaire en reste là; après l'indemnisation des familles des tués, on ne parle plus de remboursement. Exceptionnellement un homme influent et riche, en même temps que rancunier ou excessivement orgueilleux, reprenait les armes pour une seconde fois. Il prétendait ne pas cesser avant d'avoir en mains les valeurs dotales. Cette façon d'agir était universellement désapprouvée, et sa propre famille même tâchait de l'arrêter. Si le clan opposé était assez fort et opiniâtre dans la lutte, le mari n'obtenait rien du tout. Mais le désir de se venger ou d'être renommé comme guerrier faisait parfois faire fi des pertes financières. Enfin, dans la conception de nos indigènes, le cas de l'inimitié entre deux clans (que nous avons cité dans l'application du refuge) doit être rangé dans cette catégorie de compensations.

L'obligation de restituer la dot incombe au père de la femme ou à son remplaçant (père, oncle, fils, frère, etc., selon la hiérarchie familiale). Et cela, non seulement quant aux valeurs qu'il a touchées personnellement, mais encore quant à tout ce qui a été payé à n'importe quel membre de la famille. Tous ces versements, en effet, forment une seule et même dot, et toutes ces personnes sont solidairement représentées par lui. C'est à lui de les convoquer pour la discussion et l'examen des versements effectués. Et si des contestations surgissent, ils n'ont qu'à les aplanir entre eux. Pour cela point n'est besoin que le père ait personnellement vu et su ces paiements : le témoignage du ndonga suffit. Si l'un ou l'autre des parents a mal agi en omettant de porter les paiements à la connaissance de l'individu responsable, celui-ci n'a qu'à s'en prendre au délinquant. D'aucune façon il ne peut refuser de restituer ces valeurs. Le mari doit rester totalement hors de cause.

Quant à la part de la mère, elle et son clan doivent restituer ce qu'ils ont touché. Et cela même lorsqu'elle a rompu avec le père de sa fille. Celui-ci la convoque et l'invite à rendre les valeurs. Il est rare que cet arrangement suscite quelque difficulté. En aucune façon, la part de la mère ne peut être réclamée au père.

Enfin, les Nkundó exigent que le remboursement se fasse en une seule fois et globalement. Ici ils n'admettent pas de morcellement ni d'intervalles (comme pour le versement de la dot); probablement veulent-ils éviter de nouvelles discussions et des palabres interminables. Exceptionnellement on s'arrange à l'amiable pour accorder un délai nécessaire à la complétion de l'un ou l'autre détail ou d'une petite partie des valeurs à restituer.

Comme on l'a vu ci-dessus, la restitution doit avoir lieu entre le mari et la famille de la femme. Le nouveau mari n'a pas à y intervenir. A lui n'incombe que le devoir de payer une dot à ses beaux-parents. Il n'a aucune obligation envers l'ancien mari; celui-ci ne peut s'adresser à lui pour recouvrer ses valeurs; il n'a qu'à les réclamer à la famille de la femme. D'où l'axiome : njéngi la njéngi ntákimánáká = les deux maris ne peuvent se poursuivre (¹).

Restituer la dot s'appelle úndoja (baúmbá, jèngí, etc.),

---

(¹) Excepté, évidemment, lorsque le nouveau mari se met en tort en prenant chez lui la femme avant la consommation du divorce (cfr. supra).

dont la forme intransitive est úndola (rentrer dans les frais de dot), et le passif únjwa=être restitué. Le substantif est njúndó ou wăndó (restitution, remboursement).

§ 2. Modes de restitution.

Le père de la femme peut rembourser la dot :

1° Ou bien au moyen des valeurs reçues du nouveau mari. Plus donc celui-ci se hâte de s'exécuter, plus tôt la nouvelle union sera définitivement arrangée.

2° Ou bien, de ses propres moyens=lontumú, ou bokakata (ekakata), intensitif, dérivé de likata=main. De cette façon-ci, la situation est régularisée plus tôt et l'on évite les réclamations de l'ancien mari. Parfois on restitue ainsi pour faire montre de richesse et de générosité.

Dans ces cas, le père agit spontanément, de son propre gré. Mais peut-il être obligé de restituer ainsi de ses propres moyens?

Oui, dans tous les cas où la dot est encore en possession de la famille de la femme, elle doit être restituée immédiatement. La chose se conçoit sans peine; aucune difficulté d'exécution pratique n'entrave le remboursement dans ces circonstances.

Bien que, généralement, les valeurs dotales aient déjà été dépensées pour l'acquisition d'une autre femme (nkita), il n'en est pourtant pas toujours ainsi. Par exemple, lorsqu'il ne s'est écoulé entre l'élaboration du mariage et le divorce qu'un laps de temps très restreint. Ceci était et est peu fréquent. D'autres cas arrivaient plus rarement encore jadis : on ne voulait pas que la richesse dotale restât improductive. Actuellement, ils sont déjà plus fréquents : le développement du sentiment de générosité envers les fils ou frères puînés fait souvent que les valeurs sont réservées à leur intention.

Si la dot a déjà été aliénée, la solution est moins nette.

Sous l'ancien régime, la question était assez claire, ce qui n'est plus le cas à présent. Mais procédons par étapes.

Anciennement, la question se posait comme suit : Théoriquement, la famille de la femme n'était pas — par hypothèse — en mesure de restituer. Dans la pratique, toutefois, elle y parvenait, soit par la substitution d'une autre femme, soit par l'emprunt des valeurs nécessaires, soit en donnant au mari la dot touchée pour une parente de la divorcée. Le mari disposait de certains moyens pour forcer son beau-père (cfr. supra). D'autres fois, la menace d'une guerre émouvait les notabilités claniques. Celles-ci ne cessaient de pousser à la restitution, et à moins que le débiteur ne fût lui-même le plus influent et d'un caractère irréductible, il cédait à leurs instances. Si, au contraire, le mari n'avait pas recours aux moyens mentionnés, il était bien obligé d'attendre que son beau-père ait reçu une nouvelle dot.

Actuellement, ces anciennes coutumes ont été abolies. Toute la question en est donc bouleversée. Pourtant, malgré le changement des modalités extérieures, l'Administration coloniale désire agir dans l'esprit de l'ancienne législation indigène.

Le décret du 15 avril 1926, en instituant les juridictions indigènes régulières et en leur donnant la compétence de juger selon le propre droit des tribus adapté aux circonstances changées, a armé ces tribunaux pour travailler à cette adaptation. Mais en pratique celle-ci n'a pas encore été réalisée. La chose doit être attribuée à la difficulté de trouver une solution qui, d'un côté, continue l'esprit de l'ancien système et, de l'autre, satisfasse les aspirations légitimes vers un meilleur statut, aspirations favorisées d'ailleurs par le pouvoir colonisateur. Et ici il faut surtout songer à l'abandon progressif de la polygamie.

L'autorité européenne ne semble pas encore bien fixée au sujet du mode de restitution à adopter dans les circonstances présentes, question qui est d'ailleurs de la compétence des juridictions indigènes (1).

Dans les milieux indigènes les avis sont partagés. On y distingue deux projets de solution.

A. — Une forte tendance se dessine pour le maintien de la distinction, mentionnée plus haut, entre la rupture causée par la femme et sa répudiation par le mari. En soi, la chose est bonne, mais elle est sujette à un grave inconvénient : le danger, notamment, d'exagérer l'importance du dernier cas. Car, nous l'avons vu, si le mari répudie sa femme, c'est généralement sa faute à elle.

La différence de procédé que cette tendance met entre les deux cas est la suivante :

1° Est-ce la femme qui s'enfuit, la famille devra restituer de ses propres moyens. Si elle se récuse ou tarde trop, il faudrait emprisonner la « divorceuse » ou sa mère. Généralement, cette dernière peut plus aisément être atteinte que celle-là; et même s'il n'y a aucune difficulté spéciale de jeter le grappin sur la fille, l'emprisonnement de la mère est d'une plus grande efficacité.

Les critiques qu'il faut faire contre ce système sont :

a) On préconise des sanctions contre la mère, qui devrait rester hors de cause, à moins qu'il ne soit prouvé qu'elle est en faute (2). L'ancien droit admettait des sanctions contre la femme elle-même. Quant à la guerre, elle faisait pâtir les deux partis, mais avait peu d'effet sur la mère de la « divorceuse ». D'autre part, la compensation par la mainmise sur la mère de la divorcée ou sur une épouse du beau-père n'était qu'un moyen de fortune et applicable seulement dans les circonstances favorables, puisqu'elle n'était pas prononcée par les autorités, mais qu'elle était une arrestation par surprise, de par l'initiative purement privée du mari lésé. Par conséquent, à mon avis, elle ne doit pas être tolérée, excepté lorsque la responsabilité de la mère dans la rupture est prouvée.

---

(1) Quant à l'emprisonnement de la « divorceuse », — adaptation de l'etáka, — après avoir réprouvé cette pratique elle en a récemment reconnu la légitimité (avril 1935).

(2) Cfr. supra, art. II, § 2, dernier alinéa.

b) Bien que l'emprisonnement de la femme puisse avoir deux buts et que sa pratique obtienne un double effet : diminuer la fréquence des divorces, en punissant la coupable, et hâter la restitution de la dot, il importe pourtant de les bien distinguer dans la discussion théorique. L'emprisonnement comme punition a été déjà étudié. Ici nous en traitons uniquement comme moyen de faire restituer la dot ou de raccourcir le délai. Ainsi considéré, il est une contrainte par corps. Celle-ci ne peut porter sur la femme, qui n'a pas d'obligation, mais bien sur le père, s'il manque aux devoirs lui imposés par la loi, c'est-à-dire s'il refuse de procéder au remboursement auquel il est obligé par le droit ou s'il omet de prendre les mesures pour pouvoir le faire (ou encore s'il est convaincu de négligence dans le devoir qu'il a d'intervenir auprès de sa fille pour qu'elle respecte ses engagements). Dans la pratique il faudrait que le tort du père existât réellement et que son mauvais vouloir soit établi. L'emprisonnement de la « divorceuse » éviterait que le père fût poursuivi pour une situation contre laquelle il est lui-même incapable de réagir.

c) La tendance en cause pourrait empêcher des femmes de polygames de contracter un mariage monogamique, et, de ce fait, elle pourrait se mettre en opposition avec l'esprit de la loi. Cet inconvénient ne serait pourtant pas difficile à éviter.

En effet, la monogamie jouissant de la faveur du droit écrit, il suffirait d'un contrôle régulier et sérieux sur l'activité des juridictions indigènes.

2° S'agit-il d'une rupture causée par le mari, les partisans de ce système exigent la restitution de la dot seulement dès qu'une nouvelle dot aura été versée, ou plutôt, dès que la femme aura un nouvel époux. Certains vont même plus loin encore et prétendent imposer une restitution seulement partielle : une partie de la dot serait retenue par la famille de la femme en punition de la faute du mari.

Contre cette règle nous devons remarquer :

a) Loin de trouver un point d'appui dans la loi coutumière, elle est en flagrante opposition avec elle (cfr. ci-dessus et plus loin).

b) Elle présente également l'inconvénient de mettre une certaine entrave au développement du mariage monogamique stable. Non pas au mariage monogamique sans plus. Car pour un païen ou un protestant il n'y a aucune difficulté et la règle ne leur nuit pas. Si leur mariage ne tient pas, il leur est toujours loisible d'avoir recours au divorce, de façon que cette règle ne leur soit pas applicable : ils peuvent continuer la cohabitation jusqu'à ce que la femme les abandonne. Pour un catholique la situation est toute différente. Il sait que son mariage religieux est indissoluble. Mais avant de le contracter, la discipline ecclésiastique locale et actuelle l'oblige à payer la dot et, par conséquent, à s'engager dans une union coutumière et à se soumettre à ses règles juridiques, alors qu'en conscience cette dernière union ne saurait être pour lui un mariage. La même chose vaut — mutatis mutandis — pour un catéchumène lorsqu'il s'agit de recevoir le baptême et d'élever par là son mariage coutumier et légitime au rang de sacrement. Supposons que sa femme, tout en voulant rester chez lui, — sincèrement ou pour éviter à ses parents les frais d'un remboursement, — se montre d'un tempérament peu propre à la vie conjugale, ou que sa conduite soit loin d'être conforme à la morale catholique. Dans ces éventualités, le mari s'expose à des suites d'une gravité extrême. Car dans n'importe quel cas, la vie commune deviendra à la longue intenable et la femme abandonnera un jour son époux, qui, de ce fait, se trouvera devant un dilemme très douloureux : ou bien il devra rester célibataire, ou bien il se mettra en opposition flagrante avec sa conscience. Il est donc sage que cette femme le quitte pendant qu'il y a encore moyen d'arranger la situation. Or, la solution que nous discutons ici y oppose des difficultés telles que beaucoup d'hommes en sont rebutés. Et cela au détriment de l'évolution vers un niveau moral supérieur et un meilleur ordre social, bien que le fonctionnement normal des tribunaux indigènes puisse en partie éviter cet inconvénient, en obligeant le père de la femme à hâter le remboursement de la dot.

B. — Les graves inconvénients inhérents au système que nous venons de décrire ont déterminé une autre partie de la population à chercher une solution qui éviterait ces difficultés. Ce sont surtout des chrétiens qui la préconisent. Mais comme ils ont encore très peu d'influence dans le domaine politique, ils n'ont que peu de chances de faire triompher leur opinion. A leur avis il faudrait exiger le remboursement de la dot dans tous les cas, et l'on ne pourrait obliger à restituer immédiatement que lorsque la dot n'a pas encore été dépensée au moment de la rupture. Ils admettent également l'emprisonnement comme sanction contre la « divorceuse ».

Ce système prête également à critique : il est peu conforme à l'esprit de l'ancienne législation indigène, qui permettait au mari l'emploi de moyens propres à se faire rembourser immédiatement.

A mon avis, il faudrait que l'on fît la part des choses, ayant en vue uniquement la protection de l'ordre social par la stabilisation des mariages, d'une part, et, de l'autre, l'évolution vers un ordre meilleur, en favorisant les unions monogamiques, conformément à la législation coloniale et la pratique administrative (¹).

Il nous reste à signaler ici que dans divers endroits les indigènes prétendent que le premier système est prôné par les Européens. C'est leur réponse à l'objection, — que j'ai faite plus d'une fois, — que leur solution manque de conformité avec leur ancienne loi. D'un côté, il faut dire que, à présent, l'Administration ne semble pas patroner leur système. D'autre part, il m'est difficile d'admettre que ce soit une excuse cherchée pour le besoin de la cause. Car j'ai entendu l'affirmation dans la bouche de plus d'un indigène auquel le système faisait clairement et réellement tort. Il n'est pas impossible, pour ces raisons, que, avant l'organisation des juridictions indigènes, l'un ou l'autre agent du Gouvernement ait parlé et agi dans le sens d'une approbation du système en question.

Cette digression sur la pratique à adopter dans la question du remboursement de la dot est devenue longue. Mais son importance capitale pour le développement ultérieur de la société indigène demande cette insistance particulière.

§ 3. Formalités de la restitution.

L'unique formalité de la restitution de la dot est qu'elle doit se faire obligatoirement par l'entremise du (des) ndonga. C'est lui qui, étant le témoin officiel, a compétence pour dire ce qui a été payé. Nul versement, aucun cadeau qui n'a pas passé par ses mains, ou qu'il n'a pas vu, n'est reconnu devoir être restitué. Parfois, en effet, il arrive que certains paiements ont été effectués sans son intervention. On n'en peut exiger la restitution. Le témoin officiel n'en a pas eu connaissance, et par consé-quent il n'y a aucune obligation d'en tenir compte. Seulement, il reste toujours la possibilité des transactions à l'amiable.

---

(¹) Cfr. aussi le chap. VI, art. VII, § 7, et l'article sur « La réaction indigène contre les divorces », dans Congo, 1935, t. I, p. 11.

Si les ndonga étaient tous morts entre-temps, la procédure n'en souffre pourtant pas, car l'hérédité de leur office est reconnue par le droit nkundó. Son frère, fils, etc. peut agir au nom du défunt, qui, parfois longtemps avant sa mort, lui a donné toutes les explications nécessaires et utiles. Le témoignage du successeur est reconnu légitime et valide.

D'autre part, le ndonga peut être assisté, et son témoignage corroboré, voire rectifié, par d'autres hommes intègres et influents qui ont été présents aux versements. Il est clair que ceci a été établi par la loi coutumière, afin d'obtenir le meilleur résultat possible dans l'exercice de la justice.

Ceci se conçoit d'autant plus facilement que les versements sont nombreux, différents, séparés par des intervalles et effectués pendant toute la durée de l'union conjugale. D'où longues discussions et contestations.

Il n'est pas sans intérêt d'attirer spécialement l'attention sur cette nécessité du témoignage du ndonga dans le remboursement de la dot, parce que cette règle n'est pas toujours bien observée. Ainsi j'ai connu le cas suivant : un capitaine de bateau, originaire de la Haute-Ikelemba, prend comme concubine une fille de cette région-ci. L'absence de ndonga et l'omission d'une véritable dot prouvaient leur volonté de ne pas s'engager dans un mariage légitime. Pourtant, l'homme versait des valeurs (surtout argent et étoffes) aux parents de la femme. A la fin de ce concubinage, qui avait duré d'assez longues années, l'ensemble des cadeaux s'élevait à une valeur de plus de 1.000 francs. Après la séparation, le mari réclame la possession de la fille née de l'union. Le tribunal, chargé d'examiner le cas, ordonne — avec l'approbation de l'administrateur — la restitution des paiements effectués et attribue l'enfant à son père naturel, moyennant l'observation des règles coutumières (Cfr. l'article suivant). Le père de la femme avait assez le sens de l'honnêteté pour restituer les cadeaux, — bien que, légalement, il n'y eût pour lui aucune obligation, — mais il réclamait l'enfant de sa fille. Toutefois le tribunal ne voulut rien entendre à ses réclamations, quoique, devant le droit nkundó il eût dû lui rendre justice.

En dehors de cette intervention des témoins, il n'y a aucune formalité spéciale dans la restitution de la dot. On y procède selon les règles prescrites par les coutumes et convenances nkundó, pour n'importe quelle discussion en assemblée familiale ou clanique. Le tout étant terminé, l'ayant droit ramasse et prend avec lui son dû.

§ 4. Matières de la restitution.

De part et d'autre, tous les versements effectués doivent être restitués : dot dans toutes ses constituantes, part de la mère, cadeaux, paiements à l'occasion d'un décès, etc., d'un côté et de l'autre, contre-dot (nkɔmí) et cadeaux divers. Tout cela est matière à restitution. La qualité des personnes qui ont payé ou touché n'importe pas, pourvu qu'elles soient réellement de la parenté et que le témoignage du ndonga reconnaisse le versement. Mais c'est le père seul qui doit au gendre.

Les discussions sur la quantité et la qualité des valeurs étant terminées, tout est additionné des deux côtés. Puis on fait la soustraction. Le restant est remis à qui de droit. Supposons que les valeurs dotales se chiffrent au total de 125 anneaux de cuivre (1), tandis que le nkɔmí (contre-dot payée par la famille de la femme) atteint la somme de 60 anneaux. Le mari a droit seulement à 125—60=65 anneaux. Si la dot et la contre-dot sont égales, aucun paiement de restitution n'est effectué. Si la contre-dot surpasse la dot, c'est le mari qui doit rembourser l'excédent. Toutefois, dans la pratique on ne pousse pas la rigueur à l'extrême et par politesse complaisante on laisse même au mari une dizaine d'anneaux. Mais cette éventualité ne se réalise que lorsque la femme ne lui a pas donné de progéniture. Car le fait d'accepter ces anneaux et d'omettre le paiement auquel en théorie il est obligé le priverait des droits sur ses enfants qui tous appartiendraient désormais à leur clan maternel. Faire ce calcul différentiel s'appelle umanya, et à l'intransitif = umana (jěngi la nkɔmí bámana).

---

(1) Comme il a été dit au chap. II, tout paiement peut être ramené à une valeur en anneaux de cuivre.

En principe, c'est entre la contre-dot et les cadeaux (belonga) que se fait le décompte. Pourtant, si les belonga ne suffisent pas, on retranche aux paiements dotaux proprement dits les valeurs manquantes.

Toutefois, le bɔsɔ́ngɔ (¹) n'entre jamais en ligne de compte. C'est que, disent les indigènes, il constitue un paiement à part auquel on ne touche pas. Supposons le montant des belonga et autres paiements inférieur à la contre-dot : même dans ce cas on ne retranche rien au bɔsɔ́ngɔ. Il doit toujours être restitué intégralement.

Quant aux esclaves ou aux animaux domestiques, non seulement tombent-ils sous la loi du remboursement, mais en outre toute leur progéniture doit être restituée, même si elle comprend plusieurs générations. Cette prescription s'entend dans la ligne féminine (comparez l'ancien adage romain : partus sequitur ventrem). On excepte pourtant poules et canards.

Pour indiquer que de part et d'autre on est obligé de restituer absolument tout ce qui a été versé, on emploie l'expression : lá nsɔngi lá lɔkéé = même l'aiguille et le menu rasoir.

(¹) Cfr. chap. II, art. IX.

Le remboursement de la dot dans le cas où la femme retourne à son premier mari n'est régi par aucune règle spéciale. On restitue tout simplement au second son dû. Souvent la famille de l'épouse fait appel à la générosité du premier mari, afin de hâter le remboursement.

Si la femme abandonne le second mari aussi bien que le premier, sans que celui-ci ait été préalablement remboursé, il y a restitution aux deux.

Nous avons vu que le premier mari peut s'emparer des valeurs dotales de son rival pour s'indemniser du dommage que celui-ci lui a causé. La famille de la femme ne doit pas restituer ces valeurs-là, car elle ne les a pas touchées. Cette affaire ne la regarde donc pas, mais uniquement les deux rivaux. Nonobstant tout le droit du premier mari, cette façon d'agir suscitait souvent une guerre. C'est par crainte de rixes et autres suites désagréables que cette pratique est actuellement abandonnée. Pourtant l'idée n'en est pas morte, comme le montre le cas suivant, arrivé en 1932 :

Engóndó de Lóngá (Nkóle) fait la connaissance de Bosénjá, fille de Bokelé wá Yelemeya, de Ntómbá (Wângatá). Celle-ci, mariée à un travailleur de Lóngá (Ekonda), nommé Iɔngú et originaire des Boángi, quitte celui-ci pour suivre son nouvel amant, qui paie l'ikulá-ndanga (9 anneaux et 35 francs). Après x mois, l'union ne tient plus. Bosénjá ne convient pas comme épouse. Entre autres défauts, on lui reproche de ne pas aimer la mère et les autres parents de son fiancé, de ne les aider ni respecter. Après la rupture, le père Bokelé refuse de restituer quoi que ce soit, en répondant à Engóndó : « Tu n'avais qu'à laisser la femme d'autrui tranquille ».

Tout cela est pourtant en opposition flagrante avec le droit nkundó. 1° Engóndó était en tort, en prenant chez lui l'épouse d'autrui. 2° Iɔngú aurait pu — au moment du versement — ravir à Engóndó ses valeurs ; c'était son droit. Mais, 3° Bokelé est également en faute. L'affaire de débauchement et l'adultère ne le regarde pas, lui, mais loongú. Si la façon d'agir d'Engóndó ne lui plaisait pas, il n'avait qu'à s'y prendre d'autre manière. A présent il a en mains des valeurs dotales auxquelles il n'a plus aucun droit : il n'a qu'à restituer.

CONCLUSION.

La nature et les diverses circonstances du remboursement dotal pourraient suggérer la conclusion que ces capitaux ne sont pas acquis définitivement, mais qu'ils constituent plutôt des gages. Les quelques exceptions où le remboursement n'a pas lieu ne sauraient infirmer cette manière de voir. En effet, ce sont des exceptions nettement motivées. Leur raison d'être consiste en ce que la non-restitution est compensée par ailleurs (1).

Pourtant cette conclusion ne tient plus lorsqu'on compare à tout cela ce qui a lieu lors de la rupture du mariage par le décès. Dans ce dernier cas, en effet, on ne restitue absolument rien : tout ce qui a été donné de part et d'autre reste définitivement acquis. On n'exige même aucun paiement pour les enfants. (Cfr. ci-après.)

Pourquoi cette différence fondamentale ? La raison qui s'impose est que — originairement et fondamentalement — les valeurs dotales deviennent la propriété de la partie réceptrice. La restitution lors du divorce est nécessitée par les circonstances : sans elle la femme ne pourrait plus se remarier. C'est une concession faite à sa faiblesse. Des deux règles diamétralement opposées : restitution et non-restitution, l'une doit être primitive et primordiale, l'autre accessoire et surajoutée. Cette dernière est la règle du divorce.

---

(1) Cette constatation — comme d'autres indiquées plus haut — pourraient nous faire penser que dans l'esprit des Nkundó la guerre et autres pratiques sanglantes ne sont que des moyens peu recommandables et que, au fond de leur mentalité, ces gens les désapprouvent.

Cette conclusion se trouve fortement confirmée par toutes les autres stipulations du droit nkundó relativement au divorce, ses motifs et la façon d'y procéder.

ARTICLE IV. — PAYEMENT POUR ENFANTS.

La règle qui exige la restitution de la totalité des valeurs versées comporte une restriction, que nous allons étudier. Cette restriction est le paiement pour enfants.

Si des enfants sont nés de l'union rompue, le père doit laisser à la famille de la femme 10 à 15 (à présent jusqu'à 20 et 25) anneaux de cuivre pour chaque enfant, garçon ou fille. Si après défalcation de la contre-dot il ne lui reste pas de valeurs en quantité suffisante, il doit combler le déficit par d'autres moyens. Celui qui ne cède pas ces valeurs ne peut plus faire valoir aucun droit sur ses enfants. Ils appartiennent désormais à la famille de leur mère.

Si le divorce intervient avant le versement du bọsọ́ngọ, le mari est en outre obligé d'effectuer ce dernier pour obtenir droit à ses enfants. S'il refuse de s'acquitter de cette obligation, la famille de l'épouse peut lui ravir un enfant à titre de compensation.

C'est lors de la discussion sur la restitution de la dot que le mari doit se désister des biens exigés pour régler la situation des enfants. La totalité des valeurs auxquelles il a droit lui ayant été transmise par le ndonga, il doit en prélever le montant du paiement pour les enfants et le rendre à la famille de la femme. L'abstention de cet acte équivaut à l'abandon de ses droits.

La famille de la femme ne fait aucun effort pour conserver les enfants issus du mariage rompu. Elle insiste, au contraire, auprès du mari pour qu'il leur cède les valeurs requises, afin qu'il conserve ses droits sur sa progéniture légitime. Toutefois, elle ne peut le forcer : le père est entièrement libre de prendre ses enfants ou de leur préférer la partie de la dot en question. Mais il est obligé de choisir entre les deux alternatives.

Tout indigène tient à ses enfants. Aussi l'insouciance à leur égard et le fait de préférer reprendre l'entièreté de la dot sont tout à fait exceptionnels. Pourtant on rencontre des cas, comme celui-ci :

Bumba, fille de Loótá, de Bokenyola (Losenge, Bombwanja), est mariée à Elímílęlę, de Lǫsǫ́fi. Après x années de mariage, celui-ci répudie sa femme enceinte, je ne sais pourquoi. On a beau lui représenter la stupidité de son acte, rien n'y fait. Bumba retourne donc chez son frère Ifásó et y accouche d'une fille. Ifásó invite le père à venir voir son enfant et en même temps à se réconcilier avec son épouse. Refus de la part d'Elímílęlę. Après un certain temps Bumba est mariée à un autre homme, mais cette union ne tient pas. On lui substitue une bankilsá, et Bumba est épousée par Bokángo, de Bokengé. Celui-ci paie pour elle une dot de 80 anneaux. Elímílęlę est invité à venir recevoir son dû. Cette fois il s'amène. Il prend tout, sans laisser la moindre chose comme paiement pour sa fille. On le prie de se désister de 25 anneaux, pour ne pas être privé de ses droits sur l'enfant. Il ne veut rien entendre : il préfère reprendre la dot en son entier. Cette fille, Bombúla, est sur le point de se marier à Bolongólokolo, de Bompela (Bokátola). La dot qui doit être versée sera touchée par son clan maternel, tandis que son père ne recevra rien du tout. Plus jamais il ne pourra réclamer le moindre paiement de la part de son gendre. Celui-ci n'est d'ailleurs que son gendre naturel : au point de vue juridique, Elímílęlę n'est pas son beau-père. Bombúla, de son côté, ne doit plus reconnaître son père, puisqu'il l'a reniée. Elle appartient uniquement à son clan maternel, et la famille de son père ne pourra plus jamais faire valoir aucun droit sur elle, ni sur sa descendance.

Notons, pour finir, que, dans le « bas » de la région étudiée on commence à effectuer un paiement pour un enfant naturel, soit qu'il y ait eu début de versement de dot, soit qu'il n'y en ait pas eu du tout. Autrefois, il n'était nullement question de pareille pratique : dans son clan paternel, en effet, et surtout dans les villages environnants, l'enfant aurait été considéré comme esclave. Et l'on peut dire qu'actuellement encore, dans les villages de l'intérieur et pratiquement dans toute la région dont nous traitons, cette mentalité n'a pas changé. Ce sont les centres européens qui permettent l'éclosion de cette coutume, sous l'influence des idées chrétiennes. Pratiquement, les cas ne se présentent que lorsque les personnes en question sont originaires de villages fort distants et sont établies définitivement (pour autant qu'on peut employer ce terme) dans leur résidence extracoutumière.

ARTICLE V.

SITUATION DES ANCIENS ÉPOUX ET DE LEURS ENFANTS.

Une fois la palabre du remboursement des valeurs arrangée, les anciens conjoints deviennent des étrangers l'un pour l'autre.

Leurs familles, cependant, continuent parfois les relations mutuelles. En effet, nous avons vu que la femme divorcée peut être remplacée dans ses fonctions conjugales par une parente. Dans ce cas, les relations d'alliance sont produites par la persistance du pacte dotal [1].

A part ces cas de substitution, tout lien est donc rompu tant entre les anciens époux qu'entre leurs clans respectifs.

La femme divorcée ne peut plus faire valoir le moindre droit sur les cultures qu'elle a établies sur le terrain défriché par son époux. En général, tous les fruits de ses activités diverses restent la propriété du mari; elle-même n'y a plus aucun droit. Il n'est pourtant pas rare, de nos jours, que des conjoints, lors de leur séparation définitive, partagent certains bénéfices de leur travail commun, comme argent, habits, étoffes, ustensiles de ménage (1).

---

[1] Cfr. chap. III, art. IX.

Quant aux enfants issus de ce mariage, ils résident soit chez leur père, soit chez leur mère, d'après les circonstances. Ils se rendent en visite de l'un à l'autre. Aussi longtemps qu'ils sont encore en bas âge, ils demeurent presque toujours chez leur mère. Dès qu'ils commencent à pouvoir s'en tirer eux-mêmes (entre 8 et 14 ans, d'après les cas), ils vont habiter chez leur père. Les filles séjournent souvent plus longtemps chez leur mère, parfois même jusqu'au mariage.

Les parents ne se montrent pas difficiles et ne se cherchent pas misère pour cette question. Ce n'est que lorsqu'un enfant demeure pour ainsi dire continuellement chez l'un des deux que l'attachement de l'autre à son enfant devient jaloux.

Lorsque arrive le moment de toucher la dot, les parents font valoir leurs droits respectifs. Pour les garçons, lorsqu'ils désirent prendre femme, le père leur procure la somme nécessaire pour servir de dot. Si le jeune homme n'obtient pas satisfaction il peut toujours s'adresser à ses oncles maternels, qui ne manqueront pas à leur devoir d'amour familial, — à moins qu'ils n'en trouvent pas les moyens, — et leur clan sera accru d'un nouveau foyer.

Bref, le divorce sépare les conjoints, rompt l'alliance spéciale entre les deux familles, mais les enfants continuent à traiter leurs parents comme s'ils étaient encore unis. Et cela d'une façon toute naturelle, sans contention aucune; pour les Nkundó cette chose est toute simple, et ils y sont parfaitement habitués, puisque les divorces ne sont pas si rares.

---

(1) Cfr. chap. VI, art. II.

ARTICLE VI.

PRATIQUES D'ENVOUTEMENT RELATIVES AU DIVORCE.

Il ne me semble pas dépourvu d'intérêt de consacrer quelques lignes aux pratiques d'envoûtement qui sont en vogue parmi nos populations et employées à l'occasion du divorce. Nous ne parlons pas des philtres d'amour; à proprement parler ils ne seraient pas à leur place ici (1). Nous nous bornons donc à donner une idée générale des pratiques en usage, soit pour empêcher la femme de quitter son mari, soit pour se venger d'un divorce, soit pour faire revenir la fugitive.

Comme on le comprendra, ces buts s'enchevêtrent souvent.

1° La trinité ikę́táki-itǫ́kǫ-ntómbá est considérée par les indigènes comme trois pratiques apparentées. Nous y voyons plutôt trois formes d'une même pratique.

Toutes trois sont originaires des Ntómbá du lac Tumba et de là ont été introduites chez les Nkundó, — directement, ou indirectement, par certaines tribus Ekonda intermédiaires, — et cela aux temps modernes. Avant la colonisation elles étaient inconnues ici. Actuellement même elles ne sont pas encore répandues partout : elles n'ont pas encore traversé la Momboyo. L'ordre chronologique d'introduction est ikę́táki, itǫ́kǫ, ntómbá.

Leur esprit animateur est le léopard. Leur but primordial est de rappeler une épouse infidèle et, devant son obstination, de la tuer, elle ou son séducteur. Subsidiairement, elles servent aussi à donner la mort à un ennemi quelconque, spécialement à titre de représailles.

Les trois pratiques diffèrent dans le procédé de fabrication et le mode d'emploi. Nous ne pouvons entrer dans le détail de tout cela; ce serait sortir du cadre de cette étude.

---

(1) Cfr. chap. I. Ire partie, art. VIII.

Qu'il nous suffise de dire que le propriétaire de la pratique à la compétence duquel on a recours commence par appeler la femme, au moyen d'une corne d'antilope, dans laquelle il souffle surtout le matin très tôt au chant du coq (1). Si l'appelée ne revient pas, la pratique se vengera, soit sur elle, soit sur son amant, selon le désir de l'opérateur. Il faut pourtant une nouvelle intervention, dont le procédé varie d'après la forme adoptée. Notons que dans la conception indigène l'épouse ne saurait pas ne pas entendre l'appel, à quelque distance qu'elle se trouve. Si elle ne revient pas, c'est qu'elle s'obstine et mérite la punition.

L'esprit de vengeance est seul en cause dans :

2° Le ngǫndę́. Celui-ci vient de la région de Coquilhatville ou de plus loin encore. Le nom ngǫndę́ est la forme lolingá du mot lonkundó nkǫndę́, qui signifie gavial. De fait les dents de ce reptile entrent dans sa composition. Il est employé pour punir de la mort un voleur quelconque. De ce fait il est déclaré efficace contre quiconque veut débaucher la femme d'autrui. Il produira chez le coupable des gonflements des pieds, qui s'ouvriront en purulant. Jusqu'à présent cette pratique n'a, pas plus que les précédentes, traversé la Momboyo.

Ces usages, comme beaucoup d'autres, sont donc d'introduction récente. Avant l'arrivée des Européens dans ces parages-ci, on y connaissait seulement les philtres d'amour. On comprend pourtant aisément que les Nkundó ont accueilli avec joie et confiance ces nouvelles pratiques, si utiles, — à leur avis, — spécialement dans une matière d'une importance capitale et dans laquelle la colonisation leur a enlevé les moyens anciens de réaction et de sanctionnement.

---

(1) De cette façon les indigènes appellent aussi leurs enfants, etc., partis depuis longtemps dans « le Bas » et qu'ils désirent ardemment voir revenir chez eux.

CHAPITRE IX.

LA MORT.

Comme le sujet de notre étude est uniquement le mariage des Nkundó, c'est sous cet angle restreint que nous envisagerons ce qui se rapporte à leur mort. Quant aux aspects généraux de la question, le lecteur les trouvera dans notre article sur les coutumes funéraires des Nkundó, sous presse, dans Anthropos.

ARTICLE I. — CHAGRIN ET DEUIL.

Dans l'étude précitée un mot a été touché des divers degrés d'intensité que peut atteindre le chagrin causé par la mort d'un être chéri.

La douleur, certes, n'exclut pas toujours un mélange d'éléments égoïstes, tel qu'un regret de la perte financière qu'est le décès d'une épouse et l'obligation à la continence et aux divers interdits du veuvage. C'est une chose assez naturelle et qui ne mériterait pas d'être relevée. D'autre part, il serait injuste et contraire à la vérité d'attribuer toute la tristesse à l'influence de ces sentiments inférieurs. En général, il faut voir aussi dans ce chagrin la preuve d'un amour véritable qui souvent en est la cause prépondérante. On rencontre des exceptions cependant, par exemple lorsqu'il s'agit d'une femme âgée, héritée par un polygame.

En comparant les diverses manifestations de la douleur à la mort d'un conjoint avec celles observées à la mort d'un parent, nous remarquons quelques pratiques propres au premier cas. On dirait qu'en ces circonstances les marques de chagrin atteignent leur point culminant, comme si la loi indigène voulait souligner la prépondérance de la relation créée par le mariage sur les liens de la parenté et ainsi manifester son accord avec la loi divine.

Toutefois il est clair que la pratique ne correspond pas toujours à la théorie, pas plus ici qu'ailleurs. Nous ne devons pas nous étonner de ne pas trouver chez ces populations l'amour parfait et idéal, pur de tout égoïsme. Quand déjà chez les peuples universellement qualifiés de « supérieurs » il n'est ni rare ni répréhensible de rencontrer ces retours sur soi dans la douleur ressentie à la mort d'un être cher, peut-on se scandaliser de ce que nos indigènes éprouvent des regrets pareils? Condamne-t-on une jeune veuve qui, tout en regrettant vivement et sincèrement l'époux tendrement aimé que la mort vient de ravir à son affection, pense en même temps à la situation malheureuse qui en résulte pour elle et ses petits enfants? Et l'espoir fondé de trouver quelqu'un qui prendra soin d'elle et des orphelins n'est-il pas une consolation efficace et légitime qui l'aidera à supporter l'épreuve?

Rien d'étonnant donc qu'il en soit ainsi, toutes proportions gardées, de nos Noirs. Et il est assez naturel que, en pratique, ils ressentent une plus grande douleur de la mort d'un père et surtout d'une mère ou d'un enfant, que de la perte d'un mari ou d'une épouse. La situation est toute différente ici et en Europe. Et le régime polygamique avec ses conséquences n'est pas précisément de nature à décourager l'égoïsme et à favoriser l'ascension vers l'idéal d'un amour plus sublime.

Ne soyons donc pas surpris d'entendre une femme se lamenter à la mort du mari : ngóy'ôm'ôkám óye ! = maman, mon mari, ah! Mais pour un enfant ou pour un père ou une mère : ngóya njôlélengana óye ! = maman, je suis privée, ah!, exprimant ainsi un chagrin plus intense. Car un père ou une mère ne se remplacent pas, tandis qu'elle trouvera toujours quelqu'un qui voudra l'épouser. Quant à l'enfant il y a une communauté de vie plus étroite entre lui et ses parents qu'entre conjoints dans le régime polygamique. Il y a aussi plus de marques de tendresse de mère à enfant, et réciproquement, qu'entre époux indigènes.

Immédiatement après le décès de son épouse, le mari se voit entouré de toutes les femmes du village qui viennent le maltraiter. Elles l'enduisent à qui mieux mieux de noir de charbon de bois, de terre, de boue et le frottent avec la plante linsânsă, qui cause des urtications semblables à celles des orties d'Europe. Parmi les femmes qui commettent ces brutalités il n'y a aucune parente, mais uniquement des étrangères mariées dans le village (celles qu'on nomme baájdála). Ces mauvais traitements sont étendus souvent aux proches parents du veuf, c'est-à-dire à ceux que les femmes en question nomment baóme = maris et avec lesquels elles pourraient se marier, jamais aux pères et aux parents supérieurs (1). La raison de cette pratique semble être d'intensifier par des douleurs matérielles le chagrin causé par le décès. A cela s'ajoutent les paroles, gestes et mouvements obscènes de provocation, pour bien rappeler au veuf que désormais il devra vivre dans la continence, comme on peut lire in extenso dans l'étude citée.

Ensuite, des parents revêtent le veuf d'un lisáki = feuille de bananier déchirée partout transversalement. Pour les divers autres habits de deuil, cfr. l'étude détaillée, comme pour toutes les prescriptions et défenses communes.

Les mauvais traitements décrits ne sont pas infligés à la veuve. Ils sont appliqués exclusivement aux hommes.

Pendant la réclusion, les règles générales valent pour le veuf; elles sont même d'une sévérité particulière pour lui. Ce sont ses parentes qui lui préparent ses frustes repas. Toutefois, si les relations étaient excellentes avec son beau-père, celui-ci lui envoie une femme qui pourvoira à ses besoins. Souvent elle deviendra son épouse, lorsque, après la levée du deuil, il portera l'ibóleóko (chapitre III, art. IV).

---

(1) Cfr. chap. V, art. IV, § 1, n° 2, et chap. VI, art. VI.

Durant toute la première période de la réclusion, il ne peut se rendre nulle part, du moins ostensiblement. S'il est obligé de sortir, il doit le faire par derrière. S'il désire aller chez un parent ou ami, il doit passer derrière les cases, dans la bananeraie, même s'il sort le soir. En tout cas, il ne peut quitter le village. Telle était la loi ancienne, qui, maintenant, est de moins en moins observée.

Ensuite, à l'exception de ses parentes, il ne peut avoir le moindre rapport avec une femme. Il ne peut même pas lui donner la main, ni la saluer de vive voix, ni la regarder ne fût-ce qu'au passage.

L'incontinence est sévèrement punie par la morte : elle moleste le coupable, voire l'entraîne au tombeau, lui-même ou une autre personne endeuillée.

La rigueur de la réclusion s'atténue lors de la cérémonie par laquelle débute le retour du veuf à la couchette élevée du sol, une espèce de lit fait, à la manière des Batswá, de troncs d'arbre ou de branches. Après avoir été lavé par la sœur aînée de la défunte, il y est conduit par la femme de son frère aîné. Ayant reçu de son père un couteau, il peut désormais vaquer à ses travaux usuels.

Les dispenses progressives des interdits alimentaires doivent être achetées par le veuf (veuve), — contrairement aux parents, qui se font simplement délier. (Coutumes funéraires, II, n° 2, E.) Cette divergence prouve la différence foncière qui existe entre le deuil d'un conjoint et celui d'un parent; pour le premier, obligation sociale stricte dont il ne peut être délié que par un achat, sorte de compensation ou de commutation; pour le second, convenance dont on est libéré sans cérémonie ni compensation aucunes. Le fait que cette prescription est étendue aux proches parents du veuf (de la veuve) n'infirme pas la conclusion. Au contraire, il la corrobore. Car elle reste manifestement dans la ligne du mariage et jamais elle ne s'étend aux parents du défunt.

Au décès du mari, les veuves et les femmes de ses proches parents achètent les dispenses aux parentes du défunt. A la mort d'une épouse, le mari et ses proches parents les achètent à leurs propres femmes. Le produit global de l'achat fait par toutes les personnes en cause doit être partagé : une moitié revient aux femmes mariées dans le clan; l'autre moitié est réservée à la famille de la défunte.

Le deuil du veuf avec toutes les prescriptions et défenses inhérentes se termine, comme tout deuil, par une grande fête. Après s'être acquitté de ses devoirs, la famille de la défunte organise chez elle une seconde fête, à laquelle le veuf doit assister. C'est à cette occasion, généralement, qu'ont lieu les pourparlers au sujet du remplacement de la défunte. (Chap. III, art. IV.)

ARTICLE II. — RÉCLUSION DES VEUVES.

Comme je l'ai décrit dans l'article mentionné, les veuves (bituka, sing. etuka, ou, chez les Bombwanja, besámanyi, sing. bosámanyi) sont, pendant une longue période, astreintes à la réclusion. Avant la cérémonie de la levée de terre elles ne peuvent pas sortir ostensiblement. Plus tard, une plus grande liberté leur est permise; elles peuvent aller partout pour leurs travaux, voire se rendre aux marchés. Seulement, elles sont obligées de passer la nuit dans la case de réclusion commune.

Une veuve qui ne se conformerait pas à ces prescriptions et prohibitions, non seulement serait vivement critiquée comme n'ayant pas aimé son mari (et, conséquemment, soupçonnée d'avoir causé sa mort par des maléfices), mais s'exposerait en outre à la colère vengeresse du défunt, qui la molesterait dans son sommeil, la rosserait de coups lorsqu'elle se rend seule en forêt, ou encore viendrait la prendre pour l'emmener avec lui dans l'autre monde.

Autant que faire se peut, toutes les veuves sont réunies dans une seule et même case. Afin de compléter la séparation du monde, on ferme l'entrée au moyen d'un cercle de palmes, comme cela se fait pour la case de réclusion d'une femme qui allaite, d'une bolúmbú ou d'une femme possédée de l'esprit du bongóli (yëbola). C'est pour éviter que les veuves n'aient de relations avec les passants.

Le nom de la case de réclusion est lokásá (même mot que « feuille »). Les Bombwanja emploient le mot lokombí (de komba=fermer, clôturer), les Injóló et Boángi, lonkindá (7).

Pendant la dernière période de la réclusion, les veuves ne peuvent pas recevoir les visites d'amants qui désirent les courtiser en vue du mariage après le deuil, mais elles ont le droit d'en accepter des vivres divers et du bois de chauffage. Ces services rendus par des étrangers, c'est-à-dire non apparentés aux héritiers, sont plutôt mal vus. Car, en principe, les veuves appartiennent à ceux-ci; elles sont leurs épouses, puisque le contrat financier du mariage persiste (8). Pourtant, si ces hommes ne sont pas en inimitié avec les héritiers, on ne s'y oppose guère. Car, la réclusion terminée, les veuves sont libres de se disperser dans leurs familles respectives et d'y être prises en mariage par n'importe qui peut payer la dot. Il n'est pourtant pas permis aux prétendants d'entrer dans la case de réclusion, même pas dans cette période. Ils doivent donc faire passer les cadeaux par l'intermédiaire des biúnanyí (sing. eúnanyí), c'est-à-dire les parentes du défunt.

Cette dernière période débute par la cérémonie de la levée de terre. On fait monter les veuves sur les beóngá

---

(7) Les Ekonda : [illegible].

(8) Cfr. chap. III, art. IX.

=bákondeja bituka ndá beóngá. Les beóngá sont des branches fendues du parasolier, qui, posées sur des branches longitudinales, à leur tour fixées sur des pieux, constituent une couchette primitive, qui est le lit authentique des Batswá, mais est parfois employé aussi par les Baotó, s'ils n'ont rien de mieux. C'est là-dessus que, désormais, les veuves peuvent prendre leur repos; elles peuvent « se lever du sol ». Ces branches de parasolier sont nommées beóngá, sing. boóngá=bois mort, sec. On emploie aussi le même radical avec d'autres préfixes : eóngá, pl. bióngá; loóngá, pl. mbóngá. Le verbe est áta=fendre, ou fanja=tailler. A présent on commence à mitiger la sévérité de cette coutume en remplaçant les beóngá par des beánga ou lits transportables en claie.

Cette cérémonie est accompagnée de quelques danses et aspergée d'un peu de bière. Le chef de famille adresse la parole aux veuves en ces termes : « Nous avons fendu pour vous des beóngá; montez dessus ». Ensuite il leur présente quelques poules, données par la parenté du défunt. Elles les prépareront et les mangeront toutes.

A cette occasion le chef de famille remet au premier-né du défunt la bosóló à laquelle il a droit. Comme il est dit au chapitre III, article III, c'est une des veuves qui lui est ainsi donnée en épouse. Elle sort immédiatement du groupe des veuves; désormais elle n'est plus liée par aucune obligation du deuil et va cohabiter avec son nouveau mari. Toutefois, si elle aimait beaucoup le défunt, elle prie l'héritier de la laisser tranquille pendant quelque temps; ses désirs sont toujours respectés.

La réclusion se termine par une grande fête qui clôture le deuil. C'est lors de cette fête qu'on procède au partage de l'héritage, dont les veuves font également partie. Nous en traiterons à l'article V.

ARTICLE III. — L'ENTERREMENT.

L'enterrement du mari ne comporte aucune cérémonie ni règles spéciales qui ne soient communes à l'inhumation de toute autre personne. Seulement, des parentes doivent « acheter la tombe », c'est-à-dire payer aux femmes mariées dans la famille quelques anneaux pour obtenir la permission de l'inhumation. Ce paiement est à rapprocher de ceux faits pour obtenir les dispenses des interdits alimentaires.

Les personnes enterrées simultanément et dans la même fosse que le cadavre d'un homme influent ne sont jamais ses veuves, mais uniquement des esclaves [1].

Le Nkundó doit être enterré sur les terres de ses ancêtres, au cimetière clanique. Or, comme le régime de ce peuple est exogamique, il est évident que le cadavre d'une femme mariée est transporté dans son village d'origine pour y recevoir la sépulture.

Avant d'être transporté, le cadavre reçoit les soins usuels, avec les immolations concomitantes. Il doit passer au moins une nuit dans la maison du mari. Et cela s'observe encore présentement. Autrefois il y restait des jours entiers; car il fallait d'abord célébrer la fête d'adieu, et la famille du veuf devait se rassembler pour discuter l'affaire et pour réunir les valeurs nécessaires au paiement funéraire (art. suivant). Ce n'est qu'après tout cela que des jeunes gens appartenant à la famille du mari prennent sur leurs épaules la dépouille mortelle enveloppée dans une natte ou enfermée dans un cercueil, selon les cas.

Toute la parenté du mari prend part au cortège, si faire se peut. Les porteurs du cadavre marchent en tête. Les hommes sont armés d'arcs, de flèches, de couteaux et de bâtons, rarement de lances. Les femmes accompagnent en se lamentant. Le mari et, si nécessaire, quelques parents portent avec eux les divers objets dont ils auront besoin pour les paiements. Certains hommes ont un lolótai (ocarina) (6) ou une corne d'antilope, sur lesquels ils jouent par intermittence (7). Au moment de lever le cadavre et en passant par les villages intermédiaires on bat le lokolé à coups réguliers et égaux (-kémya), pour annoncer l'arrivée du cortège funèbre.

---

[1] Voir Coutumes funéraires, V, 2°.

Le principal personnage parmi ceux qui suivent le cadavre n'est pas le mari, mais le ndonga. Il ne peut jamais être absent dans cette circonstance. Même si le mari était mort et qu'il s'agit d'une veuve non remariée, le ndonga doit toujours être de la partie. C'est à lui avant tout autre qu'incombe le devoir de porter le cadavre d'une femme mariée.

Il se peut que le ndonga ait déjà devancé le cortège pour communiquer à la famille de la morte la nouvelle du décès et que, à cause de la grande distance entre le village de la femme et celui du mari, il n'ait pas, ou difficilement, pu revenir pour rejoindre le cortège.

L'action de porter le cadavre dans le clan natal n'est pas désignée par un terme spécifique. On dit simplement Isika ilékí = aller remettre le cadavre.

Près de l'entrée du village, à un ou plusieurs endroits, une barrière (bokóko, lokombí ou loálaka) a été dressée, faite de pieux et de palmes. Les parents de la défunte, armés, y attendent le cortège des parents du mari, également armés, et leur interdisent la continuation de leur marche. Avant de passer outre, ces derniers doivent faire un paiement. Les valeurs données sont nommées byɛ́kɔ by'ôkóko ou simplement bokóko (ou loálaka). La famille de la défunte crie au cortège : « Halte ! ici vous ne passez point ». Les autres répondent : « Nous venons vous apporter le cadavre de votre enfant; nous voulons abattre la barrière; laissez-nous passer; voici les cadeaux. » Le ndonga remet un couteau, un anneau de cuivre ou de laiton, ou quelque autre objet équivalent (par exemple de l'argent actuellement). Là-dessus, les membres du clan de la défunte s'écartent. Les bánambólamá (personnes apparentées aux deux clans) abattent la barrière, et le cortège passe, ouvert par le ndonga et les bánambólamá. Le mari suit le cercueil.

---

(6) Voir ma « Note sur les Instruments de Musique à l'Equateur », dans Congo, 1935, t. II, juillet, p. [illegible] fig. 1 et 2 (p. [illegible]).

(7) Parfois des tambours accompagnent aussi.

Autrefois le passage de la barrière devait presque toujours être forcé. La famille de la femme ne voulant pas ouvrir et celle du mari ne voulant pas payer, on en venait aux mains. Le groupe porteur du cadavre essayait d'abattre la barrière, tandis que leurs adversaires tâchaient de les en empêcher. Les armes employées dans cette rixe sont surtout des bâtons pointus que les deux camps se lancent, plus rarement des flèches. Cette bagarre porte le nom spécifique d'ękɔkɛlá. Certains clans sont spécialisés dans ce sport. Ainsi entre Boimbo et Lileko, c'est chaque fois une bataille en règle. Dans pareils cas sérieux, la barrière est très fortifiée : pieux gros et durs, entrelacés de lianes épineuses (bokau, lǫngǫli, wanganjála, etc.) et d'arbrisseaux épineux (ndangé, etc.). On y ajoute une quantité de fourmis mordantes ou venimeuses (bafumba, nkínkiá, bojǫnkǫ, etc.). Si la bagarre s'aggrave, le ndonga et les autres bánambólamá interviennent et imposent la paix, en obligeant le clan du mari à payer.

Il peut pourtant arriver que la famille du mari, ne parvenant pas à vaincre leurs adversaires et persistant malgré tout dans la volonté de ne pas payer, s'enfuient pour rentrer chez eux, abandonnant le cadavre entre les mains de la famille de la défunte. Mais cela est une injure fort grave. Aussi est-elle considérée comme rupture pure et simple de l'alliance entre les deux familles. Le mari peut s'abstenir de porter les paiements funéraires; ils seraient quand même refusés. Désormais il n'a plus le moyen de présenter une dot pour l'obtention d'une remplaçante de la morte. Au surplus, il perd ses droits sur ses enfants, dont il a désavoué le clan maternel, et si la chose ne s'arrange pas de façon ou d'autre, il n'a plus droit aux dots qui seront versées pour ses filles. Pour comble de malheur, il s'expose à être molesté par l'esprit de la défunte.

Lorsque le parti du mari est parvenu à se frayer un passage, le clan opposé se hâte de défendre la barrière suivante. En effet, si le cortège doit traverser plusieurs clans ou groupements apparentés à la femme (clan maternel, clan du grand-père, de la grand'mère, etc.), chaque groupement dresse sa barrière à lui.

S'il n'y a plus de barrières, la bagarre est terminée. Mais de toute façon le mari doit verser les valeurs requises pour le passage : étant donc arrivés au village, on arrange la question des paiements funéraires en y englobant ces « péages ».

La plupart du temps la rixe était inévitable. Et à présent encore les cas sont plus nombreux qu'on ne le soupçonnerait. Seulement, les violences se réduisent à quelques légères blessures. D'autres clans arrangent l'affaire à l'amiable, sans passer aux voies de fait. Mais il est tout à fait exceptionnel qu'on omette de dresser une barrière. Çà et là, cependant, le cas se présente sous la pression de chefs favorables à la pénétration des idées européennes de paix et de tranquillité publiques. On se contente, dans ces cas, de verser les indemnités réglementaires lors de l'arrangement de la palabre des paiements funéraires. Cette façon d'agir, plus humaine, est parfois favorisée par une grande amitié qui lie les deux clans en question.

Quelle est la raison d'être de cette coutume ? Voici l'explication qu'en donnent les Nkundó :

En barrant la route au cortège funèbre et se battant contre les participants, la famille de la défunte manifeste sa colère provoquée par le décès d'un de ses membres.

Car elle en ressent du courroux et du dépit. Et cela nonobstant la lance portée par le ndonga au-devant du cortège, en signe qu'on vient en amis, sans intentions malveillantes.

Cela ne veut pas dire que les indigènes attribuent au mari et à sa famille la cause du décès. Dans la majorité des cas ils sont convaincus qu'ils n'y peuvent rien. Quoiqu'ils s'expriment dans ces termes : lóótoomela bǫ́na (nkána, eóto) = vous avez tué notre enfant (sœur, parente), ils ne prétendent pas qu'ils l'ont réellement tuée, mais qu'elle est morte chez eux. Dans ces conditions, feignent-ils donc la colère, par exemple pour obtenir des valeurs ? Je ne le pense pas. Les Nkundó ne disent pas qu'ils simulent le courroux; ils affirment catégoriquement qu'ils ressentent réellement de la colère et qu'ils veulent la manifester de la façon décrite. La chose ne doit pas nous étonner, puisque — comme nous l'avons signalé dans l'étude sur les Coutumes funéraires des Nkundó — la colère et le chagrin semblent être chez ces populations deux sentiments intimement connexes.

Lorsque le cortège funèbre a franchi la dernière barrière, celle qui ferme l'entrée du village, le clan du mari dépose le corps, qui est ensuite relevé par la famille de la morte. Celle-ci le porte jusque dans la maison du père de famille. Elle est suivie par le ndonga, les bánambóteuí, le mari et ses parents. La morte est pleurée par sa famille. Les parentes (biúnanyi) manifestent leur chagrin-colère en maltraitant les épouses du clan (baíjáále), en leur enduisant le corps de boue, en les vêtant de basáki, en les frappant de plantes urticantes (banaánaá). C'est que la morte est le « mari » des baíjáále, c'est-à-dire la parente de leurs maris. Les baíjáále traitent de la même façon le veuf et ses parents, parce que « leur mari » est morte chez eux.

Le cadavre est donc déposé dans la case du chef de famille. Chaque fois que des parentes mariées ailleurs arrivent pour pleurer la morte, les ɓaájáála leur défendent l'entrée de la case mortuaire. Elle les obligent d'abord, pour manifester leur chagrin, à aller jusqu'à l'extrémité du village en pleurant la défunte.

Il arrive fréquemment, comme il est dit dans l'étude citée, I, qu'après un certain temps les lamentations diminuent et que les veilleuses se mettent à faire la causette. A ce sujet j'ai assisté un jour à une querelle entre les biánanyí et les ɓaájáála, les premières reprochant aux autres de ne plus pleurer : «C'est pourtant votre mari»; les dernières répliquant : «C'est votre parente; c'est donc à vous de pleurer; vos yeux sont-ils si secs qu'ils ne contiennent plus de larmes ?»

Quelquefois, le mari et les proches parents ne participent pas au transfert, parce qu'ils n'ont pas encore réussi à réunir les valeurs nécessaires. Dans ce cas, en effet, il leur est parfaitement loisible de rester chez eux, afin de ne pas s'exposer à des débats interminables et à la risée de toute la région. D'autres, n'appartenant qu'à un clan peu populeux, ne se hasardent pas dans le village de la défunte. Ils craignent de ne pouvoir se défendre convenablement des mauvais traitements que leur infligeraient les femmes mariées dans le clan où ils se rendent. Ces femmes, en effet, les maltraitent avec de la boue qu'elles leur jettent ou dont elles les enduisent, avec des plantes urticantes banalnaá, dont elles leur frappent le corps. Car elles considèrent le veuf et ses proches parents comme ayant tué la parente de leurs maris, que, par extension, elles nomment leur mari aussi.

Dans ces cas, le cadavre est porté par des parents éloignés du mari. Le ndonga excuse celui-ci auprès des beaux-parents, en leur disant qu'il viendra tout arranger plus tard. Le clan de la défunte reçoit le cadavre et continue de lui rendre les derniers devoirs. Si le mari est resté au village uniquement par crainte des mauvais traitements, il n'attend souvent que la tombée de la nuit pour suivre le cadavre de sa femme, à la faveur de l'obscurité.

Le cadavre doit passer dans la maison du chef de famille au moins un nuit.

Avant de procéder à l'enterrement, les deux familles règlent la question des paiements funéraires, que nous allons examiner sur-le-champ. Il y a encore une « fête d'adieu » de la part du clan de la morte. L'inhumation ne comporte, pour le reste, rien de particulier et il suffit donc de renvoyer à l'étude citée sur le sujet.

Comme nous avons fait remarquer au chapitre VII, article II, le mari peut acheter le cadavre de sa favorite. A moins d'accrocs à l'exécution de son dessein, le cadavre n'est pas transporté dans le clan natal, mais enterré à côté du tombeau du mari, au cimetière clanique de celui-ci. Tout ce qui accompagne le transport du cadavre tombe donc par le fait même, ainsi que le paiement funéraire, dont l'omission est compensée par l'achat du cadavre. Le mari ou sa famille n'envoie aux parents de la femme que le paiement usuel pour communiquer la nouvelle du décès.

ARTICLE IV. — PAIEMENTS FUNÉRAIRES.

Comme nous venons de le dire, avant de procéder au transport du cadavre de l'épouse défunte, le mari réunit les valeurs pour payer le nkunji. Par ce terme (dérivé du verbe kunda = enterrer) on désigne les divers versements que le veuf est obligé de faire au clan de la morte.

Tout d'abord, dès que la mort est constatée, le ndonge va porter aux parents de la défunte le nsango (= nouvelle), qui consiste en un anneau de cuivre ou un couteau. Il le leur présente en disant : « Sachez que votre fille une telle vient de mourir ».

A chaque barrière que le cortège doit franchir pour arriver au village de la morte, le mari doit payer un objet (généralement un couteau ou anneau), afin d'obtenir libre passage. C'est toujours le ndonga qui sert d'intermédiaire. Ces paiements sont nommés byɛ̂kɔ by'ôkáko, ou simplement bokáko, lodiaka (barrière), ou, chez les Bombanja, encore, ijakâ yâ ekálaki = couteau pour abattre (la barrière).

Le ndonga marche en tête du cortège funèbre, portant (lui-même ou remplacé par un autre bɔ́nsambótswá) une lance à laquelle est liée une pièce d'étoffe en raphia. Lorsque le cortège a passé la dernière barrière, le témoin officiel le devance et va fixer la lance dans le toit de la case du chef de famille. D'où le nom spécifique donné à cette lance : ilóswansambá (de tóswa = percer, et nsambá = toit). Cette lance signifie que la famille du veuf ne vient pas avec des intentions malveillantes, mais animé de sentiments de la meilleure amitié = wôâka te tóólɔ́yé l'etumba; tolyá ndé ótotsikela ilákâ y'ɔ̂na.

La pièce d'étoffe est une marque de respect envers la mère de la défunte, en souvenir des douleurs qu'elle a souffertes dans l'enfantement et des soins qu'elle a apportés à l'éducation de sa fille, et comme consolation pour le coup terrible qui vient de lui être porté par la mort de son enfant. Elle se vêtira cette étoffe lorsque le deuil sera terminé. À défaut de la mère, morte avant sa fille, cette étoffe revient à une de ses sœurs, tantes, etc., qui est en quelque sorte sa remplaçante. C'est donc un paiement propre au clan de la mère.

La lance et l'étoffe sont généralement désignées sous le nom commun de likɔngɔ́ l'etóo = lance et étoffe. L'étoffe peut être remplacée par un couteau, surtout un ingóndó, mais le nom d'etóo est conservé. À présent on ne donne plus d'étoffe, mais on lui substitue toujours un couteau qui porte le nom d'etóo (*). Toutefois, en souvenir de l'ancienne coutume, à la lance est souvent attaché un bout de tissu européen.

---

(*) La raison d'être de cette substitution est, d'une part, la valeur supérieure du couteau et, d'autre part, la quasi-impossibilité de se procurer des tissus de raphia. (Cfr. Introduction.)

Le cadavre ayant été déposé dans la case, les deux clans se saluent de la façon habituelle. Les femmes continuent à pleurer durant quelque temps. Le clan du mari va s'asseoir à une petite distance. Ensuite les parents de la défunte enjoignent à leurs femmes de réunir les cadeaux à offrir au veuf. Ce sont des vivres variés : manioc, bananes, viande ou poisson fumés, chenilles, sel, poules, etc., un ou plusieurs chiens (bompángá) vivants (mbwá éá nkonjo = chien à poils) ou leur valeur en espèces (deux anneaux ou un anneau plus un couteau équivalent, nommé pour cela mbwá éá baímbá ou éá bakonga), plus encore un couteau pour tuer et dépecer les bêtes et qui porte le nom de lokéla. Les bánanyi et les baíjálá apportent chacune leur part. Notons que ce cadeau ne contient jamais de légumes (bíanakélá).

Quand tout est réuni et jugé suffisant, on appelle le ndonga et les propres fils de la défunte, pour qu'ils donnent leur opinion et puissent, plus tard, témoigner en connaissance de cause. Comme rémunération pour ses services, on fait au ndonga un paiement (nyongo) d'un poisson bokéma ou d'un rat bokimba, plus un régime de bananes (parfois remplacé par un anneau). A ce sujet il est intéressant de relater une partie des pourparlers auxquels j'assistai un jour. Le ndonga exprima son mécontentement de ce qu'on ne lui offrait qu'un seul bokéma. « C'est si peu, dit-il, en comparaison de toutes les peines que j'ai dû me donner. J'ai dû arranger l'affaire de la dot; j'ai dû réconcilier mari et femme quand ils avaient des palabres; j'ai dû intervenir à maintes reprises; tout le temps j'ai dû faire la navette entre les deux clans; je me suis éreinté durant de longues années, sans jamais avoir de repos. Et pour tous ces tracas je ne reçois qu'une si faible récompense. » On me demanda mon avis. Je ne pus qu'approuver les considérations du ndonga. Un des parents de la morte lui donna également raison : « Il a tout le temps été obligé d'aller et venir entre les deux familles; sa voix est devenue rauque à cause de ses interventions incessantes dans les palabres et querelles; il mérite bien qu'on lui ajoute encore un bokóes. ». Tout le monde se rangea à notre avis, et le ndonga se montra satisfait.

Ensuite le ndonga se sépare du groupe. Avec les autres bàsambálémá et, le cas échéant, des étrangers intelligents qui puissent donner quelque avis pour trancher une discussion incidente, il s'assied entre les deux clans opposés, à une petite distance de chacun d'eux.

Tous les paiements doivent passer par l'intermédiaire du ndonga. C'est lui qui transmet les desiderata d'un groupe à l'autre. Il intervient dans les discussions qui surgissent, pour les trancher et rétablir la paix. Il explique les différents points de vue, élucide une considération dont l'autre groupe ne semble pas saisir toute la portée, etc.

Comme il a été dit déjà à maintes reprises, il peut y avoir plusieurs ndonga. Tous peuvent légitimement intervenir, personnellement ou par leurs représentants officiellement reconnus. Ainsi, à Bɔnjɔku, il y a quelques mois (1933), Bafimbe, épouse d'Ikɔmɔ de Bɔsɔmbɔ́, était présente à une affaire de nkunji. Personne ne faisait cas d'elle. A un moment, elle se jeta dans l'assemblée en réprimandant le ndonga principal et les familles, leur demandant sur quoi ils se basaient pour l'exclure de cette affaire. Son mari n'avait-il pas droit d'intervention? N'était-il pas ndonga lui aussi? Comme il est à la pêche dans la Jwalé, il lui est impossible de venir. Elle peut donc légitimement le remplacer. Or, pourquoi la laissait-on de côté? On la calma vite, en lui donnant raison et en s'excusant de l'oubli et de la négligence.

Les épouses du clan de la morte déposent les cadeaux alimentaires aux pieds du ndonga. Le bokáné (le plus jeune) du clan va lui expliquer ce dont il s'agit et à qui ces dons sont destinés (*). Une part revient aux bakalé de la défunte, c'est-à-dire aux baíjáéla du clan du mari; une seconde part revient aux baóme (les maris), c'est-à-dire le veuf et sa famille; une troisième est réservée aux parentes de la morte qui sont venues des villages où elles sont mariées pour assister aux funérailles.

Le clan de la défunte commence par « demander des nouvelles » (ώola nsango) au clan opposé. Celui-ci répond que, ayant épousé leur fille, celle-ci a vécu heureusement chez son mari, lui a rendu les services conjugaux, lui a engendré des enfants. Qu'ensuite elle est tombée malade, comme la chose leur a été communiquée en son temps, que maintenant Dieu l'a emportée, et qu'ils sont venus leur remettre le cadavre. Le clan de la femme répond : « C'est entendu, mais avant de continuer à nous demander réciproquement des nouvelles, acceptez toujours le présent (lionja) que nous vous offrons. » Là-dessus le ndonga énumère tout ce qui a été réuni et le passe au veuf.

Ces vivres sont un cadeau de bienvenue amicale et ne sont donc nullement comptés comme paiement, ni, à fortiori, comme partie du nkomí. Seuls les animaux domestiques sont considérés comme tel. Ils peuvent être consommés sur place ou être conservés en vie. La nourriture préparée, étant un présent, doit être consommée sur place. En principe on ne peut rien en emporter chez soi. Si pourtant, pour l'une ou l'autre raison, on la prend avec soi, il reste toujours interdit d'en laisser manger à des personnes qui n'ont pas assisté à la réunion funéraire. Quant à la nourriture crue, on est libre de l'emporter, s'il y a excédent.

Il peut y avoir des discussions au sujet du chien, comme j'en fus témoin un jour. Les offrandes comprenaient, non un chien vivant, mais sa valeur en anneaux. Le chef de la famille du veuf réclama un chien en chair et os. Il donna comme raison que beaucoup de ses biánanyi étaient venues aux funérailles et que, à titre de remerciement pour leurs condoléances, il voulait leur offrir un chien. Comme il ne céda point, la famille de la femme fut bien obligée de remplacer les deux anneaux par l'animal exigé.

---

(*) Dans la hiérarchie nkundó c'est toujours le plus jeune qui, sur l'injonction du chef de famille, est chargé de l'exécution de toutes ces sortes de petites besognes.

Ensuite le ndonga expose à la famille de la défunte que déjà il a apporté le naango, le likongá et l'etóo. Actuellement il arrive que la lance et l'étoffe ne sont données qu'à ce moment, lorsque, notamment, on s'abstient des barrières et de la bagarre. Les paiements de passage sont alors remis simultanément. Si les deux agglomérations sont très rapprochées, on commence même à omettre l'envoi du naango; un bɔnambɔ́tswá va confirmer la nouvelle du décès auquel on s'attendait déjà et que le lokolé vient d'annoncer.

Puis la famille de la femme exige, un à un, divers versements. Chaque appel provoque une discussion. Car il est de mode de tirer ces palabres en longueur. De part et d'autre on examine le pour et le contre. La famille du veuf se fait un peu presser, sinon la cérémonie n'aurait plus l'air d'une palabre (ce qu'elle est en réalité), mais d'un simple paiement sans importance.

La famille de la femme, ayant rappelé les cadeaux de vivres offerts et accepté les versements déjà effectués, commence à demander qu'on lui apporte les autres valeurs du nkunji. Le clan du veuf expose son point de vue et immédiatement un membre du clan de la femme se met à battre le gong (lokolé) qui se trouve à proximité. Il n'y a plus moyen de comprendre le moindre mot de ce que dit le porte-parole du mari. Plein de courage et de patience africaine il continue son discours. Mais finalement il se voit bien obligé de cesser. Il demande donc qu'on fasse taire le lokolé. Sans succès, évidemment. On lui répond sèchement : « Si vous voulez qu'on cesse, apportez-nous un anneau ». Le mari se voit donc forcé de payer; sur quoi le bruit du lokolé cesse immédiatement, et la discussion peut continuer. Ce premier versement s'appelle, pour cette raison, lokolé (1).

Ensuite un jeune parent vigoureux de la défunte sort du groupe. Il se montre courroucé, bat des mains et défie le clan du veuf : « Envoyez quelqu'un des vôtres pour se battre contre moi, car je suis furieux de ce que vous avez laissé mourir d'inanition ma parente ». On lui répond avec force protestations : « Nous sommes amis, aucun sentiment hostile ne nous anime; ce n'est pas notre faute que notre épouse est morte ». Le premier répète son affirmation et son défi et ne cesse de leur reprocher le décès que lorsqu'on lui a remis un anneau nommé bonkáte = inanition.

Un autre jeune membre du clan de la défunte s'assied au milieu entre les deux groupes. On lui met un etáka (fourche en bois) au cou et il dit : « C'est ainsi que vous m'auriez traité si ma sœur vous eût abandonnés. J'étais exposé à devoir souffrir à cause d'elle et de vous. Rémunérez-m'en ». Et il ne s'en va qu'après avoir reçu un anneau, nommé pour cette raison etáka (2).

Ensuite sont réclamés, avec force gestes imitateurs et représentatifs (de la façon décrite pour les précédents) divers paiements chacun d'un anneau ou d'un couteau :

ikɛmɔ (bendánga l'ikɛmɔ), à cause des potions que la défunte a préparées pour son mari;

bandingó = les paquets de vivres qu'elle lui a cuits dans les cendres;

---

(1) Le premier anneau pour l'éteindre s'appelle [illegible] pé lokolé. Comparez la pratique identique lors du paiement de la dot (chap. II, art. V, 3°).

(2) Ce n'est qu'une représentation d'une prétention approximative, car le jeune homme n'aurait pas été traité ainsi. La mise de l'etáka est réservée à l'épouse même. Mais il représente le clan entier solidairement.

baínda = les portions de noix de palme qu'elle lui a préparées (les portions étant représentées par quelques petites mottes de terre posées sur des feuilles);

nkóngi = les cils qu'elle lui a arrachés;

bokongo = parce qu'elle lui a coupé les cheveux (-konga);

naili = les poux qu'elle lui a enlevés de la tête (N. B. — Ce paiement peut être uni au précédent et être ainsi d'un seul konga pour les deux);

bompáło = les bains chauds qu'elle lui a fait bouillir;

mpoko = les paniers à poissons, parce qu'elle est allée à la pêche pour lui;

boingó = la civière sur laquelle le cadavre a été transporté;

bekomba = les lianes avec lesquelles le cadavre a été lié;

betóná (itóná) = les troncs de bananiers sur lesquels le cadavre a reposé (le cadavre en natte ou en cercueil est déposé sur deux troncs de bananiers mis transversalement);

bikofo = les fourches sur lesquelles se trouvait le lit où la femme est morte;

likongo = une houe (réelle ou remplacée par un anneau) pour creuser la tombe;

ifaká = un couteau (idem) pour creuser la tombe;

yòndó = une hache (idem) pour couper les racines qui se trouveraient à l'endroit de la tombe (1); bombémbé wá nyang'éy'óna = ceinture pour la mère de la défunte, afin qu'elle puisse la porter pendant le deuil;

botsé w'ilóló = la tête du cadavre, en l'honneur de ceux qui pleurent le mort en s'asseyant près de sa tête, c'est-à-dire les tout proches parents. C'est le versement final et le plus important, consistant en trois à cinq anneaux.

---

(1) Un jour je vis la famille de la femme refuser la barre de fer donnée comme yòndó, parce que cette même barre avait été donnée par eux-mêmes afin d'aider le mari à payer le nkanga (médecin-sorcier) pour sa divination (bofingo) lors de la maladie de la femme.

Tous ces paiements réunis forment le nkunji et, hormis le nsango, le likɔngá l'elóo et les byɛ̂kɔ by'ɔ̀káko, ils sont une sorte de beéngo (1). Ces beéngo n'ont pas tous la même importance. Aussi ne sont-ils pas toujours réclamés en entier. Les moins importants sont souvent omis : bakɛmɔ, bantsingá, baónda, nkɔ́ngi, bɔkɛngɔ, nsili, bompálo, mpuka.

Même certains autres peuvent être omis. La chose dépend non seulement des dispositions plus ou moins amicales qui animent les deux partis, mais surtout du nombre d'enfants que la femme en question a engendrés. Pour une femme stérile la famille se montre moins exigeante. Mais si la défunte a eu plusieurs enfants, elle ne cède pas, en arguant du grand profit dont leur fille a été pour le clan du mari.

En tout cas on réclame toujours au moins quelques beéngo en surplus du bombémbé et du bɔlaá w'ilaká. Ces derniers ne peuvent jamais être omis. La ceinture est un paiement exclusivement réservé à la mère et qui revient de droit au clan maternel.

Plus le montant de ces paiements funéraires est élevé, plus le gendre est le bienvenu. L'alliance est parfaite. Aussi, non seulement la famille de la femme réciproque-t-elle les bons sentiments en ajoutant encore quelques chiens, mais en outre le gendre sera très bien accueilli et réussira dans ses démarches, lorsque, après le deuil, il portera le montant de l'ibóleóko en vue d'obtenir une remplaçante de la défunte (2). Au surplus, si les relations ont été excellentes, il l'obtient aisément par anticipation, pour qu'elle le soigne pendant toute la durée du deuil.

L'omission des paiements funéraires est sévèrement sanctionnée. Le fait de négliger l'envoi du cadeau de faire-part suffit à lui seul à déclancher les sanctions, qui sont : la rupture de l'alliance; la perte des enfants, la faute du père équivalant à un reniement; enfin la molestation du coupable par l'esprit de la morte. Ainsi, à Bokátola (Bompela), on peut voir deux garçons, Bọtẹ́tsí et Ikembá, enfants de Bonyongela d'Ilángá et d'Ɛtáka de Bokátola. Ils sont maintenant incorporés dans leur clan maternel, pour cause de l'omission de l'envoi du nsango. A plus forte raison en est-il ainsi pour le nkunji entier.

---

(1) Cfr. chap. II, art. V.
(2) Cfr. chap. III, art. IV.

ARTICLE V. — SITUATION SOCIALE DE LA VEUVE.

Au chapitre III, articles II et IV, nous avons déjà constaté qu'aux yeux du Nkundó la mort du mari ne dissout pas le mariage : l'union continue, et même après le deuil elle n'est pas rompue ipso facto. Pour qu'elle cesse il ne suffit même pas que la femme soit prise et traitée comme épouse par un autre homme. Aussi longtemps que la dot n'a pas été restituée, la veuve continue d'« appartenir » aux héritiers du défunt et d'être leur épouse au sens expliqué au chapitre cité, article IX. Les diverses modalités dont peut se faire cette continuation du mariage post mortem ont été décrites au chapitre III, article II.

Nous y avons également vu que rien n'empêche la veuve de se remarier en dehors de la famille héritière et donc d'engager une union vraiment nouvelle et différente. Rien non plus ne l'y oblige. Elle est entièrement libre. Il n'y a d'exception — si l'on peut parler d'exception dans ce cas — que pour la veuve objet d'un testament et pour la boaliló (chap. III, art. II, in fine et art. III). Pour cette dernière il est même difficile de considérer son remariage avec l'aîné du défunt comme restreignant sa liberté. Car bien que de droit il soit obligatoire, il est volontaire en pratique et pourvu de garanties suffisantes de liberté dans les cas ordinaires. En effet, on sait qu'elle est d'accord pour cette union; ou bien elle peut toujours avoir recours au divorce si plus tard l'héritier la déçoit dans ses espoirs ou si la continuation de l'union s'avère moralement impossible.

Il serait oiseux et fastidieux de répéter tout ce que nous avons dit à ce sujet au chapitre III. Retenons seulement que le partage des veuves ne doit pas se comprendre comme un partage de personnes qui leur enlèverait la libre disposition de leur volonté et de leur cœur, mais comme le partage des droits dotaux qu'elles représentent. La liberté juridique du remariage demeure entière comme au temps où elles étaient jeunes filles. Elle peut bien subir des influences et même des atteintes authentiques plus ou moins graves d'après les circonstances, mais ce sont là des situations de fait et non de droit.

Si la veuve se juge — ou est jugée — trop vieille pour un remariage ou même désire garder à son mari défunt la fidélité de la continence, elle peut, au lieu de rentrer dans sa famille, continuer de résider dans le clan du défunt. D'ordinaire les héritiers ne s'y opposent pas et respectent ses désirs. Si elle a des enfants ou petits-enfants, la chose va de soi : ils sont heureux de garder auprès d'eux leur vieille mère ou leur grand'mère.

ARTICLE VI. — SITUATION ÉCONOMIQUE DE LA VEUVE.

Tout le temps que dure la réclusion, la veuve continue à vivre dans la famille de son mari défunt. Elle se fournit de vivres dans les cultures qu'elle avait établies. Les outils que lui avait remis son mari restent à son usage et elle s'en sert dès qu'elle le peut. Quant aux divers ustensiles qui doivent être détruits, ils sont remplacés par d'autres spécimens que lui prête la famille du défunt. Car elle ne peut plus faire usage de ceux qui lui ont servi durant la vie de son mari.

Pour mieux marquer la grandeur du deuil on omet souvent de se servir des produits des plantations établies par le défunt. Au lieu donc de continuer l'exploitation des cultures existantes de manioc et de légumes, la veuve s'approvisionne de préférence dans les champs des proches parents du défunt. Ou bien un homme qui a déjà jeté son dévolu sur elle met ses cultures à sa disposition. Sinon, si elle est de l'observance rigoureuse, elle doit acheter ce dont elle a besoin dans ce domaine.

Comme nous l'avons vu au chapitre VI, article II, la veuve n'a aucun droit sur les fruits de son activité. Ni l'argent qu'elle a gagné et qui est destiné aux besoins communs du ménage, ni les cultures qu'elle a établies, ni le poisson qu'elle a pêché, ni les chenilles qu'elle a ramassées en forêt ne lui appartiennent. Tout passe aux héritiers. Sa propriété se restreint aux objets qu'elle aurait reçus comme sa part personnelle dans la dot de sa fille, ou comme autre paiement exclusivement propre à la mère.

Toutefois, si la veuve demeure dans la famille du défunt, on lui laisse ses champs, ses outils, etc.; car dans ces conditions il n'y a aucune raison pour les lui ravir. Mais si elle se remarie ailleurs, les héritiers sont impitoyables. Le Nkundó ne veut d'aucune façon que la richesse familiale se disperse et s'éparpille : lokutu lôkisó lôtâtew'inyamó = notre patrimoine ne peut pas être aliéné. Tel est le droit.

Les faits sont pourtant plus favorables à la veuve, du moins dans les meilleurs cas. Lorsque les relations étaient bonnes, la famille ne lui refuse pas quelque menu objet qu'elle désire garder. Dans les unions exemplaires on lui laisse les nattes qu'elle a tressées de ses propres mains et l'on partage à égalité les biens qu'elle a reçus de son mari : étoffes, perles, poules, chèvres et chiens même, voire parfois ce qu'elle a acquis avec le fruit de l'activité mixte des époux (plantations, élevage). Dans ce partage on se montre ordinairement généreux envers la veuve, et s'il n'y a qu'un unique objet on est bien disposé à le lui laisser.

Cette conduite est de pure générosité, car — comme il a été dit — la femme n'y a aucun droit. Elle était — autrefois — réservée aux unions particulièrement heureuses, eu égard surtout aux relations entre les deux familles et à l'affection qu'un des proches héritiers porte à la veuve.

A présent l'influence des Missions multiplie les cas de générosité envers la veuve et suscite la tendance à en faire une règle générale. Ainsi les bonnes familles chrétiennes, si elles ne sont pas contrecarrées par leurs parents païens, laissent à la veuve les objets qui ont été à son usage personnel : habits, ustensiles, malle, voire machine à coudre.

ARTICLE VII. — EFFETS ÉCONOMIQUES DE LA MORT.

§ 1. Dot et contre-dot.

La mort d'un des conjoints ne dissout le mariage qu'à un certain point de vue et sous l'aspect d'union entre telle et telle personne individuelle. Le mariage n'est rompu absolument que par le décès des deux conjoints (ou par le divorce).

La mort ne comporte aucun remboursement, ni de la dot, ni de la contre-dot (nkomi), comme le comporte le divorce. La femme étant décédée, tous ces paiements restent acquis aux parties respectives. A la mort du mari la veuve continue à appartenir aux héritiers; elle fait partie de la succession. Les enfants appartiennent au père et à sa famille; aucun nouveau versement n'est requis pour eux.

Il existe donc une très grande différence entre le divorce et la mort. Dans le divorce la dot doit être considérée plutôt comme un dépôt. Au contraire, dans le cas de mort, elle reste définitivement acquise. Cette différence infirme la théorie qui prétend que la dot n'est qu'une garantie et est plutôt favorable à la théorie d'une compensation pour la perte que subit le clan en donnant en mariage un de ses membres. En effet, en cas de divorce, la perte subie par le clan est annulée, puisque la femme rentre dans sa famille ou — l'éventualité commune — se remarie et est objet d'un nouveau versement dotal. Par contre, la mort de la femme, loin de faire cesser la perte, la perpétue. Cela ne veut pas dire que la dot ne constitue pas une garantie; effectivement elle en est une. Mais cette garantie est un effet de la dot et non sa raison d'être, ce qui est chose toute différente.

§ 5. Succession du mari.

Puisque nous n'étudions pas le droit de propriété des Nkundó, la question de l'héritage n'est pas, à strictement parler, du domaine de cette étude. Pourtant nous ne pouvons pas nous abstenir d'en dire un mot, puisque l'étude du mariage doit contenir naturellement un chapitre sur les enfants. Aussi, est-ce sous cet angle spécial que nous envisageons la question. Ce qui nous intéresse ici c'est de savoir quels droits les enfants ont sur la succession de leur père. Quant à la veuve nous en avons déjà traité dans l'article précédent.

La succession du défunt comprend trois parties :

1° Les valeurs dotales, c'est-à-dire tout ce qui sert principalement à se procurer une femme : anneaux de cuivre et de laiton, objets en fer, veuves et filles en tant qu'elles représentent des valeurs dotales;

2° Les animaux domestiques : chèvres, chiens, poules, canards;

3° Les biens immeubles : arbres fruitiers, champs et cultures, clôtures de chasse, endroits de pêche, et les biens meubles : nasses, filets de chasse, arcs et flèches, boucliers.

Les valeurs dotales deviennent le bien commun des proches parents : chacun reçoit sa part de l'héritage. Les veuves sont dévolues aux frères du défunt, à ses oncles, à ses neveux ([illegible]), et cela conformément à leur hiérarchie dans le groupe, à leurs droits respectifs provenant, soit d'une aide financière prêtée au défunt en vue de l'acquisition d'une des femmes, soit de l'application des effets du régime de la nkíla. Il en est de même des anneaux (bakonga) et des objets en fer (bifeko). De la même manière les filles non encore mariées sont assignées aux parents divers, c'est-à-dire que les « pères » présidant au partage de la succession discutent et précisent les personnes qui ont le droit de toucher les dots qui seront plus tard versées pour elles. Parmi les fils, seul l'aîné reçoit une femme ou un certain montant de valeurs dotales en bonáló (*).

Voilà la règle ancienne. Actuellement un profond changement est déjà intervenu. Les propres fils ne sont plus exclus du partage. On leur donne, soit une femme, soit des anneaux en quantité suffisante, soit le droit à la dot d'une sœur, ou d'une cousine, si ceci est possible. Pour le reste, qu'on se réfère au chapitre II, article IV, § 2 et article XI, § 2 B, et au chapitre IV, article II.

Les animaux domestiques sont dévolus aux biánanyí, qui les portent avec elles chez leurs maris et de ce fait les font entrer dans le montant de la contre-dot. Quelques chèvres peuvent pourtant être attribuées à un des hommes de la parenté, qui en a besoin pour compléter le paiement d'une dot.

Quant aux autres biens (meubles et immeubles), ils passent directement aux fils. Le premier-né reçoit la part du lion et les biens les plus précieux, mais les puînés ne sont pas exclus du partage.

Il est à noter qu'un testament peut intervenir, assignant un objet particulier à un fils déterminé, ou excluant un des héritiers avec lequel le défunt a eu de graves démêlés. Un testament pareil est toujours exécuté, parce qu'on craint la vengeance du testateur qui fait suivre dans la mort celui qui commettrait une infraction. Même si le testament est manifestement injuste. On craint les représailles du défunt, ainsi qu'il en arriva à Iloko is'Efekele, de Lofeli. Il avait tué son propre frère Mpénda éá ŋkɔtɔnkale, parce que celui-ci, au lieu de lui laisser cet honneur, avait goûté de la bière fraîchement fabriquée, ce qui était une suprême offense. Mais comme la punition était tout à fait disproportionnée, toute la famille s'unit contre le meurtrier, qui fut obligé de fuir. A sa mort il déshérita tous ses frères en faveur de ses fils. Ce testament, jugé déraisonnable et injuste, ne fut pas respecté : l'unique frère d'Iloko, Bɔndɛ́lɛ́ wà Wilima, prit chez lui la favorite Bɔnyɛngé; mais il ne tarda pas à mourir, ce qui fut attribué à la vengeance d'Iloko. Il y a quelques années, la famille se réunit pour arranger définitivement l'affaire de la succession. La part prépondérante fut réservée aux fils d'Iloko, mais une autre part fut attribuée aux autres parents, ceux-ci n'ayant pas été nommés dans la clause exclusive, qui se limitait aux Basíká Banángá, c'est-à-dire aux propres frères d'Iloko.

---

(*) Chap. III, art. III.

Les fils ne sont jamais déshérités. Si l'un d'eux a très mal agi envers son père, celui-ci, en mourant, lui refuse sa bénédiction (bokako w'ɔ́kɔtsi) et lui donne une malédiction (bokako wà to yɔ́).

§ 3. Succession de l'épouse.

Ainsi que nous l'avons vu au chapitre VI, article II, la femme n'a aucun droit de propriété sur les fruits de son activité personnelle ou commune aux conjoints. Par conséquent, sa famille ne peut rien réclamer en fait d'héritage : il n'y a rien à hériter.

Bien que tous les fruits de l'activité de l'épouse soient la propriété du mari, la généralité des hommes n'exigent pas le respect de leur droit dans toute sa rigueur. Il sied qu'ils abandonnent une partie ou le tout à la famille de la défunte, comme cela se fait envers la veuve (*). Aussi, après la fête qui clôture le deuil, les deux clans font l'inventaire des biens en question. D'ordinaire ce que la femme a laissé comme produits de son activité est partagé également entre les deux clans. Certains hommes sont assez généreux pour renoncer à tout. Si la morte avait une ebína ou si les beaux-parents donnent à leur gendre une remplaçante, c'est à elle qu'échoient ces biens. Elle hérite même des cultures établies par sa parente, pour autant qu'elles n'ont pas été détruites; ce qui n'a pas lieu autrement, car les plantations ne sont jamais laissées à la famille de la défunte.

Les seules choses auxquelles la femme a un droit strict sont les paiements dotaux divers et analogues que la loi nkundó lui attribue : chèvres et spirales et cadeaux de la mère au versement dotal; étoffe et ceinture funéraires. A la mort de la femme, ces biens — si elle ne les a pas déjà donnés à ses parents — passent à son clan. D'aucune façon le mari ne peut se les approprier.

Enfin, à sa mort, une femme peut léguer à sa fille un outil (couteau, houe, etc.). Cette coutume est surtout observée par une femme très active, afin d'inculquer à sa fille l'amour du travail. Pareil objet devenait souvent une pièce de famille, transmise de mère en fille à travers plusieurs générations. On l'appelle botsikéjwá (de tsikela = laisser à; cfr. le latin reliquiae) ou, chez les Bombwanja, elili, termes qui s'appliquent aussi à d'autres objets compris dans la succession lorsqu'ils sont considérés séparément (globalement on les nomme lokulo = patrimoine, biens, ou lisangó = héritage). Or un botsikéjwá pareil ne peut jamais être accaparé par le mari.

(*) Voir article précédent.

ARTICLE VIII.

MORT DU FIANCÉ AVANT LE PAIEMENT DE LA DOT.

Nous traitons ici de la mort du mari durant les fiançailles, après le versement de l'ikulá ou du ndanga, mais avant le walo. La procédure de dissolution des fiançailles peut déjà nous faire supposer que la mort les rompt aussi sans difficultés spéciales. Et de fait, le fiancé étant mort, la femme devient libre. Elle peut donc rentrer chez elle, et l'on rembourse à la famille du défunt les paiements effectués.

Elle peut également demeurer dans la famille de son fiancé et y être prise en mariage par un des parents. Si tout est favorable à la continuation de l'union, le nouveau futur verse la dot; mais il ne doit pas réitérer les paiements de fiançailles, qui conservent leur validité. Si pourtant il appartient à une branche éloignée, la proche famille du défunt ne veut pas céder ses biens, et le nouveau fiancé doit s'acquitter lui-même de toutes les obligations dotales, à commencer par l'ikulá.

Il arrive que le mourant, dans ses dernières dispositions, enjoigne à sa famille de maintenir l'alliance. Dans ce cas, un des parents doit l'épouser. Si plus tard la rupture devient inévitable, les époux se séparent. D'ailleurs, si la femme n'est pas disposée à se remarier dans la parenté de son fiancé, celui-ci ne l'y force pas.

Cette pratique est basée sur la disposition du droit nkundó que les fiancés ont tous les devoirs et les droits d'époux.

Il n'existe donc rien chez les Nkundó qui ressemble à un lévirat. Même dans le cas cité d'un testament, l'obligation résulte uniquement de la nature sacrée de celui-ci.

ARTICLE IX.

MORT DE LA FEMME AVANT LE VERSEMENT DE LA DOT.

Deux cas sont à distinguer : 1° la femme meurt pendant les fiançailles; 2° elle meurt avant le bọsíngọ.

§ 1. Avant le « walo ».

Comme il a déjà été dit, les fiancés jouissent de tous les devoirs et droits des époux. A la mort de la fille, le fiancé est tenu à remplir toutes ses obligations envers la défunte et sa famille (transport du cadavre, immolations, nkunji). Mais ses obligations ne s'arrêtent pas là.

Par le versement du ndanga (et, en pratique, déjà par l'ikúlé) il s'est reconnu responsable de tout accident qui pourrait arriver, chez lui, à sa fiancée; et il a assumé l'obligation de parachever l'union par les versements ultérieurs.

La conséquence de ce fait est que la mort de la fiancée survenant avant qu'il ait satisfait à ses obligations, il est astreint à une forte indemnité (mbólaka) à ses beaux-parents, déçus dans leur espoir et frustrés de leurs droits. Le montant de cette indemnité varie avec les cas. D'ordinaire elle est à peu près égale à ce qu'il aurait dû payer normalement comme walo. D'où l'expression employée d'énga ilóká (ikɔmbɛ chez les Injɔ́lɔ́ et les Boángi) = payer la dot pour le cadavre.

Parfois la famille de la femme est moins exigeante, notamment quand elle tient beaucoup au gendre et le sait assez riche et généreux pour augmenter notablement le montant du nkunji, de l'ibóléko et de la dot pour une remplaçante. Le principe de l'indemnité est sauf; seulement l'aspect extérieur est changé et rendu moins humiliant.

D'autres fois elle hausse la somme à payer comme indemnité, soit par cupidité, soit parce qu'elle ne tient pas à cette union ou y est même opposée (cas qui était rare autrefois, mais qui est devenu plus fréquent à présent). Dans ces conditions on exige jusqu'à 100 et 150 anneaux. Tel le cas suivant, tout récent : Ilumbé de Mpámá (Boéndé) prend comme femme Lọkọkú de Bongíli wà Ndọngọ́. Il verse 10 anneaux comme ikulá-ndanga. Lorsque quelque temps après il apporte les 40 anneaux de walo, son beau-père les juge insuffisants (ce en quoi il avait pleinement raison). La pauvreté du gendre apparaissant par cette modicité de valeurs et présageant son insolvabilité, la famille de Lọkọkú ne tenait pas beaucoup à ce mariage. Par conséquent, elle refusa d'accepter ces anneaux, qui restèrent donc en dépôt chez le ndonga. Après deux ans de cohabitation, Lọkọkú mourut (16 juillet 1933). La famille de la morte réclama 100 anneaux. Ilumbé ne put invoquer aucune excuse, ni aucune circonstance atténuante. Car s'il avait voulu remplir ses obligations, il aurait pu le faire, le délai ayant été assez long, et s'il se savait sans moyens, il aurait dû abandonner la femme.

Au temps jadis, il arrivait que le veuf et sa famille refusaient de payer. On en venait alors aux armes. Le droit de la guerre entrait en jeu : après la cessation des hostilités, le coupable devait indemniser toutes les familles de son parti qui avaient un des leurs tué ou blessé. Il s'exposait ainsi à voir tous ses biens confisqués et, s'ils étaient insuffisants, à se voir vendu comme esclave. Au lieu de courir des risques aussi graves, il trouvait plus sage de se soumettre tout simplement aux sanctions normales.

Le cas que nous étudions dans cet article peut se compliquer du fait que la femme réside dans sa propre famille, ou qu'elle appartient à un autre homme auquel on n'a pas encore remboursé la dot. Mais il est préférable de traiter ces complications dans des articles distincts.

§ 2. Avant le « bọsọngọ ».

Dans ce cas le veuf ne doit pas payer d'indemnité. Il doit pourtant parfaire la dot en livrant « l'esclave ».

S'il ne le remet pas, 1° l'alliance est rompue par le fait même. Il s'ensuit qu'il ne peut porter l'ibóleóko et qu'il ne reçoit pas de remplaçante; 2° la famille de la défunte a droit à une des filles, s'il y en a, sinon à un des garçons. C'est une compensation qui lui est réservée pour la perte du bọsọ́ngọ.

Il est évident qu'en pratique la famille de la femme peut se désister de ses droits; ainsi, par égard pour son gendre influent, généreux, bien disposé, escomptant un bénéfice financier et social supérieur. Les remarques analogues que nous avons faites tout au long de cette étude nous ont déjà familiarisés avec la « largeur d'idées » de ces populations.

On pourrait faire remarquer que le cas présent ne diffère guère du précédent, la famille de la femme se trouvant de toute façon indemnisée. Mais d'abord, si la femme n'a pas laissé d'enfants, la chose n'est point du tout identique. Ensuite, le côté financier même étant égal, l'aspect juridique est tout différent. La prise de cet enfant et le refus d'accepter l'ibóleóko ne sont pas considérés comme compensation. Les Nkundó affirment catégoriquement que le cas qui nous occupe ne donne nullement lieu au paiement d'une indemnité.

Cette constatation fait ressortir à nouveau la différence essentielle entre jéngi et bọsọ́ngọ, dont nous avons déjà parlé au chapitre II, article IX, § 2 et article XII, § 5, et suggère l'idée que le walo est constitutif du contrat matrimonial, tandis que le bọsọ́ngọ est la substitution d'une personne à celle que le clan perd par le mariage d'un de ses membres.

ARTICLE X.

MORT DE LA FEMME DANS SA PROPRE FAMILLE.

Comme nous l'avons déjà fait remarquer à plus d'une reprise, le mari est responsable de sa femme, puisqu'elle lui « appartient » à cause de la convention clanique entre les familles. Cette stipulation du droit nkundó a pour conséquence que l'épouse est au risque du mari : il a à subir tous les préjudices qu'entraîne la mort de sa femme. Cependant ce principe général admet des exceptions dans les deux circonstances suivantes :

1° La femme meurt dans sa propre famille;
2° La femme meurt après avoir abandonné son mari pour un autre.

Dans cet article nous examinons le premier cas, réservant le second pour l'article suivant.

Si la femme meurt dans sa propre famille, l'exception est soumise à la réalisation de certaines conditions. Distinguons les divers cas possibles :

1° La femme rentre dans sa famille, parce qu'elle est exaspérée par les traitements injustes que lui inflige son mari. Celui-ci ne remplit pas ses devoirs envers elle, la maltraite injustement, etc., comme nous avons vu au chapitre VI, article III. La situation n'est plus tenable. Le mari est manifestement en tort, et la femme est libre de chercher un peu de tranquillité chez ses parents. Or, dans ces conditions, si elle y meurt avant que le mari ne soit venu l'y reprendre en arrangeant la palabre au moyen d'un bọ́ndọ, il n'a rien à réclamer. C'est lui-même qui par sa façon injuste d'agir s'est attiré cet embarras. Il est obligé d'exécuter les paiements funéraires. De par les relations tendues entre lui et son beau-père, l'alliance est rompue. C'est pourquoi, d'ordinaire, il refuse de payer le nkunji si, du moins, il n'a pas d'enfants de cette femme. Si nonobstant la présence de progéniture il ne paie pas, les enfants lui sont ravis par la famille de leur mère.

Ce cas était rare autrefois. Les maris jeunes et fougueux n'existaient pratiquement pas. C'étaient les vieux qui se réservaient les femmes. Devenus, par leur âge et leur expérience de la vie, plus rassis, plus calmes, plus raisonnables, ils ne se jetaient pas dans une aventure qui devait nécessairement tourner à leur désavantage. A présent les mariages étant devenus plus précoces, le cas peut se présenter plus facilement; quoique, d'autre part, la rupture définitive survienne le plus souvent avant l'éventualité décrite.

3° La femme abandonne son mari sans motif juste, et rentrée dans sa famille, y meurt. Autrefois, ce cas ne se présentait que tout à fait exceptionnellement (chap. VIII, art. II, § 1, A). Si avant la mort de la fugitive une guerre n'était pas intervenue (qui, d'office, clôturait l'affaire), le mari avait tous les droits au remboursement ou au remplacement de la morte par une autre épouse. Le cas est donc identique au suivant. Seulement, il n'y a plus question de faire renvoyer le cadavre, et s'il voulait rompre l'alliance définitivement, le mari ne devait même pas payer le nkunji.

Actuellement cette situation est devenue bien plus fréquente. Elle ne présente aucune difficulté spéciale; l'ancienne coutume continue d'être observée.

Il est presque oiseux de remarquer que des transactions à l'amiable peuvent intervenir entre le mari et ses beaux-parents quant au remboursement total ou partiel de la dot. Voici un cas typique : Bǫnjęlǫ de Iámbo (Bonkoso) hérite de Boélé, fille de Lokálámbá lo' Ibele de Bongunda. Après X années elle quitte son mari, rentre chez elle et y meurt. Son père transmet le cadeau de faire-part et y ajoute même des chiens, parce qu'il tient à cette alliance. Le cadavre n'est pas envoyé, parce que la femme étant morte d'une maladie infectieuse et se décomposant rapidement, on redoute la contagion. Lokálámbá présente sa fille cadette Mbangó à titre de remplaçante. Mais comme elle est toute jeune, Bǫnjęlǫ n'en veut pas. Il se contente d'une indemnité, parce que — au demeurant — il tient également à rester en bons termes avec son beau-père. Celui-ci lui envoie 22 anneaux à titre d'ilęngę (esclave) et l'affaire est ainsi close.

3° La femme est rentrée dans sa famille de sa propre initiative, afin de visiter ses parents, les soigner, ou pour participer à la pêche commune de la famille, pour chercher sa provision de chenilles comestibles, ou pour tout autre motif. Dans ce cas, la responsabilité passe du mari aux parents. La nouvelle du décès doit être portée au mari par la famille (toujours, s'entend, par l'entremise du ndonga). Ayant reçu la nouvelle, le mari accuse ses beaux-parents : « lôbômbomela wâli = vous m'avez tué ma femme ». Il exige qu'on lui envoie le cadavre pour qu'il le lave, le pare convenablement et pleure la défunte. Ensuite il renvoie le cadavre avec le ndonga en exigeant qu'on lui substitue une autre épouse, ou s'il n'y en a pas de disponible, qu'on lui rende la dot. Aussi longtemps que son beau-père n'a pas accompli ces obligations, le mari ne porte pas les paiements funéraires. Si, en outre, la famille de la défunte se montre récalcitrante ou trop lente, il pratique l'ikákolo, c'est-à-dire qu'il retient une parente à lui, mariée dans le clan de la défunte, pour en toucher la dot. De cette façon, il rentre dans ses droits financiers : les deux dots se compensent et ainsi l'affaire est arrangée définitivement. Il est évident que, dans ce cas, il conserve tous ses droits sur les enfants.

A plus forte raison cette solution s'applique-t-elle dans les cas où la famille a elle-même appelé leur fille ou parente.

Il peut arriver que, la femme tombant malade chez ses parents, le mari veut la soigner lui-même. Il exige de son beau-père un gage (ndanga) et témoignage de ce que la maladie a débuté chez lui. S'il omet cette précaution et que son épouse meurt, il ne possède aucun moyen juridique pour réclamer l'indemnisation.

4° Une solution identique à la précédente s'impose même lorsque la femme se rend chez ses parents à l'intention personnelle de son mari, afin de lui chercher certains objets dont il a besoin, comme de la bière pour une fête, des valeurs pour régler une palabre, etc. Cela vaut même si le mari l'a envoyée expressément dans ce but.

Pourtant ce cas donne aisément lieu à d'âpres discussions. La famille de la femme tâche de repousser les réclamations du mari en lui objectant que c'est lui-même qui a envoyé son épouse, ou, du moins qu'elle est venue chez eux uniquement pour ses intérêts à lui. Néanmoins, en fin de compte, c'est le mari qui a raison et qui gagne le procès (1).

5° La femme rentre chez elle malade. Comme nous l'avons vu au chapitre VI, art. III, § 2, les parents n'acceptent pas de soigner leur fille si le gendre ne leur donne pas — toujours par le ndonga — un ndonga en témoignage de ce qu'elle était malade au moment où elle le quittait. Ce faisant le mari se reconnait responsable de toute suite que pourrait avoir la maladie. Par conséquent, en cas de décès il ne peut rien réclamer.

Comme la responsabilité civile du décès est imputée au mari, celui-ci en est averti par le ndonga, mais la famille ne lui envoie pas l'anneau de faire-part. C'est le ndonga de la maladie qui remplace le paiement. Le veuf demande qu'on lui fasse parvenir le cadavre pour lui rendre les derniers offices, ce qui lui est toujours accordé. Pour le reste il n'y a rien de particulier; tout se fait comme si la femme était morte chez son mari.

6° La femme est répudiée par son mari. Ce cas arrivait jadis uniquement lorsque la femme se conduisait très mal et se montrait incorrigible. Comme nous l'avons vu au chapitre VIII, art. II, § 1, n° 2, le mari ne la renvoyait pas dans sa famille, mais l'attachait à la fourche (eléka) jusqu'à ce qu'il fût remboursé. Le ndonga intervenait parfois pour la libérer, mais de ce fait prenait sur lui la responsabilité de la restitution de la dot. Dans cette dernière éventualité, la femme mourant dans sa famille, le mari avait droit au remboursement comme lors d'un divorce. Nous revenons donc ici aux cas décrits sous 2° et 3°, avec les modalités différentes, selon que le veuf voulût ou non continuer l'alliance.

---

(1) Un séjour de vingt-quatre heures n'est pas reconnu suffisant pour faire retomber sur la famille de la femme la responsabilité civile de la maladie, ni donc du décès.

A présent la situation a complètement changé. L'etáka n'est plus permis par l'Administration coloniale. Par conséquent, l'homme qui veut se défaire de son épouse incorrigible fait en sorte qu'elle l'abandonne de sa propre initiative. Et l'on revient au cas 2°.

Si le mari a renvoyé lui-même son épouse en la remettant au ndonga, ses beaux-parents lui refusent l'indemnité et la restitution de la dot et souvent ne veulent même pas accepter le nkanji. En effet, ils lui répondent qu'il n'avait pas à répudier la femme qu'il s'est choisie librement. Aussi la généralité des hommes recourent-ils au procédé de l'alinéa suivant. Il existe pourtant des circonstances où cette façon de faire est plus difficile, notamment pour les monogames, car son exécution exige plusieurs semaines, parfois plusieurs mois. Entre-temps la femme fait comme bon lui semble, néglige son mari, de sorte que celui-ci se trouve pratiquement dans la condition d'un célibataire.

L'évangélisation a ajouté une seconde difficulté. Le mariage catholique est indissoluble. Pour les catéchumènes et les chrétiens qui veulent se marier il s'agit donc d'être prudents. Avant de les admettre au mariage religieux nous exigeons qu'au moins le walo soit terminé. Mais les jeunes gens ne connaissent le tempérament et la valeur de leurs fiancées que par l'expérience. Dans la presque totalité des cas ils font donc cette expérience chez eux avant le walo, selon la coutume ancestrale. Ensuite, si l'une des deux parties est païenne (ce qui arrive très fréquemment), les lois disciplinaires des Missions catholiques au Congo leur imposent une préparation de six mois minimum au poste de Mission ou dans un catéchuménat. Or, il arrive que pendant cette période expérimentale les fiancés se reconnaissent des défauts qui leur font prévoir une vie conjugale pleine de difficultés et suivie d'une rupture. Il est donc préférable qu'ils prennent les mesures voulues avant le mariage. Généralement ces difficultés proviennent de la femme. Le sexe féminin n'a été atteint par l'évangélisation que dans une mesure extrêmement minime, surtout parce que les parents païens, qui ne s'opposent pas à la christianisation et l'éducation de leurs garçons, prennent leur revanche sur les filles : ils redoutent notamment chez elles une opposition aux mariages précoces ou la fuite vers les centres. Pour ces gens donc il est pratiquement impossible de tourner la difficulté de la façon mentionnée. Comme le cas n'est pas prévu par la loi ancestrale et que, d'autre part, la majorité des détenteurs indigènes du pouvoir sont nettement indifférents, si pas hostiles, à l'évangélisation et à la stabilité du mariage chrétien, aucun compte n'est tenu de ces circonstances spéciales, au grand détriment des jeunes gens, qui se trouvent ainsi coincés entre leur conscience et leurs intérêts temporels (qui dans ces cas ont une forte répercussion sur leur vie morale). L'attitude de la presque totalité des chefs et juges n'est pas, dans cette matière, contraire à la lettre de la loi ancestrale, — puisqu'elle ne connaissait pas le cas, — mais elle est bel et bien en opposition avec son esprit.

7° Les époux se rendent ensemble dans la famille de la femme. La maladie et la mort survenant lors d'une visite pareille sont imputées uniquement au mari, qui en garde tous les risques, sauf, évidemment, si le mari, rentrant chez lui, la femme ne le suit pas, mais reste chez ses parents. Dans ce cas, en effet, nous retombons dans la solution du n° 2.

8° Ici nous reprenons l'éventualité indiquée à la fin de l'article IX, § 1, c'est-à-dire que la femme meurt dans sa famille avant le versement du walo. Si le mari est en tort (Cfr. sous 1, 3 et 7), la solution donnée à l'article en question garde toute sa valeur : la « responsabilité » du mari reste entière. Dans les autres cas, elle est diminuée, mais non enlevée. En effet, deux règles juridiques entrent en conflit. D'une part, la « responsabilité » du mari qui ne s'est pas pleinement acquitté de ses obligations, et, d'autre part, la « responsabilité » de la femme qui n'est pas restée chez son mari. Pour employer une comparaison du domaine de la comptabilité, il y a, des deux côtés, du débit et du crédit. Mais ce dernier est surtout du côté de la famille de la femme, car au moment de la mort la femme n'est pas encore épouse au sens plein du mot. Par conséquent, le mari doit payer une indemnité. Mais la mort de sa fiancée dans sa famille constitue pour lui une circonstance atténuante et de ce fait l'indemnité est diminuée et il suffira qu'il paie une petite moitié, c'est-à-dire environ 25 à 35 anneaux.

Conclusion.

Les explications données peuvent sembler un peu prolixes. Il était néanmoins utile d'indiquer toute la variété des cas possibles, afin d'en déduire la règle et de saisir sur le vif la base du système. Il appert ainsi de toutes ces considérations que la femme est entièrement au risque du mari, qui a à subir le préjudice qu'entraîne la perte de la femme. Elle lui appartient réellement et non à sa famille, et cela malgré l'impression contraire qu'on pourrait avoir comme si la femme appartenait plus à ses parents qu'à son mari. Car même dans les cas où elle meurt chez eux, après s'y être rendue pour un motif juste, son décès est considéré comme une injustice faite au mari, puisque la place de l'épouse est au foyer conjugal. C'est là la règle générale. Par exception, la femme redevient au risque des parents, c'est-à-dire que les parents redeviennent responsables, dans des cas spéciaux déterminés par le droit.

ARTICLE XI.

MORT DE LA FEMME CHEZ UN AUTRE HOMME.

Ici nous examinons ce qui arrive lorsqu'une femme ayant quitté son mari s'est rendue chez un autre homme et y meurt avant la restitution de la dot au premier. Deux cas peuvent se présenter :

1° Le walo a été versé par le second mari, mais n'a pas encore été restitué au premier. Celui-ci a droit à la restitution de la dot, tout comme si la femme n'était pas morte (chap. VIII, art. III), tandis que les règles données à l'article précédent sont applicables au nouveau mari.

2° Le walo n'a pas encore été versé; le second mari doit se conformer aux règles données à l'article IV, § 1, et article X, n° 9. Le premier mari doit rentrer dans ses droits, selon les règles indiquées au chapitre VIII, article III.

Voici deux exemples récents :

Homi yâ Lokombe, fille d'Ikotama de Bontole wâ Yôyokondo (Bongili), est mariée à Baleka de Nkilenjólô (Losenge, Bombwanja). Un jour elle se rend à Bempumbá pour se faire baptiser par le missionnaire protestant. Au retour, Humbé d'Iómbo (Bonkoso) la retient, désirant l'épouser. Il donne l'ikulá à Ikotama. Peu de temps après, Homi meurt. Humbé doit payer une forte indemnité, équivalente à la totalité de la dot, au père d'Homi, qui, lui, doit rembourser Baleka.

Ambá, fille de Nkálanga d'Ifutó (Bongili), était mariée à Yônjwa de Boimbo. Elle quitte celui-ci pour Bengóngó de Boambá, qui verse l'ikulá. Un jour Bengóngó, revenant de voyage, Ambá court à sa rencontre pour lui souhaiter la bienvenue, mais dans sa hâte elle heurte la souche d'un arbrisseau, trébuche et tombe. Sa chute a dû causer des lésions internes, car elle a été forcée de garder le lit, et peu de temps après elle mourut. Bengóngó a dû payer une indemnité de 30 anneaux plus 2 esclaves, soit au total 90 anneaux, à Nkálonga, qui, lui, a remboursé le premier mari.

A ce cas nous pouvons assimiler le décès d'une épouse survenu chez son mari, mais décès causé par un autre homme, soit que celui-ci ait eu avec elle des relations diverses, soit qu'il l'ait rendue enceinte, ce qui a entraîné sa mort. La responsabilité de cette double éventualité incombe à l'amant, qui doit indemniser le mari. L'indemnité est toujours très forte, équivalent au montant d'une dot et davantage (7).

La colonisation a donné naissance à un nouveau cas juridique, non prévu par la loi ancestrale des Nkundó : Si une femme, profitant de la liberté lui octroyée par la législation coloniale, se rend dans une Mission pour se faire instruire et s'y engager dans un mariage monogamique et qu'elle y contracte une maladie dont elle meurt (à la Mission, à l'hôpital, ou même dans sa famille, circonstances de lieu qui n'ont aucune importance juridique), nous nous trouvons devant un cas tout neuf. En effet, le mari ne considère plus la femme comme étant sienne, puisqu'elle l'a abandonné, bien que théoriquement elle continue d'être son épouse. D'autre part, elle n'est pas rentrée dans sa famille et ne s'est pas rendue chez un autre homme.

Les maris polygames veulent en rejeter la « responsabilité » sur les parents de la femme. Mais de fait ceux-ci n'y sont pour rien Il serait injuste de les mêler à cette question.

La Mission n'est pas mise en cause par eux. Elle rend d'ailleurs service à la femme et à toute la société en tâchant de l'élever moralement et culturellement.

Que faut-il penser de ce cas ? Nous avons vu à l'article précédent que l'épouse est aux risques du mari. A cette règle générale la loi nkundó formule quelques exceptions que nous avons exposées, en dehors desquelles toutefois la règle reprend son empire, puisque les exceptions sont de stricte interprétation. Ainsi dans le cas qui nous occupe, où par conséquent le préjudice doit rester pour le compte du mari.

---

(7) Cfr. chap. I, 1re partie, art. V, § 1, et chap. VI, art. VII, § 6.

Cette interprétation est en outre à encourager pour le motif suivant :

Le but de la législation en cause est de protéger la liberté dans cette matière d'une importance capitale et de favoriser la monogamie ou l'abandon progressif de la polygamie. Forcément les polygames — en bloc — doivent en pâtir de façon ou d'autre. La lutte contre un abus ne saurait se concevoir sans que les personnes qui s'y livrent soient atteintes.

Pareils cas sont encore très rares, mais leur fréquence peut augmenter avec les progrès de l'évangélisation.

Nous devons terminer par une remarque qui se rapporte à l'un et à l'autre des deux derniers articles. La cause du décès n'a aucune importance juridique. Les solutions données ne diffèrent pas, que la mort soit d'origine organique ou criminelle. Seulement, dans ce dernier cas, l'assassin doit payer une indemnité qui est remise à la personne préjudiciée, mari ou famille de la femme; de sorte que, de toute façon, il est satisfait à la justice.

Il peut arriver que la femme soit assassinée pendant une visite chez une parente de son mari, où elle s'est rendue sur le désir de ce dernier. Dans cette éventualité le mari de la belle-sœur est responsable. Il doit indemniser le mari de la victime, tandis que lui-même a droit à l'indemnisation de la part de l'assassin. Pour simplifier cette procédure, l'assassin peut payer directement au veuf : la justice est toujours sauve. Mais en aucun cas l'indemnité ne revient au père de la victime, car celle-ci appartient juridiquement et économiquement à son mari, et nullement au père, dont l'indemnisation consiste dans les paiements funéraires.

CONCLUSIONS.

1° La mort ne rompt l'union conjugale que dans la personne qui vient de mourir. De la part du conjoint qui reste en vie la rupture n'est consommée que par d'autres procédés. Si le mari est mort, la veuve reste épouse des héritiers et n'est libre que par la restitution de la dot. A la mort de l'épouse le mari peut épouser une remplaçante.

Le remariage de la veuve sans restitution dotale (et donc sans nouvelle dot) ou du veuf avec une remplaçante est considéré comme continuation de l'union préexistante et non dissoute. Cette continuation n'est pourtant pas absolue. En effet, elle n'est parfaite qu'au décès du mari, auquel cas sa parenté hérite de tous ses droits, donc aussi de ses droits sur les femmes qu'il a acquises au moyen de son capital. Au contraire, pour que le veuf continue l'alliance, un nouveau versement dotal doit intervenir.

Cette différence entre les deux cas provient de ce que la dot est liée à la « possession » de la femme qui y reste sujette et qui, de ce fait, devient, après la mort de son mari, l'épouse légale des héritiers. Ce n'est que sa propre mort qui enlève tout support à la dot, qui devient alors une valeur purement matérielle.

C'est pourquoi l'expression nkundó de « continuation du mariage » est équivoque. Pour le veuf le mariage persiste au point de vue familial. Mais du point de vue juridique il y a nouveau mariage, puisque pour la remplaçante il paie une nouvelle dot, ce qui fait un contrat absolument nouveau. Ce n'est que pour la veuve que le mariage persiste réellement aussi longtemps que le divorce n'est pas intervenu entre elle et les héritiers du mari défunt. Dans sa personne le contrat garde toute sa valeur, tandis que les obligations du mari sont transférées aux héritiers. De ce côté-ci il y a simplement changement de personnes, des sujets du contrat, qui n'est donc nullement annulé. Il s'agit ici d'un remplacement dans l'office de mari.

Ce qui précède doit s'entendre de la convention financière ou contrat dotal, comme nous l'avons expliqué au chapitre III, article IX. Car, pour ce qui est du pacte conjugal ou contrat de consentement, il est annulé par la mort, puisque tant l'héritier que la veuve doivent, pour devenir effectivement mari et femme, intervenir par de nouveaux actes. La continuation du mariage, comme s'expriment les Nkundó, n'est donc que la persistance de la convention dotale entre les familles, et nullement la continuation du pacte conjugal entre les deux individus.

Il serait souhaitable qu'un moraliste examinât à fond la valeur philosophico-théologique de ce mariage continuant après la mort d'une des parties. Personnellement, pour ce qui de la veuve et sous condition que par ailleurs rien ne s'y oppose, j'opine pour la validité. Le consentement, en effet, est exprimé de la part de l'homme par le versement des bekuedi, et de la part de la femme par le fait d'accompagner l'homme en qualité d'épouse.

2° Au point de vue économique le décès ne change pas la situation qui existait durant la vie. Les divers versements dotaux restent acquis aux parties respectives. La différence avec le divorce est donc considérable et très nettement marquée, comme il est indiqué au chapitre VIII, article III, Conclusion.

3° Les règles juridico-financières confirment la conclusion du chapitre VI, article II et suivants, que l'épouse appartient de droit comme de fait à son mari, quoiqu'elle ne sorte pas de son clan.

4° Elles corroborent aussi la conclusion du chapitre II, article IX, § 5 : que des divers paiements dotaux c'est le walo qui est l'élément essentiel pour le contrat matrimonial.

5° Enfin, elles démontrent la prépondérance juridique de l'union conjugale sur la société familiale ou clanique, nonobstant les faits apparemment contraires qu'on peut souvent observer.

CHAPITRE X.

ENFANTS.

Une étude sur le mariage serait incomplète sans un chapitre traitant des enfants. Leur procréation et leur éducation constituent le finis operis, l'effet naturel de l'état conjugal, état qui pour l'homme, être raisonnable, est la seule forme légitime de pourvoir à la propagation de son espèce, fin propre de la vie sexuelle.

Cette matière se prête à plus de développements que nous ne lui en donnons ici. Nous passons sous silence nombre de données intéressantes s'y rapportant, mais débordant les limites que nous avons tracées à cet ouvrage. Nous excluons, par exemple, la question de l'adoption, qui n'examine pas les enfants du point de vue matrimonial, mais ressort du domaine purement familial et social.

Même ramené dans ces bornes, ce chapitre, si nous traitions le sujet avec toute l'ampleur qu'il mérite, en viendrait à former à lui seul un volume entier. Nous devons donc en rester aux généralités, ne relevant que les cas particuliers les plus fréquents et les plus communs.

Pour ce qui concerne l'ordre suivi dans l'exposé de ce chapitre, nous étudierons successivement, après quelques notes préliminaires (art. I) :

Art. II, la conception et la gestation;
Art. III, l'enfantement;
Art. IV, l'allaitement;
Art. V, l'imposition du nom;
Art. VI, la question des jumeaux;
Art. VII, la circoncision;
Art. VIII, l'éducation;
Art. IX, les droits sur les enfants.

[p. 463]

ARTICLE I. — PRÉLIMINAIRES.

§ 1. Généralités.

Les Nkundó aiment avoir des enfants; non seulement, comme le prétendent parfois des coloniaux trop superficiels, des filles, mais tout autant des garçons. Il est vrai que la fille porte en elle l'espoir d'une dot et tout ce qu'elle représente pour les polygames avides de gloire païenne et de plaisirs charnels; mais en fait, il est rare de devoir constater cette préférence pour les enfants du sexe faible. Ce qui se rencontre, tout comme en Europe d'ailleurs, c'est le désir de voir naître un enfant de sexe déterminé, quand, par exemple, l'autre est déjà abondamment représenté dans le ménage. Ainsi l'indigène qui a déjà plusieurs garçons et aucune ou une seule fille fait des vœux pour leur voir s'ajouter une sœur. La chose est d'autant moins étonnante que la sœur est, ici, le moyen indiqué, et parfois unique, pour acquérir une épouse. D'autre part, le père dont la progéniture appartient exclusivement, ou presque, au sexe féminin, désire ardemment la naissance d'un fils, héritier des fruits de son travail et qui pourra lui donner aide et assistance dans sa vieillesse, en lui construisant une case, en défrichant la forêt, en lui apportant du gibier ou des produits de la pêche.

De fait, on entend rarement exprimer ces préférences. On reçoit plutôt l'impression que le Nkundó aime les enfants comme tels et aussi — les deux motifs étant inséparables dans la pratique — parce que, quel que soit le sexe, ils contribuent puissamment à renforcer son influence sociale.

On prétend parfois que les indigènes ne refusent pas les enfants parce que leur venue ne les gêne nullement, ni ne leur impose des charges financières écrasantes : ils ne leur coûtent rien à élever, tandis que chez les Blancs leur entretien, habillement, nourriture, instruction, placement entraînent des frais considérables. On ne peut contester que autant l'Européen moderne est exigeant à tous ces points de vue, enchaîné, bloqué par la multitude toujours croissante de ses besoins, autant la vie matérielle de l'indigène est simple et ses nécessités réduites au minimum indispensable. Toutefois, on n'en peut nullement conclure qu'il lui est tout aussi aisé d'élever une grande famille avec beaucoup d'enfants que de n'en avoir qu'un nombre plus restreint à sa charge. Sans parler d'habillement, — au temps présent surtout, — la nourriture des enfants grandissants l'oblige à défricher une plus vaste étendue de forêt, à se donner plus de peine pour les divers procédés de chasse ou de pêche; et lorsque le moment de chercher une épouse est venue pour ses fils, c'est encore lui qui devra se démener afin de leur procurer les valeurs nécessaires pour la dot.

De son côté, la femme nkundó autant que l'homme, sinon davantage, aime à transmettre la vie. La gestation peut bien la rendre maussade et grognarde et parfois lui susciter des peines, mais elle les supporte et ne pense pas, en règle très générale, à se priver pour ces raisons du bonheur de donner naissance à un petit être mignon, de l'allaiter, de le porter dans ses bras ou sur son épaule. Les embarras et les douleurs de la maternité ne la rebutent point. Quoique plus tard, lors du versement de la dot pour sa fille, sa cupidité la poussera à réclamer à hauts cris le paiement auquel elle a droit, voire parfois l'incitera à briser l'amour de son enfant à cause du retard dans cette opération financière, cette échéance n'apparaît pas à l'horizon de ses pensées avant que le moment n'en soit arrivé.

Elle porte à son enfant un amour parfaitement naturel, maternel, pour tout dire en un mot.

N'y a-t-il donc pas d'exceptions à cette règle générale? Oh! oui, et le contraire étonnerait de la part d'une population païenne dont toutes les passions ont libre jeu ou, tout au plus, ne sont refrénées que dans une mesure très limitée, et dont l'amour est loin d'atteindre la perfection qu'on peut rencontrer chez un peuple ennobli par quinze siècles de christianisme. D'ailleurs, — toutes les pages précédentes en témoignent, — nos Nkundó ne sont pas façonnés dans un moule uniforme, comme certains ouvrages coloniaux et ethnologiques en suggèrent l'impression. On trouve ici toutes les différences individuelles, bien que pour l'observateur européen elles ressortent moins, car d'ordinaire nous approchons les indigènes en bloc et notre contact avec eux est, souvent, trop peu personnel.

§ 5. Avortement.

Un terrible ennemi de l'amour maternel est la pratique de l'avortement, que les Nkundó ont toujours connue. Nous ne pouvons exposer ici toutes les recettes en usage à cette fin. Il nous suffira d'énumérer les motifs qui les incitent à y recourir. Ce sont :

1° La lascivité de la femme : la génération et ensuite les soins de l'enfant l'empêchent, dans une certaine mesure, de s'adonner au plaisir charnel. Cette cause d'avortements était inexistante autrefois, ou du moins très rare. Inutile de dire qu'elle est devenue plus fréquente, particulièrement dans les centres, où elle ne cesse d'augmenter et où, en outre, les « ménagères » attitrées ou occasionnelles apprennent l'emploi de nouveaux moyens stérilisateurs ou avortifs;

2° L'antipathie ou une colère persistante contre le mari peut pousser la femme à empêcher la conception ou à en détruire l'effet;

3° L'affaiblissement excessif de l'organisme maternel, causé par des conceptions et des accouchements multiples à des intervalles trop rapprochés;

4° L'encombrement, la difficulté de surveiller, de porter, de soigner beaucoup de petits enfants : bálota bokękęsano wă bàna nsátélá nsátélá. Cette raison a surtout une influence sur les danseuses renommées.

Il va sans dire que plusieurs de ces motifs peuvent être réunis dans la même personne. Ainsi j'ai connu le cas d'une femme qui avait pratiqué l'avortement de son huitième enfant. Ses accouchements réitérés, joints à une activité soutenue, avaient fortement diminué ses forces. Une palabre avec son mari fit déborder la mesure et elle résolut de se défaire du fruit qu'elle portait dans son sein.

Sauf ces exceptions, l'indigène de cette contrée désire ardemment voir sa personne se prolonger dans une nombreuse progéniture (1).

Il convient d'attirer l'attention sur le danger de voir augmenter les avortements pour un nouveau motif, la honte d'un accouchement extramatrimonial. Comme nous l'avons vu au chapitre I, IIe partie, article IV, § 3, de temps immémoriaux la grossesse prématrimoniale n'engendre ni remords ni palabres. L'enseignement de la morale chrétienne doit étendre tôt ou tard le sentiment de la honte à ce phénomène. En expliquant le mal de la fornication on devra donc avoir soin d'insister également sur le mal bien plus grand qu'il y a à transgresser le cinquième commandement par l'avortement.

L'avortement volontaire n'est pas considéré par le Nkundó comme une faute morale (2). A ses yeux, le fœtus imparfaitement formé, non viable, n'est pas encore un homme. Ce n'est qu'un être humain en formation, in potentia. D'où la coutume d'enterrer l'avorton dans la case, ou tout près. Ainsi le génie qui a procuré la grossesse se voit respecté et réitérera son action bienfaisante [1].

---

(1) Ailleurs il n'en est plus de même. On cite les exemples des régions déjà « plus civilisées » : environs de Coquilhatville, région de Losanganye.

(2) Mentalité qui existe également en Europe, actuellement, selon HAESCOUR, dans Kultuurleven, VI, n° 1, p. 21 (1935), et la brochure y citée du Prof. D. Schockaert.

Mais s'il est volontaire, l'avortement est toujours une faute familiale ou sociale, car il prive la famille d'un membre sur lequel elle pouvait compter. Toutefois, si la chose arrive à une jeune fille-mère, il n'en est fait que peu ou pas de cas, parce que personne ne peut se considérer comme lésé; tout au plus gronde-t-on la coupable. Au contraire, pour une femme mariée l'infraction est des plus graves. Son mari a un droit strict sur le fœtus qui aurait dû devenir son enfant. Comme punition, il ne peut pas battre ni maltraiter la criminelle, l'état de celle-ci ne permettant pas de violences, mais il peut l'abandonner à son sort et lui refuser toute assistance, spécialement en omettant de lui apporter le bois de chauffage dont elle a un si grand besoin dans cette situation. Car elle lui a causé un tort immense, elle a agi avec une réelle malice (aônjókel'i-nkúnyá, dit-il), puisqu'il l'a épousée principalement pour qu'elle lui donne une descendance. Si elle meurt c'est sa propre faute. Sa famille même ne la soutient pas, car elle serait accusée d'avoir trempé la main dans ce crime; inévitablement elle perdrait le procès et serait condamnée à indemniser le mari.

Un avortement avéré involontaire est traité comme un accident ou une maladie et en suit les stipulations juridiques. Si donc le fait arrive à la femme pendant qu'elle se trouve chez ses parents, la responsabilité leur en incombe. D'ordinaire, la palabre est arrangée à l'amiable : la famille fait quelques paiements de nkọmí et l'affaire est close. Si les relations entre le mari et son beau-père sont un peu tendues, le différend peut traîner et occasionner la rupture. Si la femme meurt des suites de l'accident, les règles données au chapitre précédent, article X, entrent en jeu.

---

[1] D'autres donnent comme explication de cette coutume que le fœtus ayant déjà une âme, celle-ci reste auprès du corps minuscule et profitera de la première occasion pour rentrer dans le sein maternel.

ARTICLE II. — CONCEPTION ET GESTATION.

Le Nkundó ne possède qu'une notion partielle des phénomènes de la conception. Il sait bien par quels actes la procréation des enfants a lieu. Il possède une parfaite connaissance anatomique et une terminologie riche de ce qui se rapporte à la vie sexuelle. Des processus physiologiques il ne connaît que ceux que l'expérience lui peut apprendre. En outre, d'après lui, l'acte procréateur doit être répété plusieurs fois pour qu'il produise son effet naturel. Notons enfin que les rapports sont strictement défendus pendant la menstruation (-kọna ou ẹ́na nsóngé = littéralement : être malade de, ou : voir la lune, et autres expressions similaires). On donne comme raison d'éviter à la femme dans cet état difficile toute molestation supplémentaire.

§ 1. Elima.

Les Nkundó attribuent la procréation des enfants tantôt à Dieu (Njakomba), tantôt aux génies (elímá, pl. bilímá). C'est Dieu qui les forme (-ánga) dans le sein maternel, et en même temps ce sont les bilímá qui pourvoient les hommes d'une progéniture (¹).

Il ne faut évidemment pas tâcher de faire résoudre par les indigènes cette antinomie apparente : ils n'y réussiraient pas; ils affirment tout simplement les deux faits. Je dis antinomie apparente, car, comme les Nkundó admettent que les bilímá dépendent de Njakomba, la contradiction n'est pas réelle, et les deux propositions se con-

---

(¹) Contrairement à ce que relate le R. P. LESTAEGHE, Congo, 1922, I, p. 363, sur les Ekonda, les tribus que j'ai connues, tout en attribuant à Dieu le don des enfants, ne Lui adressent jamais de prières à cet effet. Cela ne regarde pas directement Dieu (Njakomba ou Mbombiándá), mais l'elímá un tel ou un tel.

La stérilité, phénomène fréquent ici, n'est pas imputée aux maléfices, mais est considéré comme un défaut inné. D'ordinaire les indigènes prétendent que Dieu leur refuse des enfants.

cilient en expliquant l'intervention des génies comme une opération dépendante de l'action divine : ce sont des causes secondes, intermédiaires, quoique nos indigènes ne fassent pas ce raisonnement philosophique.

Ce serait sortir du cadre de cette étude que d'expliquer toutes les croyances se rapportant aux génies. Nous ne pouvons pourtant pas omettre les détails qui touchent de près à notre sujet.

Il existe une grande quantité de génies divers; presque tout village en possède plusieurs sur son territoire. Chacun a sa demeure propre dans des endroits ou objets singuliers et frappant l'imagination: arbres énormes, dépressions ovales qui forment des sortes de mares (jěmbo, pl. baémbo), pentes accentuées, blocs de limonite extraordinaires, tourbillons dans les ruisseaux et les rivières, etc.

Les Nkundó prient les bilímá afin d'obtenir des enfants. Ils leur font, à cette intention, des offrandes de vivres, de monnaie. Il arrive que l'elímá, pour éprouver les sentiments de quelqu'un à son égard, se présente à lui le soir ou la nuit, sous les apparences d'une personne connue, et lui demande quelque menu cadeau. Malheur à celui qui fait preuve de ladrerie; il sera frustré de l'objet de ses désirs, ou l'enfant n'arrivera pas à terme, ou encore naîtra débile ou difforme.

Outre l'attitude bienveillante générale envers le génie, la femme connaît encore un moyen d'assurer son intervention. Elle se procure du kaolin (ẹongọ) dans la demeure (jěmbo, de préférence) du génie. Le soir elle le mélange avec des plantes. De cette mixture, nommée isaá, elle s'enduit le ventre. Pendant toute la durée de la gestation elle continue ce traitement, qui a la propriété d'enlever tout ce qui, en elle, serait de nature à contrarier l'action du génie (ákékola lokeko jwǎ bilímá lǒle ndá likundú).

Certains génies aquatiques sont renommés pour leur générosité, tel Itúmbálombé ou Ekótalombé, de Mpakú, que l'on considère comme un être féminin. Elle va en voyage au loin chercher une provision d'enfants. Au retour, elle apparaît à quelqu'un et lui communique la nouvelle pour qu'il la répande. Seulement elle prescrit à toute femme qui désire ses faveurs d'observer telle ou telle abstinence. Parfois elle chante pour amuser ou amadouer les enfants. Ce jour-là les mères doivent omettre d'apaiser ou d'endormir leurs petits au moyen de chants, et ne peuvent y employer que de douces paroles. Sinon l'enfant mourra; car ce serait méconnaître la gentillesse de la vieille elímá.

Quelquefois les génies donnent des indices de leur bénédiction. Une femme qui, au moment de l'arrivée de la cargaison, est en train de prendre un bain à cette rive, verra bientôt réalisé son vœu le plus intime. De la part des génies forestiers, les femmes reçoivent d'autres signes : achoppement inopiné à une pierre, à une souche, à une racine, ou prise d'une grenouille arboricole qui lui vient sauter sur l'épaule, etc.

Le génie n'aime et ne protège que l'enfant qu'il a lui-même donné. Il abhorre et hait à mort les dons vivants de ses congénères. Pourtant, s'il se trouve plusieurs bilímá aux environs d'un même village, les Nkundó expliquent l'absence des rivalités usuelles en les considérant comme apparentés entre eux : l'un est le mari, l'autre l'épouse, les autres les enfants; c'est pourquoi ils ne se contrecarrent pas.

L'elímá est donc hostile aux fœtus autres que ceux dont il est l'auteur. Toutefois, son action malveillante ne se déclanche qu'après quelques semaines, et encore faut-il que la grossesse soit avancée au point d'être devenue manifeste (jěmi jǒkela isómbá). Lui faudrait-il du temps pour obtenir l'évidence que le fruit en question est indubitablement son don à lui?

En tout cas, la conséquence de cette croyance est qu'une femme enceinte depuis quelques mois ne peut résider longtemps à l'étranger et que telle autre, ayant après la conception accompagné son mari qui est allé travailler ailleurs, rentre dans son village pour y achever la dernière période de sa grossesse et y accoucher.

Il existe pourtant un antidote (nsengó) contre cette action meurtrière des génies. On peut se le procurer chez une personne qui en connaît la recette (cette personne n'est pas le nkanga ou « médecin »). Cette composition protectrice, enveloppée dans un bout d'étoffe, est liée au moyen d'une ficelle en fibres de la liane lokósá, au milieu d'une corde tressée avec les fibres de l'arbuste ikuluyaéndé que la femme menacée se noue autour des reins (¹).

§ 2. Débuts de la grossesse.

Les premiers mois qui suivent l'arrêt des règles s'appellent bọfọswa. L'expression verbale est -fọswa jĕmi (jĕmi signifiant fœtus).

La femme qui vient de concevoir n'a plus de succès à la recherche des chenilles ou à la pêche (par écoppement, à hameçons balẹ́ngẹ́, à stupéfiants = lisola, n'importe). Elle ne parvient à rien prendre, tandis que les efforts de ses compagnes sont fructueux. C'est que le bọfọswa est wĕká, c'est-à-dire une cause d'insuccès (bŏmoto óâ wĕká áfóáte). Notons que ce mot peut dériver du verbe ẹ́ka = mettre obstacle.

Le mari d'une femme qui se trouve dans cet état n'est pas logé à meilleure enseigne. Le wĕká de son épouse se communique à lui ainsi qu'à tout parent du mari qui habite le même village ou, comme l'expriment les indigènes, ǫ̌lę́ mpoké ęmǫ̂nkǫlǫ́=celui qui mange du même pot; ŏkisí ilǫmbę ímǫ̂nkǫlǫ́=celui qui demeure dans la même maison. En sont indemnes les amis, même s'ils résident dans l'agglomération de la femme enceinte, et les parents vivant ailleurs.

---

(¹) Ces données au sujet de l'elímá s'opposent diamétralement à la conception que s'en est faite le R. P. SCHEBESTA (Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 241, et dans W. SCHMIDT, Der Ursprung der Gottesidee, IV, p. 322), sur la foi de son interprète Bern. Bongonga, de Boúlama (Bombwanja) (actuellement décédé), qui, en ma présence, a été obligé un jour de retirer ses affirmations sous la pression des objections écrasantes d'un nombre considérable d'autres indigènes. Cfr. aussi R. P. BOELAERT, Hooger Leven, 1935, p. 60, et Congo, 1936, t. I, p. 42; HULSTAERT, Congo, 1936, t. II, p. 670.

Le wěká porte malheur à celui qui en est entaché. Ainsi, s'il va à la chasse, il reviendra bredouille. S'il participe à une guerre, il sera blessé. Plus encore, un léopard se trouvant dans les environs attaquera de préférence cet homme. Un éléphant le flairera et tâchera de le tuer. Un serpent le mordra plutôt qu'un autre. Au marché tout lui sera compté plus cher.

Cette situation encombrante persiste pendant tout le temps que dure la grossesse, donc jusqu'à la naissance de l'enfant.

Toutefois, les Nkundó connaissent un antidote (nsengó ou losenjó), un moyen de défaire (senjola) ces interdits gênants. Des trois procédés connus c'est surtout le dernier qui est en vogue actuellement.

1° Le mari (ou celui auquel le wěká est attaché et qui veut s'en débarrasser) prend, au moyen d'une feuille, évidemment, un chilopode nkǫ̂ngǫlí, l'enferme dans une grande feuille et, en la liant avec une mince liane, en fait un petit paquet, tout comme on fait un paquet de viande, de poisson, etc. Il remet ce paquet à sa femme, qui, pensant qu'il contient de la nourriture, l'ouvre sans méfiance. Mais à la vue de l'arthropode abhorré, elle le jette loin d'elle en poussant des cris d'aversion, pendant que le mari lui dit : « C'est toi qui restes avec le wěká ». De ce fait, lui-même en est libéré.

2° Un second moyen est de prendre, lorsque l'occasion s'en présente, la femme enceinte au nez, en disant : « Que le wěká reste attaché à toi ».

3° La femme prépare de l'imbóndó (feuilles de manioc salées et saucées d'huile de palme). Les deux époux en mangent conjointement, contrairement à la pratique habituelle. Mais le mari s'arrange en sorte que la dernière bouchée reste à la femme et que celle-ci garde donc la feuille qui sert d'assiette et qui représente le wĕká, pendant que le mari lui dit : « Garde le wĕká pour toi ».

Le wĕká ne peut pas se détacher de la femme, qui est le bomóngó wĕká= la propriétaire du wĕká, celle qui en est le fondement. Pour elle il persiste jusqu'à ce que l'enfant soit sur le point de naître (elaká ô jĕmi jŏtúnda = littéralement : qu'il est arrivé au terme de sa croissance, ou jŏkékama= s'est mis de travers) ; donc pratiquement il ne cesse qu'avec la naissance de l'enfant.

Si la première femme meurt au début de sa première grossesse on doit pratiquer l'opération césarienne. On extrait le fœtus (qui n'est encore qu'un embryon = iléngélá, ou bokelé= littéralement : œuf, ou ilóngó= littéralement : sang), pour l'enterrer dans ou derrière la case. L'omission de cet usage entraînerait la mort en grossesse des autres épouses de son mari ou des femmes auxquelles il s'unirait plus tard.

§ 3. Période d'interdits.

Lorsque la grossesse est avancée, deux ou trois mois avant l'accouchement (période réduite à présent à une ou deux semaines), on procède à la « conservation du fœtus » = báomba jĕmi= ils conservant le fœtus, ou bááka jĕmi = ils fixent le fœtus. Dès ce moment commence la période du bokeka ou bokeko, qui ne cesse qu'après l'accouchement. L'expression verbale est lémba bokeka= lier la période d'interdits sexuels (¹). Cette dénomination s'étend aussi à toutes les défenses particulières (bikilá) qui découlent de cet état.

(¹) On dit aussi lémba lúmbá. Pareille période d'interdits sexuels appelée du même nom existe encore, entre autres, pour la circoncision, le dressement d'une clôture de chasse, la pose de pièges à éléphants.

Pour la première grossesse on prélude par la cérémonie suivante : la mère de la femme enduit de fard rouge, ngóla, la tête et tout le corps de sa fille. Le ngóla, objet de parure, est ici une marque d'affection, donnée pour honorer et féliciter de l'heureux événement la future mère. Lorsque le ngóla est plus ou moins durci elle arrange en boulettes la chevelure ainsi enduite, en se servant d'un bosóngó en fer, qui est l'instrument habituel pour le dressage des cheveux. Ensuite elle lui présente à manger une poule et des bananes. Désormais la femme enceinte ne peut plus se nourrir de poules, car la consommation de cet oiseau (auquel les Nkundó assimilent les canards) et de ses œufs arrêterait le développement normal du fœtus. Cette cérémonie s'appelle íla bongata (Bombwanja : ẹlẹku) = enduire de fard rouge en boulettes.

Le père de la femme et les parents du mari tiennent à y assister, car elle est considérée comme de grande importance. J'ai connu une forte palabre parce que la mère d'une femme avait procédé à la cérémonie en l'absence du mari et de sa famille. Ceux-ci étaient furieux. Ils divulguèrent l'affaire pour pouvoir obtenir gain de cause si, plus tard, il arrivait quelque chose à la mère ou à l'enfant. Le mari pourrait de la sorte se disculper et faire retomber la faute sur sa femme et la famille de celle-ci, qui devraient alors payer une indemnité.

La femme n'enlève le fard qu'après trois ou quatre semaines. Actuellement, l'usage du fard ayant disparu, excepté à certaines occasions et chez les vieilles personnes, on ne le laisse qu'une nuit. En outre, la surface à enduire est restreinte à une ligne au milieu de la tête ou même à un seul point.

A l'occasion de cette cérémonie, les Bombwanja procèdent à la confession publique (etato) des amants. Mais comme les Bokóté la réservent pour après l'accouchement, nous en traiterons plus loin.

La nuit qui suit la cérémonie décrite, les conjoints « fixent le fœtus » par leur union charnelle. S'ils omettaient cet acte, l'enfant n'arriverait pas à terme.

Pour les grossesses suivantes, la fixation du fœtus n'est plus précédée des mêmes formalités.

Pendant tout le temps de la gestation les conjoints ne cessent pas leurs rapports, « afin de frayer à l'enfant un passage facile ». Par contre, ils doivent observer rigoureusement la fidélité conjugale. Néanmoins, un polygame peut avoir des rapports avec ses autres femmes.

A côté de cette partie essentielle, l'interdit comprend une partie accidentelle : les conjoints ne peuvent même pas se permettre des actes qui n'y ont qu'une relation fort éloignée. Ainsi ils ne peuvent :

1° toucher de n'importe quelle façon, fût-ce simplement en donnant la main, les personnes avec lesquelles ils ont eu des rapports adultères; ils doivent donc les éviter;

2° s'asseoir à côté de ces personnes;

3° les fixer du regard;

4° entrer dans un appartement ou une maison où elles se trouvent;

5° manger « dans le même pot »;

6° coucher sur le lit d'un autre ménage;

7° d'autres personnes ne peuvent plus dormir dans le lit des conjoints liés par le bokeka.

Cette loi d'une fidélité plus rigoureuse se prolonge, pour le mari, jusqu'à la fin du bokeka, pour la femme, au contraire, jusqu'au sevrage de l'enfant. Elle est particulièrement sévère pendant la réclusion. (Cfr., plus loin, art. III, § 3.)

La transgression de la stipulation essentielle de cette interdit (-fénda bokeka) entraîne, soit la mort de la femme pendant la grossesse et surtout durant la réclusion, soit, plus tard, la mort de l'enfant.

A. — Si la femme meurt pendant cette période, les soupçons pèsent à priori sur le mari. On dit aǒfénda wǎlí = il a transgressé sa femme. A moins qu'il ne puisse prouver son innocence, soit par des faits publics, soit par le jugement d'un magicien, soit par l'autopsie.

La femme a-t-elle été la victime d'un séducteur, celui-ci est rendu responsable et doit payer une forte indemnité, équivalente au montant de la dot versée pour la défunte. Si nul autre homme n'est en cause l'affaire n'a pas de suite.

L'autopsie-opération césarienne était toujours pratiquée autrefois. Son but était double : extraire l'enfant et examiner la mère. Si l'opération révèle l'existence d'un « estomac » (likundú), c'est que la défunte était d'une nature, ou plutôt d'une constitution malfaisante (lilọka) et qu'elle a ainsi causé la mort de son enfant. Si celui-ci vit encore, cela prouve qu'il est d'une nature magique supérieure; il a résisté aux maléfices naturels de sa mère et ceux-ci se sont retournés contre leur auteur inconscient (¹). L'enfant est donné à une nourrice (parente, étrangère, femme Bọtswa, selon les disponibilités).

Si le corps de la mère ne montre aucune caractéristique de malfaisance et de « haine des autres », sa mort est censée causée par les maléfices de l'enfant. Là-dessus d'aucuns le tuent pour l'empêcher de nuire durant toute sa vie; d'autres, au contraire, l'épargnent malgré tout.

Si par malheur le mari (car c'est lui surtout qui est en cause, parce que le plus exposé aux défaillances) s'est méconduit, il ne reste à sa femme qu'une faible chance de salut. Il est pourtant toujours possible qu'elle en réchappe. Mais cela uniquement à condition que le mari s'abstienne désormais de tout acte sexuel et de tous les gestes et actions accidentels décrits ci-dessus. La moindre chose qu'il puisse faire dans ces conditions, s'il est sérieux, est d'avertir son épouse de la faiblesse qu'il a eue, pour qu'elle prenne ses précautions. S'il veut parer à toute éventualité de causer à sa femme une mort certaine, il l'envoie chez elle, en remettant à son beau-père un gage (ndanga) par lequel il reconnaît sa culpabilité et prouve son intention d'assumer l'entière responsabilité de son méfait. Un homme probe agit de préférence de cette façon. Car il ne sait jamais si, par inadvertance, il ne transgressera pas un jour une des prescriptions.

---

(¹) Pour le Nkundó, seuls les animaux ont un « estomac » = likundú. Si une personne humaine en possède un, c'est-à-dire si ce viscère est grand, courbe, à compartiments, anormal en un mot, c'est un malfaiteur. Il porte en lui une force occulte pour nuire. Il fait ce mal volontairement, ou, le plus souvent, inconsciemment. On peut reconnaître certains hommes à likundú à ce qu'ils mangent leurs ongles, leurs cheveux, etc. Les Nkundó ont dû certainement constater des rapports entre cette habitude et la difformité de l'estomac.

B. — La mort de l'enfant est provoquée par la corruption du lait de la mère, qui devient ainsi inapte à la nutrition. Comme pour le cas précédent, la faute est à priori imputée au mari : isé aɓoma bǫ̂na la ndota (¹). Puisqu'il ne cause de tort qu'à lui-même, il ne s'ensuit aucune palabre; la punition « naturelle » suffit. Cela n'empêche qu'il est en butte aux mauvaises langues; on le montre du doigt et à l'occasion on n'omet pas de lui rappeler son méfait. Pour se disculper, il peut recourir à une ordalie ou demander au jugement d'un magicien ou d'une pratique magique la révélation du coupable. Le coupable découvert n'encourt aucune sanction sociale : il est puni par l'effet même de l'ordalie ou de l'envoûtement exercé contre lui.

Si l'adultère de la mère est prouvé par le fait flagrant, son séducteur est reconnu coupable. Il doit payer l'indemnité de mort (20 à 30 anneaux de cuivre). La femme reste entièrement hors de cause, socialement : c'est une affaire entre elle et son mari.

Afin de prévenir tout effet préjudiciable à l'enfant, on a recours à la potion du bondandota, qui sera expliqué à l'article suivant, § 3. On peut y ajouter une « médication » par scarifications. Cette thérapie est appliquée tant aux parents qu'à l'enfant. Si le père est riche, il invite la famille de sa femme à venir faire elle-même cette opération. L'invitation est, comme dans tous les cas analogues, accompagnée de la livraison d'un gage, et des cadeaux d'adieu (belingako) sont remis à la fin de la visite. En outre, très souvent, la femme va, après la réclusion, résider pour quelque temps chez ses parents, afin d'accroître l'efficacité du traitement.

(¹) Ndota = maladie causée par la transgression de prescriptions en matière de sexualité. (Cfr. chap. 1^{er}, 2^{e} partie, art. IV, § 2, A.)

La sanction encourue pour la transgression des stipulations accidentelles est moins grave. Ce sont, chez la parturiante, des migraines violentes, qui souvent provoquent la pamoison et parfois rendent l'accouchement fort laborieux et peuvent ainsi aller jusqu'à causer la mort. Le mari est rarement importuné par ces maux de tête. Mais il s'efforce d'observer fidèlement la loi, afin d'épargner à son épouse de si pénibles éventualités et d'éviter la mort de l'enfant naissant.

Les conjoints sont astreints, outre à l'abstention sexuelle avec ce qui s'y rattache, à divers interdits qui sont manifestement dus à des idées superstitieuses. Ainsi :

1° Ne pas descendre dans un puits ni creuser la terre : la femme mourrait, car c'est comme si vous creusiez sa tombe.

2° Ne rien porter conjointement avec une autre personne, car c'est de cette façon qu'on porte les cadavres, et le portage serait l'imitation-cause du cortège funéraire de la femme.

3° Ne pas monter sur le toit (grimper dans un palmier pour y couper des noix n'est pas défendu).

4° Ne pas manger des bêtes tuées par un carnassier (léopard, crocodile, etc.), sinon l'enfant mourrait d'une mort subite et innaturelle, à l'instar des victimes de ces fauves.

5° S'abstenir d'animaux qui ont l'habitude de vivre dans les creux des arbres ou dans des tanières, comme le porc-épic, les pangolins, certains oiseaux, les crocodiles et gavials [1]. L'accouchement serait très pénible, car l'enfant s'enroulerait sur lui-même et se blottirait dans le sein de sa mère. Les poissons qui se réfugient dans des galeries ne donnent pas matière à ces conséquences et sont donc consommés.

6° Ne pas manger de tortues [2]. On craint un enfantement difficile : la tortue, en effet, rentre dans sa carapace et en clôt les extrémités anales comme des tenailles, et l'enfant en ferait de même.

7° Ne pas manger la tête d'un singe; l'enfant naîtrait avec des yeux enfoncés semblables à ceux de cet animal.

8° Ne pas manger la grande antilope mbuli, parce qu'elle a le cou long et les chairs molles; l'enfant contracterait les mêmes défauts.

9° Ne pas manger le poisson lioóló, qui produirait des migraines; car il nage sauvagement sans direction ordonnée.

Les conséquences du bokeka et les obligations qui en découlent sont attachées à la paternité naturelle. Ainsi, si la femme se trouve en état de grossesse par suite de relations avec un amant attitré et reconnu, celui-ci doit en assumer toute la responsabilité. Il est obligé de fixer le fœtus et d'observer toutes les prescriptions du bokeka. Il en est de même quand la grossesse est adultérine: le père naturel porte toutes les suites de son acte. Le mari en est déchargé et n'a plus de rapports avec son épouse jusqu'à la fin de l'époque particulière de la parturition. Le coupable doit lui donner un gage par lequel il reconnaît publiquement sa responsabilité, et il est tenu de s'acquitter de tous les devoirs de mari et peut donc, pendant toute la durée de la grossesse, avoir des relations avec cette femme sans payer d'indemnités supplémentaires. Si un accident arrive à la mère ou à l'enfant, il est condamné à une forte indemnité.

---

[1] Dans cette région, les femmes ne mangent jamais de serpents, ni les chauves-souris (loléma, bọnkọ́m, ifukyá).

[2] Dans certaines tribus (Bongili, Bonkoso) les femmes s'abstiennent de ces reptiles en tout temps.

Notons, enfin, que depuis la visibilité de la grossesse jusqu'après la réclusion, aucun versement dotal ne peut avoir lieu, comme nous l'avons déjà fait observer au chapitre II, article XI.

L'enfantement est facilité par l'application, entretenue régulièrement sur l'abdomen de la femme, de la décoction de feuilles diverses mêlée à du kaolin (isaá), dont il a déjà été question. On fait également des scarifications médicales sur le ventre.

Enfin, à l'approche de la délivrance, on administre des lavements spécialement au moyen d'une décoction de l'écorce de l'arbre boímbo (¹). Tous ces traitements sont nommés belé byă bosánjá, c'est-à-dire médicaments (en vue) d'un enfantement facile.

ARTICLE III. — LA NAISSANCE.

§ 1. Accouchement.

Pour l'accouchement la femme reste chez son mari et ne se rend pas dans sa famille. Ce n'est que par exception qu'elle accouche ailleurs, par exemple lorsque pour l'une ou l'autre raison elle a été renvoyée chez elle, ou encore en voyage, pendant les travaux des champs, au ruisseau, à la source, etc. Ces accouchements subits et imprévus ne sont pas très rares (²).

Le mari prie sa belle-mère de venir assister sa fille. D'autres parentes du mari ou de la femme ne refusent non plus leurs services. Il se trouve toujours parmi elles l'une ou l'autre plus experte en la matière, qui fait fonction d'accoucheuse (mbótsi).

---

(¹) Certains de ces lavements, notamment celui du boímbo, sont également employés comme abortifs.

(²) La facilité d'accouchement s'appelle : bosánjé; la difficulté : bonsombo.

L'accouchement a lieu dans la bananeraie, derrière la case : il y a de la lumière et de l'air. Dans la maison, il serait plus laborieux.

Le mari ne peut pas assister à cet événement. Sa présence le rendrait difficile et pénible. Plus il est éloigné, mieux cela vaut. Ceci n'est pourtant pas une défense stricte; s'il n'y se trouvait personne pour aider la parturiante (comme lors d'un accouchement imprévu en forêt, etc.), il n'hésite nullement à aider son épouse de tout son pouvoir et de toute son habileté.

L'accoucheuse facilite la venue de l'enfant en faisant boire à la mère une potion « pour rendre glissant » (boté wă bosę́li), ou en lui administrant un lavement à l'écorce de boímbo.

Si les douleurs persistent pendant plusieurs jours et que toute médication reste vaine, on suppose l'action de quelque maléfice (lilǫka). Pour la neutraliser, on « bénit » (-saka) la parturiante. A cet effet, tant sa famille que celle du mari apportent chacune une tige de la plante bokaakó (bosáánga). Deux parentes, chacune avec la tige de son clan, en extraient, par pétrissement, le suc, dont elles enduisent l'abdomen de la femme. Après quoi l'accouchement se passe normalement.

Le nkanga (médecin-magicien) n'intervient qu'au cas où la femme a déjà eu plusieurs fausses-couches ou que tous ses enfants meurent. Consulté il les attribue invariablement à l'action des esprits des défunts, qui peuvent être apaisés par des offrandes et par la promesse d'attendre la manifestation de leur volonté pour l'imposition d'un nom à l'enfant. Il y ajoute généralement l'observation, jusqu'au sevrage. de quelques interdits alimentaires.

Dès que l'enfant est né, les assistantes annoncent l'heureux événement par des cris, et l'on court en avertir le père. Celui-ci (ou un parent) communique la nouvelle au moyen du lokolé. Pour un garçon on téléphone : Batǫkǫ́ falafala, bokáta bókátáká likǫngá la nguwa, ayíme lǫkęndǫ ndá likundú, etc. (1) = les nattes étendues, celui qui tient lance et bouclier vient de voyage dans le sein. Pour une fille, « bokáta....nguwa » est remplacé par : isekaseka y' ólíato = douce amitié de la femme (2).

La nouvelle est acclamée par des cris d'allégresse dans tout le village et chacun accourt admirer l'enfant et féliciter la mère. Ils n'entrent pas dans la maison. Aucune fête ne rehausse la joie générale.

Ensuite, s'il s'agit d'un garçon, le père ou un homme de sa famille se poste, armé d'une lance, devant l'enfant qu'on lui présente à l'entrée de la case, ou sur la véranda, s'il y en a une. Il menace comme s'il allait attaquer l'enfant, lui crie : « Ha! ha! ha! », gesticule comme un guerrier, puis prend la petite main et lui fait tenir la lance, en lui disant : « Sois un homme fort, fais la guerre avec courage » (3).

La naissance d'un enfant comporte quelques interdits communs à tout le village, qui frappent aussi bien les Batswá que les Baotó. Ne sont pourtant pas liés les habitants d'une partie du village séparée par un marais du groupe où l'heureux événement a eu lieu. Ainsi on ne peut plus vaquer aux « travaux », c'est-à-dire aller aux plantations pour y travailler, chercher des vivres, du bois de chauffage, établir une clôture de chasse ou un barrage de pêche, travailler à la construction ou à la réparation d'une maison. L'infraction détruirait le fruit du travail entier : les champs ne produiraient plus et l'on ne prendrait plus aucune bête ou aucun poisson. Et l'influence funeste s'étend à toute culture, etc., appartenant à n'importe qui. Toutefois, il n'y a pas d'inconvénient à chercher du bois de chauffage en pleine forêt, ni à récolter le manioc d'un champ mûr, ni à couper des fruits de palme.

---

(1) Ailleurs : ásókúsola. Ou : bęsǫfǫ́ la mpíko básókitela bele folé-folé = boyaux et foies sont descendus, sont dehors.

(2) D'autres termes existent dans certaines tribus. [Cfr. Anthropos, XXX, p. 655 et suiv. (1935).]

(3) Si un garçon, plus tard, se laisse épouvanter, on lui demande : « N'a-t-on pas fait cette cérémonie quand tu étais à peine né ? »

A proprement parler, ces interdits ne frappent que les personnes qui ont vu le nouveau-né. Mais comme personne ne s'abstient d'aller l'admirer, tous y sont astreints. Cet interdit reste en vigueur jusqu'au détachement du cordon ombilical. Certaines tribus, pourtant, ont plus facile en limitant la défense au jour de la naissance.

§ 2. Hygiène de la mère et de l'enfant.

Le cordon ombilical (lọkọ́ki) est coupé vers le milieu. Près de l'ombilic on pratique une incision. Sur le morceau qui reste fixé on verse chaque jour une décoction d'herbes et l'on met du sable blanc, pour le faire se dessécher plus rapidement. Lorsque le bout se détache, on applique sur la plaie de la poudre de banane grillée.

Afin de prévenir l'affaissement du ventre, on ceint la femme d'une ceinture en bandes d'écorce sèche de bananier (ekutú).

Les assistantes lavent l'enfant et sa mère. A celle-ci on met des écorces ou des feuilles sèches de bananier qu'on a soigneusement frippées. On les attache en guise de culottes pour recevoir le sang et on les renouvelle tant que cela est nécessaire. A présent on emploie déjà beaucoup des pièces d'étoffes, mises à la mode masculine.

Afin de faciliter l'écoulement de tout le sang, on donne des bains chauds à la mère. On ne commence pourtant pas avant midi, car le matin et le soir il fait trop frais et le sang n'est pas suffisamment liquide, dit-on. Ceux qui ont été plus en rapport avec les Blancs font boire à la mère de la bière ou du vin. Les bains chauds sont administrés derrière la case, dans l'enclos ad hoc. Ils sont de deux sortes : le bain par aspersion (bompúlo wă mbŏomba) et le bain à vapeur (bompúlo w'ĕlángé). Pour le premier on prend de l'eau très chaude et, au moyen d'une touffe de palmes, on asperge la femme sur l'abdomen, les lombes et les côtés. Pour le second, on creuse un puits dans lequel on dépose de grandes feuilles (ou un bassin) contenant l'eau bouillante. On met au-dessus trois ou quatre forts et gros bâtons sur lesquels la femme s'assied. On l'enroule dans quelques nattes, auxquelles, actuellement, on ajoute une ou deux couvertures. On la laisse ainsi exposée à l'action de la vapeur pendant quelques minutes. D'après les indigènes, c'est le système idéal, parce qu'il fait sortir tout le sang, ou à peu près. Certaines personnes donnent d'abord un bain par aspersion, puis un bain à vapeur; d'autres se contentent de l'un ou de l'autre, d'après les circonstances. En tout cas, on n'administre jamais plus d'un bain par jour. Ces soins peuvent continuer pendant une ou deux semaines, ou bien cesser après deux ou trois jours. La tendance « civilisatrice » incline plutôt dans ce dernier sens. Mais aucun Nkundó ne voudrait les omettre, car il y va de la vie de la femme.

Après le bain, la femme est soigneusement essuyée et séchée, puis enduite avec de l'huile mélangée de fard rouge.

De temps en temps, généralement tous les deux jours, on lui met un lavement.

Aussi longtemps que la faiblesse de la mère dure, un grand feu est entretenu dans la case pour la bien chauffer, et les portes sont fermées par des palmes. Le bois est cherché par le mari et ses parents. Mais la première bûche doit être coupée et apportée par le mari, qui, pour l'exprimer comme les Nkundó, doit « enlever l'éclat » (imola lofasó). Au début la femme est couchée sur un boánga tout près du feu. Elle lui tourne le devant du corps. Après deux jours elle lui tourne le dos. Le feu joue un grand rôle pour son prompt rétablissement. Elle est très bien soignée et nourrie pour reprendre rapidement ses forces.

§ 2. Réclusion.

Après l'accouchement, la mère reste recluse (-ulama) dans sa case pendant plusieurs semaines, — deux, trois ou davantage, d'après les circonstances, et surtout selon la position sociale de son mari. Cette réclusion s'appelle julé. La case porte le même nom, ou encore celui de jånga = feuille de palme. Parfois on lui applique aussi le terme d'ekelé, qui signifie la période de réclusion, avec toutes les prescriptions spéciales qu'elle comporte :

1° Repas. — Dans quelques tribus la femme peut déjà manger le jour de l'accouchement. Mais chez d'autres on lui permet seulement de boire. La raison de ce jeûne est donnée sous forme d'une légende. Autrefois, un Bọtswa demanda, un jour, un peu de manioc à son maître, qui refusa. La femme de celui-ci venait d'accoucher. Froissé par ce refus, le Bọtswa le maudit en disant : « Désormais vos femmes à vous autres devront jeûner le jour où elles accouchent (1) ». Ou encore on explique qu'au temps jadis quelqu'un avait refusé à manger à un esclave qui était sur le point d'être immolé à la fête de levée du deuil. Les tribus ou villages qui n'allèguent pas une raison pareille mangent déjà le soir, si l'accouchement s'est produit dans la matinée.

Le premier repas de la mère est préparé par une femme qui a posé la nuit précédente l'acte charnel. Elle va puiser l'eau et au retour elle fixe ou attache au-dessus de la porte de la case de réclusion un bout de palme (jånga) ou, chez les Bombwanja, un morceau de feuille sèche de bananier, pour signifier à tous que c'est une maison d'ekelé. Puis elle apprête la nourriture, qui consiste en bananes avec du poisson ou une poule dans la sauce d'huile de palme. La mère et son mari ainsi que la cuisinière en mangent. Leurs tout jeunes enfants peuvent s'en délecter aussi, mais pas les plus âgés approchant de la puberté. Au nouveau-né on donne à goûter un tout petit peu de sauce.

---

(1) Les femmes Batswa ne jeûnent jamais dans cette circonstance.

Pour une jeune fille-mère, le repas est préparé par une fille impubère ou une femme toute vieille, donc par une personne qui ne s'adonne pas aux actes sexuels.

2° Prescriptions diverses. — Depuis la préparation de ce repas jusqu'à la fin du bokeka, c'est-à-dire jusqu'au jour où le cordon ombilical se détachera, le foyer de la case de réclusion est pour ainsi dire sacré. Hormis les époux et les assistantes, personne ne peut en jouir ni profiter, soit pour y prendre du feu, soit pour manger rien qui y ait été préparé. Certains hommes connaissent pourtant un moyen de lever la défense du feu. Ils font tomber sur le foyer et sur tous les foyers du village ou d'un groupe de maisons — selon les cas — quelques gouttes d'une décoction spéciale.

Il est encore interdit de balayer ou de ramasser les cendres du foyer. Tout doit rester en place jusqu'au détachement du cordon ombilical du nouveau-né.

Pendant toute la durée de la réclusion, la mère est assistée par une parente (ou une parente de son mari; chez les Bombwanja il y en a toujours deux), qui est la wujisa =celle qui fait la réclusion (verbe uja). La réclusion ne doit pas être comprise comme un ermitage : la mère peut sortir dès que son état le permet, et l'assistante vaque à ses occupations, mais elle ne le fait pas plus que nécessaire. La case est plutôt une maison d'interdits.

Durant cette période, la mère et son assistante ne s'adonnent pas aux travaux de culture. En outre elles doivent s'abstenir de relations charnelles et de tout rapport avec l'autre sexe, conformément aux explications données ci-dessus (art. II, § 3). L'ekelé s'étend au mari ainsi qu'à toute personne qui entre dans la case. La transgression entraîne la mort de la mère ou de l'enfant, de la même manière que pour le bokeka (voir l. c.).

3° Fin du bokèka. — Lorsque, après quatre à cinq jours, le cordon ombilical se détache, la nouvelle est annoncée à tout le village, pour qu'on reprenne les travaux suspendus. La nuit suivante le père et la mère posent l'acte conjugal, pour « détruire le bokeka et pouvoir allaiter ensemble l'enfant ». Cela ne veut pas dire que désormais ils peuvent avoir des relations régulières, celles-ci n'étant permises qu'à la fin de la réclusion; mais si, à ce moment, ils omettaient cet acte, ils devraient s'abstenir jusqu'au sevrage. Les Nkundó disent que cet acte n'est posé « qu'un peu ». Pour beaucoup cela devient de l'onanisme. D'autres se retirent avant l'obtention de l'effet. D'aucune façon l'acte ne peut atteindre son but naturel. Le pourquoi de cette manière d'agir m'est inconnu. Peut-être est-ce pour ne pas molester la femme dans la condition pénible où elle se trouve.

Le lendemain, les cendres du foyer de la case de réclusion sont balayées, et le feu devient « commun » : toute personne peut en prendre et manger de la nourriture qui y a été préparée.

4° Le cordon ombilical est séché sur le bolíkó (claie-étagère), puis enterré au pied d'un jeune bananier planté à cet effet, de préférence sous un arbre bǫnkǫḿ, si faire se peut. On y jette les cendres et les balayures provenant de la case de réclusion. Ce bananier est nommé nkíndá (¹). Ses fruits ne peuvent être mangés que par le grand-père ou la grand'mère de l'enfant. Si une autre personne les consommait elle serait punie d'un mal de tête de forme nerveuse.

Le cordon ombilical est toujours enterré dans la terre natale du père. Les gens qui se trouvent loin de chez eux (travailleurs de Blancs, etc.) conservent précieusement le cordon ombilical de leurs enfants, pour l'apporter avec eux lorsqu'ils rentreront au village, ou pour l'envoyer à une occasion favorable. Les Nkundó tiennent très tenacement à cet usage, parce qu'on n'a pas d'autorité dans le clan paternel si le cordon ombilical n'y est pas enterré. Dans un cas pareil, on objecterait à l'intéressé : ntákokúndela lokolé, ntákokundela lọkọ́ki, óyakúmya ngámó? olě nk'eyǎya = on n'a pas battu le lokolé pour toi, on n'a pas enterré ton cordon ombilical; comment oses-tu te glorifier? Tu n'es qu'un étranger. Cette coutume constitue donc une sorte d'acte d'immatriculation à la famille. Si l'on veut connaître de façon indubitable le clan natal d'un Nkundó, on n'a qu'à rechercher l'endroit où son cordon ombilical a été enterré.

---

(¹) Ce nom est générique et s'applique à tout bananier planté à un effet spécial (pratique magique, jeu, etc.).

5° La fin de la réclusion est marquée par quelques cérémonies.

A. — Repas. — Au jour fixé, de bon matin, le mari va couper un régime de fruits de palme et l'assistante va cueillir des feuilles de manioc (à présent on se sert parfois de feuilles et de fruits cherchés la veille). Elle pile le tout pour en faire un mets, auquel elle peut ajouter du manioc. Pendant qu'il cuit sur le feu, elle rase quelques cheveux à la mère, lui arrache un sourcil et lui coupe un ongle. Puis elle en fait autant à l'enfant. Ensuite la mère agit de même envers l'assistante et l'enfant. L'assistante s'éloigne et le père entre. Sa femme lui fait subir le même traitement, qu'il lui réciproque, ainsi qu'à l'enfant. Les déchets sont simplement jetés sans cérémonie aucune. Cette pratique ne porte pas de nom spécifique; on dit : báyaténa bẹkẹngọ, báyakẹnga = ils se rasent mutuellement la tête.

Les légumes étant prêts, on rassemble toutes les femmes du village. Devant la case un petit puits est creusé. On y dépose, en guise de plat, une large feuille dans laquelle on verse les légumes. Mère, assistante et toute l'assemblée en mangent. A part quelques rares petits garçons, on n'y voit aucun représentant du sexe fort. Le repas achevé, on enterre dans le puits la feuille-assiette et les feuilles-cuillers. A présent, les éléments plus avancés de la population se servent d'une assiette et de cuillers européennes. Ce repas et les légumes s'appellent losanganya=réunion, parce que tout le village s'y unit, ou bien lofanjola=dispersion, parce qu'elle prélude à la fin du bokeka.

B. — Ensuite on procède à la Cérémonie de séparation (-téna bofofó ou, chez les Injọ́lọ́ : bọkẹ́kẹ́lẹ́kẹ́ (¹). Le bofofó est la nervure médiane d'une feuille sèche de bananier. On y fait trois nœuds. L'assistante le tient d'une main et de l'autre coupe le premier nœud, qu'elle emporte. La mère garde en main son bout et présente l'autre à son mari. Ayant reçu le couteau des mains de l'assistante, elle coupe entre les deux nœuds et chacun des conjoints emporte le sien. A chaque fois les intéressés disent : « Nous avons coupé le bofofó; nous nous séparons; pars ». S'étant ainsi fait les adieux, chacun fixe son bout dans le toit de la case de réclusion.

Cette cérémonie termine la réclusion et met fin aux interdits de l'ekelé. Désormais les époux peuvent avoir des relations entre eux; l'assistante peut reprendre sa vie régulière et l'adultère du père ne cause plus de torts à l'enfant ni à la mère. Il faut remarquer cependant que l'immunité de l'enfant contre l'inconduite de son père suppose la condition que celui-ci ne le prenne pas sur ses genoux le jour d'un adultère. Le lendemain les effets de son acte sont annulés. Une femme peut connaître l'infidélité de son mari par le refus de celui-ci de prendre l'enfant. Souvent elle profite de ce moyen pour obtenir la confirmation de ses soupçons. Certains hommes s'abstiennent de toute méconduite uniquement pour parer à toute éventualité. Cette influence funeste de l'adultère peut encore s'exercer même après le sevrage si l'enfant est d'une constitution faible. Tout cela semble indiquer que la réaction est considérée comme physique et directe plutôt que comme sanction à base religieuse ou superstitieuse.

---

(¹) L'expression et la cérémonie qu'elle désigne sont employées chaque fois qu'il s'agit de terminer une affaire importante, un procès, etc.

La thérapeutique nkundó connaît pourtant un antidote, nommé bondandota (de ndota=maladie causée par la transgression de prescriptions en matière sexuelle). Il consiste en une potion fabriquée avec le suc d'une aroïdée du même nom mélangé avec le suc de la plante libúlúkakó. Si les conjoints, pour une raison quelconque, ont été absents l'un de l'autre pendant un laps de temps un peu long, ils s'asseyent ou se postent l'un en face de l'autre; l'enfant est pris sur leurs genoux qui se touchent et chacun lui fait boire la potion, deux fois, une fois de chaque main, ayant soin de tourner vers soi la face de l'enfant. D'ordinaire, les époux prennent eux aussi le breuvage qui, primordialement, est destiné à l'enfant. Sans ces précautions, les relations des conjoints et la prise de l'enfant par le père causeraient la mort du premier. Cette même précaution est encore indiquée si le mari, étant parti en voyage avant la naissance de l'enfant, revient après l'accouchement.

Nous venons de voir que l'effet préjudiciable de l'inconduite du père sur la vie de son enfant s'exerce par l'acte de le prendre sur ses genoux. Aussi parle-t-on de baǫ́ngǫ́ b'ǎbé=mauvais genoux du père, pour signifier sa conduite répréhensible, et dit-on que la potion du bondandota est administrée à l'enfant pour qu'il ne meure pas à cause des mauvais genoux de son père (¹).

Une diarrhée douloureuse et persistante de l'enfant est souvent interprétée comme l'effet de l'infidélité du père. Dès qu'ils s'en aperçoivent, les époux se séparent pour quelque temps et le père ne touche plus à l'enfant.

(¹) Cette expression de baǫ́ngǫ́ b'ǎbé s'emploie aussi lors d'un insuccès dans les entreprises pour lesquelles la continence est requise. (Cfr. art. II, § 3.)

Contrairement à ce qu'on lit au sujet d'autres populations congolaises, les conjoints nkundó ne sont pas astreints à la continence en dehors de la période de réclusion. La cérémonie de séparation rend au mari sa liberté d'allures précédente. Pour la femme, le bokeka persiste dans toute sa rigueur jusqu'au sevrage quant aux relations coupables. Cependant, elle aussi peut retrouver sa liberté en ayant recours à un antidote dont elle achète la composition chez une personne qui en détient le secret. Ces ingrédients sont mis dans une petite corne d'antilope, bouchée ensuite au moyen de bolaká (résine du Symphonia gabonensis). L'intéressée la porte autour des reins, à une corde ou une ceinture de perles, ou, de préférence, à une liane spéciale. Cette amulette protège la vie de l'enfant contre l'influence nocive des actes adultères de la mère; à condition toutefois qu'elle ne se sépare pas de lui, comme nous expliquerons plus loin. Ce procédé n'est pourtant pas moralement recommandable, et celle qui y a recours n'échappe pas aux critiques. On la compare à une chèvre qui n'a pas de mari fixe et stable : álǫ́mya bǫ̌na lontaa = elle allaite son enfant à la façon d'une chèvre (¹).

La cérémonie de la séparation terminée, la mère est parée de tous ses ornements et sort pour faire la procession par le village. L'enfant est porté par une sœur plus âgée, une nièce, etc. On lui fait faire le tour du village = bánangya bǫ̌na l'ȏlóló. Partout on lui offre de menus présents : flèche, petit couteau, épingle à cheveux, etc. Il n'y a toutefois aucune fête : si on lui faisait cet honneur, il en mourrait (qu'on se souvienne que lors du décès il y a toujours une fête en l'honneur du défunt pour faire les adieux).

(¹) Le contraire de lǫ́mya lontaa, s'il est employé pour marquer le contraste, est lǫ́mya lontómbá.

ARTICLE IV. — L'ALLAITEMENT.

Les premiers jours après la naissance, l'enfant ne tette pas le lait de sa mère, « celui-ci étant trop chaud »; il est nourri par une tierce personne, de préférence apparentée. Le troisième jour on procède au :

1° Massage des seins de la mère (-kulola baę́lę). A cet effet on se sert des feuilles de la liane bŭtę et de la plante lilongyá (Adenostemma viscosum Forst.), d'une feuille verte du bananier nsęlęngę, de quelques morceaux de canne à sucre pelée, des bouts de feuilles sèches d'un bananier quelconque, auxquels on ajoute parfois d'autres plantes. Tout est pilé, puis bouilli, et l'on y mêle du sable blanc et un peu de fard rouge. Cette mixture s'appelle ndengó. Elle est préparée par les femmes qui sont préposées au massage des seins. Toutefois, les feuilles du bŭtę doivent être cueillies par le père de l'enfant. S'étant rendu en forêt de bon matin, il secoue d'abord la liane pour faire tomber toutes les feuilles insuffisamment attachées. Puis il y grimpe et cueille la quantité voulue de feuilles dans son petit panier ilámbá. Si une feuille venait à tomber au cours de cette opération, il doit la cesser et jeter tout ce qu'il a déjà cueilli. Le massage ne peut avoir lieu ce jour-là, car il ferait mourir l'enfant, qui tomberait et se fanerait comme une feuille. Le père n'a qu'à recommencer le lendemain.

Il y a toujours deux masseuses : une parente du mari et une de la femme (¹). Elles pilent les feuilles dans une seule et même auge (eoka). Entre-temps la mère doit faire la confession publique, dont nous reparlerons à l'instant. Lorsque la préparation des produits destinés à la friction est achevée, les deux masseuses commencent leur opération, qui doit être assez douloureuse. La parente du mari s'occupe du sein droit, celle de la femme du sein gauche (¹). Avec la mixture elles massent énergiquement les seins de haut en bas. Après quelques minutes elles essaient le lait, en en faisant couler quelques gouttes sur un tesson ardent. Si la réaction est normale, la mère commence l'allaitement. Si, au contraire, le lait se coagule et se solidifie (baélę báonda) comme du caoutchouc, c'est un signe qu'il est de mauvaise qualité, à cause de la présence d'un furoncle interne du sein, nommé ìtsí. On fait alors appel à la science et à l'habileté d'une femme experte. Celle-ci frotte entre les mains les feuilles d'une liane, pour en extraire les sucs qu'ensuite elle mélange avec de l'eau. De ce liquide huileux et écumant comme du savon elle met quelques gouttes sur un bout de feuille de bananier, dont elle fait un sachet. Pendant un certain laps de temps elle tient ce sachet sur le sein, jusqu'à ce que le furoncle, semblable à un caillot de sang ou un morceau de foie, soit sorti du sein et entré dans le sachet. Elle le montre à l'assistance : désormais la mère peut sans crainte allaiter son enfant; le lait est devenu sain et normal.

---

(¹) Les Injǫ́lǫ́ permettent parfois le massage à un homme.

2° La confession publique doit comprendre les noms de tous les hommes avec lesquels la mère a eu des rapports charnels depuis la conception. D'autres, comme les Injǫ́lǫ́, étendent cette obligation même aux cas qui étaient arrivés avant ce moment et qui n'ont pas encore été déclarés à une occasion précédente. La confession est publique. La masseuse parente du mari commence à piler les feuilles destinées à la friction du sein; elle donne un coup de pilon et dit à la mère : « cite un homme ». Celle-ci répond en citant un nom. La masseuse reprend : nyongo= indemnité. Puis toute l'assistance : yęngô yęngô yęngô= absous. Ensuite c'est le tour de l'autre masseuse, qui interroge de même; et ainsi jusqu'à l'épuisement des noms. Si la mère cite le nom d'un homme qui est proche parent de son mari et qui, de ce fait, ne doit pas payer d'indemnité, la masseuse ne répònd pas : nyọngo, mais un membre du clan du mari fait le geste de franchise : dans la main gauche il tient une amande de noix de palme (loliká) et la lance au moyen d'une planchette qu'il tient dans sa droite. Chez les Injọ́lọ́, cet homme prend deux amandes qu'il frappe l'une contre l'autre et qu'il jette ensuite. Si la femme taisait un nom, l'enfant mourrait. Si elle n'a aucun aveu à faire, elle répond : « Personne hormis mon mari ».

---

(¹) Disposition naturelle pour nos gens; le terme employé pour signifier mari (bóme) à celui qui exprime la droite (elóme). est sans doute apparenté étymologiquement, et il y a quelque probabilité qu'il en soit de même pour wǎlí (épouse) et tǎlí (gauche).

L'indemnité à payer par ceux qui y ont été jugés astreints consiste en une poule et un régime de bananes (ou leur valeur en argent) à donner aux masseuses, qui se les partageront ensuite. Si l'inculpé refusait, le mari lui réclamerait, après la réclusion, une indemnité en règle.

Les Bombwanja procèdent à cette confession lors de la cérémonie de la fixation du fœtus. Ce sont quelques vieilles femmes mariées dans le clan qui font l'interrogatoire. L'amande de fruit de palme est lancé au moyen d'un couteau.

Notons enfin que la confession est restreinte aux femmes mariées. Une jeune fille-mère n'y est jamais tenue. Ce semble donc être une pratique qui se rapporte au mariage (institution sociale) et non à l'enfantement (phénomène physiologique).

Cette confession s'appelle etato ou lotato, du verbe -tata=confesser (remplacé parfois par le mot générique sanga=dire).

Je n'ai pu trouver d'autre motif pour cet usage que celui d'éviter la mort de l'enfant. Il est pourtant évident que cette explication n'épuise pas la question, quoiqu'il soit très bien possible que le sens original et profond ait été perdu sans laisser de souvenir dans l'esprit de la génération présente.

3° Durant toute la période de l'allaitement, la mère ne peut pas se séparer de son enfant. Pour les circonstances ordinaires de la vie, ceci s'entend au sens large; mais pendant les relations sexuelles la prescription est rigoureuse et n'admet ni exceptions ni excuses. La négligence dans cette condition entraînerait inévitablement la mort de l'enfant par ndota dès que la mère le reprend. Cela vaut tant pour les relations légitimes que pour les rapports coupables. La mère doit donc toujours garder son enfant sur sa poitrine.

4° Si, à un moment de l'allaitement, le lait ne coule plus en quantité suffisante, on administre à la mère une potion d'extrait d'écorce bouillie de l'arbre bǫlǫ́ngẹ́ (dont le fruit contient un suc laiteux très doux). Ensuite elle mange des légumes lotélé (¹).

5° Un accident auquel les Nkundó attachent une grande importance est le rejet ou le vomissement du lait dans la bouche d'une personne adulte, fût-ce la propre mère. Cette personne ne peut plus manger de viande, — si l'auteur est du sexe masculin, — ou de poisson, — si c'est une fille, — jusqu'à ce que l'enfant en question, devenu grand, ait tué, selon le cas, un animal (ou oiseau) ou un poisson et l'ait donné à la victime de l'accident. Si l'enfant meurt en bas âge, cette personne est accusée d'avoir transgressé la défense et obligée de payer une forte indemnité. La chose n'en arrive d'ailleurs pas à cette extrémité, car l'accidenté se garde scrupuleusement de tout ce qui pourrait causer un meurtre de ce genre. Et si la mort survenait sans qu'il ait rien à se reprocher, il peut recourir à l'ordalie ou au jugement d'une épreuve superstitieuse. En outre, dans les villages qui ont des Batswa, une femme de cette race doit allaiter un instant l'enfant avant que sa mère ne lui rende le sein.

(¹) Plante dont les feuilles sont consommées aussi comme légumes dans la vie ordinaire; mais particulièrement par ceux qui possèdent la pratique magique moderne du boyaóli.

6° L'enfant est porté sur l'épaule et, dès qu'il est capable de se tenir, sur la hanche. Il ne lui faut pas beaucoup de semaines pour s'habituer à cette position. Lorsque la mère est forcée de la garder pendant une durée assez longue (marche, voyage, etc.), elle le met dans une écharpe-baudrier (lǫmbę̌), fabriquée avec des lianes râpées et tressées à la manière d'une natte, ou avec un tissu en fibres de raphia, ou encore avec une peau (actuellement, souvent une pièce d'étoffe européenne). Cette écharpe doit être solide, car si elle se déchirait et que l'enfant tombât, les conséquences porteraient très loin : tous les enfants ultérieurs de cette femme sont condamnés à mourir dans le sein maternel ou pendant la période d'allaitement.

L'enfant grandissant est parfois porté chevauchant sur dos de la mère, qui n'aime pas beaucoup s'en séparer ou qui est obligée par la tyrannie du petit de le garder même pendant ses travaux, ses courses, voire ses danses. Elle remédie, si possible, à cette situation encombrante en ayant recours à l'aide d'une fille plus âgée, d'une jeune nièce ou cousine, ou d'un garçonnet de la proche parenté.

Durant le jour, l'enfant est pour le repos couché sur le lit ordinaire ou sur un lit mobile (boánga), sans autres accommodements. Il ne rencontre pas de difficultés à dormir ferme sur ces dures couchettes.

7° Le sevrage. Bien que l'enfant soit habitué peu à peu à la nourriture solide, il ne cesse de tetter. Les allaitements s'espacent d'autant plus qu'il avance en âge. Mais il ne s'abstient définitivement qu'à deux ans environ, et parfois deux ans et demi, s'il est d'une constitution faible.

Le sevrage n'est accompagné d'aucune cérémonie ni fête.

Afin de déshabituer l'enfant, la mère s'enduit les mamelons avec le suc du fruit lifę́tę́ (espèce de petit piment doux ou aubergine) ou avec l'extrait du piment-poivre (imbénga). Parfois elle le confie pendant quelque temps à l'une ou l'autre parente (fille, sœur, etc.) habitant ailleurs.

Comme on l'a vu ci-dessus, c'est après le sevrage que se termine, pour la mère, la période de l'ekelé-bokeka et que ses infidélités n'ont plus de répercussions sur la vie de son enfant.

8° Si la mère meurt pendant l'allaitement, on charge de cet office une femme qui s'y montre disposée, fût-elle Bǫtswa, et qui ne fait jamais défaut. Après le sevrage elle est rémunérée convenablement. L'usage du lait de chèvre est inconnu.

9° Les enfants en bas âge souffrent fréquemment de convulsions. Cette maladie est attribuée à l'action de l'épervier et est, pour cette raison, appelée mpulú (oiseau). On tâche de l'éviter en pendant au cou des enfants une amulette, généralement le triangle claviculaire d'une carcasse de poule. En outre, les Nkundó connaissent un remède qui a pour but de fortifier les nerfs : l'enfant est couché sur une natte étendue à un endroit quelconque du toit de la case. Avec le suc des feuilles de l'arbrisseau litóyănsombo, mélangé avec de l'extrait de mbǫ́lę́ (fruits du bǫsǫ̆ǫmbǫ́) on prépare un collyre (bǫlǫ́i) dont on laisse tomber, au moyen d'une feuille en forme de cornet, quelques gouttes dans les yeux de l'enfant. Ensuite, le père ou un parent retire la natte de dessous l'enfant et lève celui-ci plusieurs fois en criant : tá tá tá.

10° A la dentition on n'attache aucune importance spéciale. Seulement l'enfant dont les dents supérieures poussent avant les inférieures (défaut nommé ingondo) passe pour être anormal. Aussi lui est-il défendu de manger les prémices de la chasse ou de la pêche par clôture (mpao), sinon celles-ci seraient rendues infructueuses.

ARTICLE V. — IMPOSITION DU NOM.

L'imposition d'un nom n'a pas lieu à date fixe. On ne la retarde pas sans raison particulière. Aucune fête ni cérémonie ne l'accompagne. Le père se contente de poudrer de couleur le front de l'enfant, en signe d'allégresse.

C'est au père que revient le droit de choisir un nom pour son enfant. Parfois il demande l'avis de sa famille. De préférence, il impose les noms de ses parents décédés ou en vie, quelquefois le sien propre. Mais il convient de respecter également les sentiments de la mère. La négligence d'en tenir compte peut inciter la femme à provoquer un avortement pour le punir de son opiniâtreté à méconnaître sa famille à elle.

Un accouchement pénible, comme le décès réitéré d'enfants précédents, est attribué souvent à la rancune d'un défunt mécontent. Dans ces cas, on attend le verdict d'un songe, ou l'on recourt au jugement d'un nkanga (médecin-magicien), afin de pouvoir satisfaire ce mort irascible.

Si le cas se répète trop souvent, cette calamité provient d'une rivalité entre défunts qui se disputent la possession d'un homonyme, l'évincé envieux tuant l'enfant. Pour éviter ces vengeances mesquines et les contenter tous en ne satisfaisant personne, on donne à l'enfant un nom neutre ou un nom de Bǫtswa, comme : Bǫtswá, Sáka, Ĕfâlĭna = sans nom; Botsilá = insuccès, malchance; Litúli = morts sans cause connue, etc. Lorsque l'enfant a déjà reçu un nom et que l'on craint, pour l'une ou l'autre raison, la fureur néfaste d'un mâne, il y a toujours moyen de le remplacer par un autre.

D'ordinaire on réserve aux enfants les noms de parents du sexe égal. On y fait pourtant exception lorsqu'un des sexes est insuffisamment représenté dans la progéniture, auquel cas le porteur du nom peut encore le changer plus tard, permission dont il est rare qu'il n'use pas. Il n'existe cependant pas de noms spécifiquement masculins ou féminins, sauf ceux qui ne sont que la forme relative d'un verbe, comme Ósâsuka = la coquette; Óyệmẹngọ = celle qui vient avec l'abondance; Ófénji = celle qui surpasse, etc. Enfin, certains noms se rencontrent rarement dans l'un ou l'autre sexe.

Pour la majorité des noms, l'étymologie est impossible à tracer et ils n'ont aucune signification. Certains sont empruntés à la nomenclature des règnes de la nature ou d'objets; mais on ne prête aucune attention à leur sens original et les allusions dans cette matière — comme l'essaient parfois certains Européens — sont ou incomprises ou mal reçues. D'autres sont dictés par la constitution de l'enfant; comme Ókunjọlọ́ = qui sera enterré encore aujourd'hui; Báwáôlóí = on ne meurt que plus tard (1). On trouve aussi des noms qui commémorent un événement particulier, comme un grand deuil (Báwá = ils meurent; Bálela = on pleure), une rivalité (Báunela = ils se battent pour..., signifiant la rivalité de deux hommes pour la possession de la mère de l'enfant ainsi nommé). Quelques-uns, enfin, ont la portée d'un dicton : Báwake = tous les hommes doivent mourir, etc.

Répétons, pour terminer, que les homonymes se lient souvent d'une amitié particulière, se font des présents et s'entr'aident. Cela ne donne pourtant aux homonymes de sexes différents aucun droit à des rapports intimes, qui, s'ils existent, ne sont que le concubinage ou l'adultère pur et simple.

ARTICLE VI. — LES JUMEAUX.

Pour les Nkundó la naissance de jumeaux (baása, sing. jása), sans avoir l'importance qu'y attachent d'autre populations, comporte néanmoins quelques particularités, dont la principale est l'absence des interdits et prescriptions attachés aux naissances ordinaires : les jumeaux sont libres de tout interdit commun; ils sont falúngú (1). Examinons les détails :

---

(1) Par ces deux noms on veut prévenir des allusions à la débilité de l'enfant et exprimer l'équivalent du dicton : il n'est vie que de langoureux.

L'événement est annoncé par le signal ordinaire, mais doublé, ou, si les enfants sont de sexes différents, par le simple signal de chaque sexe. Suit le rythme de danse : 2 ou 3 longues et 2 courtes.

Le lendemain, les parents du père se rendent hors du village, de préférence à une bifurcation du chemin. De chaque côté, ils plantent un pied de lokókólókó. Tout autour ils disposent un petit amas de branchettes et de feuilles diverses, nommé jũké. C'est un signe et un lieu de bénédiction et de porte-bonheur. Chaque passant s'arrête, cueille deux feuilles, dont il en dépose une sur chaque tas, puis crache dessus en disant : swá (2). Ensuite, en battant des mains, il chante deux fois : yelí yeye. Cette manière de se comporter attire la bénédiction des jumeaux sur son voyage, ses entreprises, son mariage. Sous ce tas, on enterre le cordon ombilical, ainsi que le placenta et la membrane.

Tous les matins, père et mère se dessinent, avec du kaolin, deux raies sur le milieu du front et sur les bras, tant au-dessus que dessous le coude. Ils en font de même des jumeaux (3). Cette pratique ne cesse qu'au sevrage. Si après ce moment un des enfants tombe malade, on recommence sur lui jusqu'à la guérison, en ayant bien soin de ne pas l'omettre sur son frère, de peur que la maladie ne l'atteigne lui aussi. Car ces dessins, tout en étant un signe d'allégresse, sont avant tout un moyen prophylactique contre la fièvre des enfants (ikútswáki) qui, chez les jumeaux et l'enfant suivant, est appelée wăsanyi et se manifeste principalement par des tumeurs à la tête et dans la figure.

---

(1) Même pour les abstentions pendant le deuil.

(2) Onomatopée pour « cracher ».

(3) Parfois une double raie s'ajoute aux tempes. Le kaolin peut être employé pur ou mélangé avec du fard rouge ngóla.

Les jumeaux s'appellent invariablement, le premier-né : Mbóỵó, le second : Bǫkę́tu, quel que soit le sexe. Les Bombwanja (comme les Ekonda) emploient les noms Mbóó et Mpia respectivement. La mère prend celui d'Àmbá. Ces noms ne sont pourtant pas réservés exclusivement à ces personnes; d'autres peuvent également s'appeler ainsi. Le père, au contraire, ne reçoit pas de nouveau nom; il porte seulement le titre d'Is'éỵ'ăfé, littéralement : père de deux (¹). On dit encore des jumeaux qu'ils sont Àmbámba (pl. Byămbámba), du verbe -ámba = accepter, recevoir, parce qu'il leur est permis d'accepter et de prendre tout, aucune prohibition ordinaire ne valant pour eux.

La mère des jumeaux n'est pas astreinte à la réclusion (nyang'éy'aása áfóáte waékelé). On arrange pour elle le hangar du chef de clan, c'est-à-dire celui chez qui on dépièce les animaux d'autorité (léopard, etc.) (²). Ce hangar est fermé au moyen de palmes. Ni les parents, ni l'assistante, ni les personnes qui entrent dans ce lieu ne sont obligés d'observer la continence et les autres interdits de l'ekelé.

Tous les membres de la parenté viennent saluer les jumeaux et leur font à chacun un présent (poules, couteaux, flèches, nourriture) qui est reçu par le père ou la mère. Chaque fois qu'on donne quelque chose à l'un des jumeaux, fût-ce le plus menu objet, on doit en faire autant à l'autre; sinon ce serait causer sa mort. Si la mère prend l'un sur le bras, il faut que l'autre soit pris également, soit par elle-même, soit par le père. Si elle frappe l'un, elle ne peut omettre de frapper aussi son frère. Cette dualité vaut donc pour tout et à plus forte raison pour l'allaitement.

---

(¹) Chez les Ekonda on le nomme Buka.

(²) Donc à l'endroit du bǫnsęngę ou lieu de dépiècement des animaux d'autorité (nyama yá bikofo, littéralement : animaux superbes).

Si un enfant jumeau pleure ou est malade, les parents doivent chanter et danser avec accompagnement d'un lokolé et d'un tambour ngǫmǫ. C'est ce qu'on nomme -bénga baása. Si quelqu'un invite à la danse un jumeau ou ses parents, ceux-ci ne peuvent omettre d'y donner suite. Passant à une bifurcation ou à un habitat de génie ou à un efeno (endroit où l'on se réunit pour des pratiques magiques, oracles, etc.), elle danse et chante encore en l'honneur du génie, pour qu'il soit propice à ses enfants. Divers chants sont en vogue, comme : Elím'é'Àmbá tongólela yelí yeye = génie d'Àmbá ne pleure pas (¹): Bǫkętu la Mbóy'é'Àmbá tofúkáké tonyongáké, tǫlękę bilingǫi yelí yeye = Bǫkętu et Mbóyó d'Àmbá ne te meus pas, ne remue point, ne mange pas de champignons bilingǫi; Bǫkętu 'a Mbóyó njóátela ngóy' ęmęngo yelí yeye = Bǫkętu et Mbóyó, je mets ma mère dans l'abondance; Bǫkętu'a Mbóyó lá'ǫkǫnǫ lá'ǫkęndǫ yelí yeye = je tomberai malade et néanmoins je marcherai (me porterai bien); Bǫkętu'a Mbóyó, lióta bǫkękęsano yelí yeye = accouchement encombrant, etc.

Les nourritures interdites aux jumeaux sont les champignons bilingǫi (ou bilingǫndǫ ou bankǎnkíndá), l'antilope mpambí et l'igname ǒlí, qu'il est également défendu aux parents de consommer avant le sevrage (²).

En voyage, les parents de jumeaux se ceignent de la plante rampante boyayenga ou la portent en bandoulière sur l'épaule. En outre, la mère y attache une sonnette. Leur chevelure est souvent ornée de deux plumes de la queue du perroquet gris (nkoso) et de deux plumes d'une poule blanche.

(¹) Tongólela = forme archaïque, encore en usage chez les Ekonda, etc.

(²) Cet interdit s'étend à toute nourriture cuite dans des pots où ces aliments défendus ont été préparés; extension qui d'ailleurs est commune à tout interdit alimentaire.

Le salut à donner à des parents de jumeaux et leur réponse doit toujours être double : w'ǫ̀nę́ w'ǫ̀nę́; rép. em'ǫ́nę́ em'ǫ́nę́; oôyá oôyá, rép. njôyá njôyá; losák'esáko, rép. bíka bíka. Pour cette dernière salutation, remarquons qu'ils ne répondent pas autrement; ils sont donc assimilés aux grands notables des anciens temps.

Lorsque les enfants sont devenus grands à pouvoir se suffire à eux-mêmes, toutes les prescriptions particulières perdent leur rigueur et ils sont désormais comme tout le monde. Pour le mariage, le décès, etc., rien ne les distingue du commun. Aucune préférence n'est montrée pour ou contre eux. Seulement, leur descendance produira encore des jumeaux.

Les Nkundó considèrent donc les jumeaux comme des enfants extraordinaires, sans pourtant pousser leur jugement aux extrêmes. Ils sont contents de recevoir deux enfants à la fois, tout en estimant que la gestation et l'accouchement dans cette circonstance sont plus dangereux pour la mère. C'est pour ce motif que celle-ci est appelée bǫyę́ngwá, la gravité du cas n'ayant pu la faire mourir. Cette épithète s'applique également au père et aux jumeaux, probablement pour la même raison et à cause de leur immunité à l'égard des interdits. Toutefois, si les jumeaux sont de sexes différents, la mère est moins appelée bǫyę́ngwá, car elle est lilǫka= malfaisante (¹).

Il résulte encore des lignes précédentes que les jumeaux sont, à un certain degré, entachés de magie. Ceci est confirmé par la défense de jeter quelque objet (pierre, amande de palme, etc.) sur la case où ils se trouvent, tout comme pour quelqu'un qui possède un charme, une pratique d'envoûtement ou de protection. En outre, ils jouissent d'une certaine propriété innée d'ensorceler les entreprises (chasse, pêche) d'autrui. C'est pourquoi ceux qui redoutent leur action nuisible s'enduisent de kaolin de la même façon que le font ces enfants et leurs parents.

(¹) Voir, plus haut, art. II, § 2.

Les Nkundó ont connu des cas de trijumeaux, mais ils sont extrêmement rares. Le dernier-né des trois s'appelle Yę̂ndęmbę ou Yę̂ndęndę ou Yę̂lęlę. La seule particularité qui lui soit propre est qu'on ne peut jamais lui commander un travail, ni l'envoyer porter un message ou faire une commission, etc. = áfótswé ntómo. Pour le reste, rien ne le différencie des deux autres. Les salutations ne sont pourtant pas triplées.

L'enfant qui naît immédiatement après les jumeaux est appelé Wuteji (de utela = répéter). Il ne diffère en rien du commun.

ARTICLE VII. — LA CIRCONCISION.

La circoncision est générale. Aucun âge n'est prescrit. D'ordinaire elle a lieu pendant la jeunesse, avant la dixième année. Les plus peureux diffèrent jusqu'à la puberté ou même après. Des coutumes claniques particulières peuvent fixer une date limite. Ainsi aucun homme du village de Bęsǫmbǫ́ n'y est admis avant d'avoir tué une bête à la chasse. Par contre, la saison de la circoncision est déterminée : elle doit avoir lieu pendant l'époque des eaux basses.

La circoncision est opérée par un homme quelconque qui y est expert. Elle se pratique derrière les cases. Hormis les « operandi » et leurs pères, personne n'y est présent. Les garçons se groupent un peu à l'écart, mais de façon à pouvoir suivre de leurs yeux le traitement que subit leur compagnon. Le patient s'accroupit. Un des assistants âgés lui met les mains sur les yeux pour l'empêcher de voir ce qui se passe. L'opérateur a creusé un petit puits pour recevoir le sang. Il tire le prépuce, le lie avec un fil, puis trace avec des cendres la ligne que doit suivre le couteau empútę qu'on emploie dans cette circonstance. Lorsque le sang cesse de couler, l'opérateur mâche du poivre bondóngó (Aframomum...) ou, de préférence, une nageoire caudale du poisson ngǫlǫ, qu'ensuite il crache sur la plaie. La réaction est fort douloureuse. Mais le patient se montre courageux ; s'il pleure, il est l'objet de la risée de ses compagnons.

Aussi longtemps que la plaie n'est pas cicatrisée, le garçon doit s'abstenir de feuilles de manioc (bangánju) et du pain de manioc dans la préparation de bosombó ou de lǫǫ́lǫ. En outre, il ne peut manger ni la peau, ni la tête ni la queue de poissons.

Pendant la cicatrisation l'opéré est soigné, lavé, etc., par sa mère, ou — s'il a atteint la puberté — par son père. Cet office impose à la personne qui en est chargée l'obligation à la continence (bokeka), même à l'égard de son conjoint. La transgression empêche la guérison de la plaie ou la rend pour le moins extrêmement difficile et de longue durée (1).

Le prépuce coupé est séché sur le bolíkó (claie-étagère). Puis on ne s'en occupe plus et généralement il demeure là poussiéreux et sale pour un temps indéfini, si les rats ne s'en mêlent pas.

Dans les centres, les jeunes gens commencent à négliger l'opérateur indigène, pour recourir à l'intervention du chirurgien européen.

La circoncision ne donne pas lieu à des cérémonies ni à des fêtes. Il arrive qu'un homme riche et vaniteux donne une fête, mais la chose n'est nullement de pratique courante.

Circoncire se traduit en lonkundo : téna bǫnsǫ́ę́ = couper le prépuce. Le terme moins vulgaire et beaucoup usité est : téna nsǫ́ngę́ = couper l'extrémité. Une circonlocution de décence excessive est : téna batói = couper les oreilles.

Quant à la raison d'être de cet usage, après ce qui en a été dit au chapitre I, IIe partie, article II, § 2, nous n'avons plus à y revenir.

---

(1) Un bokeka analogue existe pour celui qui soigne un grand ulcère phagédénique ([illegible]).

ARTICLE VIII. — L'ÉDUCATION.

Dès son jeune âge l'enfant nkundó doit rendre à ses parents divers menus services, surtout dans les travaux du ménage : puiser de l'eau, chercher du bois de chauffage, s'occuper d'un petit frère ou d'une petite sœur, etc. Les appels s'adressent principalement aux filles, mais les garçons n'en sont nullement exemptés. De par la nature même des choses, ceux-ci sont pourtant moins souvent mis à contribution.

Le fils peut assez tôt accompagner son père dans ses voyages, aux réunions, aux discussions judiciaires, etc. Celui-ci fabrique pour lui un arc et des flèches et lui enseigne cet art. Le grand passe-temps de la jeunesse masculine est la chasse et la pêche par toutes sortes de procédés qui conviennent à son âge. Peu à peu l'adolescent apprend les travaux communs et tout ce qu'il doit savoir pour subsister, se nourrir et se loger. Son instruction est complétée par ses compagnons et surtout par les circonstances de la vie.

La fille apprend les travaux du ménage et des cultures. Déjà très tôt sa mère lui tresse un petit panier, pour qu'elle s'habitue à porter des fardeaux. Puis elle participe aux pêches féminines.

On a généralement l'impression que les filles sont beaucoup plus actives que les garçons. Mais j'estime que la différence provient de ce que ceux-ci sont presque toujours en forêt, tandis que celles-là restent au village et sont par conséquent remarquées davantage. D'ailleurs, dans nos Missions on ne peut pas dire que les garçons travaillent moins bien que les filles, au contraire.

Les filles s'exercent à l'art culinaire, non seulement chez leur mère, mais encore — comme en Belgique — par le jeu (ioto).

Les enfants n'étudient pas l'histoire, les lois et traditions de leur clan ou tribu. Ils les apprennent par les circonstances, soit en les entendant raconter, soit en questionnant. Souvent les parents les expliquent de leur propre initiative, non en suivant un programme déterminé, mais plutôt en profitant des occasions. C'est surtout en accompagnant son père dans ses visites, ses voyages et aux réunions ou délibérations, et en assistant attentivement aux séances des troubadours à longombé (mandoline), que le jeune homme peut apprendre beaucoup de choses. La fidélité à suivre le papa plutôt que de jouir constamment de la liberté en forêt rend compte de cette connaissance surprenante des us et coutumes, des lois ancestrales, de l'histoire, de la sagesse des anciens, des proverbes, fables, etc. que possèdent certains jeunes au point de l'emporter sur nombre de vieux. J'ai rencontré plus d'un cas de ce genre qu'on expliquait avant tout par cet attachement.

A peine capable de marcher, l'enfant nkundó commence à fredonner les airs en vogue et à imiter les mouvements rythmiques des danseurs. Les fillettes surtout s'exercent par de petites danses à elles. Puis les enfants se mêlent peu à peu au groupe des danseurs adultes et peuvent s'associer au chœur, mais à l'arrière.

Les parents enseignent à leurs enfants les métiers qu'ils connaissent eux-mêmes : forge, sculpture du bois, tressage de nattes et de paniers, poterie, etc.

Au point de vue éthique, les enfants apprennent beaucoup par l'expérience, mais les parents n'omettent pas de leur inculquer les règles de politesse, de bienséance, de savoir-vivre et les grands principes des relations sociales. Il y a pourtant, ici comme en Europe, des degrés dans le soin ou l'insouciance dans ce domaine. La morale enseignée est celle qu'ils adoptent eux-mêmes; elle est avant tout familiale, sociale : déférence envers les membres de la famille, entr'aide, respect du bien d'autrui, crainte de l'autre sexe, etc. Mais tout cela repose sur une base naturaliste : le motif donné se limite aux conséquences fâcheuses. Les réprimandes, voire les châtiments pour infractions ne sont pas inconnus. Mais ils sont provoqués surtout par l'exaspération, par conséquent mêlés de mouvements de colère, et donc sans continuité ni idée de suite; une fois la colère calmée, les menaces restent stériles. En fait de punitions les parents recourent principalement aux coups. D'autres peines sont pourtant en usage. Ainsi, un de nos catéchistes, étant jeune (entre 1880 et 1895), avait enlevé un oiselet pris au piège à glu d'un de ses cousins. Dès que son père en eut connaissance, il fit à son gamin une verte semonce et le condamna à se coucher ce soir sans souper.

A l'approche de la nubilité, la mère enseigne à sa fille les droits et devoirs de la femme mariée. Elle lui apprend la façon de se conduire et de se comporter pour faire une bonne épouse et mère. Et cela pour qu'elle trouve un bon mari, pour que l'union demeure stable et ne provoque trop de palabres ou d'embarras.

Autrefois les enfants n'étaient pas admis à voir les danses des adultes. Ils en étaient chassés et n'avaient qu'à s'amuser entre eux. C'était une excellente mesure pour la sauvegarde de la moralité parmi la jeunesse et pour conserver le respect à l'égard des vieux. Aussi est-il très regrettable qu'elle soit actuellement tombée en désuétude.

Ayant atteint la puberté, les enfants n'aiment plus à rester coucher chez leurs parents. Ceux-ci ne les chassent point, mais, d'autre part, ne s'opposent pas à ce désir de la jeunesse, qui, dit-on, est inspiré par un sentiment de pudeur. Les garçons vont d'un côté, les filles d'un autre, par exemple dans une case inoccupée appartenant à leur père ou chez des propres parents; ou encore cherchent-ils à trouver place dans le logement d'un groupe de compagnons ou de compagnes. Si aucune maison n'est disponible, les garçons s'associent pour la construction d'une hutte commune. A présent, ils commencent déjà très tôt à se bâtir une case individuelle, ou à deux, pour jouir ainsi d'une liberté plus grande.

On trouve sur les arbres de la forêt une espèce de champignon dur, nommé losikitela. Lorsque l'enfant commence à parler on lui en met un spécimen entre les dents pour qu'il y morde et apprenne ainsi à ne pas s'exprimer inconsidérément, mais à retenir ses paroles (-sikitela) pour réfléchir avant de parler.

Maintes fois on peut constater que les parents et d'autres personnes aident activement les enfants à s'exprimer dans une langue correcte, particulièrement en redressant les fautes, en corrigeant la prononciation, en rectifiant les erreurs dans les noms propres, en leur citant le mot exact, voire en leur expliquant des formes grammaticales ou les nuances entre certains termes : « C'est comme ceci qu'il faut dire; cela signifie autre chose; cette plante s'appelle ainsi, etc. ».

Bien donc que l'enfant nkundó soit très libre de disposer de ses jours comme bon lui semble et que, forcément, il apprenne nombre de choses par l'expérience personnelle, il serait faux d'affirmer que les parents se désintéressent de son éducation ou n'y contribuent pas. Ils interviennent activement par leurs conseils, leurs explications, leurs démonstrations. Il va sans dire que leur part n'est pas aussi importante ni continue que dans beaucoup de milieux civilisés. Il est d'ailleurs très difficile, et souvent injuste, de comparer la situation de nos gens avec celle d'Europe : la différence des circonstances est trop considérable. Mais nous devons à l'équité de montrer que des efforts sont faits par les Nkundó dans ce domaine, tout en faisant remarquer que les effets sont peu palpables quant à l'éducation morale (1), parce qu'il y a quantité de fautes, de lacunes, d'erreurs et d'obstacles dont il n'est pas inutile d'examiner les plus importants.

---

(1) Nous ne parlons plus de l'éducation matérielle et économique, qui ne prête pas à critique.

1° D'abord, l'éducation commence trop tard. Les efforts, pour être couronnés de succès, devraient débuter le plus tôt possible. Or, tant que l'enfant n'a pas atteint un développement relatif (d'ordinaire vers sa sixième année) il est jugé trop jeune pour recevoir des leçons, des punitions, etc.

2° Dans leur pédagogie, les Nkundó ne tiennent aucun compte de la relation de cause à effet dans l'acquisition de mauvaises habitudes. Ils réagissent contre les actes condamnables, mais ne s'attaquent pas à la racine en s'opposant à l'éclosion des vices. Ainsi, ils ne comprennent pas que la satisfaction continuelle des désirs ou des caprices d'un enfant en bas âge, par exemple pour l'allaitement, la demande de nourriture, le désir d'être choyé et porté, etc., doit nécessairement en faire un insoumis, un petit tyran qui veut être contenté en tout.

3° Le manque d'idée de suite et l'inconstance dans la répression des défauts ou dans la punition des fautes, qui, nous l'avons déjà dit, sont de la part des parents nkundó le plus souvent des explosions brusques de colère et d'indignation. Pour l'enfant, le but de la punition disparaît : elle n'obtient d'autre effet que la crainte du châtiment. Il peut y avoir d'heureuses exceptions, mais elles sont sûrement rarissimes. En général, les parents se laissent entraîner par l'impulsion du moment, et les gamins d'en tirer profit. La gravité de pareille situation apparaît bien dans cet exemple historique : Isia (à présent un homme entre 30 et 40 ans) s'amuse à tirer des flèches. Une des femmes de son père, nommée Bọkẹli, arrive sur les lieux accompagnée de Bakutu, jeune sœur d'Isia. Le gamin reprend Bọkẹli : « Que viens-tu faire ici avec ma sœur ? Si une flèche l'atteint, ce sera ta palabre ». La femme l'insulte. Le garçon menace de tirer sur elle. Là-dessus, son père, Bọlẹ́kẹ̀lá, intervient en disant : « Si tu oses toucher à ma femme, je tue une de tes mères » (1). Isia riposte en tirant sur Bọkẹli et disant : « Eh bien mourez toutes deux » (2). Son père veut l'attraper, mais l'agile gamin s'enfuit en forêt. Ne le voyant pas rentrer, le soir, tous sont pris de peur. Finalement il répond à l'appel de sa tante Bongóla et revient. Morale de l'histoire : tout le monde est heureux de le revoir, et il n'est plus question de châtiment (3).

Autre exemple plus fort : Esalé (actuellement entre 40 et 50 ans) est insulté par sa mère Bosola, pour un méfait. Il tire sur elle et la blesse au front. Pour fuir la colère de son père, il se retire en forêt On l'appelle et il revient. La palabre est terminée (4).

4° Le manque de coopération dans les efforts des conjoints. Chacun agit de sa propre initiative et sous l'impulsion de sa propre indignation. Plus encore, ils se contrarient; l'un punissant l'enfant, l'autre tâchant de le protéger, directement, ou indirectement en réprimandant le conjoint. Ceci arrive surtout aux femmes qui ne supportent que très mal que leur enfant soit touché par quelqu'un fût-ce son propre père. La chose doit être attribuée en partie au défaut d'union de sentiments entre les époux et en partie à l'amour maternel purement naturel, psychophysiologique pour ainsi dire.

Les mesures prises contre un enfant qui s'est mal conduit suscitent souvent une grave querelle de ménage, parfois suivie de la fuite de la femme chez elle. Tel le cas historique de Bakutu b'Ŏfóngé (né vers 1880). Son père Bolónjó lui avait défendu de peler un bout de canne à sucre d'une façon maladroite et gaspillante. Le garçon ne voulait pas entendre raison. Puis le voilà qui se taille une profonde blessure au doigt. « Ne te l'ai-je pas dit, s'écrie le père; te voilà puni de ta désobéissance. » Làdessus fureur de la mère Mbélá. « Ah ! tu me tues mon enfant » et le reste... Elle roule ses nattes, endosse ses paniers et prend le chemin de son village.

---

(1) C'est-à-dire, soit ta mère (Botsinanya), soit sa sœur et ebisa Basimi.

(2) C'est-à-dire si ma mère doit mourir (riposte courante en pareil cas), que toi, Bọkẹli, meures aussi.

(3) D'après la jurisprudence nkundó, le tort était d'ailleurs du côté de Bọkẹli, parce qu'elle a commencé les insultes. Mais la réaction était quand même exagérée.

(4) Une fable enseigne, d'ailleurs, qu'il ne faut pas laisser quelqu'un sous l'empire de la fureur, surtout lorsqu'il s'est retiré en forêt, parce que cela peut le rendre misanthrope, ce qui aurait des suites plus déplorables encore (vagabondage, meurtres, etc.).

La casuistique nkundó cite le cas hypothétique, semble-t-il, ou du moins appartenant aux temps passés, — car je n'en ai jamais connu ni entendu un exemple réellement arrivé, — d'un homme se vengeant sur sa femme qui aurait insulté son enfant, en commandant à celui-ci d'aller tuer une chèvre dans le clan de sa mère, pour que ce dernier soit obligé de payer une indemnité au propriétaire et que la mère se trouve ainsi punie dans sa famille. La jurisprudence nkundó reconnaît au père ce droit. Mais il est évident qu'au point de vue éducatif cette solution est loin d'être idéale.

5° L'influence de la parenté joue encore un grand rôle. Les Nkundó sont très attachés à leur famille. Les enfants y sont partout chez eux. La femme est très liée à sa famille à elle. Les frères et sœurs du père sont les « pères » de l'enfant; les oncles et tantes maternelles ses « mères ». Le père réel ne défend pas beaucoup ses fils contre les semonces ou corrections de la part de ses proches parents à lui, mais n'admet pas aisément l'intervention de la famille de la femme, et vice versa. Et l'enfant de profiter de nouveau de ces dissensions. Le cas arrive assez fréquemment, quoique les exceptions, elles aussi, ne soient pas rares.

6° Aux blâmes d'étrangers, l'opposition des parents est encore plus grande, en règle générale. Ils tâchent de couvrir et de justifier contre eux les défauts de leur progéniture, qu'ils défendent avec acharnement et qui, évidemment, ont connaissance de tout cela et en tirent profit.

7° Le ménage polygamique avec ses rivalités entre coépouses ne fait qu'accentuer tous ces mauvais effets pour l'éducation. Les conflits, les allusions malveillantes, les palabres, etc. passent facilement aux enfants. Et chacune de défendre le sien.

8° La publicité : rien n'est secret, tout est connu, vu et entendu. Les gens ne se retiennent pas et la présence d'enfants n'arrête pas les flots d'insultes et d'obscénités provoquées par la colère. La jeunesse voit quantité de choses qu'elle ferait mieux d'ignorer. Elle assiste aux querelles de ménage et est témoin des dissensions. Tout cela est augmenté par la vie en plein air, dans la rue, et par la ténuité des parois.

9° A présent un autre facteur s'ajoute : la facilité des communications et la présence de postes européens. Les garçons peuvent toujours s'enfuir et trouver à se caser chez le Blanc ou ses employés indigènes. Les filles recherchent les parentes habitant dans ces postes, quitte à les aider un peu dans leur ménage, avec l'espoir de jouir plus tard d'une plus grande liberté et de vivre luxueusement. L'influence et l'autorité des parents en sont forcément affaiblies.

10° Finalement, l'absence dans l'éducation de toute base solide, de toute religion ou morale religieuse. Tout est fondé sur la crainte naturelle, matérielle : peur de châtiments (physiques ou superstitieux), des conséquences funestes de l'action mauvaise (palabres, difficultés, amendes, indemnités, parfois la honte d'être découvert (comme pour le vol). C'est surtout cette absence de motifs religieux qui rend l'éducation morale si peu fructueuse. Comme les Nkundó se sont habitués à cet état défectueux, ils ne sentent pas la nécessité de ce fondement. C'est pourquoi il est si ardu de leur inculquer cette conscience morale. Il faut l'action patiente et persévérante des grandes vérités chrétiennes avec ses institutions de formation morale (prédication ininterrompue, confession, prière) pour doter ce peuple du sentiment du devoir, de cette conscience personnelle dont il a un si impérieux besoin.

ARTICLE IX. — DROITS SUR LES ENFANTS.

Sans répéter tout ce que nous avons déjà rencontré à divers endroits de cet ouvrage, il convient pourtant de grouper ici en résumé les considérations et conclusions au sujet du droit sur les enfants.

Le grand principe qui domine toute cette question est l'adage romain : Pater is est quem nuptiae demonstrant. C'est le mari légitime qui est le père légal de l'enfant de son épouse. Sans mariage, le père naturel n'y a aucun droit.

Il s'ensuit que les enfants adultérins appartiennent exclusivement au mari. (Chap. VI, art. VIII.) Comme la relation avec une veuve qui n'est pas encore légitimement remariée est un adultère, l'enfant qui en naît est l'enfant légal de l'héritier. (Chap. III, art. II.) La même règle vaut, mutatis mutandis, pour une divorcée avant le remariage régulier. (Chap. VIII, art. III, § 1.)

L'enfant né d'une femme libre n'a pas de père légal. Par conséquent il appartient à la famille de sa mère; il reste enfant illégitime (entombó : entombó ěkáḿ, est-il appelé par son grand-père). (Chap. I, IIe partie, art. IV, § 3.) Pourtant le père naturel peut, s'il épouse la mère, obtenir l'enfant en payant pour lui un « esclave » supplémentaire. De toute façon il doit parachever le versement de la dot entière. S'il n'épouse pas la mère, il n'a aucun droit sur l'enfant; règle qui est pourtant en voie de changer dans la pointe Nord-Ouest de la région étudiée. (Chap. I, IIe partie, art. IV, § 3.)

Cette légitimation n'est pas requise lorsque la grossesse a commencé après le début du paiement dotal. Elle peut avoir lieu même après la mort de la mère, moyennant le versement prévu. Ce cas de légitimation posthume se présente quelquefois en faveur des enfants nés d'unions extracoutumières engagées pendant la première période de la colonisation.

Les droits du père sur son enfant ne sont pas intangibles : il peut les perdre, notamment s'il néglige de s'acquitter de certains devoirs, parce que cette conduite équivaut à un reniement. Parmi ces devoirs dont l'omission entraîne la perte des droits sur les enfants, citons :

1° le parachèvement de la dot;

2° l'exécution des devoirs funéraires (enterrement, paiements);

3° l'abandon d'une partie de la dot à restituer lors du divorce;

4° l'observation des devoirs envers l'enfant. Ici n'entrent en jeu que les négligences graves qui équivalent à un véritable reniement : spécialement le refus illégitime de procurer à un fils les moyens de se marier; tel encore le cas cité au chapitre II, article XI, § 3, et analogues.

CONCLUSIONS.

Nous ne pouvons omettre, à la fin de ce travail, de résumer les conclusions qu'il nous suggère :

1° Chez les Nkundó le mariage consiste dans une union entre un homme et une femme, constituée par le paiement de certaines valeurs que le mari fait, par l'intermédiaire d'un ou plusieurs témoins officiels, aux parents de l'épouse, paiement contre-balancé par le versement de valeurs de la part de la famille de la femme au mari et à sa famille.

2° Il existe diverses sortes d'unions conjugales qui s'écartent plus ou moins de cette forme typique : héritage d'une veuve par un parent éloigné du mari; substitution — pendant la vie ou après décès — d'une parente qui continue l'union commencée par la défunte ou la divorcée; offre d'une femme contre prestation d'un service éminent, une certaine sorte d'échange, et, dans quelques tribus, l'achat, plus l'union avec une esclave.

3° Les empêchements au mariage, à part la question des Batswa, découlent de la parenté et de l'affinité.

4° La vie conjugale est régie par des règles bien déterminées et sages, contre lesquelles pourtant des infractions sont commises. L'adultère est condamné et réprimé, mais la conception que les Nkundó s'en font ne concorde pas avec la nôtre et ils y admettent certaines exceptions.

5° La polygamie est en honneur; sa pratique est soumise à des règles déterminées et la première femme occupe un rang de primauté familiale et sociale.

6° Le divorce est admis sous des conditions relativement sévères, et la rupture est réglementée par une législation adaptée.

7° Les stipulations juridiques à observer lors du décès démontrent la prééminence du mariage sur les liens du sang et prouvent que l'épouse appartient réellement au mari, bien qu'elle continue à faire partie de son propre clan. En outre, la mort du mari ne rompt pas le mariage de la part de la veuve.

8° Les enfants appartiennent au père légal.

En somme, nous pouvons conclure que ces institutions matrimoniales, si à notre point de vue elles ne sont pas sans défaut, se présentent cependant comme bien ordonnées et nullement « sauvages ». Il s'en dégage une impression de netteté et de sagesse, d'adaptation et de souplesse, d'unité et de logique, qualités merveilleuses que beaucoup de législations européennes peuvent leur envier et qui démontrent l'organisation remarquable qu'a su atteindre la peuplade intéressante des Nkundó.

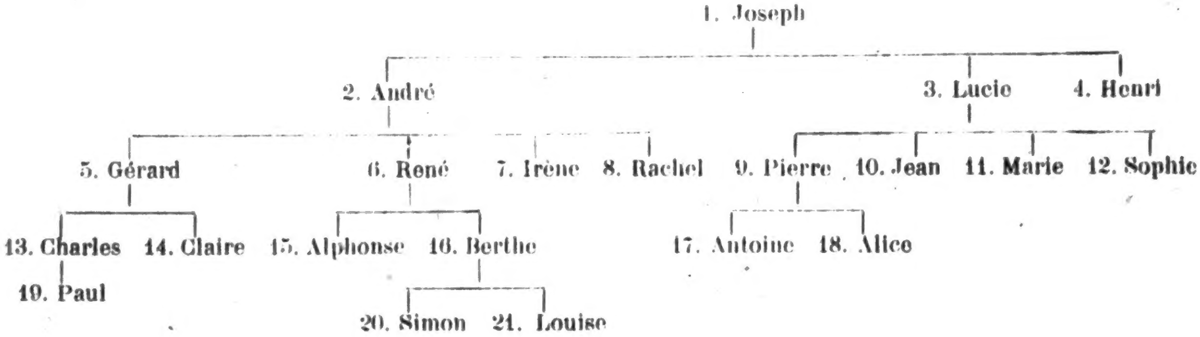
2: Hulstaert FO32 Mongo

ANNEXE

TERMINOLOGIE DES RELATIONS FAMILIALES

TABLEAU GÉNÉALOGIQUE

N. B. — Pour faciliter la claire indication des sexes, nous nous servons exclusivement des noms européens.



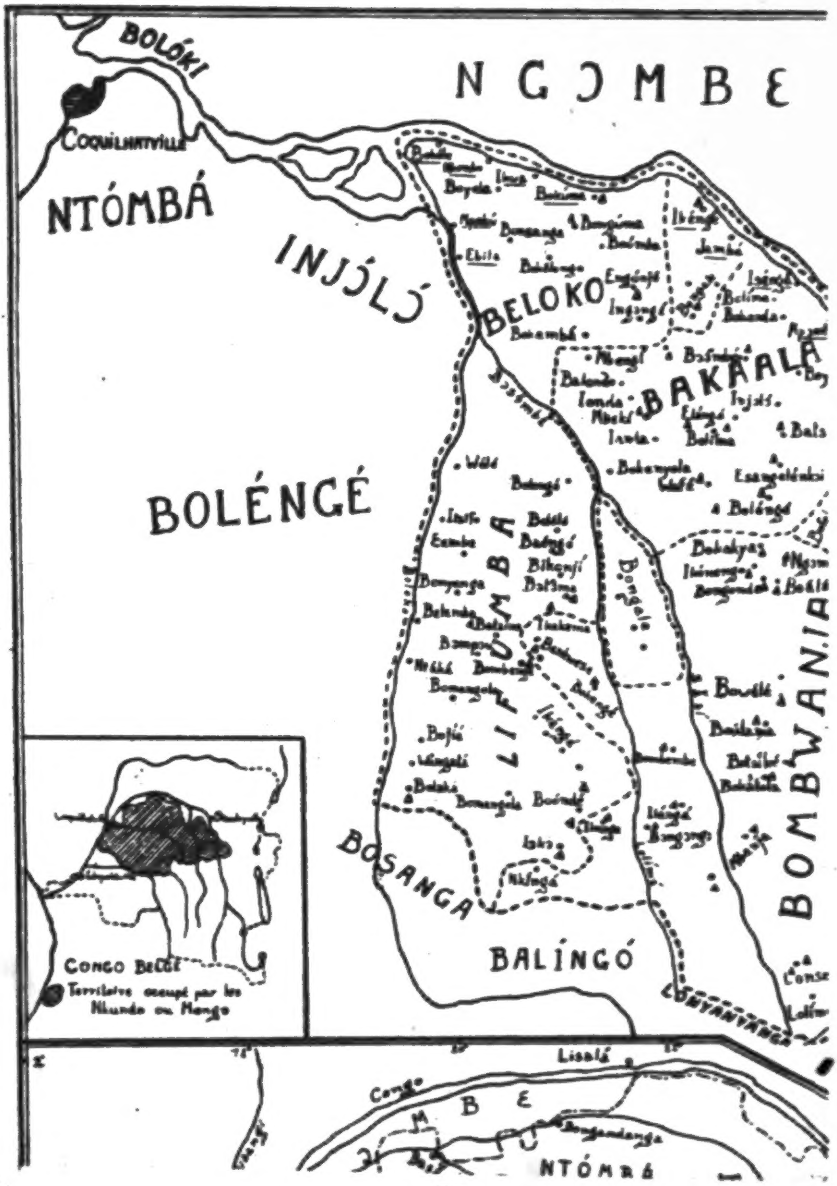
1. Joseph
2. André
3. Lucie
4. Henri
5. Gérard
6. René
7. Irène
8. Rachel
9. Pierre
10. Jean
11. Marie
12. Sophie
13. Charles
14. Claire
15. Alphonse
16. Berthe
17. Antoine
18. Alice
19. Paul
20. Simon
21. Louise

1. Pour 1 — 13 et 14 sont bonkánola, pl. bankánola.
   Pour 13 et 14 — 1 est nkǫ́kǫǫlǫ, pl. bankǫ́kǫǫlǫ.
2. Pour 2, 3 et 4 — 13 et 14 sont bonkána, pl. bankána.
   Pour 13 et 14 — 2, 3 et 4 sont nkǫ́kǫ (nyangó), pl. bankǫ́kǫ (nyangó).
3. Pour 1 — 2, 3 et 4 sont bǫna, pl. bâna.
   Pour 2, 3 et 4 — 1 est isé, pl. baisé (relativement à la première personne : fafá, pl. bafafá).
4. Pour 3 — 9 et 10 etc. sont bǫna, pl. bâna.
   Pour 9, 10 etc. — 3 est nyangó, pl. banyangó (relativement à la première personne : ngóya, bangóya).
5. Pour 5 — 6 est bokúné, pl. bakúné.
   Pour 7 — 8 est bokúné, pl. bakúne.
   Pour 6 — 5 est botómóló, pl. batómóló (relativement à la première personne : mâlé, bamâlé).
   Pour 8 — 7 est botómóló, pl. batómóló (relativement à la première personne : mâlé, bamâlé).
6. Pour 5 et 6 — 7 et 8 sont nkâna, pl. bankâna.
   Pour 7 et 8 — 5 et 6 sont nkâna, pl. bankâna.
7. Pour 5, 6, 7 et 8 — 3 est isómoto, pl. baisómoto (pour la première personne : faómoto, pl. bafaómoto).
   Pour 3 — 5, 6, 7 et 8 sont bónankáná, pl. banánkáná.
8. Pour 9, 10, 11 et 12 — 2 et 4 sont nyangômpámé, pl. banyangômpámé (ou nyangóbika) (pour la première personne : ngômpámé, bangômpámé).
   Pour 2 et 4 — 9, 10, 11 et 12 sont bǫnankáná, pl. bânankáná.
9. Pour 13 et 14 — 6 est isé (éy'ǫnǫlu).
   Pour 6 — 13 et 14 sont bâna.
10. Pour 15 et 16 — 5 est isé (éâ mpaka).
    Pour 5 — 15 et 16 sont bâna.
11. Pour 13, 14, 15 et 16 = 5, 6, 7 et 8.
12. Pour 14 — 20 et 21 sont bâna.
    Pour 20 et 21 — 14 est nyangó.
13. Pour 13 — 20 et 21 sont bânankáná.
    Pour 20 et 21 — 13 est nyangômpámé.
14. Pour 9, 10, 11 et 12 — 5, 6, 7 et 8 sont bâna.
    Pour 5, 6, 7 et 8 — 9, 10, 11 et 12 sont baisé.
15. Pour 9, 10, etc. — 13, 14, 15 et 16 sont bankána.
    Pour 13, 14, 15 et 16 — 9, 10, 11 et 12 sont bankǫ́kǫ.
16. Pour 5, 6, 7 et 8 — 17 et 18 sont frères et sœurs et vice versa.
17. Pour 13, 14, 15 et 16 — 17 et 18 sont baisé.
    Pour 17 et 18 — 13, 14, 15 et 16 sont bâna.
18. Pour 19, 20 et 21 — 4 est nkǫ́kǫǫlǫ.
    Pour 4 — 19, 20 et 21 sont bankánola.
19. Pour 19 — 15 est isé.
    Pour 15 — 19 est bǫna.
20. Pour 19 — 14 et 16 sont baisómoto.
    Pour 14 et 16 — 19 est bǫna.
21. Pour 19 — 20 et 21 sont baisómoto.
    Pour 20 et 21 — 19 est bǫna.

TABLE DES MATIÈRES

	Pages.
INTRODUCTION	3
CHAPITRE PREMIER. — Préliminaires et généralités	23
CHAPITRE II. — Élaboration du contrat matrimonial. — Dot	105
CHAPITRE III. — Des différentes formes de mariages et unions pseudo-matrimoniales	186
CHAPITRE IV. — Age des mariés	231
CHAPITRE V. — Empêchements au mariage	241
CHAPITRE VI. — La vie conjugale	260
CHAPITRE VII. — La polygamie	341
CHAPITRE VIII. — Le divorce	376
CHAPITRE IX. — La mort	417
CHAPITRE X. — Les enfants	463
ANNEXE : Terminologie des relations familiales	518

[p. 520]



BOLÓKI
NGƆMBƐ
COQUILHATVILLE
NTÓMBÁ
INJƆ́LƆ́
BELOKO
BAKAALA
BOLÉNGÉ
LIAMBA
BOSANGA
BALÍNGÓ
BOMBWANIA
Ebila
Bosombá
Bolondo
Ionda
Mbeki
Iwota
Bolóngó
Bovólá
CONGO BELGE
Territoire occupé par les Nkundo ou Mongo
Lisalá Congo
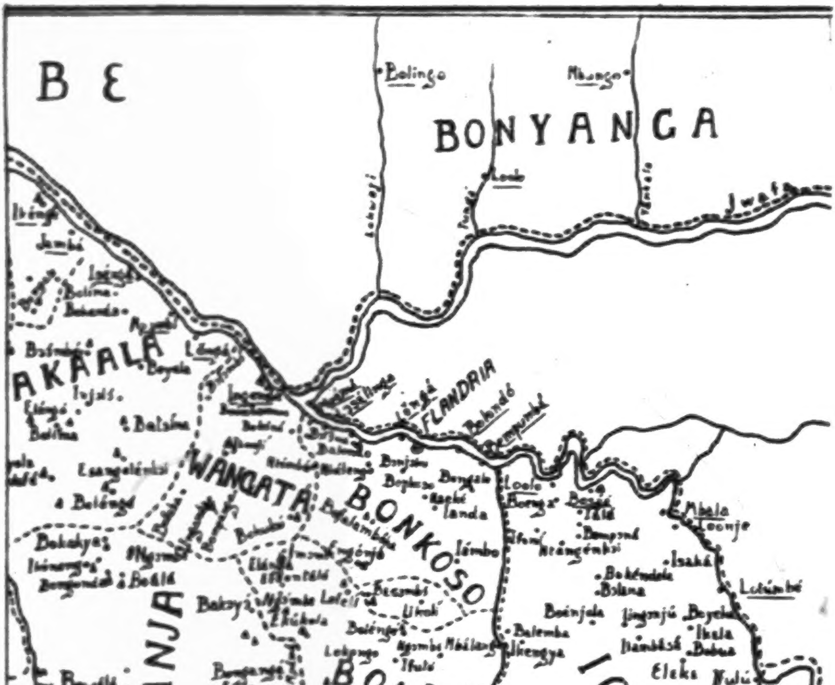
MBƐ
Bongandanga
NTÓMBA

[End MAP (A)]



B Ɛ
BONYANGA
Bolingo
Mbongo
AKAALA
WANGATA
BONKOSO
FLANDRIA
BOMBWANJA
BONGILI
IONDA
NTOMBA(WANG
LIOKO
LIOMBO
B Ingende
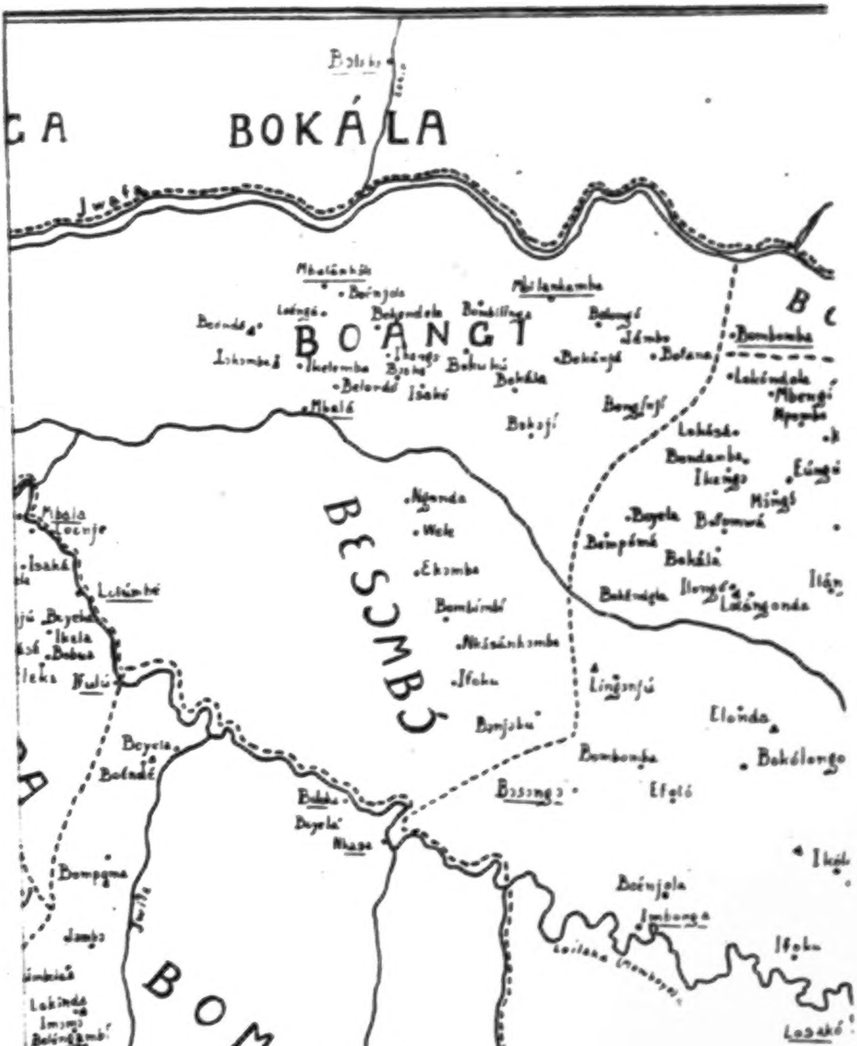
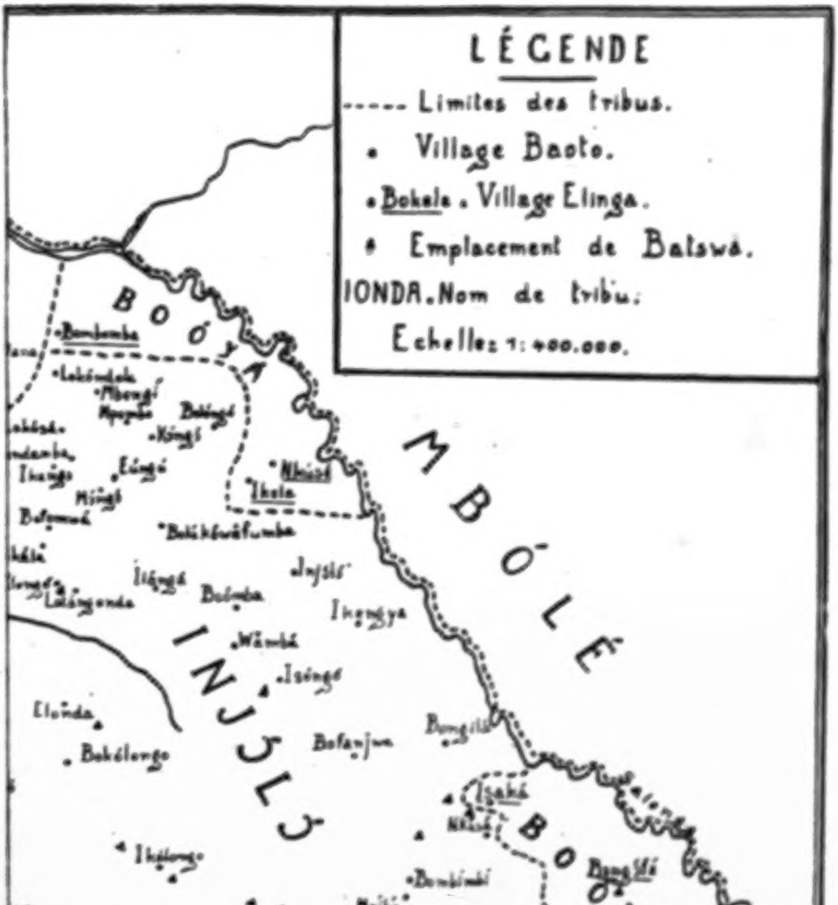
Bolenge
Bolondo
Loolo
Mbala
Loonje
Isaka
Lotumbe
Boyela
Bokala
Bolaka
Bilima
Bompona
Imanga
Lokinda
Bofili
Lonyanyanga

[End Map (B)]



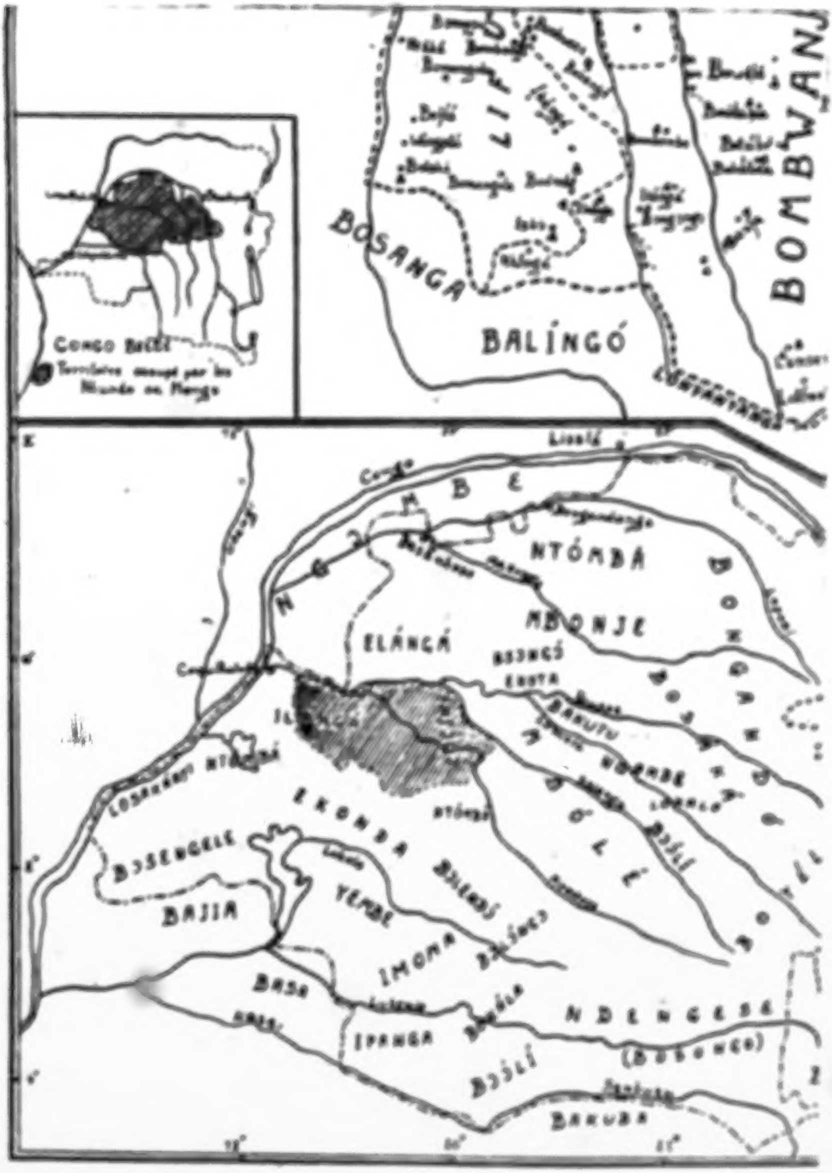
BOKÁLA
BOANGI
BƐSƆMBƆ
BOMBOMBƆ
Jwafa
Mbalankombe
Bombomba
Lokóndola
Mbongi
Ngonda
Wale
Ekomba
Bombímbí
Nkásánkomba
Ifoku
Bonjoku
Lingonju
Elonda
Bombomba
Bokólongo
Efoló
Bosongo
Bokala
Lotángonda
Bokálá
Bolumwá
Bompómá
Boyela
Bondamba
Lokóndo
Bongéfé
Bokóji
Bokála
Bokuku
Bosho
Isako
Ikelomba
Isikombo
Belondé
Mbaló
Bokondola
Bombilinga
Boénjolo
Loóngó
Boende
Bolongé
Jombo
Bolana
Bokónjá
Mbala
Loonje
Isaká
Lotómbé
Boyela
Ikala
Bobua
Nulu
Boyela
Bolafé
Boyela
Bokuka
Mbaya
Bompona
Jambo
Lokindo
Imomo
Bolongambi
Boili
Boénjola
Imbonga
Ifoku
Losako
Bombilongo
Ikolo

[End Map (C)]



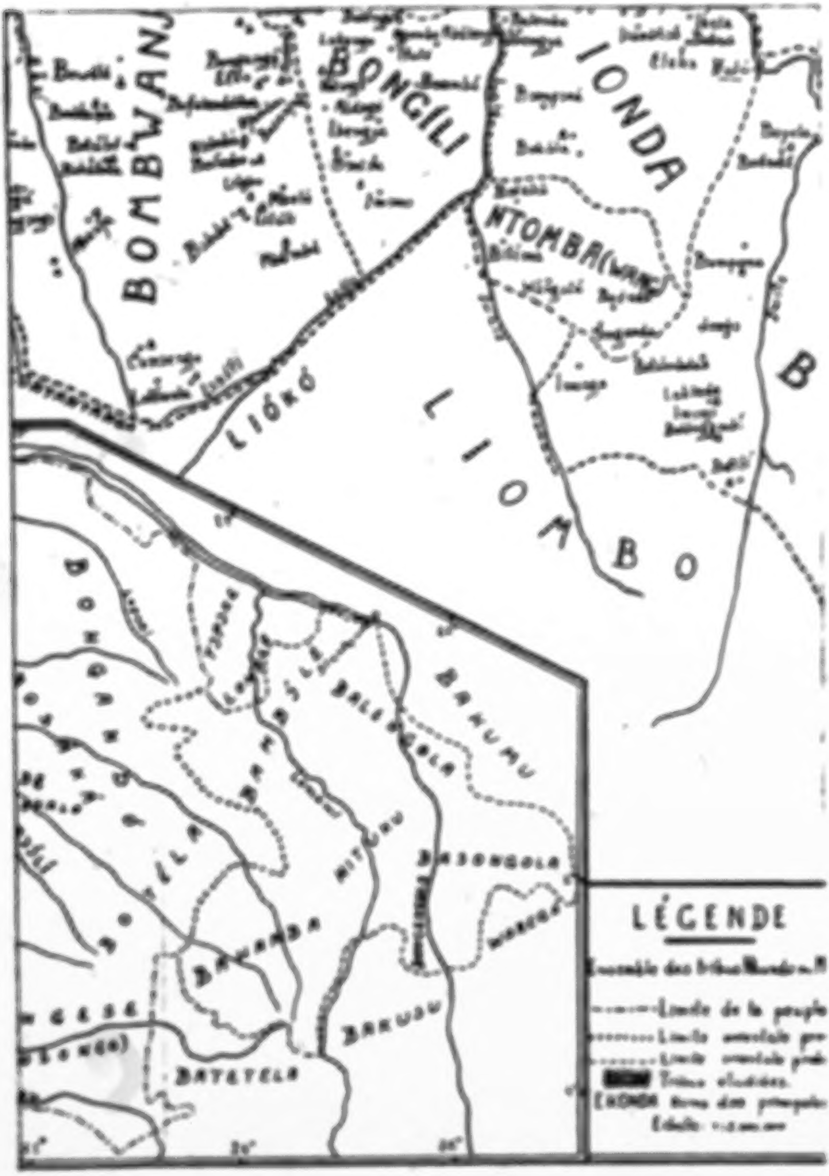
LÉGENDE
----- Limites des tribus.
• Village Baoto.
• Bokele • Village Elinga.
• Emplacement de Batswá.
IONDA. Nom de tribu.
Echelle: 1: 400.000.
BOÓYA
MBÓLÉ
INJƆLƆ
BOÓYÁ
BÓLÉ
Bombomba
Lokóndola
Mbongé
Bóóngé
Ilanga
Elóngó
Bolikówáfumba
Injsis
Ilóngé
Lolongonda
Bolomba
Ingenya
Wamba
Isóngé
Elonda
Bokélongo
Bofanjua
Bongili
Isaká
Ikólongo
Bombimbi
Mpika
Bongili
Buya
Bombomba
Ilongólóbála
Bofana
Bolondó
Ifoku
Lotakó
Ifeku
Bombilongo
Bongiló
Bombe
Luilo

[End Map (D)]



CONGO BELGE
Territoire occupé par les Nkundo ou Mongo
BOSANGA
BALINGÓ
BOMBWANJ
Congo
NTÓMBA
MBONJE
ELÁNGÁ
EKONDA
BOSENGELE
BAJIA
YEMBE
IMOMA
BASO
IPANGA
NDENGESE
(BOSONGO)
BOOLI
BAKUBA

[End Map (E)]



BOMBWANJ
BONGILI
IONDA
NTOMBA (WANG
LIOKO
LIOMBO
B BAKUMU
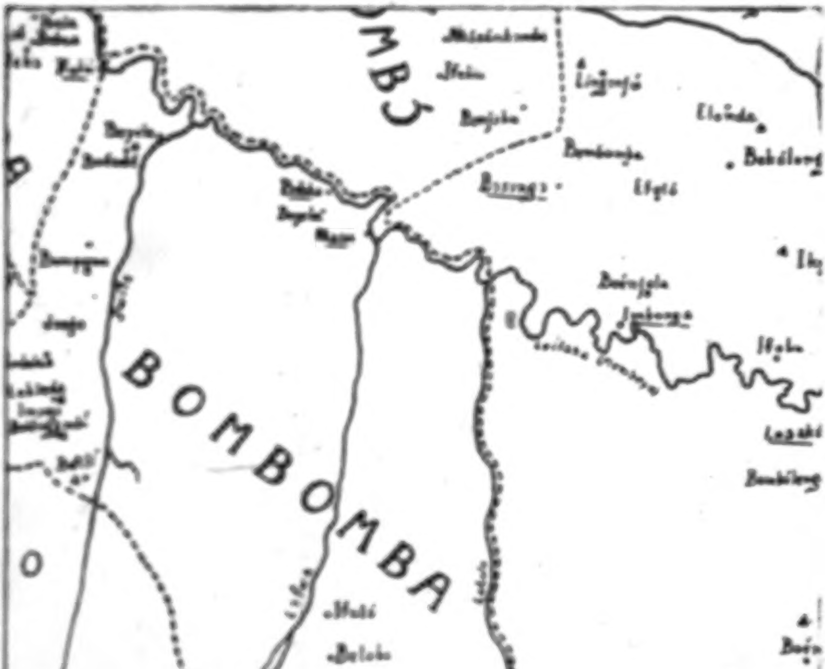
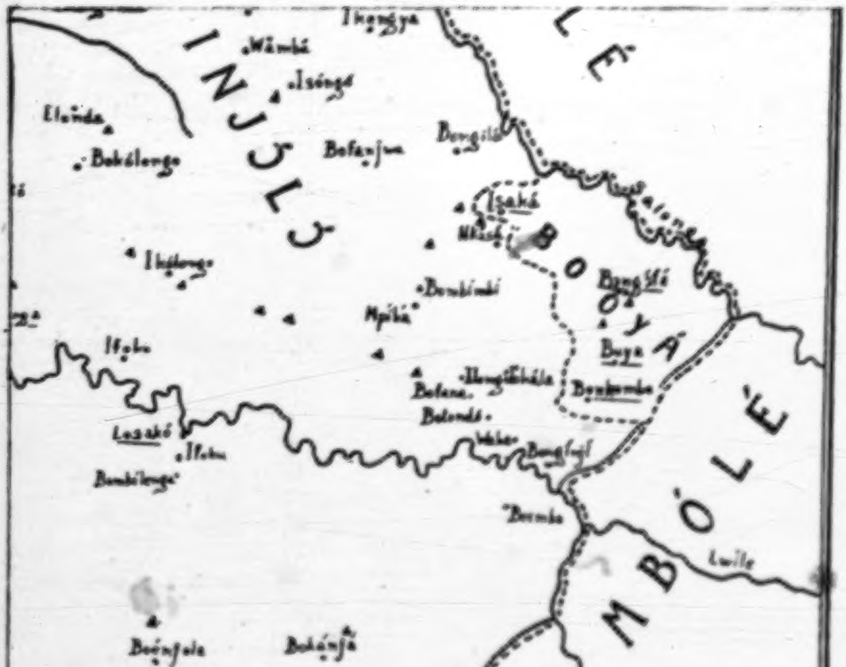
BALENGOLA
MITUKU
BASONGOLA
BAKUSU
BATETELA
LÉGENDE
Tribus étudiées.

[End Map (F)]



MBƆ
BOMBOMBA
NTÓMBA
BOMBWANJA
O
ÉGENDE

[End Map (G)]



Ikengya
Wámbá
Isóngó
INJƆLƆ
Elonda
Bokólongo
Bofanjwa
Bongilá
Izakó
Nkofi
BOOYÁ
Ikólongo
Bombímbá
Mpíká
Bongílé
Buya
Ilongálikála
Bolena
Bolondó
Bonkombo
Ikoko
Lozakó
Ifeka
Bombilongo
Wáka
Bongílé
Bomba
LÉ
MBÓLÉ
Luíle
Bonfola
Bokáŋja
Bompámá
Ilulé
Ilángá
Ekombe
Bosombo
WÁNGATÁ
ÓMBÁ

[End Map (H)]

Nkundo

CCO

Nkundo Society
[De Nkundo-Maatschappij]

E. Boelaert

Kongo-Overzee, Vol. VI, pp. 148-161, 1940

Translated from the Flemish by Helen N. Sprey

Human Relations Area Files

1959

[Title Page]

Nkundu

[148]

NKUNDO SOCIETY

By E. Boelaert, M. S. C.

(Coquilhatville)

Introduction

000 All of White civilization is in search of a "new order," a reorganization of society. The disrupting forces that broke through in the French Revolution have destroyed all of the intermediary parts and all of the subordinate organs of the social body, and all of their rights and duties have been concentrated in the impersonal State, which alone still has power and leadership over all free and equal individuals.

Having been brought up with such a conception, whose insufficiency and injustice we are learning to realize very slowly, it is only with great difficulty that we can form a correct idea of what an organized society ought to be. The attempts to create organizations of workers and of social status groups and to bring about a corporative arrangement have absorbed all of the social powers for almost a hundred years. The question of how we can make the family once more the nucleus of the community is still scarcely touched on, while the problem of nationality groups has turned Europe into a volcano. And still the question of the new order will only find its solution when justice is done to each of these forces: ethnic (family and nationality), economic (job, social and economic class), and political (form of government).

It is, therefore, not surprising that it is difficult for us to obtain true insight into a society that clashes completely with the ideas that prevail among us; that we too easily considered stupid, primitive, and barbaric that which we did not understand, because it went against our own faulty conceptions; that we thought [149] we were serving civilization by dismantling the naturally organized societies, with only the aim of making them like ours; that we confused natural law with our own positive law and civilization, with our own decadent customs. In the presence of the natives, we completely forgot the imperfection and "growing disorganization" of our own society and made it into an indisputable ideal for their "elevation."

|21| The question about the real structure of the native society begins to be asked only now that it has been brought completely to the tottering point. The question as to whether that society is, in its foundations or basic elements, really in conflict with natural law, the general welfare of mankind, and faith -- the question, thus, of the right of that society to exist -- is still shoved aside in favor of the supposed duty of the moment: to make that society like ours.

In this article, I have tried to outline the social order of the Nkundo [Nkundu]-Mongo as clearly as possible, in order to find an answer to the last question.

1. The Ethnic Clan

When we keep saying that the family is the nucleus of the community, we are ultimately merely clutching a legal fiction, or rather, we say what it ought to be. In fact, the family is, among us, only the producer of individuals who play their role in the community. The family, as such, is neither socially nor legally nor politically an intermediary, a mediator, between the individuals and the higher organs of the society.

b|3 Second, the nuclear family has, in our society, developed into a completely separate conception, compared to the extended family. The patriarchal household, the model of which Le Play portrayed, or the extended family, has completely disappeared. Among the Nkundo-Mongo, on the contrary, it is precisely the patriarchal family which, in the most absolute sense, is still the nucleus of the community and the foremost independent organ of that community.

Most often, this extended family is designated by the term "clan," to which vaguely different characteristics are attached: [150] blood relationship, totemism, exogamy, community of property, and others. One speaks of ethnic (patriarchal or matriarchal), legal, exogamic, and political clans, without further giving a clear description of these concepts.

The ethnic clan includes all of the persons who are descended in the male line from a particular ancestor. It is his descent in the male line from that particular ancestor which ties each Nkundo to that clan. Each ethnic clan has its own name, which is indicated in our society by the family name. When the Nkundo wish, however, to indicate that name,

613 they always refer to their descent from the ancestor-founder: "We are baseka Ngoi (descendants of Ngoi; we belong to the clan of Ngoi)."

Naturally the Nkundo-Mongo know very well that all the Mongo clans are descended from a common ancestor. They even believe in the common descent of all people. However, in clan unity they only go back to that ancestor who made their group legally autonomous, who made himself independent.

To that group belong, thus, all the children of that founder, all of the children of his sons, all of the children of his grandsons and great-grandsons; thus, all those who keep the same family name in our society.

The Nkundo-Mongo call the clan from the father's side their wise, from ise (father). The children of the lawfully married daughters belong to another wise, since they go back on their father's side to another ancestor. However, children of an unmarried daughter of the 848 clan continue to bear their mother's name, and thus belong to the wise of the mother, just as, in our society, they take on the family name of the mother.

Married women, however, continue ethnically to belong to their own paternal clan and do not form part of the wise of their husband.

2. Kinship Terms in the Paternal Clan

601 613 All of the living members of the paternal clan constitute one extended family. In the bosom of that one family, all members of the same /151/ generation also bear the same title. All of the members of the grandfather's generation are grandfathers. All the members of the father's generation are fathers, also including the female members. Thus, the sisters and female cousins of the father who belong to the wise are all called "female fathers": isomoto or faomoto (from ise or fafa, father, and bomoto, woman). All of the older brothers and male cousins of the wise are batomolo; all younger brothers or male cousins of the wise are bakune; all sisters or female cousins of the wise are nkana. All of the children of brothers and male cousins, and also all of the children of sisters and female cousins who remain in the wise, are bana (children).

601 561 613 Such terms are to us, of course, a never ending source of mistakes, complications, and ridicule. The native cannot possible understand this and underneath takes it very much amiss. Socially, legally, and 601 561 613 politically, his whole society is, in fact, based on those relationships which are incomprehensible to us. Indeed, the order of duty and responsibility, of authority and honor, are socially, legally, and politically determined by the order of birth. That order is determined by generation, and within the generation, by age: from the oldest father down the whole line of fathers to the oldest "child" in the whole row of children. The children of your older brother, even if they are younger in years, go before your own children. As we shall see later, the female members of the family, who practically fall outside this order, recover their place of honor through their sons.

613 From this short description of the paternal clan, it is immediately apparent that the clan is not a geographical concept among the Nkundo. Wherever the daughter may marry, wherever the son may wander in service to the Whites, that person always and everywhere continues by law to belong to his wise, and he remains bound to all the rights and duties of his place in that community.

602 613 It also appears that clan and blood relationship do not come anywhere near to blanketing each other. Each "blood relationship" of the Nkundo extends itself over various paternal clans, since the blood relations of the mother, as well as the descendants of all the other women of my wise who are lawfully married out of the clan, belong to another wise.

/152/ 3. Inheritance in the Clan

613 421 Each clan has possessions that constitute the inheritance or patrimony of the members, the domain of the family. These goods are of two kinds: economic and dotal. The former are subdivided into real property, or inalienable property, and personal property.

613 423 The real property of the clan consists of land and waters. The land is divided into: arable land, land for gardens, and hunting areas. These constitute common property, whose cultivation or usufruct is divided among the members of the clan: each one receives his garden land and hunting ground to clear; as soon as the user leaves it, that ground is free again for the community. Palm groves, of course, also remain common property of the members. A similar arrangement applies to water rights. Larger fishing areas remain common property and are, under the leadership of the clan head, communally exploited. Smaller fishing grounds, creeks, ponds, etc., are allotted to each

Nkundu

613 member. In the case of common use or of an exceptionally good 423 yield (large game, a rich haul of fish, large yield from a particular cultivation of common property, such as palm beer), these are divided by the clan leader and their respective shares allotted to all members.

613 Personal property consists of the hut and the tools of the man, the furniture of the woman, and the domestic animals. These are movable 422 and can also go out of the clan through inheritance. Should they leave their husbands, married women may taken with them whatever they have received or inherited personally from their wise.

In contrast to the economic property of the clan, there is the dotal 421 or capital property, the marriage settlements, which do not have 613 economic, but only legal value. They represent the rights over people.
583 In the first place we find those persons who themselves are the source of rights: the marriageable girls (bibunanyi) of the clan /A/ and the substitutes for women married into the clan /A/—that is, the women who are married into the allied clan /B/ with the acquired bride price (nkita). /Ed. Clan A pays bride price for a woman from clan B, the allied clan. Then clan B uses this acquired bride price to obtain another woman in marriage, a "substitute." This substitute is nkita to [567] the original woman./ In addition, there are the slaves who can replace a caput. In the second place, there are the titles which represent 421 a caput: the /153/ so-called dotal securities (baumba). These dotal 613 securities or titles are kept by the clan leader and, with the knowledge of his immediate successor, hidden somewhere in the ground. With the approval of the clan council, he may also lend them out. These dotal possessions or rights are also common property of the clan and are used to procure a wife for the clan members, each in his turn.

The common ownership of the economic property makes possible the difficult sharing of woods and river, prevents the cutting up of the property, hinders the impoverishment and the proletarization of the poor, and insures the livelihood of all of the clan members. This common ownership has nothing more to do with communism than the common ownership of property in our nuclear families.

The dotal or capital property, the bride price titles, which have perhaps aroused the most indignant and lofty compassion of our civilized world, have less to do with buying and selling the wife then our own dowry and class system. They are permanent legal titles of the contract which is made between the clans of the couple on the occasion of the marriage. Our individualistic liberalism and mercantilism have regarded these legal securities only through economic spectacles and 421 613 have seen them as money transactions. We have obtruded our point of view and destroyed the whole legal system of the natives. It is through our materialization of those securities that we have lowered the native woman to a plaything of money and a piece of merchandise.

586 595 As for the two outgrowths of the native system, divorce and polygamy, neither is inherent in the legal system as such. They are only abuses which have taken root and which clash with the principles of the native law itself. By its nature, native marriage is also indissoluble, and polygamy has only been able to exist through a popular confusion between paternal and marital law.

4. Legal Power in the Clan

613 627 In Nkundo society all individuals do not have equal rights or powers, as in the Napoleonic law books, /154/ but the natural rights concerning people are still completely recognized. All value and power comes from God, through the ancestors. Those who are nearest to God are thus the highest in position, his first representatives. There is no question of absolutism or despotism. Just as the blood is divided among all clan members in a descending line, so also are authority and legal power. They are one as a legal entity in relation to the outside world; nevertheless, each member takes part and has a vote in the internal administration of justice, so that, when clan interests are discussed and dealt with, each member may sit in the place accorded to him and take part in decisions. In a legal sense there is, therefore, no question of a separate family council, which would assist the clan leader, but all decisions are made communally.

594 627 A single exception to this does exist, namely, that which gives the head of the nuclear family legal power over his wife and children, and then only with the acknowledgment and approval of the clan. Differences between autonomous clans are settled by the clans involved, a sort of international court of law where friendly clans may also be brought in as arbiters.

627 Such an arrangement made the court absolutely "paternal." The whole procedure was one of a reconciliatory character, which resorted to coercive measures only when necessary, and did its utmost to save the honor and the welfare of the involved clans, and to compensate for, to restore, and to prevent further offenses.

177 Although even St. Thomas teaches that the only natural authority is that of the head of the family, European legislation has, through ignorance, completely abolished the rights of the native family head;
the wife is freed from all ties and is thus abandoned to licentiousness.
Through a legal fiction, clan law has gone over into the hands of the "recognized native courts of justice," which, however, have just as much to do with the clan court as a policeman with a father. The communization of trade, education, and the rearing of the young, as is demonstrated to us by Russia, would revolutionize our society far less than our installation of these so-called native courts of justice has done in the Congo. Education and correction have been replaced by punishment. Politics, which have begun to play such an all-important 602 role in our society, had /155/ almost no importance in Nkundo society.
613 The neighboring clans were all connected with each other through blood relationship, intermarriage, or friendship ties. Only when there was a struggle against a foreign and common enemy did politics have a role to fulfill. And then the same order of rank was observed among the clans as was already indicated for the members of a single clan.

177 Here also, biased or romantic products of our ideas about barbarism have adapted these so-called intertribal wars to the need that we felt, 728 to civilize the natives at any cost. These wars were not to be com-622 pared with our European wars, in which a mass of people are slaughtered.
In the Congo, no sooner had wounded or dead fallen on both sides than the chiefs were already congregated to conclude a peace treaty.
Here again, we meant to respect the political organization of the natives by the creation of chieftainships and native chiefs, who were to form the political-administrative link between the native clans and the European higher administration. Such chiefs were totally unknown in native society. Together with the establishment of the native courts, the establishment of chieftainships gave the death blow to the actual social organization of the Nkundo-Mongo. The very fact that these institutions are territorial demonstrates clearly that here no ordinary sharing of power has taken place, but simply an elimination of the traditional power in favor of a new colonial power.

177 Indeed, where formerly the "customary rightful chief" was sought out, even though it was sometimes only a formality, the new formula 622 of the "sectors" has relieved the higher administration from this care too. And it is only to be hoped that this new formula will at least do away with the legal fiction that the "chiefs" are actually "something native," so that they may be classified for once and for all in the 177 622 category of civil servants. In this manner they would fall under the written law and could be obliged to practice monogamy, whereas now nearly all of the "native chiefs" are precisely the maintainers and promoters of polygamy. If this had /156/ been enforced from the start, then polygamy, instead of spreading, would have virtually disappeared from the native society.

5. Splitting of the Clan

613 After all that has been said before, it must be rather apparent how an autonomous clan can split up and, thereby, form two autonomous clans.

When a clan has expanded too far, its leaders cross over the boundaries of blood relationship, and offenses against the law of exogamy occur. When such offenses are multiplied, further separation is gradually aimed at to make marriages possible. Such a situation between two parts of the same clan, who are striving for "legal autonomy," is called lonkana, a term that signifies that unlawful relations exist between the two. It generally occurs between member groups that have the same male ancestor, but not the same female ancestor—that is, they are issue from different wives of the same founder.

Another cause of splitting is the voluntary or obligatory withdrawal of one of the members. When he establishes himself outside, begets a sizeable progeny, and acquires a patrimony of his own, the relations with his own clan become less frequent; and the separated fraction gradually begins to settle smaller lawsuits, to maintain its own graveyard, to bury the umbilical cords of its children in its own territory, to take on its own name, and to refer to its own founder.

Often also at the source of this estrangement lies the refusal of a certain fraction of the clan to submit to the authority of the clan members.

6. Legal Dependents

613 614 608 Until now we have spoken only of the ethnic clan: of the members who belong to it through descent. They /157/ are the sole bearers of 613 authority (mpifo). Each clan can, however, also take in other persons 614 who fall outside the order of authority, but who legally belong to the 608 clan. Along with the real descendants, they make up the legal clan.

These are, in the first place, the wives who have married into the clan, the children brought with them (mbusola), and the lawful housekeepers. In addition, there are the clients who have been taken in; then the war prisoners and slaves; and finally the Pygmies. The women married into the clan are naturally separate, as are also the Pygmies who form a completely separate community. The others are gradually treated as children, receive their part in the general responsibility and protection, their place in the court session, etc. Depending on the degree to which they develop in the bosom of the clan which has taken them in, they can constitute a separate group in it, which becomes more and more independent.

7. The Maternal Clan

602 Each Nkundo has a double "fatherland": his wise and his bonyango. 613 The bonyango is the paternal clan of his mother. His mother gave birth to him there; her blood relations live there and receive him with motherly love and will protect him against all difficulties; he has often passed a large part of his happiest childhood years there; and there he can always find a safe shelter when, for one reason or another, he might lose the paternal clan.

The structure of the maternal clan naturally resembles that of the paternal clan in every way. If we treat it specially here, it is not in order to speak of the form, but only to point out the specific rights that each person has in his maternal clan.

601 Just as all of the brothers and sisters of my father are my "fathers," 602 so all of the brothers and sisters of my mother are my "mothers." 613 Mother's brother, that is, my maternal uncle, I call ngompame, nyangompame. All the nephews and nieces on the mother's side are my "children." A special tie binds me to the children of the nkita of my mother, that is, to the children of the women who was acquired by the maternal clan with the bride price /158/ that had been paid for my mother by my wise. Mother is, thus, the nkolo, the woman or mistress, of those children who call me their father.

602 As long as I continue to live in my own paternal clan, I have the 613 right to special care and love from the maternal clan. If I cannot find

602 sufficient dowry at home, then I can always go and appeal to my 613 maternal uncles who are obliged to help me insofar as they are able. I even have the right to the free dowry of one of the children of my mother's nkita. I may always lay out gardens and hunt in the territory of my bonyango, and take part in the court sessions of the maternal clan when they consider the allotment of the free dowries or the division of the inheritance. If, however, I wish to leave my father's clan and establish myself for good in the maternal clan, then I receive priority in everything over my male and female cousins and become heir and clan leader directly after my maternal uncles. This is, thus, a truly princely compensation for the so-called inferiority of the woman in native society: the child of the sister (bonankana) restores her gloriously to the honor and rank which are due her.

8. Related Clan: Likilo

602 Outside my paternal clan and outside my maternal clan, I still 601 have blood relations: namely, the children of my paternal aunt and of my sisters or female cousins, each of whom belongs to the clan of his own father. Just as the children of my mother's brothers are my children, so the children of my father's sister are also my fathers. I am, thus, in the same relationship to the children of my mother's brother as the children of my father's sister are to me.

As far as the children of my sister are concerned, they are also my real banankana and, therefore, the fathers of my own children.

The other members of the related clans (who are thus not blood relations) all share, according to generation, in the classification of immediate relatives: all the "fathers" of the husband are "fathers-in-law"; all the mothers, "mothers-in-law"; etc. There is this single big difference, that the "superiors" of the husband are also your "superiors." According to the opinions of the Nkundo, they are the only real relatives. Those on the husband's side are called bokilo; those on the wife's side, bokanga.

/159/ The "subordinates" of the husband are not real relatives and rightly call each other "husband" and "wife." In various legally [582] defined circumstances, marriage relations and marriages are permitted between the latter.

It is unnecessary to repeat that all of the members of the reciprocal clans share in these relationships: the whole generation of a clan

602 member is, as it were, identified with that member, so that, for in-601 stance, all younger sisters and female cousins of one spouse become "wives" of all the younger brothers and male cousins of the other spouse. One must really have the legal sense and the patience and the capacity for palaver and unravelling of an old Nkundo to make sense out all of these relationships. They themselves compare them, in fact, with the inextricable clew of the intestines of a sort of dwarf crocodile: besofo bya lokekele.

9. Exogamy

613 The term, "exogamic clan," often heard or encountered in writings,
582 is also, at least in the Nkundo-Mongo society, very misleading. The group of persons with whom marriage is forbidden does not constitute any common entity; it differs from person to person. Two half brothers can have the same paternal clan but differ in maternal clan; they can have the same maternal clan and different paternal clans. Marriages are forbidden for older brothers and sisters that are permitted for the younger ones. The rules differ from one blood relation to another, from blood relation with relative-by-marriage to blood relation with relative-by-marriage, from relative-by-marriage with relative-by-marriage to relative-by-marriage with relative-by-marriage.

If one still wishes to put the law of exogamy into European terms, then one might say: 1) blood relationship forbids marriage insofar as the blood relationship is recognized. This recognition varies from clan group to clan group. Sometimes in the same legal but extended clan, an exception is made to this recognition; mostly, however, the different autonomous clans which descend from the same distant ancestor are still bound by the law of exogamy. Generally, groups which have the same father but a different mother /160/ separate most quickly. 2) Relationship (other than blood) forbids marriage—insofar as the relationship is recognized between the parents of spouses; it sometimes permits marriage between children of spouses.

613 Here it should be observed once again, however, that the customs 582 differ from region to region as regards this recognition; that, for in-184 stance, the stepson in many regions may marry his stepmother in a regular marriage; and that the violations are less severely judged and punished in proportion to the degree to which the forbidden relationships diverge.

Nkundu

10. Conclusion

182 Nkundo society was a fully alive, organic community. All of its organs functioned and were able to adjust continually to the changes in its life. Ethnically, socially-legally, and politically, they were open to every improvement. The organs with which it was built stood nearest to natural law and drew their rights and duties from it, and also the spirit which inspired them.

The facts prove that this society could survive. It arose at the source of the Lomako; in a short time it had extended itself peacefully over the whole central area of the Congo; it pressed eastward across the Lomami and Lualaba, and southward across the Kaisai /Kasai/-Sankuru, to occupy about a fifth of the present Congo at the time of the arrival of the Whites.

182 This society was open to all healthy influences and could adapt it-
177 self to all reasonable demands of civilization. It was, however, not reconcilable with what precisely is wrong in our European ideas about progress and civilization: elimination of all ethnic intermediary organs, equalization of all individuals, materialization of all life on the basis of economic competition, slave-like submission to the impersonal, unpaternal State, with that terrible pretense of freedom, of being able to do everything that is not forbidden by the State.

178 This suddenly attained freedom, which was accompanied by the 161 abolition of all the former joints of society, means the death of the Nkundo /161/ community, not only in its soul, its being, but also in its existence. The gradual depopulation, the dying out in the Middle Congo, has had repercussions now and then, even in government circles. "The Nkundo-Mongo population is melting away like snow before the sun," is the brief content of the last official report. The Waola, between the Ruki and the Ikelemba /rivers/, had in 1939 ninety deaths and three births. The official statistics of 1939 of the territory of Coquilhatville give one hundred adults for every twenty-four children. The official data of the same year for the Vicariate of Coquilhatville, with its 382, 736 inhabitants, give a ratio of 415 children to 1, 000 adults. According to these data, the whole population will be decreased by more than 50 percent by the following generation, thus dwindled to less than one-half.

Coquilhatville, 1939

3: Boelaert

FO32 Mongo

KONGO-OVERZEE

TIJDSCHRIFT VOOR EN OVER BELGISCH KONGO
RWANDA-BURUNDI EN AANPALENDE GEWESTEN

ONDER REDACTIE VAN PROF. Dr. A. BURSSENS, UNIVERSITEIT TE GENT

6. JAARGANG 1940

DE SIKKEL, KRUISHOFSTRAAT 223, ANTWERPEN

DE NKUNDO-MAATSCHAPPIJ

door E. Boelaert, M. S. C.
(Coquilhatstad)

Inleiding

Heel de blanke beschaving is op zoek naar een „nieuwe orde", naar een reorganisatie der maatschappij. De desorganiseerende krachten, die in de Fransche revolutie hun doorbraak vonden, hebben alle tusschengeledingen, alle ondergeschikte organen van het maatschappelijk lichaam gesloopt, al hun rechten en plichten geconcentreerd op den onpersoonlijken Staat, die alleen nog macht en leiding heeft over de gelijkgerechtigde individuen.

Opgevoed in een dergelijke opvatting, waarvan wij slechts heel langzaam de ongenoegzaamheid en onrechtvaardigheid leeren inzien, kunnen we ons maar zeer moeilijk een juist denkbeeld vormen van wat een georganiseerde maatschappij zou moeten zijn. De pogingen om werkorganisaties en standorganisaties in het leven te roepen en om een korporatieve ordening tot stand te brengen, hebben sinds haast honderd jaar alle sociale krachten opgeslorpt. Het vraagstuk, hoe wij het huisgezin weer tot kernorgaan der gemeenschap kunnen maken, is nog maar ternauwernood aangeraakt, terwijl het vraagstuk der ethnische volksgemeenschappen Europa tot een vulkaan heeft gemaakt. En toch zal de kwestie der nieuwe orde enkel haar oplossing gevonden hebben, wanneer aan elk dezer krachten : ethnische (huisgezin en volksgemeenschap), ekonomische (vak, klasse, stand) en politieke (staatsinrichting) recht is gedaan.

Het is dan ook niet te verwonderen dat het voor ons moeilijk is een juist inzicht te krijgen in een maatschappij, die volledig indruischt tegen de opvattingen welke ten onzent heerschen ; dat wij al te gemakkelijk als onverstandig, primitief en barbaarsch gingen beschouwen wat wij niet begrepen, omdat het inging tegen onze eigen foutieve opvattingen ; dat wij de beschaving meenden te dienen door natuurlijk-georganiseerde maatschappijen te ontmantelen, alleen met het doel ze aan de onze gelijk te maken; dat wij natuurrecht met eigen positief recht, beschaving met eigen dekadente gewoonten gingen verwarren. Ten overstaan van de inlanders vergaten wij volledig de onvolmaaktheid en „groeiende verwarring" onzer eigen maatschappij om ze tot onaantastbaar ideaal te maken voor hun „verheffing".

De vraag naar de werkelijke grondslagen der inlandsche maatschappij begint pas gesteld te worden nu deze volledig aan het wankelen gebracht zijn. De vraag of die maatschappij in haar grondslagen of principieele elementen werkelijk in tegenspraak is met het natuurrecht, het algemeen welzijn der menschheid en het geloof, de vraag dus naar het bestaansrecht dier maatschappij, is nog altijd opzij geschoven voor den vermeenden plicht van het oogenblik: die maatschappij aan de onze gelijk te maken.

In deze bijdrage heb ik getracht de maatschappelijke ordening der Nkundo-Mongo zoo duidelijk mogelijk te omlijnen, ten einde een antwoord op de laatste vraag te vinden.

1. De ethnische klan

Wanneer men te onzent blijft zeggen, dat het huisgezin de cel is der gemeenschap, dan houdt men ten slotte nog enkel aan een juridische fictie vast, of liever: men zegt, wat het rechtens zou moeten zijn. Feitelijk is het huisgezin te onzent nog enkel de voortbrenger der individuen, die hun rol zullen spelen in de gemeenschap. Het huisgezin als zoodanig is noch sociaal, noch juridisch, noch politiek een tusschengeleding, een bemiddelingsorgaan tusschen de enkelingen en de hoogere organen der maatschappij.

Ten tweede is het huisgezin, in onze gemeenschap, tot een gansch afzonderlijk begrip uitgegroeid tegenover de familie. Het patriarchaal gezin, waarvan Le Play het model uitteekende, of de groote familie is geheel verdwenen. Bij de Nkundo-Mongo daarentegen is het juist die patriarchale familie welke nog in den meest volstrekten zin de cel is der gemeenschap, het eerste zelfstandig orgaan dier gemeenschap.

Meestal duidt men die groote familie aan met den naam van klan, waaraan vagelijk verschillende kenmerken toegekend worden:

bloedverwantschap, totemisme, exogamie, gemeenschappelijkheid van bezit, en andere. Men spreekt van ethnische (patriarchale of matriarchale), juridische, exogamische en politieke klans, zonder verder duidelijk de omschrijving dier begrippen aan te geven.

De ethnische klan omvat alle personen, die in mannelijke linie van een bepaalden voorouder afstammen. Het is de afstamming in mannelijke linie van dien bepaalden voorouder, die elken Nkundo aan dien klan verbindt. Elke ethnische klan heeft zijn eigen naam, die te onzent door den familienaam wordt aangegeven. Wanneer de Nkundo dien naam echter willen bepalen, beroepen zij zich steeds op de afstamming van den voorouder-stichter : Wij zijn baseka Ngoi (afstammelingen van Ngoi, wij behooren tot den klan van Ngoi).

Natuurlijk weten de Nkundo-Mongo heel goed, dat alle Mongo-klans afstammen van eenzelfden voorouder. Zij nemen zelfs de eenheid van afstamming van alle menschen aan. Als klan-eenheid klimmen zij echter enkel op tot dien voorouder, die hun groep juridisch-autonoom heeft gemaakt, die zich zelfstandig gemaakt heeft.

Tot die groep behooren dus alle kinderen van dien stichter, alle kinderen zijner zonen, alle kinderen zijner kleinzonen en achterkleinzonen, dus al degenen die bij ons denzelfden familienaam blijven bewaren.

Dien klan langs vaderskant noemen de Nkundo-Mongo hun wise, van ise (vader). De kinderen der geldig getrouwde dochters behooren tot een anderen wise, omdat zij langs vaderskant opklimmen tot een anderen voorouder. Kinderen echter eener ongetrouwde dochter van den klan blijven moeders naam dragen, dus tot den wise der moeder behooren, juist zooals zij bij ons den familienaam der moeder aannemen.

Ingetrouwde vrouwen echter blijven ethnisch tot haar eigen vadersklan behooren, maken geen deel uit van den wise harer echtgenooten.

2. Benamingen in den vadersklan

Alle levende leden van vadersklan maken één groote familie uit. In den schoot dier ééne familie dragen alle leden eener zelfde generatie ook een gelijkwaardigen titel. Alle leden van grootvaders generatie zijn grootvaders. Alle leden van vaders generatie zijn vaders, ook de vrouwelijke leden. Aldus worden de zusters en nichten van vader, die tot den wíse behooren, alle „vrouwelijke vaders" genoemd : ísomoto of fasomoto (van ise of fafa, vader, en bomoto, vrouw). Alle oudere broers en neven van den wíse zijn batomolo, alle jongere broers of neven van den wíse zijn bakune, alle zusters of nichten van den wíse zijn nkana. Alle kinderen van broers en neven, ook alle kinderen van zusters en nichten die in den wíse blijven, zijn bana (kinderen).

Dergelijke benamingen zijn voor ons natuurlijk een nooit uitdrogende bron van vergissingen, verwikkelingen en bespottingen. Hetgeen de inlander onmogelijk begrijpen kan en ons in den grond ten zeerste euvel duidt. Sociaal, juridisch en politiek is immers heel zijn maatschappij op die voor ons onbegrijpelijke verhoudingen gegrondvest. Sociaal, juridisch en politiek immers wordt de rangorde van plicht en verantwoordelijkheid, van gezag en eer door de geboorteorde bepaald. Die rangorde wordt bepaald door de generatie, en binnen de generatie door den leeftijd : vanaf den oudsten vader langs heel de linie der vaders tot aan 't oudste „kind" in heel de rij der kinderen. De kinderen van uw ouderen broer, ook als zij in jaren jonger zijn, gaan vóór uw eigen kinderen. Zooals we verder zien zullen, komen de vrouwelijke leden van den klan, die praktisch buiten deze rangorde vallen, in haar zonen deze plaats met eer terug innemen.

Uit deze korte beschrijving van den vaderklan blijkt al dadelijk, dat de klan bij de Nkundo geen geografisch begrip is. Waar de dochter ook moge uittrouwen, waar de zoon ook moge wegzwerven in blankendienst, altijd en overal blijft die persoon in rechte tot zijn wíse behooren, blijft hij aan al de rechten en plichten van zijn plaats in die gemeenschap, gebonden.

Er blijkt ook uit, dat klan en bloedverwantschap elkaar op verre na niet dekken. Elke „bloedverwantschap" der Nkundo strekt zich over verschillende vaderklans uit, vermits zoowel de bloedverwanten van moeder als de afstammelingen van alle andere geldig uitgetrouwde vrouwen van mijn wíse, tot een anderen wíse behooren.

3. Erfgoederen van den klan

Elke klan heeft eigendommen, die het erfgoed of patrimonium der leden, het domein der familie uitmaken. Die goederen zijn tweeërlei : ekonomische en dotale. De ekonomische worden onderverdeeld in onroerende of onvervreemdbare en in roerende.

De onroerende goederen van den klan bestaan uit gronden en waters. De gronden zijn : bouwgronden, tuingronden en jachtgebieden. Zij maken een gemeenschappelijk bezit uit, waarvan de exploitatie of het vruchtgebruik onder de klanleden wordt verdeeld : ieder krijgt zijn tuingrond en jachtgrond ter ontginning ; zoodra de gebruiker hem verlaat, wordt die grond terug vrij voor de gemeenschap. Natuurlijke palmerijen blijven ook algemeen eigendom der leden. Een dergelijke regeling is getroffen voor de waters. Grootere visch-exploitaties blijven gemeengoed en worden, onder leiding van den klanleider, gemeenschappelijk uitgebaat. Kleinere visch-exploitaties : kreekjes, vijvertjes enz., worden aan elk der leden toegewezen. Bij gezamenlijke exploitatie of bijzonder goede opbrengst (edele jachtdieren, rijke vischvangst, groote opbrengst eener partikuliere exploitatie van gemeengoed : palmbier) wordt deze door den klanleider verdeeld en wordt aan alle leden hun overeenkomstig deel toegewezen.

De roerende goederen bestaan uit de hut, de werktuigen van den man, het huisraad der vrouw en de huisdieren. Deze zijn vervreemdbaar en kunnen bij erfenis ook uit den klan gaan. Wat de ingetrouwde vrouwen voor zich persoonlijk uit hun wise meekregen of overerfden, mogen zij meenemen als zij haar echtgenoot verlaten.

Tegenover de ekonomische goederen van den klan staan de dotale of kapitale goederen, de huwelijkswaarden, die geen ekonomische, maar juridische waarde hebben. Zij vertegenwoordigen de rechten op personen. Het zijn dus in de eerste plaats die personen zelf, waaruit rechten kunnen voortkomen of voortkomen : de huwbare meisjes (bibunanyi) van den klan, de plaatsvervangsters van ingetrouwde vrouwen, d. z. de vrouwen, die in den aangetrouwden klan ingetrouwd zijn met den verkregen bruidschat (nkita). Verder de slaven, die een caput kunnen vervangen. In de tweede plaats zijn het de titels, die een caput vertegenwoordigen : de zoogenaamde bruidschatwaarden (baumba). Deze bruidschatwaarden of titels worden door den klanleider bewaard en met medeweten van zijn onmiddellijken opvolger ergens in den grond verborgen. Met goedkeuring van den klanraad kan hij er ook van uitleenen. Die dotale goederen of rechten zijn weer gemeenschappelijk bezit van den klan en worden gebruikt om de klanleden om beurten een vrouw te verschaffen.

De gemeenschappelijkheid van het ekonomisch eigendom maakt de lastige uitbating van bosch en rivier mogelijk, voorkomt de versnippering der eigendommen, belet de verarming en de verproletariseering van de misdeelden, verzekert het bestaan van alle klanleden. Met het kommunisme heeft dit gemeenschappelijk bezit niet meer uitstaans dan de gemeenschap van goederen in onze huisgezinnen.

De dotale of kapitale waarden, de bruidschattitels, die misschien het meest het verontwaardigd en superieur medelijden van onze beschaafde wereld hebben gaande gemaakt, hebben met koop en verkoop der vrouw minder uitstaans dan ons eigen bruidschat- en standen-systeem. Zij zijn blijvende, juridische titels van de overeenkomst, die tusschen de klans der trouwers bij gelegenheid van het huwelijk wordt gesloten. Ons individualistisch liberalisme en merkantilisme heeft die juridische waarden enkel met een ekonomischen bril bekeken en er geldwaarden in gezien. Wij hebben onze zienswijze opgedrongen en het heele juridische stelsel der inlanders vernietigd. Enkel door onze vermaterialiseering dier waarden hebben wij de inlandsche vrouw tot een speelbal van het geld, tot een koopwaar vernederd.

Wat de twee uitwassen van het inlandsch systeem betreft, de echtscheiding en de veelwijverij, beide zijn niet inherent aan het juridische stelsel als zoodanig. Het zijn enkel ingewortelde misbruiken, die tegen de grondregels van het inlandsch recht zelf indruischen. Uit zijn aard is ook het inlandsch huwelijk onverbreekbaar, en de veelwijverij is enkel kunnen ontstaan door een gewilde verwarring tusschen het paternaal en het maritaal recht.

4. Rechtsmacht in den klan

In de Nkundo-maatschappij zijn niet alle enkelingen gelijkgerechtigd en evenmachtig, zooals in de Napoleontische wetboeken, maar worden de natuurlijke rechten op personen nog degelijk erkend. Alle waarde en macht komt van God, langs de voorvaderen. Zij die God het dichtst benaderen, zijn dus de hoogstgeplaatsten, zijn eerste vertegenwoordigers. Van absolutisme en despotisme is echter geen sprake. Zooals het bloed over alle klanleden in afdalende lijn verdeeld is, zoo ook het gezag, de rechtsmacht. Zij is één als juridische persoonlijkheid tegenover de buitenwereld ; elk lid ervan heeft nochtans deel en stem in de interne rechtspraak, zoodat, bij de bespreking en behandeling van alle klanbelangen, elk lid op de hem toekomende plaats mag zetelen en medebeslissen. In juridischen zin is er dus zelf geen sprake van een bijzonderen familieraad, die den klanleider zou ter zijde staan, maar worden alle beslissingen gemeenschappelijk genomen.

Een enkele uitzondering bestaat hierop, nl. degene, die aan het gezinshoofd rechtsmacht geeft over zijn vrouw en kinderen, en dan nog alleen mits erkenning en goedkeuring door den klan. Geschillen tusschen autonome klans werden door de betrokken klans beslecht, een soort internationaal gerechtshof, waarbij ook bevriende klans als scheidsrechters konden betrokken worden.

Dergelijke regeling maakte het gerecht absoluut „vaderlijk". Heel de proceduur ervan was een verzoeningsproceduur, die slechts uit noodzaak tot dwangmaatregelen overging, en alles in het werk stelde om de eer en het welzijn der betrokken klanleden te redden, de fouten te vergoeden, te herstellen en verder te voorkomen.

Ofschoon zelfs Sint Thomas leert, dat het eenige natuurlijk recht dit van het gezinshoofd is, heeft de Europeesche wetgeving het haar onbekende recht van dat gezinshoofd volledig afgeschaft : de vrouw is van alle banden verlost en dus aan alle losbandigheid overgeleverd. Door een juridische fictie is het klaniek recht overgegaan in de handen van de „erkende inlandsche rechtbanken", die echter met het klan-gerecht juist evenveel overeenkomen als een politieagent met een vader. De verkommuniseering van handel, onderwijs en opvoeding, zooals Rusland ons die voorhoudt, zou voor ons een veel minder groote revolutioneering der maatschappij tot stand brengen, dan wij in Kongo teweeggebracht hebben door die zoogenaamde inlandsche rechtbanken. Opvoeding en verbetering werden door straf vervangen. De politiek, die in onze maatschappij zoo 'n alles-overwegende rol is gaan spelen, had in de Nkundo-maatschappij haast geen beteekenis. De buurklans waren alle door bloedverwantschap, aanverwantschap of vriendschapsbetrekkingen met elkaar verbonden. Alleen wanneer er te vechten viel tegen een vreemden en gemeenschappelijken vijand, kreeg de politiek een rol te vervullen. En dan werd weer eenzelfde rangorde tusschen de klans in acht genomen als reeds voor de leden van eenzelfden klan werd aangeduid.

Hier ook hebben tendentieuse of romantische uitbroeisels van onze opvatting over barbaarschheid deze zoogezegde intertribale oorlogen aangepast aan de behoefte die wij voelden om de inlanders het koste wat het wil te beschaven. Deze oorlogen waren niet te vergelijken met onze Europeesche waarbij een massa menschen worden afgeslacht. Nauwelijks waren in Kongo van weerszijden gewonden of dooden gevallen, of reeds werden de hoofden bijeengestoken om een vredesverbond te sluiten. Ook hier weer hebben wij gemeend de politieke organisatie der inlanders te eerbiedigen door het scheppen van hoofdijen en inlandsche opperhoofden, die de politiek-administratieve schakel zouden vormen tusschen de inlandsche klans en het Europeesch hooger bestuur. Dergelijke opperhoofden waren in de inlandsche maatschappij totaal onbekend. Samen met de inrichting der inlandsche rechtbanken heeft de inrichting der hoofdijen den genadeslag gegeven aan de werkelijke maatschappij-organisatie der Nkundo-Mongo. Alleen het feit reeds, dat die instellingen territoriaal zijn, toont duidelijk aan, dat hier geen gewone machtsverschuiving heeft plaats gehad, maar een gewone uitschakeling der traditioneele macht ten bate van een nieuwe, koloniale macht.

Trouwens, waar vroeger nog gezocht werd, al was het soms voor den vorm, naar den „gewoontelijk rechthebbenden chef", heeft de nieuwe formule der „secteurs" het hooger bestuur ook van deze zorg ontheven. En het is alleen maar te hopen, dat deze nieuwe formule ten minste de juridische fictie zal doen wegvallen, alsof die „hoofden" werkelijk „iets inlandsch" zouden zijn, om ze voorgoed te rangschikken in de kategorie der staatsbedienden. Op die wijze zouden zij onder de geschreven wet kunnen vallen en tot monogamie kunnen verplicht worden, waar nu nog ongeveer alle „inlandsche hoofden" juist de groote instandhouders en bevorderaars zijn van de veelwijverij. Hadde men daar van in het begin de hand aan gehouden, dan zou de polygamie, in plaats van zich uit te breiden, zoo goed als verdwenen zijn uit de inlandsche samenleving.

5. Splitsing van den klan

Na al wat vooraf werd gezegd, moet het vrij duidelijk schijnen, hoe een autonome klan zich kan splitsen en aldus twee autonome klans vormen.

Wanneer een klan te uitgebreid geworden is, gebeurt het, dat de leden ervan de grenzen der bloedverwantschap overschrijden en dat er fouten voorkomen tegen de exogamie. Wanneer dergelijke fouten zich vermenigvuldigen, wordt er van lieverlede op verdere scheiding aangestuurd, die de huwelijken zal mogelijk maken. Zulke toestand tusschen twee deelen van eenzelfden klan, die naar „juridische autonomie" streven, noemt men lonkosa, naam die aanduidt, dat er nog-ongeoorloofde betrekkingen bestaan tusschen beide. Men vindt ze gewoonlijk tusschen ledengroepen, die wel denzelfden voorvader, maar niet dezelfde „voormoeder" hebben, die dus voortkomen van verschillende vrouwen van denzelfden stichter.

Een andere oorzaak van splitsing ligt in de vrijwillige of verplichte verwijdering van een der leden. Wanneer deze zich in den vreemde vestigt en daar een flinke nakomelingschap verwekt en eigen patrimonium verkrijgt, worden de betrekkingen met den eigen klan schaarscher, de afgescheiden fractie komt er langzamerhand toe kleinere rechtszaken zelf op te lossen, een eigen kerkhof te onderhouden, de navels harer kinderen op eigen woongrond te begraven, een eigen naam aan te nemen en zich op een eigen stichter te beroepen.

Vaak vindt men ook aan den oorsprong dezer verwijdering, de weigering van een zekere fractie van den klan om zich te onderwerpen aan het gezag van de klanleden.

6. Juridische onderhoorigen

Tot hier toe hebben wij enkel van den ethnischen klan gesproken : van de leden, die er door hun afstamming toe behooren. Zij alleen zijn dragers van het gezag (mpifo). Elke klan kan echter ook andere personen opnemen, die buiten de rangorde van het gezag vallen maar juridisch tot den klan behooren. Samen met de echte afstammelingen vormen zij den juridischen klan.

Het zijn in de eerste plaats de ingetrouwde vrouwen met de door haar meegebrachte kinderen (mbusola) en de wettige huishoudsters. Verder de opgenomen kliënten, dan de krijgsgevangenen en slaven, en ten slotte de Pygmoïden. De ingetrouwde vrouwen staan natuurlijk geheel apart ; ook de Pygmoïden, die een heel afzonderlijke huishouding vormen. De anderen worden van lieverlede als kinderen behandeld, krijgen hun deel in de algemeene verantwoordelijkheid en bescherming, hun plaats in de rechtszitting enz. Naarmate zij zich in den schoot van den opnemenden klan ontwikkelen, kunnen zij er een afzonderlijke groep in uitmaken, die meer en meer zelfstandig komt te staan.

7. De moedersklan

Elke Nkundo heeft een dubbel „vaderland" : zijn wise en zijn bonyango. De bonyango is de vadersklan zijner moeder. Daar heeft moeder hem gebaard, daar wonen haar bloedverwanten, die hem met moederlijke liefde ontvangen en zullen beschermen tegen alle moeilijkheden ; daar heeft hij dikwijls een groot deel zijner gelukkigste jeugdjaren doorgebracht ; daar kan hij steeds een veilig onderkomen vinden, wanneer vadersklan hem, om een of andere reden zal ontvallen.

De structuur van den moedersklan is natuurlijk in alles aan die van den vadersklan gelijk. Als wij er hier speciaal over handelen, dan is het dus niet om er den vorm van te bespreken, maar enkel om de specifieke rechten, die elk mensch in zijn moedersklan heeft, aan te duiden.

Zooals alle broers en zusters van vader mijn „vaders" zijn, zoo ook zijn alle broers en zusters van moeder mijn „moeders". Moeders broer, mijn moederlijke oom dus, heet ik ngompame, nyangompame. Alle neven en nichten van moederszijde zijn mijn „kinderen". Een bijzondere band bindt mij dan nog aan de kinderen van de abits mijner moeder, d. w. z. aan de kinderen der vrouw, die in moedersklan werd aangeschaft door middel van den bruidschat, die door mijn wise voor moeder werd gestort. Moeder is immers de Nkolo, de Vrouwe of Meesteres dier kinderen, die mij hun vader noemen.

Zoolang ik in mijn eigen vadersklan blijf wonen, heb ik recht op bijzondere zorg en liefde van moedersklan. Kan ik thuis geen voldoenden bruidschat vinden, dan mag ik altijd bij mijn moederlijke oomen gaan aankloppen, die verplicht zijn mij in de mate van het mogelijke te helpen. Zelfs heb ik recht op den vrijen bruidschat van een der kinderen van moeders nkita. Steeds mag ik tuinen aanleggen en jagen op het grondgebied van mijn bonyango, en zetelen in de rechtszittingen van moedersklan, waar het gaat over de bestemming der vrije bruidswaarden of over de erfenis-verdeeling. Wil ik echter mijn vadersklan verlaten en mij voorgoed in moedersklan vestigen, dan krijg ik in alles den voorrang op mijn neven en nichten en word erfgenaam en klanleider onmiddellijk na mijn moederlijke oomen. Een waarlijk prinselijke vergoeding dus voor de zoogenaamde achteruitstelling der vrouw in de inlandsche samenleving : het kind der zuster (bonankana) herstelt haar glansrijk in eer en rang, die haar toekomen.

8. Aanverwante klan : likilo

Ook buiten mijn vadersklan en buiten mijn moedersklan heb ik nog bloedverwanten : de kinderen nl. van mijn vaderlijke tante en van mijn zusters of nichten, die elk tot den klan van hun eigen vader behooren. Zooals de kinderen van moeders broers mijn kinderen zijn, zoo zijn de kinderen van vaders zuster mijn vaders : ik sta immers in dezelfde verhouding tot de kinderen van moeders broer, als de kinderen van vaders zuster tot mij.

Wat de kinderen mijner zuster betreft, die zijn dus ook mijn echte banankana, en dus de vaders mijner eigen kinderen.

De andere leden der aanverwante klans (die dus géén bloedverwanten zijn) deelen alle, volgens generatie, in den rang der onmiddellijk-aanverwanten : alle „vaders" van echtgenoot zijn „schoonvaders", alle moeders „schoonmoeders", enz. Met dit enkele groote onderscheid, dat de „hoogergeplaatsten" van echtgenoot ook uw „meerderen" zijn. In de opvatting der Nkundo zijn zij alleen de echte aanverwanten. Die van den manskant worden bokilo genoemd, die van den vrouwkant bokanga.

De „ondergeschikten" van echtgenoot zijn geen echte aanverwanten en heeten elkander terecht „man" en „vrouw". In verschillende, juridisch-bepaalde omstandigheden zijn huwelijksbetrekkingen en huwelijken tusschen deze laatsten geoorloofd.

Onnoodig te herhalen, dat alle leden van de wederzijdsche klans deelen in die verhoudingen : de gansche generatie van een klanlid wordt als het ware met dat lid vereenzelvigd, zoodat bijv. alle jongere zusters en nichten van den eenen echtgenoot „vrouwen" worden van alle jongere broers en neven van den anderen echtgenoot. Men moet werkelijk den juridischen zin, het geduld en het palabreerend ontwarringsbeleid hebben van een ouden Nkundo om uit al die verhoudingen wijs te worden. Zij zelf vergelijken die trouwens aan het onontwarbare kluwen der ingewanden van een soort dwergkroko : besofo bya lokekele.

9. Exogamie

De benaming „exogamische klan", die men dikwijls hoort of in geschriften aantreft, is dan ook, ten minste in de Nkundo-Mongo-maatschappij, zeer misleidend. De groep personen, met wie het huwelijk verboden is, maakt geen aaneengesloten geheel uit, het verschilt van persoon tot persoon. Twee halfbroers kunnen denzelfden vadersklan hebben, maar van moedersklan verschillen; zij kunnen één moedersklan hebben en verschillende vadersklans. Voor oudere broers of zusters zijn huwelijken verboden, die voor jongere geoorloofd zijn. De regels verschillen van bloedverwanten tot bloedverwanten, van bloedverwanten met aanverwanten tot bloedverwanten met aanverwanten, van aanverwanten met aanverwanten tot aanverwanten met aanverwanten.

Wil men toch die wet der exogamie in Europeesche termen gieten, dan zou men kunnen zeggen : 1. bloedverwantschap legt huwelijksverbod op zoover de bloedverwantschap erkend wordt. Die erkenning verschilt van klangroep tot klangroep. Soms wordt in éénzelfden juridischen maar uitgebreiden klan reeds inbreuk gemaakt op die erkenning; meestal echter zijn nog verschillende autonome klans, die van eenzelfden verwijderden voorouder afstammen, nog door de wet der exogamie gebonden. Veelal gaan groepen, die denzelfden vader hebben maar van moeder verschillen, het rapst uit elkaar. 2. Aanverwantschap verbiedt het huwelijk zoover de aanverwantschap erkend wordt met ouderen van echtgenooten; zij laat soms het huwelijk toe tusschen jongeren van echtgenooten.

Hierbij zij echter nogmaals aangemerkt, dat de gewoonten van streek tot streek verschillen wat die erkenning betreft, dat bijv. de stiefzoon in vele streken de stiefmoeder kan ten erfhuwelijk bekomen en dat de overtredingen minder streng beoordeeld en gestraft worden naarmate de verboden verhoudingen verder uiteengeloopen zijn.

10. Slotwoord

De Nkundo-maatschappij was een volop-levende organische gemeenschap. Alle organen ervan werkten en wisten zich voortdurend opnieuw aan het groeiende leven aan te passen. Ethnisch, sociaal-juridisch en politiek stond zij open voor elken vooruitgang. De organen, waaruit zij opgebouwd was, stonden het dichtst bij het natuurrecht en haalden daaruit hun rechten en plichten, ook den geest, die ze bezielde.

Dat die maatschappij leefbaar was, bewezen de feiten. Aan de bronnen van de Lomako is zij ontstaan; op korten tijd had zij zich vreedzaam uitgebreid over het heele centrale gebied van Kongo; zij drong oostwaarts over de Lomami en Lualaba, en ten Zuiden over de Kasayi-Sankuru, om bij de komst der Blanken ongeveer een vijfde van het huidige Kongo te bezetten.

Die maatschappij stond open voor alle gezonde invloeden en kon zich aanpassen aan alle redelijke eischen der beschaving. Zij was echter niet overeen te brengen met wat er in onze Europeesche opvattingen over vooruitgang en beschaving juist verkeerd is: uitschakeling van alle ethnische tusschenorganen, gelijkschakeling van alle individuen, vermaterialiseering van alle leven op een ekonomischen concurrentiestrijd, slafelijke onderwerping aan den onpersoonlijken, onvaderlijken Staat, met dien vreeselijken schijn van vrijheid alles te mogen doen wat niet door den Staat is verboden.

Die plotseling verkregen vrijheid, die de afschaffing meebracht van alle vroegere voegsels der maatschappij, is de dood der Nkundo-gemeenschap, niet alleen in haar ziel, haar wezenheid, maar ook in haar bestaan. De geleidelijke ontvolking, de uitsterving van Midden-Kongo heeft zelfs in regeeringskringen nu en dan weerklank gevonden, „De Nkundo-Mongo-bevolking sterft weg als sneeuw voor de zon" is de korte inhoud van het laatste officieel verslag. De Waola van tusschen Ruki en Ikelemba hadden in 1939 negentig overlijdens en drie geboorten. De officieele statistieken 1939 van het territorium van Coquilhatstad geven, tegen honderd volwassenen, 24 kinderen. De officieele gegevens van hetzelfde jaar voor het Vikariaat van Coquilhatstad met zijn 382.736 inwoners, geven een verhouding van 415 kinderen tegenover 1000 volwassenen. Blijkens die gegevens zal de heele bevolking bij de volgende generatie met meer dan 50 % verminderd zijn, dus op meer dan de helft geslonken.

Coquilhatstad 1939.

000

The Economic Life of the Mongo Negro
[Het Economisch Leven van den Mongo-neger]

Th. Gutersohn

Congo, vol. I, i, pp. 92-105

Brussels, 1920

Translated from the Flemish by Richard Neuse

Human Relations Area Files

1959

[title page]

[92] THE ECONOMIC LIFE OF THE MONGO NEGRO

INDUSTRY

241 One might say that nature throws into the lap of the Mongo
461 Negro everything he needs in order to exist so that he does not have 181 to exert himself in the slightest to get it. Generally speaking, he has only to look for his food in the forest, to pick it up from the ground as it were, with the exception of his bananas, manioc roots, and moma (a yam that, if it is prepared well, reminds one of potatoes) which are cultivated by his women. Hence, it is quite natural that one finds little industry among the Mongo, and that the Mongo Negro is not prepared to put the least effort into developing or perfecting in any way that centuries-old industry which already exists.

461 He can eat, and that is the main thing as far as he is concerned.

181 A lazy, inert people, effeminate to the core, each one merely living on the efforts of his many wives and female slaves, cannot have a highly developed industry.

In general, except for hunting which is undertaken primarily by the young men of the village, the Mongo Negro does not bother about anything. Eating, sleeping, looking for and listening to quarrels, carousing at gatherings with sugar-cane beer until they are picked up in a drunken state by their wives (a spectacle one also sees in civilized Europe), this is the dreary, monotonous, drowsy life of the Mongo Negro, one of the least culturally developed but at the same time one of the most highly interesting tribes of the Evenaar district if not of the whole Congo.

He loathes and despises work and is indolence personified.

461 Notwithstanding the extreme idleness of the Mongo [93] people,
462 they do have some of the industry that is necessary for their existence. However, it is on a low level and not widespread. In general, the existing industries are carried on by either the men or the women, and a man will never undertake a job belonging to the women, and vice versa. The work is not done in groups or in family units; where a branch of an industry exists, it is the concern of a single person unless more workers are necessary in order to carry out the work.

463 [177] Division of labor is unknown, and each person works entirely on his own, without the help of a middleman. There are no laborers and certainly no artisans unless there happens to be some artisan or other who learned his trade under the government or at one or other of the Mission posts and has returned to his village after having completed his contract.

As a rule, such people do not find sufficient work in their own villages, and, as they are usually in possession of a few boxes, clothes, and pots and pans which they have acquired with the savings of their monthly salary, they play the grand gentleman in their village until their goods and chattels have been used up and worn out.

"Njolemwa Bosala," he says, "I am tired of work." "Njowa l'ompele," "I am dying of the heavy, difficult work."

Several of ~~them~~ there return to one or the other of the centers of the White settlers and again offer themselves as craftsmen.

554 A good craftsman has a high reputation among the natives, and his social position is even a very good one for a Negro. He is able regularly to supply food for his wife and children and also to get himself clothes.

326 Although most Negroes work individually, this is not true of the smith who has to have helpers in order to do his job.

465 436 Since the Mongo Negro knows nothing of wages, his helpers get part of the income, consisting of mitako [a kind of metal currency] or some part of the work that has been done, either a knife or a lance, or a foot or arm ring.

I. THE SMITH'S TRADE.

326 554 Of the various industrial trades, that of the smith is certainly the first in rank. The smith is one of the leading people [94] in the village and one of the inevitable persons to have a decisive voice in village affairs whether in settling differences or in meetings.

In fact, the smith is the only one of the Mongo Negroes who works regularly and does not rest on his oars. From what he earns he is able to buy quite a number of wives, and he is regarded as one of the village heads whose wishes must be consulted.

326 521 571 Whereas with us the village inn is the place where the affairs of the week are noisily debated, it is at the smithy where the Mongo Negroes congregate. There the elders gather -- the younger men have no voice here; there the various differences about (or among) wives and the impending taxes are discussed; amidst the billows of smoke -- drawn with deep puffs out of their huge bamboo pipes -- the smith is the only one who works on and earns his living nobly.

326 428 The smith is the most judicious craftsman among the Mongo Negroes.

His trade is practically the only one which is a family affair and is passed on from father to son. If a smith does not have any children, the business is taken over by his younger brother.

This right of inheritance is by no means general in the other trades; the trade of the smith is inherited while the others are taken up by any Tom, Dick, or Harry who happens to have a liking for them.

325 348 The smithy where the smith plies his trade is a wide oblong dark hut (about five meters by ten meters) built alongside the public highway. In contrast with the other dwellings of the Negroes, the floors of which are generally built about 20 centimeters above the road, the floor of the smithy is dug out from 30 to 70 centimeters below the level of the road so that one goes down a step from the road into the smithy.

The reason why the floor of the smithy should be dug out in this way is not quite clear to me, but most probably it is to prevent the danger of fire when the storm winds that accompany the heavy tropical rains sweep through the huts. By digging out the floor in this way, an earthen enclosure about half a meter high is formed around the smithy, and this protects the smith from the wind and enables him to continue quietly at work.

325 In spite of the primitiveness of his tools [95] and the primitive manipulation of them, the smith knows how to get what he needs from his implements. The forge (lotulu) is constructed as follows: a block of wood is cut about 60 centimeters long, 40 centimeters wide, and 30 centimeters high, with a hollow pipe, half a meter long, connected to it. This is all formed of one piece. With the aid of a banana stalk, on which the clay is moulded, a smith's pipe is formed. The banana stalk is removed from the clay, and the hollow pipe (boongo) remains. Two, sometimes four, bellows (njasa) are placed on the 325 wooden block. These bellows have the openings covered with the dried hide of some wild animal to which piston rods (biongonga) have been attached. The "biongonga" are pushed up and down in quick tempo by two men to make the draft that fans the little charcoal fire.

In front of the "boongo" the smith (botuli) has dug a kind of trench in which the little charcoal fire is laid. In this fire the iron ore, European iron, and copper sticks (njele-mitakos) are smelted.

Botuli atula la lotulo: "The smith forges with the forge."

325 439 In former times when it was not possible for the Mongo to get European iron, iron ore (bikense bia bokili) was dug out of the forest and heated to melting point in the smithy. Impurities which came to the top were skimmed off, and in this manner the Mongo Negro got his iron. Today, now that the Negro can get his iron so easily from the various trading-posts, he prefers to work with European iron. The imported iron makes a better product, and the Negro no longer has to take the trouble of going to look for his ore. Indeed, the Mongo smith would no longer be able to dispose of lances made of native iron ore because the imported iron is so much better.

325 The implements the smith uses are as follows.

1. Boengwa: the small pounding iron.
2. Loaka: the large pounding iron.
3. Etulaka: the sledgehammer.
4. Eala: the anvil.
5. Lingwata: a hammer which is very much like a European hammer and serves the same purpose.
6. Kongwa: a split stick used to get the hot iron out of the fire and to hold it tightly during the forging.

An iron [96] ring or a piece of liana is placed around the split stick and pushed down to hold the hot object as tightly as possible while it is being forged.

7. Loseno: chisel.
8. Losio: small chisel fastened on a stick, with which the decorations on knives, lances, and rings are carved.
9. Jyoka: the implement chest, a nicely finished box with a lid and a European lock.

000 The objects of iron made by the Mongo smith are as follows.

326 The objects of iron made by the Mongo smith are as follows.
411

Bibui: all that is of iron

1. Likula: arrow.
2. Bosuki: arrow for hunting pigs; also used to cut copal and spear fish.
3. Bongelo: lance.
4. Ifombolo: lance.
5. Mpokwankoi: lance.
6. Liswa: axe.

Jokula: knives

326
412 1. Mombi; 2. Boli; 3. Bolengwa; 4. Lingonda; 5. Limenga;
6. Likodzi; 7. Efamba; 8. Momba; 9. More little knives;
10. Lizangi.

Basongo: needles

1. Ingwala.
2. Lokili: tattooing needle. [413]
3. Jyolo: small needle to get flea beetles out of the feet.
4. Efoli: small pin.

Ngonga: bells

326
534
306
[789]

1. Ngonga ea tosisi: bells worn on the hips by women and children so that as they walk the ringing will keep away the evil spirits.
2. Bongonga: a bell attached to the point of a war-lance which makes it like the head of a walking-stick but upside down.
3. Lingwete: little round bell worn on the wrist by men.
4. Elondza ea itumba: the war-bell. An oblong pipe [97] in the form of a long cup attached to a stick. It is struck with a piece of soft wood, and the sound travels surprisingly far.

These bells are all made of wrought iron.

326 The native smith works not only with iron but also with copper which he melts down in the same manner from copper sticks (longele: mitako) and old, worn copper rings.

[439, 435] The copper sticks, that nowadays sell at 30 for a franc, come from Europe; copper ore is unknown here.

The copper objects made by the smith are as follows.

326 301 Bakonga: all that is of copper

1. Bongombwa: necklace, often weighing ten kilograms or more; value, 1,000 mitako.
2. Lokolo: leg ring, weighing four to six kilograms and more; value, 200 to 500 mitako.
3. Bolongu: arm ring, not heavy.
4. Ingwete: arm ring, not heavy.
5. Bongenza: leg ring that rattles when the wearer walks.
6. Bosankere: leg ring.
7. Limpala: great leg rings in spiral form, twisted out of thick copper wire, which cover the whole of the lower leg. They [435] bear much resemblance to the springs in a mattress. Among the Negroes these have a value of 500 mitako.

8. Bompulenge: resembling a small limpala, these were formerly worn on the arms by old people, but they are now out of fashion and no longer made.

326 554 In the whole district there is only one smith, a certain Elumbu in the village Lilangi (Basankusu), who knows how to make copper bells.

This Black is a celebrity to every Mongo Negro.

According to the Negroes, there is a smith, a certain Bokedzu from the vicinity of the Ikelemba River, who knew how to put a new rifle together from the parts of old broken ones and did so successfully. According to the Negroes, the government agent, however, took the rifle away from him, but in my opinion, and in that of others, this black [577] rifle manufacturer belongs in the realm of fable, the more so as a Negro is not at all afraid of a lie.

[98]

II CARPENTRY.

335 Carpentry plays an important part in the life of the Mongo Negro. The primitive utensils in his house as well as his canoe and his lokole (the Negro telephone with which he spreads his thoughts from village to village) are made of wood.

The making of the canoe and the lokole takes a great deal of work.

The Canoe.

313 396 The following three kinds of wood, namely, (1) Bokeswa, (2) Lifake, (3) Bomposo, make a good canoe, especially Bokeswa. This tree is much sought after because its wood makes a strong, light canoe.

The Negro who wants a canoe goes into the forest, picks out a nice slender tree, brings out his axe, and fells at his leisure the tree he has chosen. He hacks off the unnecessary branches and hollows the tree out in the rough form of the canoe. (Aulema watu: he shapes the canoe.)

[474] He calls some of his friends together, and they proceed, for payment, of course (nothing for nothing, says the Negro), to hollow out the tree.

396 When they have finished hollowing out the tree, the owner of the canoe calls the wongiwa biatu, the proper canoe maker, a heavy man and one of some account among his fellow villagers. This wongiwa biatu gives a nice, slender form to the canoe with his axe, planes it off nicely, and with the help of the esuwa, a small axe, marks off the edge of the canoe with sharp, short, regular grooves.

483 476 Often the Negroes make their canoes hours away from the nearest water. In order to transport it, they place sticks on the ground and draw the canoe over them. In addition to a number of strong men, all the spes patriae [hope of the fatherland] of the village help with this task. They get a mitako as a reward and feel themselves on top of the world.

396 476 The canoe maker is well paid, the price reckoned according to the size of the canoe. Several dogs are slaughtered at the expense of

376 the owner, and everyone who has helped gets his share according to
476 the amount of work he has done. [99] Frequently a big sugar-cane
[273] beer spree is started, where disgusting scenes often take place until finally the drunken men are taken home by their wives. In civilized Europe it is sometimes not much better.

501 Boats are made just large enough for two men, as well as others sufficient for a hundred or even a hundred and fifty men. The big war canoes of the great chief Evoloko of Waka and of the former chief of Bandaka, a certain Isempoko, are known throughout the region. The war canoe of the latter was said to hold a hundred and fifty men, and the edge of this canoe to reach up to the shoulders of a fairly tall Negro. The ordinary canoe in which Whites travel is, as a rule, sufficiently large for twenty to thirty oarsmen.

435 The prices of canoes vary, according to size and strength, from 200 to 10,000 mitako.

The Lokole

202 The lokole plays a very large part in the life of the Negro. Without the lokole, the life of the Negro would be inconceivable.

The lokole can be best described as the public telephone with which the Negro makes his thoughts known publicly from village to village.

The lokole is to the Negro what the trumpet signal is to the soldier.

The lokole calls the men to meetings, to war, and to the hunt; the lokole calls all the people, great and small, to the dance. During the dance it is the loyal accompanist until deep in the night; its monotonous sound brings the enthusiasm of the dancers almost to the point of frenzy.

The Negro telephones his friends at great distances and explains what he wants. If two Negroes from the same village or from different villages have a quarrel, they abuse each other over the lokole, and the whole world is kept fully up-to-date on the details of the dispute. Each one tries to blacken the reputation of the other in the eyes of the other villagers. If someone dies in the village, it is proclaimed everywhere the whole night through, by means of the lokole, that 202 so-and-so has died. Hours before his actual death, people everywhere know that a certain person is on his deathbed and that his death is imminent.

[100] If the witch doctor is up to his tricks of duping the silly Negro, people everywhere around know just what nonsense he is performing at what moment.

The White announces his morning and midday orders by means of the lokole and tells his workers when they may cease work for the day by the same means.

In the mornings and evenings and in the case of wet weather, the lokole carries especially far, but in the full sun it is not so effective.

242 534 The lokole is a large block of wood which is split down the middle for almost the whole of its length, and the inside part is carefully hollowed out. The lokole has the shape of an extra long, open mussel shell although, in general, the outside edges are flattened out.

322 The making of lokole is the trade of a certain person, and some Negroes are well-known for the lokole they have made.

Only four kinds of wood are suitable for the making of a lokole. [illegible] These are (1) Bokungu; (2) Likoso; (3) Bolondo; and (4) Isi. The last is the most excellent kind of wood and the one used by the Mongo [illegible] Negro to manufacture his "ngula" (red dye) with which he smears his body for even the least important event that occurs in his village. The Isi is probably a species of redwood. The Mongo Negro makes 322 534 five different lokole: (1) Ingonga, small in shape; (2) lokole ja losali, medium size; (3) bongungu, large lokole. These three are all like the one described above. They are struck with sticks (bosolu) from the "momambo" tree (umbrella tree). (4) Bonkuka is the large, high lokole that is struck with two sticks to the ends of which are attached several balls of caoutchouc. The sound of these lokole carries for the greatest distance. (5) Ngomo is the large, oblong, upright dance lokole. This lokole is simply a large, oblong piece of wood, completely hollowed out, decorated a little, about 1.25 meters high, and covered at the top with a piece of dried antelope or leopard skin. It is struck with the fingers and the palm of the hand. This lokole is the well-known tom-tom, still used by the Negroes on the steamboats to announce their arrival in the villages along the river.

202 178 And now something about lokole language.

The beat of the lokole varies, and it is by this means that the Negroes [101] understand the different words. The tempo varies also,

202 198 The White hears only the difference in tempo, nothing more. The Negro miles away understands what is being telephoned.

The lokole language consists chiefly of metaphors and is thus not intelligible to any White in the whole of the Congo. The Negroes are proud of their invention and also pleased that the White, who otherwise can do everything, is not able to understand their lokole.

Every man has his own name (nkombo) on the lokole with which he makes himself known. Because such a name often covers several lines of script, chiefly expressed in metaphors giving facts of the public life of the Negro concerned, it would be a physical impossibility for a White to master the lokole language in the way a Negro does. Actually, not even all Negroes understand the art of beating the lokole.

The women have a general name; beating the lokole is only for [462] the men, and no woman understands the art. The women understand what is being broadcast when the lokole is beaten, but they cannot beat it themselves. Moreover, they would be ashamed to attempt it; this is no task for a woman, and they would be laughed at. The lokole name, or nkombo, of the woman is as follows:

Bali la tolombo basalaki lisala, basalaki tomboloko, tond' al' isusu, befambe eka lisala.

"Women in numbers, worked the garden, prepared much to eat, consisting of bananas, to eat out of the garden."

A White, personally, has no nkombo of his own on the lokole, but to announce the arrival of a White in a village, the following is spread around far and wide:

Lolema ja lifeka feka, esongo etenaka nkola.

"The bat flies about everywhere, the pin wounds the nails of the feet."

With "the bat flies about everywhere" is to be understood the government agent who goes from village to village collecting the taxes. "The pin wounds the nails of the feet" means that, just as [726] the Negroes go on the warpath with sharp pointed sticks dipped in poison to wound the enemies' feet, the government agent is always on his rounds with his rifle, ready for the fray.

The nkombo of the Catholic missionary is as follows: [102]

(1) Bansele mele ba nkanga; (2) bofala boki ndaki lisako nda lokombo; (3) etafe bolo; (4) benanga bekendaka la mpera.

202 198 Bamsele msele ba [illegible]nga. "The one always screaming who is followed into the high gr[illegible], the strong branch, the districts go along with the priest (Father).

1. The missionary is seen here as a witch doctor (bamsele msele ba nkanga is a general lokole name for the Negro witch doctor), who, like the Negro doctor, is looked upon as a doctor and a priest.

2. Bofala boki ndaki lisako nda lokombe [sic]. The priest, because he is always seeking converts everywhere, is here compared with an antelope which, when it is followed, runs around and around in the high grass.

3. Etafe bolo. The missionary is here compared with a strong branch. He is strong because he is influential and highly regarded by the Negroes.

4. Benanga bekendaka la mpera. The districts all go along with the Father (priest). They all follow his instructions.

The nkombo of the Protestant Anglican missionary is as follows: Bofanga sembola bonanga boso nkenda l'Inglese.

"The fishing net is spread out; the country goes along with the Englishman."

In the same way as the fishing net cordons off a part of the river and everything is caught in it, so all the people go along with the Englishman. The Protestant Anglican missionary was in this district [147] before the arrival of the Catholic missionary, so this nkombo refers, of course, to this period. Since the arrival of the Catholic missionary, the situation has changed completely in this district.

These few examples give an indication of the difficulty in understanding the lokole language.

352 322 In addition, the Negro makes a few chairs, the most important of which is the lyeko la mpaka, the chair for the elder, a three-legged affair with two props under it, topped with a piece out of the umbrella tree; into this the elder can throw himself as lazily as he wishes.

Then there is the so-called ebonga, a little stool chopped out of a block of wood with the native axe. This is finished off attractively with an esumwa, a small paring chisel, and the seat is decorated around the edge with studs which have been bought in some factory or other.

352
322 [103] Occasionally one sees a native stool, made as described above, but with a kind of back rest chopped out of one piece.

342
177 The Negro who wishes to move with the times makes for his house a chair out of bamboo in the European style: some sticks stuck in the ground, a mat of split bamboo laid over them, and the gentleman can spend his days in dolce far niente [pleasant idleness].

352
322 A table made in the same way (otherwise unknown to the Negro) completes the furnishing of his hut.

One does not need to be an expert, either, in order to be able to make a Negro bed. Some straight sticks are chopped out of the mombambo (umbrella tree). These are placed lengthwise and then across, on top of each other, trimmed a bit at the edges so that the whole thing fits more or less, and it is then bound together with some split lianas. In this way the Negro has made a bed; this favorite piece of furniture is finished for a sale price of 5 to 10 mitako. [435]

[438] The making of beds could be classed among the Mongo trades. I once saw, in the interior, ten of these beds, large and small spread out along the side of the road for sale.

I was assured that the owner of the beds was the very best bedmaker of the village. Of course, I raised my hat to such an important personage.

The ekoba, the bed stool, is also indispensable. These ekoba take the place of our pillows and are made of one piece, formed to the shape of the head. It is a somewhat hard pillow, but the Negro head is hard and can put up with it; the fellow sleeps without having to be rocked.

322
252 To prepare his food he needs some mortars and pestles, and these are made of wood. He uses hardwood for these utensils so that the mortars do not wear away from the constant pounding.

322
534 In addition, the Negro makes his oars, his bow and arrows for the hunt, and the lokombi. The lokombi is a flat, oblong, hollowed block of wood over which some pegs are stretched [sic]. He plucks these with his fingers, thus producing a monotonous sound. This so-called musical instrument is the constant companion of the young man and accompanies him on his long treks through the Evenaar forest and on his visits to friends and acquaintances.

[104]

III. WEAVING

286 The craft of the Mongo weaver is an honorable one and one that calls for much labor and attentiveness.

[177] Weaving is no longer as much in vogue as it was in earlier times, because the younger people buy European materials. However, the weaver is still able to earn his daily bread comfortably, because [541] the old people are too pagan to give up their old ingrained habit of wearing a loin cloth.

[462] Weaving is a craft carried on by men only. Some are very skillful in the weaving of materials and command our admiration. Pieces of really beautiful workmanship were offered to us for sale; I had myself seen them being woven.

286 314 The weaver takes his knife, goes into the forest, and cuts the "mpekwa ia lifeke," the fibers of a certain kind of palm tree which he also sometimes plants on the open highway near his hut. As soon as he has sufficient fibers for the weaving he has in mind, he goes home and at his leisure scrapes the fibers with his knife until they are all of the same thickness.

286 After that he leaves them in the sun to dry. When they have dried sufficiently, he puts up in his hut or on the open highway the frame on which the fibers are to be hung.

After he has attached the fibers to the top cross-bar (they are bound between the top and bottom cross-bars), he holds down the bottom cross-bar with his foot and goes to work.

Often he uses fibers of different colors, and this gives a lovely effect to the piece of material.

Bofomi afom'eto, "the weaver is weaving material."

386 314 The weaver has a very simple way of giving the fibers their different colors.

From the forest he fetches a liana (longoli) which contains the red, white, or black coloring agent, cuts it in pieces, puts them in a banana leaf which has been quickly scorched in the fire, adds some water and hangs all this, with the fibers, in a bag of banana leaves above the fire. When the dye has soaked thoroughly into the fibers, he has his colored fibers all ready [105] for the material he is about to weave. This mixture is called "bosaka."

Rope-making

283 The Mongo rope-maker (one can hardly call him a professional rope-maker) goes to the forest, fetches fibers from a certain kind of palm-tree, scrapes them nicely with his knife, and puts them in the sun to dry.

Whole coils of rope are made in this way. Native rope, finished in this manner, is of a good, strong quality. Nets for the hunt and also for fishing are made of it. As in the case of weaving, it is something done by the men only.

IV. BASKET AND MAT WEAVING

285 The weaving of baskets and mats is chiefly the work of the women, 462 especially the fine braidwork.

The men make only the large, roughly finished baskets needed for the transport of their copal. The braiding of mats is done only by the women.

285 From the forest they fetch the twigs of the Bolongoto tree, 381 scrape them nicely or dry them in the sun, and, sitting down, braid their baskets and mats.

They make different kinds of baskets, but the raw materials necessary for braiding are the bokombe or likombe of the Bolongoto tree.

285 One or two women together braid the mats on the flat ground. The names of the mats are as follows.

[435] 1. Efonzolo, the roughly finished mat (value, five mitakos).

2. Nkongole, the finely braided mat (value, half a franc).

3. Irundo or lofole, the little mat with which the dirt from the road and the ashes from the fire are carried away.

4. Ilefa, the little mat used to fan the fire.

A. Th. Gutersohn,
Priest of St. Joseph's Congregation,
(Mill-Hill).

4: Gutersohn FO32 Mongo

CONGO

REVUE GÉNÉRALE DE LA COLONIE BELGE

ALGEMEEN TIJDSCHRIFT DER BELGISCHE KOLONIE

TABLE DES MATIÈRES

(1920. Tome I et II)

ARTICLES DE FOND

Wahis (Lt général baron). La participation belge à la conquête du Cameroun et de l'Afrique Orientale allemande. . . Tome I, page 1.
L. Philippart. L'organisation sociale dans le Bas-Congo. I, 45, 221, 503. II, 20.
Edm. Leplae. La situation de l'agriculture au Congo Belge . . . . I, 67, 201, 481. II, 14, 305.
Th. Gutersohn. Het Economisch leven van den Mongo-Neger. . I, 97.
A. Verbeken. Le tambour téléphone chez les indigènes de l'Afrique centrale . . . . I, 213.
Léo Bittremieux. Mayombsche Sprookkelingen . . . . I, 265.
Van Leeuw. Les Chemins de fer du Congo . . . . I, 296.
Ed. De Jonghe. A propos des « Primitifs ». . . . . I, 314.
J. Sin. Inlandsch huwelijk bij de Bakongo, rond Boma . . . . I, 320.
Th. Simar. A propos de politique coloniale. . . . . I, 327.
E. De Wildeman. Le « Niando » succédané du chanvre au Congo Belge . . . . I, 334.
J. Maes. Le Ngula au Congo Belge . . . . I, 339.
de Briey (Comte R.). Musinga . . . . II, 1.
Th. Heyse. Les concessions de terres rurales au Congo Belge . II, 18.
Al. Janssens. Negerpoëzie. . . . . II, 61.
J. Pieraerts. Une acanthacée oléagineuse du Congo Belge. . II, 98.
F. Delhaye et M. Sluys. Les calcaires du Bas-Congo. . . . . II, 109.
E. Henry. L'agriculture au Congo . . . . II, 223.
J. Van Wing. Nzo Longo ou les rites de la puberté chez les Bakongo . . . . II, 229.
L. Bittremieux. Mayombsch Reisboek . . . . II, 247.
Rutten. Notes de démographie congolaise. . . . . II, 260.
E. Boglemans. Onderlinge hulp. . . . . II, 270.
Ed. De Jonghe. L'ethnologie, son objet, sa méthode . . . . . . II, 279.

[title page]

Het Economisch Leven van den Mongo-neger.

NIJVERHEID.

Vermits de natuur den Mongo-neger zijn benoodigdheden om te bestaan als het ware in zijn schoot werpt, zonder dat hij de minste moeite er voor doet, daar hij in hoofdzaak zijn voedsel slechts behoeft te zoeken in 't bosch en als 't ware op te rapen van den grond, met uitzondering van zijn bananen, maniokwortels en moma (een igname, die, goed bereid, aan aardappelen doet denken) die zijn vrouwen aanplanten, is het geheel natuurlijk dat men in den Mongo zeer weinig nijverheid vindt en de Mongo-neger zich de minste moeite niet getroost de reeds van eeuwen herwaarts bestaande nijverheid eenigzins te bevorderen en te vervolmaken

Hij heeft toch te bikken en dit is hoofdzaak voor hem.

Bij een lui, vadsig volk, verwijfd in merg en been, en slechts levend van het werk zijner veelvuldige vrouwen en slavinnen kan de nijverheid niet op hoog peil staan.

Over 't algemeen genomen met uitzondering van de jacht, die nog hoofdzakelijk gedreven wordt door de jonge mannen van het dorp, bekommert de Mongo-neger zich om niets. Eten, slapen en geschillen zoeken en aanhooren, op suikerrietbiervergaderingen medefuiven, totdat ze door moeder de vrouw worden meegepakt in beschonken toestand (tooneelen, die men in beschaafd Europa ook wel ziet) ziehier het saaie, eentonige, verslappende leven van den Mongo-neger, één der laagst staande, doch tevens één der hoogst belanginboezemende stammen van het Evenaardistrict, zoo niet van gansch Kongo-land.

Van werken walgt hij, daar heeft hij minstens een dozijn broertjes aan dood; hij is de aartsluilak in persoon.

Niettegenstaande de verregaande vadsigheid van het Mongo-volk bestaat er toch nijverheid, noodig voor hun bestaan, ofschoon op laag peil en weinig verspreid. Over 't algemeen beperkt de bestaande nijverheid zich tot 't mannelijke of 't vrouwelijk geslacht en een man zal nooit 't ambt, eigen aan de vrouwen ter hand nemen en omgekeerd. Het werk wordt niet gedaan bij groepen of per familie, doch waar een tak van nijverheid bestaat, is dit het werk van een enkel persoon tenzij meer werkkrachten noodzakelijk verlangd worden om het werk te kunnen uitvoeren.

Verdeeling van het werk is onbekend en een ieder werkt geheel op zich zelven, zonder de hulp van een tusschenpersoon. Werklui zijn niet bekend, laat staan handwerklieden, tenzij een of andere ambachtsman, die een ambacht leerde bij den Staat of op een of anderen Missiepost en terugkeerde naar zijn dorp na zijn contract afgedaan te hebben.

Als regel vinden deze in hun eigen dorpen geen voldoende werk en meestal in bezit zijnde van eenige kisten, kleêren en wat potten en pannen, overgehouden van hun maandelijksch salaris, spelen zij den grooten Mijnheer in hun dorp, totdat al hun hebben en houden opgeteerd en versleten is.

Njolemwa Bosala zegt hij, ik ben het werken zat. Njowa l'ompele, ik sterf van 't zware, moeilijke werk.

Verscheidenen gaan dan weer naar een of ander middenpunt van de blanken en bieden zich weder als ambachtslieden aan.

Een goed ambachtsman staat nog al hoog aangeschreven onder de inboorlingen en zijn sociale positie is voor een neger zelfs zeer goed te noemen. Hij kan zich geregeld het voedsel voor vrouw en kinderen aanschaffen en steekt zich in de kleêren.

Ofschoon de meeste negers individueel werken, kan dit niet gezegd worden van den smid, die andere werkkrachten ter hulp moet roepen om zijn werk te kunnen verrichten.

Wijl de Mongo-neger geen gedacht heeft van salaris, krijgen zijn medehelpers een deel der verdiensten, bestaande in mitakos, of een of ander gedeelte van het geleverde werk, hetzij een mes, lans of voet- of armring.

I. — 'T SMIDSVAK.

Van de verschillende takken van nijverheid staat zeker het smidsvak bovenaan. De smid is een der voornaamste personen van het dorp en met dorpsaangelegenheden, hetzij geschillen, vergaderingen, is hij een der aangewezen personen om zijn stem in de weegschaal te leggen.

De smid is feitelijk de eenigste onder de Mongo-negers, die geregeld door blijft werken en niet op zijn lauweren gaat rusten. Door zijn verdiensten heeft hij zich nog al wat vrouwen aan weten te koopen en wordt hij beschouwd als één der dorpshoofden, die men naar de oogen moet zien.

Wat bij ons de dorpsherberg is waar men de dorpsaangelegenheden van de week luidvoerig bespreekt, is de smidse bij den Mongo-neger. In de smidse verzamelen zich de ouderlingen, — de jongeren hebben niks in de melk te brokkelen; daar worden de veelvuldige vrouwengeschillen en de aanstaande belastingen besproken; onder 't zwelgen van de rook, — uit hun reusachtige bamboepijpen met diepe trekken getrokken, — is de smid de eenige, die doorwerkt en zijn kost op nobele wijze verdient.

De smid is de meest tactvolle ambachtsman onder de Mongo.

't Ambacht van den smid is ongeveer 't eenige ambacht dat eigen is aan de familie en van vader tot zoon wordt voortgezet. Laat de smid geen kinderen na, dan zal zijn jongere broeder de zaak overnemen.

Van andere ambachten kan dit erfrecht geenszins gezegd worden; 't ambacht van den smid is erfelijk, terwijl de andere ambachten onwillekeurig door Jan en alleman, die er zijn genoegen in vindt, worden opgenomen.

De smidse waarin de smid zijn ambacht uitoefent, is een breede langwerpige donkere hut, (ongeveer 5 m. bij 10 m.) gebouwd langs den openbaren weg. Ongelijk aan de overige woonhutten der negers, waarvan de vloer in den regel een 20 c. m. hooger ligt dan de weg, is de vloer van de smidse een 30, 70 c. m. diep uitgegraven, zoodat men van den weg in de smidse stapt.

Met welk gedachte de vloer der smidse is uitgegraven kan ik niet zeker zeggen, doch hoogstwaarschijnlijk om bij 't opkomen van stormwinden, die bij 't opzetten van een zware tropischen regen de hutten doorvagen, brandgevaar te voorkomen. Door 't uitgraven van den vloer ontstaat een 1/2 m. hooge omheining van aarde rondom de smidse, waardoor de smid buiten den wind zit en zoodoende rustig kan doorwerken.

Niettegenstaande de primitieve inrichting der werktuigen en de primitieve behandeling daarvan, weet de smid van zijn werktuigen toch gedaan te krijgen, hetwelk hij er van vereischt. De smidse (lotulu) is als volgt opgesteld : Een blok hout, terlengte van ongeveer een 60 cm.; 40 cm. breed; 30 cm. hoog, wordt uitgehakt; een 1/2 m. lange, holle buis is daaraan verbonden; dit alles is gevormd uit één stuk. Door middel van een banaanstronk, waarlangs klei is opgehoogd vormt men een smidbuis. De banaanstronk wordt uit de klei getrokken en de holle klei-buis (boongo) ontstaat. Op 't blok hout worden de twee, ook vier windzakken (njasa) geplaatst. Deze windzakken zijn de gaten overdekt met de gedroogde huid van een of ander wild beest, waarin de bedrijfstokken (biongonga) vastgebonden zijn. Deze « biongonga » worden door twee mannen op en neer gehaald in een vlug tempo; deze handeling veroorzaakt de wind en het vuurtje gemaakt van houtskool aan te wakkeren.

Voor de « boongo » heeft de smid (bo'uli) een soort loopgraaf gegraven, waar het aan te vlammen houtskoolvuurtje ligt. In dit vuurtje worden het ijzererts, Europeesch ijzer en de koperstaafjes (njele-mitakos) gesmolten.

Botuli atula la lotulo : De smidt smeedt met de smidse.

In vroeger tijden, toen men in de Mongo het Europeesch ijzer niet machtig kon worden werd het ijzererts (bikense bia bokili) uit 't boschopgegraven en in de smidse tot vloeistof verhit. De onreinheden die boven dreven werden er afgeschept en zoodoende verkreeg de Mongo-neger zijn ijzer. In tegenwoordige tijden, nu de neger zijn ijzer zoo gemakkelijk bij de verschillende factorijen kan verkrijgen, verkiest hij 't Europeesch ijzer te bewerken. 't Ingevoerde ijzer geeft betere waar en de neger behoeft geen moeite meer te doen zijn ijzererts te gaan zoeken. Trouwens zou de Mongo-smid lansen gemaakt van ijzererts niet meer kwijt raken, wijl het ingevoerde ijzer veel beter is.

De werktuigen van den smid zijn als volgt :

1. Boengwa : 't kleine stampijzer.
2. Loaka : 't groote stampijzer.
3. Etaleka : 't smeedijzer.
4. Eele : aambeeld.
5. Lingwata : een op een Europeeschen hamer gelijkende hamer, die voor 't zelfde doel dienst doet.
6. Kongwa : een gespleten stok om 't heete ijzer uit het vuur te halen en vast tehouden onder 't smeden. Een ijzeren ringetje of een stukje liaan wordt om den gespleten stok gelegd en wordt bij het vasthouden van 't heete voorwerp dichtgeschoven, zoodat het te smeden voorwerp beter bevestigd zit.

7. Loseno : beitel.

8. Losio : kleine beitel bevestigd in een stok waarmede men de versieringen op messen, lansen en ringen kerft.

9. Jyoka : de gereedschapskist bestaande uit een mooi afgewerkt kistje met deksel, waarop een Europeesch slot.

De ijzeren voorwerpen door den Mongo-smid vervaardigd zijn als volgt :

Bibui : alles wat ijzer is.

1. Likula : pijl.

2. Bosuki : pijl voor de varkensjacht en die ook gebruikt wordt om de kopal te steken en visch te spiehten.

3. Bongelo : lans.

4. Ifombolo : lans.

5. Mpokwankoi : lans.

6. Litwa : bijl.

Jokula : messen.

1. Mombi; 2. Boli; 3. Bolengwa; 4. Lingonda; 5. Limenga; 6. Likodẓi; 7. Efamba; 8. Momba; 9. Verders kleine mesjes; 10. Liẓangi.

Basongo : steeknaalden.

1. Ingwala.

2. Lokili : naald om te tatoueeren.

3. Jyolo : kleine steeknaald om de aardvlooien uit de voeten te halen.

4. Efoli : kleine steeknaald.

Ngonga : bellen.

1. Ngonga ea tosisi : bellen gedragen door vrouwen en kinderen om de lendenen opdat hun geklingel, veroorzaakt met loopen, de slechte geesten weghoudt.

2. Bongonga : bel verbonden aan de punt van den strijdlans, gelijk de kop van een wandelstok, doch ten onderste boven.

3. Lingwete : rond belletje gedragen door de mannen aan den pols.

4. Elondẓa ea itumba : de strijdklok. Een langwerpige bois in den vorm van een langen kelk vastgehecht aan een stok. Men slaat er met een zacht stuk hout tegen en 't geluid verspreidt zich verbazend ver.

Deze bellen zijn allen gemaakt van gesmeed ijzer.

De inlandsche smid bewerkt niet alleen het ijzer, doch ook het koper dat hij op dezelfde manier uit koperen staafjes (longele : mitako) en oude, versleten, koperen ringen samensmelt. De koperen staafjes hier een geldswaarde vertegenwoordigend van 30 voor een frank zijn van Europa afkomstig en kopererts is hier onbekend.

De koperen voorwerpen door den smid vervaardigd zijn als volgt :

Bakonga : alles wat koper is.

1. Bongombwa : nekring, dikwijls ter zwaarte van 10 kilogram en daarboven. Waarde 1,000 mitakos.
2. Lokolo : beenring, zwaarte 4-6 kilogram, en daarboven; waarde 200-500 mitakos.
3. Bolongu : armring, niet zwaar.
4. Ingwete : armring, niet zwaar.
5. Bongenza : beenring, die bij 't loopen rammelt.
6. Bozankere : beenring.
7. Limpala : groote beenringen, spiraalvormig, gedraaid uit dik koperdraad en 't gansche onderbeen bedekkend; de veeren uit een matras lijken er veel op. Onder de negers een waarde van 500 mitakos vertegenwoordigend.
8. Bompulenge : gelijk een kleine limpala, die vroeger door de ouderen van dagen aan de armen werden gedragen, doch thans niet meer gemaakt worden en uit de mode zijn.

In de geheele streek is slechts één smid bekend, een zekere Elumbu van het dorp Lilangi (Basankusu), die koperen bellen weet te maken.

Door ieder Mongo-neger wordt deze zwarte als een grootheid geroemd.

Volgens zeggen der negers moet er een smid wezen, een zekere Bokedru uit de buurt van de Ikelembarivier, die van eenige stukkene geweren weder een nieuw in elkander wist te zetten hetwelk goed afging. Volgens de negers pakte de Staatsagent hem echter het geweer af, doch volgens mijn en anderen meening, temeer wijl een neger voor een leugen niet vervaard is, behoort deze zwarte geweerfabrikant tot den tijd der sagen thuis.

II. — DE HOUTBEWERKING.

De houtbewerking neemt een voorname plaats in het leven van den Mongo-neger in; zoowel zijn primitief huisraad als zijn kano en zijn lokole (de negertelefoon, waarmede hij zijn gedachten van dorp tot dorp bekend maakt) bewerkt hij uit hout.

Het vervaardigen van de kano en de lokole nemen nog al veel werk in beslag.

De kano.

De drie volgende houtsoorten namelijk : 1. Bokeswa; 2. Lifake; 3. Bomposo maken een goede kano; vooral verkiest men de Bokeswa. Deze boom wordt zeer gezocht, wijl uit dit hout de sterke, lichtvarende kano wordt vervaardi,d.

De neger, die een kano wil hebben trekt het bosch in, zoekt een mooien, slanken boom uit, haalt zijn bijl voor den dag en hakt op z'n gemak den uitgezochten boom om. Hij hakt de overvloedige takken er af en geeft den ruwen vorm aan de kano. (Aulema watu : hij vormt de kano.)

Hij roept eenigen zijner vrienden bij elkander, die, natuurlijk tegen betaling (niets voor niets, zegt de neger) den gevallen boom uithollen.

Zijn ze klaar met 't uithollen van den boom, dan roept de eigenaar van de kano, den Wongi wa biatu, den eigenlijken kanomaker, een man van gewicht en nog al in tel bij zijn dorpelingen. Deze wongi wa biatu, geeft met zijn bijl den mooien, slanken vorm aan de kano, hakt haar mooi gelijk bij en door middel van de esuwa, een kleine bijl, teekent hij den rand van de kano met scherpe, korte lijntjes gelijk af.

Dikwijls vervaardigen de negers hun kanos op uren afstand van het naastbijzijnde water; om nu de kano te vervoeren worden stokken op den grond gelegd, waarover de kano wordt voortgetrokken. Eenige flinke mannen helpen daarnaa mede en verders de geheele spes patriae van het dorp. Zij krijgen een mitako als geschenk en zijn den koning te rijk af.

De kanomaker laat zich goed betalen en de te betalen prijs hangt van de grootte van de kano af. Eenige honden worden geslacht op kosten van den eigenaar en iedereen, die medehielp, krijgt zijn deel naar het werk, hetwelk hij leverde. Dikwijls wordt er ook een groote suikerrietbierfuif op touw gezet; walgelijke tooneelen hebben dan dikwijls plaats en beschonken worden ze door hun vrouwen naar huis gebracht. In beschaafd Europa is het soms al niet veel beter.

Men maakt vaartuigen voldoende voor twee man tot zelfs honderd en honderd vijftig man toe; de groote oorlogskano's van den grooten chef Evoloko van Waka en den oud-chef van Bandaka een zekere Isaempoko zijn alombekend. De oorlogskano van dezen laatsten wordt gezegd honderd vijftig man te kunnen bevatten en de rand van deze kano reikt tot aan de schouders van een tamelijk grooten neger. De gewoone reiskano van de blanken is in den regel voldoende voor twintig tot dertig roeiers.

De prijzen der kanos verschillen naar gelang de grootte en sterkte van 200 tot 10,000 mitakos.

De Lokole.

De lokole speelt een zeer voorname rol in het leven van den neger; zonder de lokole is het leven van den neger niet denkbaar.

De lokole kan niet beter beschreven worden dan te zijn de openbare telefoon, waarmede de neger zijn gedachten van dorp tot dorp aan het publiek bekend maakt.

De lokole is voor den neger wat het signaal van de trompet voor den soldaat is.

De lokole roept de mannen ter vergadering, ten strijde en ter jacht; de lokole roept de gansche bevolking, klein en groot, ten dans. Gedurende den dans is zij tot diep in den nacht de getrouwe begeleidster; haar eentonig geluid voert de dansers tot een in halve razernij overslaand enthusiasme.

Op uren afstand telefoneert de vriend naar zijn vrienden en geeft weer wat hij verlangt; zijn twee negers van verschillende of van dezelfde dorpen met elkander in geschil, per lokole wordt hun de huid volgescholden en Jan en alleman wordt op de hoogte gebracht van het hangende geschil. Zij doen hun best elkander voor het volk zoo zwart mogelijk te maken. Is er een doode in het dorp, den ganschen nacht door wordt alom per lokole bekend gemaakt, dat die en die gestorven is. Reeds uren voor diens dood weet men overal dat die en die persoon op sterven ligt en zijn dood nabij is.

Indien de fetisch-dokter zijn bedrog aan het domme negervolk aan het opdisschen is, overal in het rond weet men precies het uur zijner handelingen en wat voor onzin hij op 't oogenblik uitzet.

De blanke kondigt het morgen-en middag-appel en het uur van uitscheiden zijner werklui per lokole aan.

Voooral s'morgens, s'avonds en met nat weer klinkt de lokole ver; met volle zon dringt de lokole niet ver door.

De lokole is een groote blok hout, waar in het midden een spleet over bijna de gansche lengte wordt gehakt, terwijl het binnenste zorgvuldig wordt uitgestoken. De lokole, ofschoon over het algemeen aan de buitenkanten afgeplat heeft de vorm van een overlangs openstaande, liggende mosselchelp.

Het lokole maken is een ambacht uitgevoerd door een bepaald persoon en sommige negers zijn wijdbekend voor het maken hunner lokole's.

Slechts vier houtsoorten zijn geschikt voor 't vervaardigen van de lokole namelijk :

1) Bokungu; 2) Lik[illegible]; 3) Bolondo; 4) Isi, het hout bij uitnemendheid, het hout waar de Mongo-neger zijn « ngula » (roodeverfstof) uit vervaardigt, waarmede hij zijn lichaam insmeert bij de minst gewichtige gebeurtenis, die in het dorp plaats heeft. Waarschijnlijk is de Isi een soort vermiljoenhout. De Mongo-neger vervaardigt vijf verschillende lokole's namelijk : 1) Ingonga, klein van vorm; 2) lokole ja losali- middelsoort; 3) bongungu- groote lokole. Deze drie zijn allen gelijk de boven geteekende. Deze worden geslagen met de stokken (bosulu) van de « momambo » boom (parasol-boom); 4) bonkuka, de groote hoog-opstaande lokole, die geslagen wordt met twee stokken, aan de punt waarvan eenige bollen caoutchouc worden bevestigd. Deze lokole dringt het verste door; 5) Ngomo, de groote langwerpige, recht opstaande dans-lokole. Deze lokole is slechts een groot langwerpig stuk hout, gansch uitgehold, een weinig versierd, ongeveer 1,25 m. hoog, van boven afgedekt met een stuk gedroogd antilopen of luipaardenvel, die geslagen wordt met de vingers en de palm van de hand. Deze lokole is de bekende tam-tam, nog al gebruikt door de negers der stoombooten om hun aankomst in de dorpen langs de rivier aantemelden.

Nu nog iets over de Lokole-taal.

De slag van de lokole is verschillend en zoodoende verstaan de negers de verschillende woorden; het tempo verschilt. De blanke hoort slechts het verschil van tempo, meer niet; de neger verstaat op uren afstand wat er getelefoneerd wordt.

De lokole-taal is hoofdzakelijk beeldspraak en zoodoende voor geen enkelen blanke in gansch Kongoland verstaanbaar. De negers zijn trotsch op hun uitvinding en wat in hun schik, dat de blanke, die anders alles kan, hun lokole toch niet slaan kan.

Iedere man heeft zijn eigen naam (nkombo) op de lokole, waarmede hij zich bekend maakt. Wijl zulke naam dikwijls eenige regels schrift beslaat hoofdzakelijk bestaande uit beeldspraak, feiten uit het publieke leven van den neger weergevend, is het als 't ware een physische onmogelijkheid voor een blanke de lokole taal volledig machtig te kunnen worden, gelijk een neger die kent. Zelfs alle negers verstaan de kunst van de lokole te slaan niet.

De vrouwen hebben een algemeenen naam; de lokole slaan is speciaal voor de mannen en geen enkele vrouw verstaat die kunst. Als de lokole geslagen wordt, verstaan de vrouwen het wel, doch zelf kunnen ze de lokole niet slaan. Trouwens ze zouden zich schamen een poging te wagen; dit is geen werk voor een vrouw en ze zouden uitgelachen worden. De lokole naam of nkombo der vrouw is als volgt :

Bali la tolombo basalaki lisala, basalaki tomboloko, tond' al' isusu, befambe eka lisala.

Vrouwen met velen, bewerkten den tuin, maakten veel eten gereed, bestaande uit bananen, eten uit den tuin.

Een blanke, persoonlijk, heeft geen eigen nkombo op de lokole, doch, om de komst van den blanke in een dorp wijd en zijd te verkondigen, wordt het volgende rondgetelefoneerd :

Lolema ja lifeka feka, esongo etenaka nkola.

De vleermuis overal heenvliegend, de pin verwondt de nagels der voeten.

Voornamelijk wordt hieronder, « de vleermuis overal heenvliegend », de Staatsagent verstaan, die van dorp tot dorp rondtrekt om de belastingen te innen, « de pin verwondt de nagels », beteekent dat, gelijk de negers in den strijd scherpgepunte, in 't vergift gedoopte pinnen op 't oorlogspad zetten, die den vijand z'n voeten verwonden, zoo is de Staatsagent immer op weg met zijn geweren gereed tot den strijd.

De nkombo van den katholieken missionaris is als volgt :

1) Banseie nsele ba nkanga; 2) bofala boki ndaki lisako nda lokombo; 3) etafe bolo; 4) benanga bekendaka la mperu

Banseie nsele ba nkanga, die altijd schreeuwend wordt vervolgd in 't hooge gras, de sterke tak, de streken gaan met den Priester (Père) mede.

1) De Missionaris wordt hier beschouwd als een fetischdokter (banseie nsele ba nkanga is een algemeene lokole-naam van den negerfetisch dokter) die gelijk den neger dokter wordt beschouwd als een dokter en een priester.

2) Bofala boki ndaki lisako nda lokombe; de Priester, omdat die overal catechumenen ziet aan te werven, wordt vergeleken met een antiloop, die achtervolgd, overal in 't hooge gras rondvlucht,

3) Etafe bolo. De Missionaris wordt vergeleken met een sterke tak. Hij is sterk door zijn invloed en hooggeacht door de negers.

4) Benanga bekendaka la mperu. De streken gaan alle met den Père (Priester) mede; zij allen volgen zijn instructies.

De nkombo van den Protestantschen Engelschen Zendeling is als volgt :

Bofanga sembola benanga boso nkenda l'Inglese.

't Vischnet wordt gespannen, het land gaat men den Engelschman mede.

Gelijk 't vischnet de rivier afzet en alles in zich opvangt, zoo gaat het land met den Engelschman mede. Wijl de Protestantsche Engelsche Zendeling den Katholieken Missionaris in deze streek vóór was, ging deze nkombo dien tijd op. Door de komst van den Katholieken Missionaris is de toestand gansch veranderd in deze streek.

Deze weinige voorbeelden geven een denbeeld van de moeilijkheid om de lokole-taal te verstaan.

Verders bewerkt de neger nog eenige stoeltjes, waaronder de voornaamste, de lyeko ia mpaka, de stoel van den onderling een driesprong met twee stutten er onder, uit een stuk uit de parasolboom gekapt, waar hij zich zoo lui mogelijk tusschen werpt.

Dan hakt hij met zijn inboorlingenbijl nog een klein zitbankje uit een blok hout, de zoogenaamde ebonga. Deze bewerkt hij netjes met zijn esumawa, kleine steekbeitel en versiert het zitvlak, rondomgezet met pinnekens (punaises) aan een of andere factorij gekocht.

Nu en dan ziet men een inboorlingenstoel vervaardigd gelijk hierboven vermeld, doch waaraan een soort leuning uit een stuk is gekapt.

De neger, die met den tijd mee wil, maakt voor zijn huis een stoel à l'Européenne uit bamboe; eenige stokken in den grond gestoken, een mat van gespleten bamboe er over gelegd en Mijnheer kan zijn tijd doorbrengen in dolce far niente.

Een gelijksoortige tafel (den neger onbekend) maakt het ameublement compleet.

Om een negerbed te vervaardigen behoeft men ook het buskruit niet ontdekt te hebben; eenige rechte stokken uit de mombambo (parasolboom) gekapt; in 't lange en in 't breed over elkander gelegd, aan de kanten een weinig afgeplat, dat 't zaakje eenigszins in elkander past; met wat lianen (gespleten) aan elkander gebonden en den neger heeft weer een bed in elkander gezet. Zijn lievelingsameublement is klaar, verkoopsprijs : 5-10 mitakos.

Het beddenmaken zou men onder een der Mongo-ambachten kunnen rangschikken; eens zag ik in het binnenland tien dezer bedden, klein en groot, ter verkoop op den weg uitgespreid liggen.

Men verzekerde mij dat de eigenaar de beddenmaker bij uitnemendheid van het dorp was. Ik nam natuurlijk mijn hoed voor zoo'n gewichtig personnage af.

De ekoke, het slaapstoeltje, is ook onmisbaar; uit een stuk gemaakt, gevormd naar de vorm van het hoofd neemt deze ekoke de plaats in van ons hoofdkussen, al is 't ook wat hard uitgevallen. Een negerkop is hard en kan er tegen; de kerel slaapt zonder wiegen.

Voor 't gereed maken van zijn eten, heeft hij eenige vijzels en stampers noodig, uit hout vervaardigd. Voor dit huisraad gebruikt hij hard hout, waardoor de vijzels bij 't voortdurend gestamp, niet gauw verslijten.

Verders bewerkt de Mongo-neger nog zijn roeispaan, zijn pijl en boog ter jacht en de lokombi, een plat, langwerpig uitgehold blokje hout, waarover eenige pinnen zijn gespannen, waarop hij met zijn vingers tokkelt, hetwelk een eentonig geluid veroorzaakt. Dit zoogenaamde muziekinstrument is voor den jongeling zijn trouwe medegezel op zijn lange tochten door het Evenaarswoud en op 't bezoek bij vrienden en kennissen.

III. — WEVERIJ.

Een eerzaam ambacht, hetwelk nog al veel werk en oplettendheid vereischt, is voorzeker het ambacht van den Mongo-wever.

Ofschoon het weven niet meer zoo in zwang is als in vroeger tijden, wijl het jongere volk zich Europeesche stoffen aanschaft, geeft het weven den wever toch ruimschoots zijn dagelijksch brood, wijl de ouden van dagen te heidensch zijn om van hun oude, ingewortelde gewoonte, een lendendoek te dragen, af te wijken.

Het weven is een ambacht dat alleen door de mannen wordt uitgeoefend. Sommigen zijn zeer bedreven in het weven van stoffen en dwingen onze bewondering af. Werkelijk mooi afgewerkte stukken kwam men ons te koop aanbieden en zag ik zienderoogen weven.

De wever pakt zijn mes, gaat het bosch in en snijdt de « mpekwa ia lifeko », de vezels van een zeker soort palmboom, die de wever somtijds in de nabijheid van z'n hut op den openbaren weg geplant heeft. Zoodra hij een bundel vezels, noodig voor het weven van het stuk stof, bij elkander gezameld heeft, gaat hij naar huis en op zijn gemakje schraapt hij met zijn mes de vezels gelijk bij.

Daarna legt hij ze in de zon te drogen; nadat ze voldoende gedroogd zijn, stelt hij in zijn hut of op den openbaren weg op waar hij de vezels aanhangt.

Na de vezels aan den bovensten dwarsstok bevestigd te hebben en den ondersten dwarsstok met zijn voet vasthoudend (de vezels zijn verbonden tusschen den bovensten en ondersten dwarsstok) gaat hij aan den slag.

Dikwijls gebruikt hij vezels verschillend van kleur, wat een werkelijk schoon effect maakt op het stuk stof.

Bofomi afom'ele : de wever weeft stof.

Om aan de vezels de verschillende kleuren te geven, gaat de wever heel eenvoudig te werk.

Uit 't bosch haalt hij een liaan (longoli), die de roode of witte of zwarte kleurstof inhoudt, snijdt die in stukjes, doet ze in een eventjes op 't vuur geschroeid bananenblad, voegt er water bij en hangt dit alles in een zakje van bananenblad boven het vuur met de vezels er in. Nadat de kleurstof goed in de vezels is getrokken, heeft de wever zijn gekleurde vezels, benoodigd voor zijn stuk stof. Dit mengsel noemt men « bozaka ».

TOUWVERVAARDIGING.

De Mongo-touwmaker (touwslager kan men hem slecht noemen) gaat naar het bosch, haalt de vezels van een zeker soort palmboom, schraapt ze netjes met zijn mes af en legt ze in de zon te drogen.

Heele klossen touw worden zoo vervaardigd. 't Inboorlingentouw, aldus vervaardigd, is van een goede, sterke hoedanigheid. Zijn netten bestemd voor de jacht en de vischvangst worden er mede vervaardigd. Gelijk 't weven is het touw maken een ambacht der mannen eigen.

IV. — MANDEN- EN MATTENVLECHTERIJ.

Manden en matten vlechten is hoofdzakelijk het werk der vrouwen, vooral het fijne vlechtwerk.

De mannen maken slechts hun groote, ruwafgewerkte manden, benoodigd voor het transporteeren hunner kopal. Het matten vlechten wordt alleen door de vrouwen uitgeoefend.

Uit het bosch halen zij de twijgen van de Bolongote boom, schrapen die netjes of drogen ze in de zon en vlechten al zittend hun manden en matten.

De soorten manden zijn velerlei, doch de grondstoffen noodig voor het vlechten zijn de bokombe of likombe van de Bolongote boom.

De matten worden op den vlakken grond gevlochten door één of twee vrouwen te gelijk. Hun namen zijn als volgt :

1) Efomolo, de ruw afgewerkte mat (waarde vijf mitakos).
2) Nkongole, de fijn gevlochte mat (waarde een halve frank).
3) Itandé of Isfole, 't kleine matje waar het drek van den weg en de asschen van het vuur mede worden weggedragen.
4) Ilefa, 't klein matje, gebruikt om het vuur aan te wakkeren.

A. Th. Gutersohn,
Priester der St Jozef's Congregatie.
(Mill-Hill).

THE FAMILY HEAD AMONG THE NKUNDO NEGROES
[HET FAMILIEHOOFD BIJ DE NKUNDO NEGERS]

H. BREPOELS

Congo, Vol. 2, pp. 332-340
Brussels, 1930

Translated from the Flemish by Helen H. Sprey

Human Relations Area Files

1959

[Title Page]

[332]

THE FAMILY HEAD AMONG THE NKUNDO NEGROES

[illegible] The family among the Negroes is organized in a patriarchal fashion. The father is lord and master, not only over his children, but also over all of his descendants. The power over his daughters and daughters' children, however, escapes him through his selling them.

All important things were dealt with and settled by him. Thus, for instance, to speak of only the most important, if one of his sons or grandsons had to be helped to get a wife, then it was for him to decide whether or not it was time for that. It was he who negotiated over that transaction and finally decided about the purchase of the wife. If one of his children or grandchildren shot an animal, then it was brought to him, and the distribution was made according to his decision and under his supervision. If one of his children had difficulties with his wife, the matter was judged by him. If one of the wives of his children stay away, he went to look for her if the matter was of a serious nature. If he was not able to settle the matter, then it was up to him to decide if the return of the money must be demanded or whether the matter must be decided by means of arms.

To the end of his days, sickness and insanity notwithstanding, he remained the only lord and master, and nothing was dealt with without his knowledge and approval. He was honored and respected up to his last breath.

Law of Succession

The law of succession is very much askew in relation to the patriarchal fatherhood mentioned in our history. Here it was not, it is still not today, the oldest son who was considered, even when he was of age. At the death of the father, these full powers passed to his brother. The children [333] female as well as male -- of the deceased brother, even though they were older in years, called him father and also showed him all the honor attached to the title of father. All their disputes and matters of importance were brought to him and settled by him. At his death the powers of family government passed again to his younger brother, and so on until all of the brothers had died. At the death of the last one, all rights passed, not to the oldest, second, or third brother [among his sons?], but to the oldest son of their sister, bona wa nkano. As an example:

596

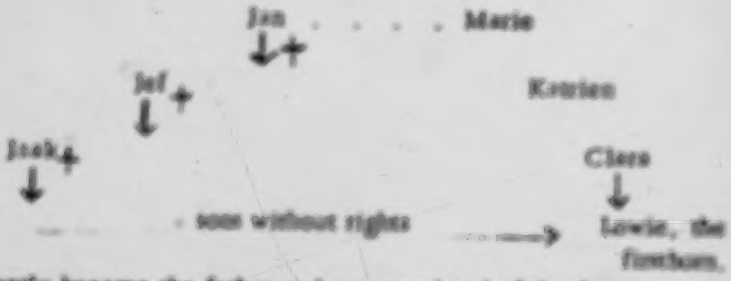
Brothers
Jan
Marie
Jef
Jaak
sons without rights
Paul becomes the successor.

Or if there were more sisters, the rights passed to the firstborn son of those sisters; for instance:



Jan
Marie
Jef
Katrien
Jaak
Clara
sons without rights
Louis, the firstborn.

He consequently became the father and supreme head of the family upon the death of the three brothers.

596 In order to understand this peculiar custom clearly, some ex-583 planations should be given. The custom in this country is that the 582 woman is sold; not a single one escaped that general rule in former days. With that money the father or brother bought, or rather, had to buy himself another woman. This wife belonged, however, to the daughter or sister who had been sold; the daughter or sister called her nkita, "goods" or "property." The children born of this nkita called her [the woman sold]: is'a'omoto, "female father." Even if she brought male children into the world, the rights of their mother passed to them, and [394] their mother was called father by the children of the nkita. According to our ideas, they were only nephews. That held even if the woman was still not paid for; it was enough that a ndonge, a security as proof of further payment, had been given. It was also not

576 necessary for her father or brother to have brought her to the man and 583 to have received money for her; another member of the family was 586 sufficient. She was sold by her family and accordingly, wherever the money had remained or whoever had received it, she had her rights in the family. Since the family maintained itself through the sale of the children of the female sex, the male children born of them were considered as the owners, the rightful claimants, the fathers. There was no exception to this rule; it was not to be altered, and no one had ever thought of disputing the place of the claimant or of laying claim to his rights. I have only heard of one single case of that sort, namely, at the succession of the Baki, the younger brother was said to have killed his older brother in order to take over his place. He was said to have made a hole in his brother's prow, so that it sank when it reached the middle of the stream. The matter in itself seems an impossibility; also I consider it a legend, unless an accident might have happened that was interpreted in a mistaken or deliberately false manner.

The rightful claimant, bona wa nkana, sister's son, might 596 still be a child; nevertheless he was called father and everyone vied
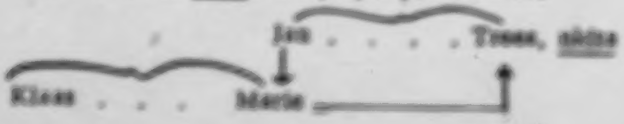
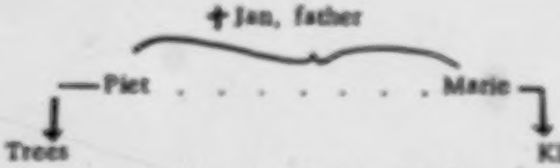
597 with one another in showing him the honor due a father. That was the unbreakable law, not only for the father common to the hamlet, bola, but also for the father of each individual family.

Nkita

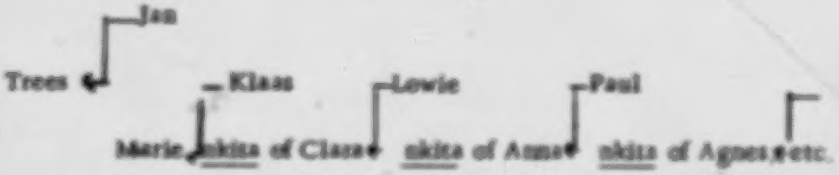
583 Nkita is what the woman is called who is bought with the money
602 that the father or brother has received for his daughter or sister on the occasion of her marriage. In reality, however, she is only the nkita, goods or property, of the sold woman. Nkita ekam, "my property," this woman calls her. For instance, Jan [338] sells his daughter, Marie, to Klaas and buys another wife, Trees, with the money received. The latter woman is now the nkita, the property, of Marie.



Or else, father Jan having died, Piet sold his sister, Marie, to Klaas and buys Trees with the money:



Practically speaking, Marie profited very little from her nkita. She had, it is true, certain rights over her nkita; thus, the latter considered her as her mistress, helped her in sickness and heavy work. Unfortunately for her, what she gained on the one side she lost again on the other side, in that she herself was also the nkita of another woman and consequently had the same obligations to fulfill towards the latter that her own nkita owed her. For example:



Jan, then, sold Marie to Klaas in order to buy Trees; Klaas, however, in order to be able to buy Marie, sold in turn his sister, Clara, to Lowie; Lowie acquired the necessary money to buy Clara by marrying off his sister, Anna. Thus, Trees then became the nkita of Marie, Marie the nkita of Clara, Clara of Anna, Anna of Agnes, etc. In short, every wife had her nkita and was, with few exceptions, the nkita of another wife. I say with few exceptions; for example, the wife was not the nkita of another woman if her husband had bought her with his own earned money. Practically speaking, this changed the matter very little. Also [336] there was no change if the nkita of a woman died; it was only a loss for the buyer or owner of that woman.

Rights of the Male Children in Relation to the Nkita of Their Mother

596 583 605 We have already seen that the right of succession and fatherhood passed to the male children of the sister, because she had been sold and had brought money into the family, or rather because she had a nkita there, a sort of guarantee for the money that had been received for her. Nkita-ship brought another right to them, namely, the female children born of the mother's nkita belonged to them; they could sell them and get themselves other women with the money. 582 They could not, however, marry them, since they were their cousins, and custom was opposed to any marriage between relatives. 602 The boys could, nevertheless, take the nkita of their mother as a wife, since the Negroes have no notion of affinity or relationship by marriage. The male children were, then, the owners of the female children that the nkita of their mother brought into the world:

These three girls, children of nkita Trees, belong to the three sons of Marie. If Marie had only one son, then Piet would have the right to trade the two other girls for money and to buy other wives with this money, either for himself or for his younger brother; but if she [Marie?] brought female children into the world, half of them belong to Marie's son.

583 604 If the nkita gave birth to no children of the female sex, the boys of Marie could resort to the husband of the nkita of their mother, namely, their uncle, nyangobika. If, however, he had no fortune, no money, [237] no wives, no girls to sell ... or only wives to whom others could lay claim and had more right, then they were disinherited, poor devils in society, and it cost them long years of work and much 583 searching for old disputes and old arguments about wives to get a wife.

604 And then they were still not always successful; their youth itself was against them here and robbed them constantly of the little that they 464 had saved for that purpose. The means for getting money, such as lances, knives, arm and foot bands, were extremely scarce. The Blacks do not know of workers or servants, and if one of those poor souls presented himself at the home of one who was better endowed by fortune and offered to chop wood for him, to lay out a manioc field, or to build a house for him, to gather straw and bamboo in the forest for that purpose, then the inborn laziness of the Negro would require long months to complete that work. As salary, the worker received only a few bokonga (copper arm or leg bands); these he already owed to the owner for having shown too much inclination for one or another of 587 his wives. The result of this was that many young men remained without a wife and that those who were favored by chance, that is to say,
595 had many children of the female sex in their family, each had several 562 wives. I consider this a primary cause of polygyny. The woman had a relatively high monetary value and represented capital. Thus, it did not happen that anyone gave his daughter or sister to another for nothing, just as among us it does not happen that a farmer gives his cow or horse to a poor devil for nothing.

583 If the father or brother sold a daughter born of the nkita of his 604 daughter or sister -- a right that general custom gave him and which 603 usually occurred, since the children of the female sex were sold very young and the boys, the rightful claimants or owners, in that case were still very young -- this was done in order to buy another wife. The rights of the children shifted then as follows:

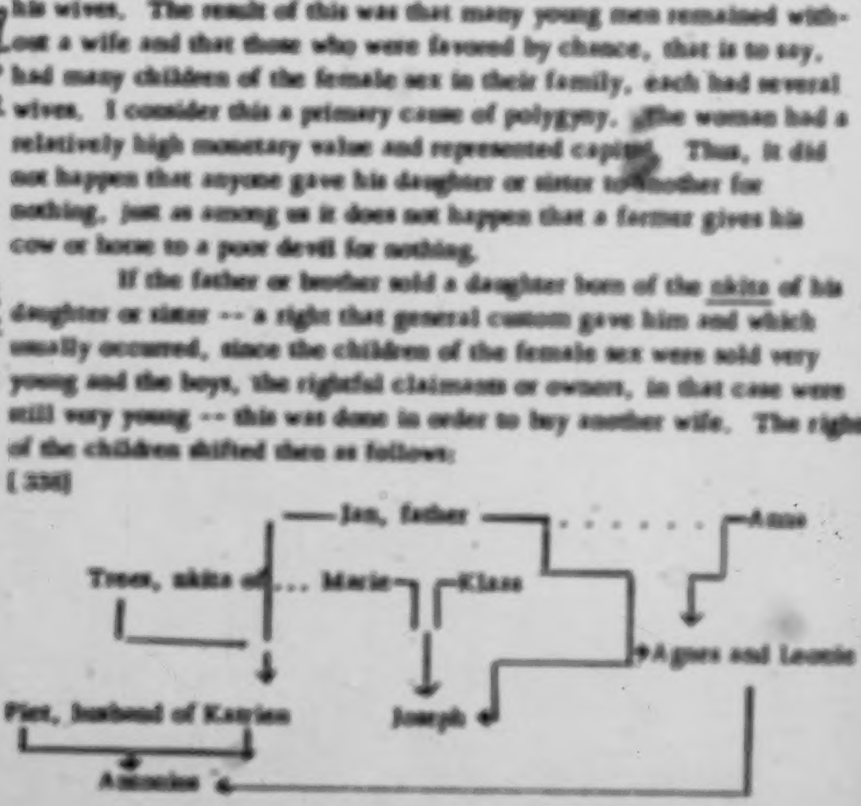
[338]



583 Jan, the father, by selling Katrien, the nkita of his daughter
604 Marie, becomes indebted to Joseph, the son of Marie and at the same 603 time his own grandson; and on the other side he becomes the debtor of Antonius, his other grandson, by selling his mother, Katrien.

Anna, whom he bought, was then the nkita of Katrien and the quasi-nkita of Marie. Both sons, Joseph and Antonius, were hard pressed because of Anna, the nkita of both of their mothers. If Anna bore two daughters, as I have indicated, the case was simple: the first daughter belonged to Joseph and the second to Antonius. If, however, she gave birth to only one daughter, then this child belonged to Joseph, and Antonius was left out in the cold. If father Jan had no children of the female sex by Anna, then the matter was extremely thorny for both of them, and if their grandfather or uncle possessed no money, had no more wives by whom he had daughters, there was nothing left for them to do but, at his death, to take the nkita of their mother as a wife. For this reason it happened many times that young men lived with old women, and even though there was then generally no more hope of children, these wives were then still good enough to cook the meals and do the little work that a Negro household requires.

606 I will not digress any further about the method of distribution of women, about the rights over the women which the nkita system brings with it. It would take us too far. Furthermore, not only the present, but also the past and the future are involved in it; so that one would have to be a Negro and raised in these matters to understand them clearly .... and even then they involve numerous palavers (disputes), which continually agitate the families and the villages.

[330]

The Origin of the Nkita?

576 The sale of the woman and the immediate loss of her freedom 583 must naturally have given her cause for revolt. It has perhaps cost the 562 man a severe struggle to make the woman content with her lot. A compensation or reimbursement had to be given to her, and most certainly the nkita system has its origin there. It was at least a partial compensation that the man gave to the woman. It gave her rights over her nkita

596 and over the children who were born to the latter; even more, it gave 583 her own children rights which exist nowhere else in the world and prob-
562 ably among no other people: they became the superiors, the fathers of the family of their mother. Unfortunately, practically considered, the woman enjoyed very little of the gift which was given her; she remained what she was, slave of money, slave of the man. Even her children, for whom the nkita-ship secured such great advantages in her family, brought them into a false situation, in that it robbed them in the home of their own father of all the advantages that it brought them in the home of their mother's father. It was only the old and well-favored who actually gained advantage from the nkita system and enjoyed them.

1) It relieved them in the first place of all care on behalf of their daughters whom they sold while still children; and if later, after they were grown up, these daughters complained about the injustice done to them, they could answer them, "But, my dear daughter, I have done you no wrong; here in my own house is the woman whom I bought with your money; she belongs to you always, and the children that I have by her are your children; you are both their father and their mother; they will call you is'womoto (female father), and in that capacity they will honor and serve you; the boys will at the same time be the children of your children, and the girls will be sold to give your sons the opportunity to buy a wife for themselves."

2) It discharged them for the most part from all care of providing a wife for their sons, and it denied the latter the right to make claims to the women whom the father possessed. [360] If the son begged his father for a woman, he could put him off and say to him, "But, my boy, you have the nkita of your mother; the children (girls) who will be born of her are for you. We shall sell them, and with the money we will buy you a wife." Most of these girls, however, were traded by the father for another wife, since his son was still, in that case, small. Almost all the women then ended up in the harem of the father before passing on to the son. Thus, after all, the nkita system only benefited the lust and the lasciviousness of the old Negro and made him the one and only master of the women. Sons, daughters, wives, and children were, in contrast, the dupes and victims of the nkita-ship.

S: Brepoels FO12 Mongo

Juin 1930 — Tome II, Nº 1.

CONGO

Revue générale de la Colonie belge
Onzième année

Algemeen tijdschrift
van de Belgische Kolonie
XIde jaargang

ET

BULLETIN DE LA SOCIETE BELGE D'ÉTUDES COLONIALES (XXXVIIme année)

Directeur : Ed. De Jonghe

SOMMAIRE :

L. LOTAR . . . . Souvenirs de l'Uélé. 1

J. SCHWETZ . . . Un voyage d'étude dans la région du Lac Kivu. 9
Directeur de laboratoire au Congo belge.

MÉLANGES : [illegible] : La question de [illegible], p. [illegible]. — Hygiène et médecine : Le travail médical des [illegible] du Congo belge pendant cinq ans, p. [illegible]. — Questions scientifiques : [illegible], p. [illegible].

ASSOCIATION POUR LE PERFECTIONNEMENT DU MATERIEL COLONIAL

1. L'aviation marchande au Congo belge et la Sabena Belgique-Congo, par le Colonel de réserve J. [illegible], administrateur-délégué de la Sabena, p. [illegible]. — 2. Transports et communications. — Les tarifs des transports dans la Colonie, p. [illegible]. — 3. Conservation des bois exposés à l'air, par M. Paul [illegible], p. [illegible].

BULLETIN DE L'OFFICE COLONIAL

Commerce : Statistique commerciale de l'exercice [illegible], p. [illegible]. — Exportations. Statistique des produits exportés du Congo belge pendant l'année [illegible], p. [illegible]. — Importations. Statistique des marchandises importées au Congo belge pendant l'année [illegible], p. [illegible]. — Province Orientale. District de Stanleyville, p. [illegible]. — Territoire de Ponthierville, deuxième semestre [illegible], p. [illegible]. — District du Kasai. Territoire d'Idiofa, p. [illegible]. Arrondissement industriel de Lubudi: Territoire de [illegible]. Liste des établissements industriels et agricoles, p. [illegible]. — Informations, p. [illegible]. — [illegible], p. [illegible].

Le numéro : 10 francs

[title page]

ÉDITEUR :
Goemaere, imprimeur du Roi
Rue de la Limite, 21, Bruxelles

[illegible]
MARTINUS NIJHOFF

HET FAMILIEHOOFD BIJ DE NKUNDO NEGERS.

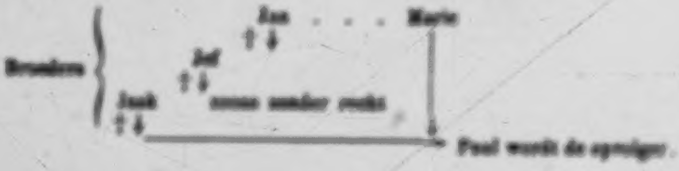
De familie is bij de negers in patriarchalen stijl opgebouwd. Zoodat de vader heer en meester is, niet alleen over zijne kinderen, maar ook over al zijn nazaten. Het recht evenwel over zijne dochters en dochters-kinderen ontsnapte hem, doordien hij ze verkocht.

Alle voorname dingen werden door hem behandeld en afgedaan. Zoo bijvoorbeeld om slecht van de voornaamste te spreken, als een zijner zonen, kleinzonen... aan een vrouw moest geholpen worden, dan was het aan hem te beslissen of de tijd daar was ja of neen. 't Was hij die over die zaak onderhandelde en ten slot over den aankoop dier vrouw besliste. Schoot een zijner kinderen of kindskinderen... één dier, dan werd het bij hem gebracht, de verdeeling werd volgens hem en onder zijn oogen gedaan. Had een zijner kinderen moeilijkheden met zijn vrouw, de zaak werd door hem geoordeeld. Liep er één der vrouwen van zijn kinderen weg, hij ging ze opzoeken, als de zaak van ernstigen aard was. Als hij niet vermocht de zaak bij te leggen, was het aan hem om te beslissen of het geld terug moest ge-eischt of de zaak door de wapens moest beslist worden.

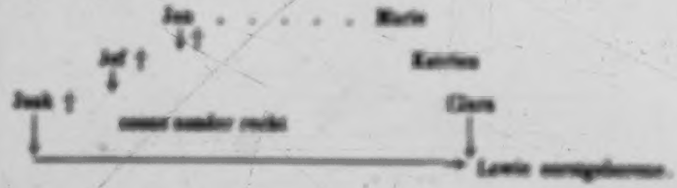
Tot zijn hoogsten ouderdom, niettegenstaande ziekten en krankheden, bleef hij de eenige heer en meester en er werd niets verhandeld zonder zijn voorkennis en goedkeuring. Men eerde en achtte hem tot zijn laatste ademhaling.

Opvolgingsrecht.

Het opvolgingsrecht, met betrekking tot het patriarchaal vaderschap in onze geschiedenis gekend, scheelt zeer veel. Hier was het niet — en heden nog niet de oudste zoon, zelfs meerderjarig, die in aanmerking genomen werd. Bij den dood des vaders gingen dezes volle rechten over op zijn broeder. De kinderen — zoo vrouwelijke als mannelijke — van den overleden broeder, al waren zij zelfs ouder in jaren, noemden hem vader en bewezen hem tevens alle eer aan den titel van vader verbonden. Al hun geschillen en zaken van aangelegenheid werden bij hem gebracht en door hem vereffend. Bij zijn dood gingen de rechten van familie-bestuur weer over op zijn jongeren broeder en zoo voort tot al de broeders overleden waren. Bij den dood van den laatsten gingen alle rechten over, niet op den oudsten, tweeden of derden broeder, maar op den oudsten zoon van hun zuster, « bona wa nkana ». Voorbeeld :



Of als er meerdere zusters waren, gingen de rechten over op den eerstgeboren zoon dier zusters, bijvoorbeeld :



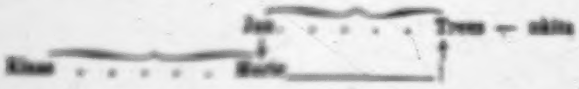
en werd gevolglijk de vader en 't opperhoofd der familie, bij den dood der drie broeders.

Om in die zonderlinge gewoonte klaar te zien, dienen er eenige verklaringen gegeven. Het gebruik hier ten lande is dat de vrouw verkocht wordt, geen enkele uitzondering in vroegere dagen aan dien algemeenen regel. Met dat geld kocht of liever moest de vader of broeder der vrouw zich een andere vrouw koopen. Deze vrouw behoorde evenwel aan de verkochte dochter of zuster toe, die ze hare « nkita », goed of eigendom noemde. De kinderen uit deze nkita geboren noemden haar : is'e'omoto — vrouwelijke vader. Zoo zij zelve mannelijke kinderen ter wereld bracht, gingen de rechten harer moeder op hen over en de kinderen van de nkita hunner moeder noemden hen vader. Volgens onze opvatting waren zij enkel neven. Dat gold zelfs al was de vrouw nog niet betaald geworden; 't was voldoende dat men een « ndanga » een pand ter bewijs van verdere betaling gegeven had. 't Was ook niet noodig dat haar vader of broeder haar aan den man gebracht had, en er geld voor getrokken had, een ander lid van de familie voldeed. Zij was door hare familie verkocht en als dusdanig, waar het geld dan ook gebleven was of wie dan ook het getrokken had — had zij hare rechten in de familie en daar deze zich in stand hield door den verkoop van de kinderen van het vrouwelijk geslacht, beschouwde men de mannelijke kinderen uit hen geboren als de meesters, de rechthebbenden, de vaders. Op dezen regel was geen uitzondering, daar viel niet aan te tornen en niemand had er ooit aan gedacht den rechthebbende zijn plaats te betwisten of aanspraak te maken op zijne rechten. Een enkel feit van dien aard is mij slechts ter oore gekomen, bij den overtocht namelijk van den Ruki, zou de jongere broeder zijn ouderen om 't leven gebracht hebben om zijn plaats in te kunnen nemen. Hij zou een gat in de prauw zijns broeders gemaakt hebben zoodat zij zonk toen zij in 't midden van den stroom gekomen was. De zaak op zich zelf beschouwd lijkt eene onmogelijkheid; ook beschouw ik ze als een legende, tenzij een ongeluk zoo gebeurd geweest zijn dat men verkeerd of opzettelijk slecht uitgelegd heeft.

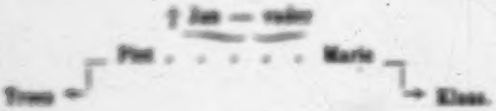
De rechthebbende, bona wa nkana — zusters zoon, kon nog een kind zijn, toch noemde men hem vader en niemand betwistte hem om strijd de eer van het vaderschap. Dat was zoo de onverbreekbare wet, niet alleen voor den algemeenen vader van het geslacht — bokoi —; maar ook voor den vader van elke familie afzonderlijk.

Nkita.

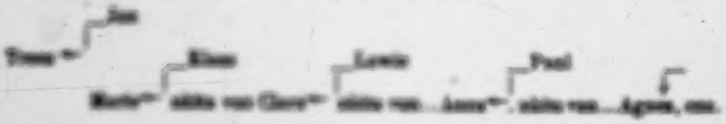
Nkita noemt men de vrouw, die gekocht wordt met het geld dat vader of broeder ontvangen heeft voor zijn dochter of zuster bij hare uithuwelijking. In werkelijkheid is zij echter slechts de nkita — goed of eigendom — van de verkochte vrouw. Nkita ekam, mijn eigendom, noemt deze haar. Bijvoorbeeld : Jan ver-koopt zijn dochter Marie aan Klaas en koopt met het ontvangen geld een andere vrouw, Trees. Deze laatste nu is de nkita, het eigendom van Marie :



Ofwel vader Jan dood zijnde, verkocht Piet zijn zuster Marie aan Klaas en koopt met het geld Trees :



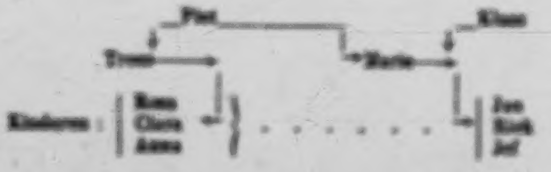
Praktisch gesproken profiteerde Marie bitter weinig van hare Nkita. Zij had wel zekere rechten op hare nkita : zoo, deze beschouwde haar als hare meesteres, hielp haar in ziekte en drukken arbeid... Ongelukkig voor haar wat zij van den eenen kant won verloor zij weer langs den anderen kant, doordien zij zelf ook de nkita was van een andere vrouw en gevolglijk dezelfde verplichtingen jegens deze te vervullen had, welke haar eigen nkita haar schuldig was. Bijvoorbeeld :



Jan dus verkocht Marie aan Klaas om Trees te koopen; Klaas eveneens om Marie te kunnen koopen verkocht weer zijn zuster Clara aan Lowie; Lowie verschafte zich het noodige geld om Clara te koopen, met zijn zuster Anna aan den man te brengen. Zoo werd dan Trees de Nkita van Marie, Marie de Nkita van Clara, Clara van Anna, Anna van Agnes... Kortom iedere vrouw had hare nkita en was op weinige uitzonderingen na de nkita van een andere vrouw. Ik zeg : op weinige uitzonderingen na, zoo bijvoorbeeld was de vrouw niet de nkita van een andere vrouw, als haar man haar gekocht had met zijn eigen gewonnen geld. Praktisch gesproken veranderde dit weinig de zaak; ook niet als de nkita eener vrouw stierf; 't was alleen een verlies van den aankooper of eigenaar dier vrouw.

Rechten der mannelijke kinderen wegens de nkita hunner moeder.

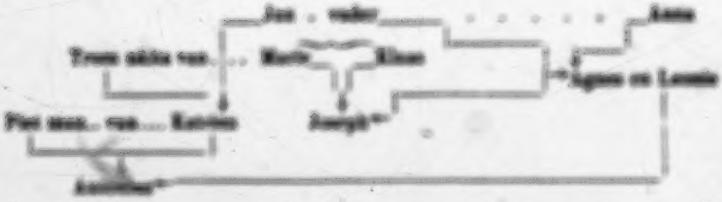
Wij hebben reeds gezien dat het opvolgingsrecht en het vaderschap op de mannelijke kinderen van de zuster overging omdat deze verkocht geworden was, geld in de familie gebracht had of liever omdat zij er een nkita had, een soort waarborg voor het geld dat men voor haar getrokken had. Een ander recht bracht het nkita-schap hen mee, namelijk de vrouwelijke kinderen uit moeders-nkita geboren behoorden hen toe; zij konden ze verkoopen en zich andere vrouwen aanschaffen met het geld. Zij konden ze evenwel niet huwen, daar het hun nichten waren en de gewoonte zich verzet tegen elk familie-huwelijk. De jongens konden nochtans de nkita hunner moeder tot vrouw nemen, daar de negers geen gedacht van affiniteit of aangetrouwd verwantschap hebben. De mannelijke kinderen dan waren de bezitters der vrouwelijke kinderen die de nkita hunner moeder ter wereld bracht :



Deze drie meisjes, kinderen van nkita Trees, hooren toe aan de drie zonen van Marie. Als Marie maar een jongen had, dan had Piet het recht de twee andere meisjes in geld om te zetten en met dit geld andere vrouwen te koopen 't zij voor zich zelf, 't zij voor zijn jongeren broeder; maar als zij vrouwelijke kinderen ter wereld brachten, hoorden de helft ervan toe aan Marie's zoon.

Als de nkita geen kinderen van 't vrouwelijk geslacht ter wereld bracht, konden de jongens van Marie wel hun toevlucht nemen tot den man der nkita van hunne moeder, namelijk hun oom, nyangolola. Had deze evenwel geen fortuin, geen geld, geen vrouwen, geen te verkoopen meisjes... of slechts vrouwen, waarop anderen konden aanspraak maken en zwaardere rechten hadden, dan waren zij onterfden, arme duivels in de maatschappij en kostte het hun lange jaren arbeid en een hoop opzoekerij van oude palabers, oude wijvenkwestiën, om aan eene vrouw te komen. En dan nog lukte het hun niet altijd : hun jeugd zelf was hen hier tot vijand en berooifde hen gestadig van het weinige dat zij te dien einde gespaard hadden. De middelen om geld : lansen, messen, arm- en voetbanden te vergaren, waren uiterst gering. Werklieden of dienstlieden kenden de zwarten niet en als één van die minderbedeelden zich aanbood bij één door het fortuin beter bedeelde om voor hem een bosch af te kappen om een maniokveld aan te leggen, of om hem een huis te bouwen : strooi en riet te dien einde in het bosch te halen, dan vroeg de aangeboren luiheid van den neger lange maanden om dien arbeid te voltooien en tot loon kreeg de werkman slechts eenige bakonga's (kopere arm- of beenbanden) die hij al lang in schuld was bij den eigenaar, om te veel genegenheid voor de één of andere zijner vrouwen betoond te hebben. Het gevolg hiervan was dat vele jongelingen zonder vrouw bleven en dat degenen die door het lot begunstigd werden, 't is te zeggen, vele kinderen van 't vrouwelijk geslacht in hun familie hadden, ieder verschillende vrouwen hadden. Ik stip dit aan als een eerste oorzaak van de veelwijverij. De vrouw had betrekkelijk een hooge geldelijke waarde en vertegenwoordigde een kapitaal. Bestond dus niet dat iemand zijn dochter of zuster aan een ander voor niet gaf, gelijk het ten onzent ook niet bestaat dat een boer zijn koe of paard voor niet zal geven aan een armen duivel.

Als de vader of broeder zijn dochter, uit de nkita van zijn dochter of zuster geboren, verkocht, — recht dat het algemeen gebruik hem gaf en hetgeen dan gewoonlijk ook gebeurde, daar de kinderen van 't vrouwelijk geslacht zeer jong verkocht werden en de jongens, de rechthebbende of eigenaars, alsdan nog zeer jong waren — gebeurde dit om een vrouw bij te koopen. De rechten der kinderen verplaatsten zich dan als volgt :



Jan, de vader, door Katrien de nkita van zijn dochter Marie te verkoopen, werd de schuldenaar van Jozef, de zoon van Marie en tevens zijn eigen kleinzoon; en van den anderen kant werd hij de schuldenaar van Antoine, zijn anderen kleinzoon, door dezes moeder Katrien te verkoopen.

De gekochte Anna was dan de nkita van Katrien en de quasi-nkita van Marie. Beider zonen, Jozef en Antoine kwamen dus in gedrang wegens Anna, nkita hunner beide moeders. Als Anna twee dochters baarde, gelijk ik opgegeven heb, was het geval eenvoudig : de eerste dochter hoorde Jozef toe en de tweede aan Antoine. Bracht zij evenwel maar een dochter ter wereld, dan hoorde deze toe aan Jozef en Antoine mocht toekijken. Indien vader Jan geen kinderen van 't vrouwelijk geslacht met Anna won, dan was de zaak voor beiden uiterst netelig en zoo grootvader of oom geen geld bezat, niet meerdere vrouwen had, waarmee hij dochters won, bleef hen niet over dan bij zijn dood de nkita van hun moeder tot vrouw te nemen. Vandaar dat het meermalen gebeurde dat jonge mannen met oude vrouwen leefden en al was er dan doorgaans geen hoop meer op kinderen, die vrouwen waren dan toch nog altijd goed om den pot te koken en 't weinige werk te verrichten dat een neger-huishouden vraagt.

Ik wil niet verder uitweiden over de verdeelings methode der vrouwen, over de rechten over de vrouwen, die het nkita-systeem meebrengt. 't Zou ons te ver leiden; overigens niet alleen het heden, maar ook het verleden en de toekomst zijn er mee gemoeid; zoodat men neger moet zijn en in die zaken opgegroeid om er klaar in te zien... en dan nog brengen zij tal van palabers (twistgeschillen) mee, die voortdurend de familiën en de dorpen beroeren.

Oorzaak der nkita ?

De verkoop der vrouw en met een het verlies van hare vrijheid, moest haar natuurlijk in geweldigen opstand brengen. Een hevigen strijd heeft het wellicht den man gekost de vrouw te doen berusten in haar lot. Een compensatie of vergoeding moest haar gegeven worden en heel zeker vindt het nkita-systeme daarin zijn oorsprong. 't Was ten minste een gedeeltelijke vergoeding dewelke men de vrouw gaf : het gaf haar rechten over hare nkita, over de kinderen die uit deze geboren worden; meer nog gaf het haar eigen kinderen rechten die nergens ter wereld en wellicht bij geen enkel volk bestaan : Zij werden de meerderen, de vaders der familie hunner moeder. Ongelukkig, praktisch beschouwd genoot de vrouw bitter weinig van de gift die men haar deed : zij bleef wat zij was, slaaf van het geld, slaaf van den man. Zelfs hare kinderen, die het nkitaschap van groote voordeelen bezorgden in hare familie, bracht hen in eene valsche situatie, dewijl het hen beroofde in het huis van hun eigen vader van al de voordeelen, die zij hen aanbracht in het vaderhuis hunner moeder. 't Was enkel de ouden, en goed bedeelden die in werkelijkheid uit het nkita-systeme hun voordeel trokken en ervan genoten :

1) Het ontlastte hen ten eersten van alle zorg wegens hunne dochters, die zij nog kind zijnde verkochten en als dezen later, groot geworden zijnde, zich beklaagden over het onrecht hen aangedaan, konden zij hen antwoorden : maar lieve dochter, ik heb u geen ongelijk aangedaan; hier in mijn eigen huis, is de vrouw die ik met uw geld gekocht heb; zij hoort u immers toe en de kinderen die ik met haar win, zijn uwe kinderen; gij zijt en hun vader en hunne moeder, zoo zullen zij u noemen : is'ommoto (vrouwelijk vader) en in die hoedanigheid zullen zij u eeren en dienen; de jongens zullen trouwens de kinderen zijn uwer kinderen en de meisjes zullen verkocht worden om uwe zonen de gelegenheid te geven om zich een vrouw aan te koopen.

2) Het ontsloeg hen voor een groot deel van alle zorg om een vrouw voor hunne zonen te zoeken en het ontzegde aan dezen het recht aanspraak te maken op de vrouwen die vader bezat.

Als de zoon vader plaagde om een vrouw, kon hij hem wandelen zenden en hem zeggen : maar jongen je hebt de nkita uwer moeder; de kinderen (meisjes) die uit haar geboren worden zijn voor u. Wij zullen ze verkoopen en met het geld zullen wij u een vrouw koopen... De meesten evenwel van die meisjes werden door den vader met een andere vrouw omgezet, daar zijn zoon alsdan nog klein was. Al de vrouwen dan kwamen bijna in den harem van vader te recht alvorens aan den zoon over te gaan... Zoodat bij slot van rekening het nkita-systême enkel de wulpsheid en de geilheid van den ouden neger ten goede kwam en hem geheel en gansch meester maakte van de vrouw. Zonen, dochters, vrouwen en kinderen waren daarentegen de gefopten en de slachtoffers van het nkita-schap.

H. BREPOELS, m. s. c.

Family Life and Customs among the Natives of Equatorial Africa

[Familieleven en zeden bij de inboorlingen van den Evenaar]

Gregorius Kaptein

Congo, Vol. 1, pp. 531-549
Brussels, 1922

Translated from the Flemish by Helen N. Sprey

Human Relations Area Files

1959

[Title Page]

[531]

FAMILY LIFE AND CUSTOMS AMONG THE NATIVES OF EQUATORIAL AFRICA

5B The so-called marriage, or rather, the acquisition of a wife takes place:

1. Through a bride price to the family of the woman who is given;
2. Through buying, or the payment of an amount for a woman who is no longer in the hands of the family;
3. Through inheritance;
4. Through abduction.

Acquisition by bride price is called enga, njengenga: "the binding or engagement of oneself."

Acquisition by purchase is called sombo, masombo: "buying."

When a woman is acquired through inheritance, the designation under which she was first acquired is retained. When the deceased father, uncle, or brother had acquired the woman by bride price or purchase, the heir will say: "I have taken this woman by bride price, purchase, etc."

Acquisition by abduction often occurred formerly in the tribal wars.

In disputes the natives often say: "He stole that woman." This is usually to announce the fact that the woman, according to them, was acquired in a dishonest manner.

The payment of bride price, purchase, etc., is usually made with a combination of money, objects, and male or female slaves.

This combined payment is called songa, masonga: "equalizing, settlement."

When a native is asked in what way he acquired his wife, he will usually say: njoloengaki (I have paid her bride price), because he [532] knows well that this is the most honest way. There are, however, many wives who have been acquired in the other way.

583
584 Acquisition by bride price sometimes begins before the birth of the expected daughter. The man, usually a polygynist, gives something of security to the father of the child. This security 583 584 [844] consists of a beautifully fashioned native knife, or a lance, or mitako (copper wire used as currency). In some areas, it was the polygynist who attended the mother at the birth of the daughter. He had the wood gathered, water brought, and food prepared. If, then, the expected child was a boy, the security was usually returned, and the contract declared null and void. If, however, the one who had given the security was a village chief or a man of importance, then the father of the child tried to give him another daughter. The father had, for instance, at an earlier time given a daughter to another man of much less importance. In the above-mentioned case, he would give back the bride price received, take his daughter back, and give her to the polygynist from whom he expected a larger bride price.

583 Sometimes too the boy was taken by the polygynist and remained in his family until the father could trade a daughter for him.

583 861 While very young and still a child, the little daughter was installed in the harem of the polygynist. She was brought up there, together with other children of her age and status; or rather, she grew up there in the midst of these heathen customs without any upbringing.

595 The composition of the harem of a polygamist:

The first wife was called the Bomatso; she preceded all the other wives in rank, and in the absence of the polygynist, she was the mistress of the harem.

The second wife was called Ekila; she was the most loved and preceded all the remaining wives. She was also called Nkonda.

The third wife was called Bolumbu. At the appointment of the Bolumbu, a certain ceremony took place, and the wife was clothed with an animal skin. The Nkumu, a sort of patriarch and magician, sometimes had three or four Bolumbu who served as [202] messengers to other villages. In this capacity they had special [721] privileges. For instance, to attack a Bolumbu was a reason for declaring war.

[533] The remaining women were simply women of the harem, without distinction.

595 In the area of Monjoku, among the Bolee [Bole?], the first wife was called Nkisa, with the same rank as Bomatso. The second

595 wife was called Lonkoto. This was, however, more a category, for there were sometimes four Lonkoto to a harem. The rest were ordinary wives. Among the Ekonda, the first wife was called Nkumekolo, just like the Boimoma. The second wife was called Ekila or Nkombe. The remaining wives were the ordinary wives of the harem.

595 684 The first wife, Boimoma, always remained at home and never left the harem. The second, Ekila or Nkombe, accompanied the polygynist everywhere; she was at his side on all his trips. The Bokumbe usually went completely alone to do errands in other villages.

595 These old customs of priority among the wives are now gradually beginning to disappear.

684 It was forbidden under severe penalty to have relations with the first, second, or third wife of the polygynist. The penalties were death, slavery, or a large fine.

This was their law concerning adultery, enforced with severe punishment.

595 837 The ordinary wives of the harem were less strictly guarded. This often depended on the jealousy or indifference of the polygynist. Anyone who had relations with these wives had to pay a fine, or rather, a price of prostitution. Since the wives were almost all in the possession of the polygynists, there were naturally many men without a wife. These, then, often had relations with the ordinary wives of the polygynists. Also, the sons of the polygynist had relations with them; the polygynist himself sometimes even had relations with the ordinary wives of his neighbor. This was the bad consequence and the immorality of polygyny.

595 586 It is easy to understand that the ordinary wives of the polygynist, having relations with others, often left their husband, or rather, their master in order to go to another. The ordinary wives constituted the largest number. It is because of this that one now finds many women who have had three or four, sometimes even seven, different husbands in succession. Among some tribes, [534] the Ekonda among them, they were stricter; a wife who had already left her husband or master two or more times was considered to have little worth.

567 595 The female slaves who were taken in war were given by the polygynist to his male slaves as wives. They could also be installed in the harem among the ordinary wives. Their children could have the same rights as the other children of the polygynist 600 the same rights as the other children of the polygynist.

595 The polygynist always sought to increase the number of his 556 wives, for his prestige rose and his fortune increased in that manner.
593 If anyone in civilized lands seeks to enlarge his fortune, this is done, people say, in order to insure the future of his children. The native thinks little about that; his primary idea is to enjoy himself and to surpass others in prestige and esteem. As far as the future of his children is concerned, there are polygynists who possess twenty or thirty wives or even more, and sometimes they have only one or two children. Also it is little in keeping with their notions to care for the future; he who is still alive tomorrow must take care of 595 tomorrow then, so they reason. On the contrary, instead of caring for his children, the polygynist often took great trouble to obtain a 593 wife for his son. The son, however, was not yet the owner of his 594 wife; it was, so to speak, only a loan. Not until after the death of 606 his father did he become owner. In some districts, when the father had obtained a wife for his son, he first kept this wife for some time for himself. Only after a few months did he give her to his son. In 595 other districts, when the wife was pregnant by the son, he was obliged 593 to send her for a few days to his father. He was not allowed to bear 606 the honor of fatherhood alone; his father must share that with him.
592 The father reserved for himself the honor of naming all of the chil-591 dren of his children. In some areas of the Congo, morals were so 835 low and common that the father even kept his own daughters in his harem. This did not occur in Equatorial Africa, but there was a custom that was not much better. The magician was sometimes 593 consulted about the bride price which the father tried to get for his 791 daughter, or the brother for his sister.

The magician then gave them the advice that they themselves should first have relations with their own daughter or sister. This custom existed almost everywhere in Equatorial Africa.

593 [535] Bride Price. In general, the daughter was given in marriage upon payment of a bride price. The father had little choice of the future husband of his daughter. The one who guaranteed the most goods in payment was certain to get her. Since, in most cases, the little daughter had not yet arrived at the years of maturity, there was naturally no question of her consent. The bride price was not paid all at once, but gradually during the years while the daughter grew up. Since the daughter was given without her consent 583 to an old, worn-out, grey-haired man, it naturally often occurred that when she arrived at maturity, she no longer wished to remain with him. She therefore left him and went to another, or back to her family. In the latter case, however, great difficulties arose concerning the return of the bride price. Indeed, with the bride price the father had received for his daughter, he bought himself another wife. This wife was then called the Nkita of the daughter. We could translate Nkita in this case as "substitute." The Nkita represented the value of the sold or married daughter. Meanwhile, the daughter herself was often the Nkita of the daughter or sister of her husband. Thus, many women were the Nkita of each other. According to their customs the children (boys) were in theory the heirs of the Nkita of their mother. The Nkita was, in fact, the value or the bride price of their mother.

One might ask whether the wife was then always content that she was, so to speak, an object of trade. In general, yes, she was satisfied with this. This is how the customs were, and nobody gave a thought to changing them. Usually the wife simply found herself in an arranged situation (fait accompli). Gradually a certain sense of honor is coming into being among the Christian wives against these heathen customs.

If the woman desired that a large bride price or purchase price be paid for her, was it also because she wished to care for the future of her children who would be heirs of her bride price? No, they say, not for that reason -- for, they add, what woman knew in advance that she would have children, and moreover boys? There
[163] are, in fact, many women who have no children. Also, [536] only 583 the boys are eligible for the inheritance; the girls are heirs only in [illegible] name. When it came to the inheritance, the children inherited the 587 Nkita of their mother only if there were no more brothers of the mother or uncles on their father's side. The mightiest always had the greatest right.

Usually a youth had to acquire a wife with the bride price or supplement of the bride price of his sister. The inheritance of the Nkita of his mother was only secondary. Still we often see a heathen wife leave her husband in order to go to another, without bothering much about her children who remain with the deserted husband, their father.

583 If the wife was content and if she insisted that a large bride price be paid for her, it was out of vanity and also to procure money for her family (father or brothers), and not out of concern for her children.

586 583 Divorce. When the wife left her husband to go back to her family, they had to give back the bride price they had received. In general this was a very difficult business, because the bride price was used by the father or the brother to obtain another wife for himself, the Nkita. Thus, in order to be able to return the bride price, they would have to sell this Nkita or give her back to her family and ask for the return of her bride price. There were few other ways to give back the bride price; all their property consisted of wives. Since the family usually could not or would not return the bride price, the deserted husband then sought to become the master of the mother or a sister of his runaway wife, whom he then kept as a hostage. Among the heathens, this was a commonly used expedient to retrieve the wife or the bride price. When the runaway wife discovered that her mother or sister was a prisoner of her former husband, she often went back out of sympathy for her mother or sister. When the wife had gone not to her family but to another man, which was often the case, the family urged this second husband to give the bride price to the first husband. This was usually the only practical means by which the difficulty was resolved. This second husband then paid the bride price to the first. Since the [537] bride price often had been only paid in part by the first one, he then paid the remaining portion to the family.

Sometimes, if there were no way to return the bride price, the woman was forced to go back to her deserted husband. To avoid unpleasant treatment, she had to feign submissiveness.

586 587 As soon as an agreement was arrived at, either with the family or with the second husband, over the return of the bride price, the first bond was considered broken. If the woman was with her family, she was considered free to enter into a new agreement. If, however, she was with another husband, then after the argument she was considered bound to that second husband. The primary bond of their agreement thus appears to be the bride price.

586 If the wife had children, these remained with their father, and the bride price was only partially returned. The value of the children was, so to speak, subtracted from the bride price.

587 When a wife of a polygynist had illicit relations with another
576 man of the same village, this was called bonsomba. When she had such relations with a man of another village, this was called loeke. As we have observed, the ordinary wives of the harem often had such relations. When the woman eloped with her bonsomba or loeke, or with whomever it was, she was pursued by her husband or owner, who tried to get her back. If the wife refused, negotiations over the bride price began.

If an agreement was reached or if a pledge was given as guarantee for the payment, the first bond was considered broken, and the woman was considered bound to this second man, even though he had been her bonsomba or loeke.

It might also happen that the first husband was so jealous that he did not want to make any agreement; then he attempted to kill either the guilty wife or her second husband. If the woman became 593 ill at the home of her husband, he went to tell her family and had to 758 give a security to the family.

583 Often the family came to get the wife, in order to be able to care for her better. If, in such a case, the wife [538] died at the home of her family, there were no further difficulties about the bride price, according to their customs. If, however, the bride price had still not been completely paid, the family asked their son-in-law to pay the remainder.

583 In recent times, now that the heathen customs have been 171 undermined by the European occupation, we see that the husbands whose wives have gone to their family when sick and have died there, demand the return of the bride price from the family, but this is completely contrary to their old customs. In one case the husband could demand the return of the bride price, namely, if the wife had left while healthy to go to her family and had died there.

562 Buying or Trading of Women. The woman was also in many 439 cases an acknowledged object of trade. The great village chiefs, among others Ibaka and Yoma, of whom we shall speak further, carried on a sort of woman trade. With European articles and also native currency, they went to other districts of the Equator [Province] to buy women with them, just like someone who goes to market, even though no public markets where women were sold actually existed.

567
437
562 Everywhere there were also abducted women and female slaves; these were simply sold. Furthermore women were bought and sold with women [as payment]. Also women who were inherited and no longer in the hands of their family were sold by their second, third, or other subsequent husband. In all of these cases, the family no longer came into consideration for the bride price. One would have to stretch the point in order to consider the sums paid in these cases as a bride price, and consequently as a native custom which one must respect.

562
437 Or one should have to assume that such a native woman remains a "bride" for her whole lifetime. It will be said that the woman consented to her sale by one man to the other.

567] Often this was indeed the case, but not always by any means, for children and slaves were also sold. Even the consent of the woman did not prevent it from being a sale; her consent was rather an extra transaction that simplified the sale of a human article of trade. It still remains woman trade.

764
567 The Inheritance. Upon the death of a polygynist, the burial ceremony was conducted according to the class and rank of the deceased. One or two or several [538] slaves were killed and buried with the polygynist in the same grave. Sometimes the arms and legs of these male and female slaves were broken, and then they were buried alive in the same grave with the body.

When these slaves still had family, it might happen that the family members, having learned of the unfortunate lot of their relative, would hasten from faraway districts to buy him or her free if it was not yet too late. Several Negroes have told us of these heartbreaking scenes at which they were present as children. The mourning and the lamenting over the dead lasted from a week to a month. [765]

768
428 The eldest son immediately succeeded his father in position and immediately took one of the wives of his father.

587 The other sons divided among them the lances and knives of their father.

If the deceased had left no son, or if he was still too young, the oldest brother succeeded the deceased. All of the wives had to remain in their own home, except the wife who was immediately taken by the eldest son. They were obliged to await the day of the distribution. This day was put off for from one to four months.

Meanwhile, these wives were subjected to a certain discipline. They were called bituka, which we translate here as "widow." During this time they were allowed to speak with the relatives of the deceased, but they had to remain at home; it was not permitted for anyone to take these wives.

When the time came for the distribution, the one in charge, namely, the son or the brother of the deceased, called together the heirs and parties concerned. On the day of the distribution, in the morning before dawn, the bituka left their dwelling place and went to the man with whom they had already come to an agreement, so that by daybreak all the huts of the bituka stood empty. Each of the wives of the polygynist usually has her own hut. At the appointed hour, the meeting was announced by the usual beating of the tomtom. The wives, the heirs, and all parties concerned then came together.

If there were many wives to distribute, the order of distribution was as follows: in the first place the brothers of the deceased received their share; in the second [540] place came the sons; and in the third place, the grandsons, that is, the sons of the daughters who received their share from the Nkita of their mother. If at this time the wife did not want to go with the man for whom she was designated, she was sold to another. Sometimes the family of the wife was not satisfied with that, and if they could, they gave the bride price back in order thereby to free their daughter or sister. Such a wife then came back to her family, where, however, she was again married in return for another bride price. The family acted thus to prevent its daughter or sister from simply being sold. When the grandsons were still too young, their share of the Nkita of their mother went to their uncle, the son of the deceased. The latter had then to provide a wife for them later, which he usually never did without making a great deal of trouble. If the daughters had no sons who could inherit their Nkita, they received some of the father's personal property as inheritance: goats, dogs, lances, knives, pross, etc. If the deceased had left a daughter but no sons or brothers, the daughter had to supervise the distribution of the inheritance.

Our civilized idea that the wife, the mother of the family, is the first heir, is thus not taken into consideration there. Indeed, the wife, the mother herself, is inherited if she is not too old.

001 What is one to do if even in such cases it is taught, "One must respect" the native customs?

587 The inheriting of wives existed everywhere; it was, in fact,
428 the only wealth left behind by the native. The details of the dis-
[562] tribution differed according to district or tribe. Thus, for instance, in some districts it was the eldest son who alone inherited all of the wives of his father. This was in order to preserve the rank and the class of the family. Prestige and power actually depended only on the number of wives that one possessed. In this case, however, this eldest son had, in place of his father, to provide a wife for his younger brothers and the sons of his sisters. As far as impediments [582] to marriage were concerned, generally they strictly observed the impediment of blood relationship; two blood relatives, even in a distant degree, should never enter into marriage, [541] with the exception of the irregularities mentioned above. As for relatives by marriage, these do not exist for them in any degree. There is, nevertheless, one case that somewhat resembles relationship by marriage, namely, the Nkita might never be in the home of a man together with the woman whose Nkita she was. Thus, the son-in-law or the brother-in-law might never take the Nkita of his wife into his home. If, however, the wife had left or died, there was no further impediment.

587 When, like the inheritance above, the family had returned
428 the bride price and had then married the woman to another man, this 431 second husband also had to give a gift to the one who, according to the law of inheritance, had the right to the wife. This gift was called a bampanga.

587 If the wife who was freed by the family had children, only a 428 part of the bride price had to be returned. Sometimes the wife was freed completely through her children. The children then remained with the family of the deceased husband, and they then represented the value of the bride price of their mother. If, however, such a woman was married again by her family, they demanded a second bride price for that.

587 Sometimes a single woman was the Nkita of several other 428 women. In the inheritance several people then had a right over
583 her, and everyone demanded his share. For instance, a young man

597 428 583 had to acquire a wife with the bride price or with a supplement of the bride price of his sisters. Three of his sisters, for instance, were married, and he needed 3,000 mitako to pay for his intended wife. Now he went with presents to his three brothers-in-law and asked for 1,000 mitako from each of them. The bride price was already paid to the father; the 1,000 mitako that he asks are a supplement of the bride price.

With these 3,000 mitako, our young man pays for his wife. This wife now becomes the Nkita of the three sisters. If this young man dies, his three sisters and his three brothers-in-law all demand their share back from the widow. If she is sold, the price must be divided among the three brothers-in-law. If she remains in the family of her husband, with the uncle or brother, she continues to be the Nkita of her three sisters-in-law.

431 583 [542] There also exists a general rule and custom that the family which has received the bride price regularly give gifts to their daughter and son-in-law or sister and brother-in-law. These gifts consisted of goats, dogs (which also have a rather large value among the natives), ducks, etc., but the gifts never consisted of money. These gifts were in turn given by the son-in-law or brother-in-law to the one who had helped him pay the bride price.

For instance, if the young man of whom we just spoke received gifts from the family of his wife, he would then have given these gifts to his three brothers-in-law. These gifts were often so much that the value of them was almost equal to the bride price that the man had paid for his wife. Custom demanded, in such a case, that the man then pay a supplement to the bride price.

In case the bride price had to be given back, the gifts that the family had already given might be subtracted from the bride price. When such disputes are brought before a European, it is difficult for him to settle them, for the value is tremendously exaggerated by the parties. The husband will demand the return of a much larger bride price than he actually gave, while the family on its side will estimate the gifts that they had given as much higher than the actual value or amount.

436 Something about prices, the bride price for wives, and native money value.

Their first original money was as follows.

436 1. Bonkata: this was thin iron or copper wire coiled into small rings; the thickness of the wire was about 3 millimeters, the length, 20 to 25 centimeters.

2. Bingwele: iron or copper bars about 6 millimeters thick and 15 centimeters long; these are still in use in Bikoro.

436 301 3. Bokete: copper wire; thickness about 7 or 8 millimeters, and 1 meter or 1.50 meters long; spiral shaped; the women wore these coiled around their legs as copper leggings.

[142] 4. Bikonga: copper rings which served as arm bands and foot bands and also as collars. The size differed for small or large persons; the weight is from one half kilo to 5 kilos.

436 5. Mitako: copper wire about 4 millimeters thick and 25 centimeters long, usually bent like a hairpin. The mitako served as a uniform currency, from which the other values and prices were reckoned, like the franc with us. The value of the mitako was formerly reckoned at five centimes.

583 436 Formerly the bride price, which was paid for a wife in almost all of Equatorial Africa, was from 5 to 20 bikonga. (The value of the bikonga differed greatly according to the weight. The average value, however, is estimated at 2.50 francs.) This payment was further supplemented with slaves or wives. This manner of payment and the bride price still exist in the districts where the natives have not yet, or practically not, come in contact with Europeans. Also, [567] it was sometimes paid with only slaves or women. The price for one female slave was relatively much less than for another woman.

178 583 Through the occupation of the Congo by Europeans, the family life of the natives has necessarily undergone great changes, and their customs and habits as well.

In the first place the natives have found themselves deprived of their wives by the sentinels of the Independent Congo State. [661] These black sentinels, appointed in the villages by the State to supervise the reaping of caoutchouc, assumed an unlimited power. They took as many wives of the natives as they chose and did not pay for a single one.

Next many black soldiers, servant boys, and workmen of the Europeans also took wives everywhere in the beginning, without bothering about the native customs, that is, without paying for those wives; and this often happened under the protective power of their Whites.

177 583 We can add to that also a large number of black women who become the famous "housekeepers" of the Europeans. Although payment for these women was usually given to their owners, they were still withdrawn from the family life and the native customs. Finally, the Christian women, who now live in Christian marriage, must also be mentioned.

In addition, the price of wives and the bride price have [544] undergone great changes, primarily in those districts where the natives come into more immediate contact with Europeans. Before the arrival of the Europeans, their main medium of payment was the woman herself; a woman was paid for with a woman. Now it is forbidden to use women as currency. Therefore the natives have raised the price in the payment of bokonga and mitako.

177 583 585 In some districts close to the European centers, the natives have brought the price for wives and the bride price to a height never before known. For one wife they ask several nkoni.

A nkoni is 10,000 mitako. Such a sum is much too high in relation to their means. In a village there are, for instance, 50 women; for one woman, 40,000 to 50,000 mitako are asked, while at present in the whole village together the sum of 50,000 mitako is no more to be found. Therefore to oblige someone to pay two or three nkoni is usually to make it impossible for him to pay, or rather to make it necessary for him to pay with women, which is nothing else than encouraging woman trade, which then occurs.

802 177 A remark should also be made here about the nomenclature of the numerals. Nkoni is not a word of the Equatorial peoples; it was brought in from elsewhere with the Europeans. Their amounts were as follows:

10 was jum or bonkama;

100 was nkoto; and with the arrival of the Whites and foreign population came

1,000 nkoni.

The present numerical value is: 10, jum; 100, bonkama; 1,000, nkoto; and 10,000, nkoni. Some very old Negroes, however, still say bonkama for 10.

[583] This is the probable origin of the great rise in price of wives, especially in the area of Coquilhatville.

178 437 583 When the first Europeans arrived at Leopoldville and Brazzaville, it was not long before European materials and other articles also came to Coquilhatville to the hands of the great village chiefs who carried on trade on the rivers, primarily in slaves and ivory. The village chiefs, Yoma from the village of Boyeka, Ilonko of Boyera, Yomba of [163] Eala, Nkake of Bokala, etc., carried these European articles up the Tshuapa and Ikelemba rivers, and they bought slaves and wives with them.

Returning home again, they bought wives from their own district and paid for them with the slaves and women whom they themselves had bought cheaply with the European articles. For one woman of their district they paid three or four women. The arrival 803 of the Whites and foreign Blacks acquainted them with the number nkesi which, however, in their definition was only 1,000 and which they formerly called 10 nkoto or 10 times 100.

178 583 It was not long before the Europeans had to concern themselves with having disputes over the wives. In the Black land such a thing is unavoidable. Whenever the Blacks came to the Whites with their disputes, they dared not or would not say, "I paid for this woman with three women, but they said, "I paid for this woman with three nkesi," that is, 3 times 1,000 mitako. Meanwhile, the nkoto and nkesi acquired their value of 1,000 and 10,000. The statement, however, that a woman was paid for with nkesi was retained, through the error of the Whites or through the greed of the polygynists or both. Indeed, later some women were paid for with nkesi, namely, when the prevalent currency in the Congo was the mitako. It was also no wonder, for the polygynists had a monopoly on the wives, and it was to their advantage to raise the price.

Therefore, if the native of Coquilhatville says now that his father or his uncle paid for that woman with three or four nkesi, this generally means that the wife was paid for with three or four women. The price of the women in Wangata, near Coquilhatville, was formerly no higher than in the other areas. Many women were paid for with only five bakonga, for instance, in Bokala, near Bamania, a village which belonged to the village chief Yoma of Boyeka.

178 583 435 It should also be noted that the nkesi which have been paid in recent years in Wangata have been paid not in mitako or in

178 currency, but in articles on which the natives fix a conventional 583 price, usually much higher than the actual value. Thus, for in-435 stance, a petaki, or piston rifle, was always reckoned at 2,000 mitako; it did not matter that it was only worth 1,500. There are, [544] therefore, only very few women who are paid for with ebasi in real currency or mitako.

691 The tragic result of this exaggerated rise in prices is that the 583 mutual debts and difficulties among the natives have been increased,
178 so that they are almost impossible to solve. In the attempt to settle a dispute, five other disputes come into it, all equally complicated, for the simple reason that the money, the mitako, to be paid does not exist, and it is forbidden to pay with women. To settle a dispute, several months are sometimes necessary, or a whole year. Other disputes never end, but pass on from father to son and are brought by each one in turn before each new District Administrator. In the districts where the bride price has not been raised, the difficulties and disputes are not nearly as numerous and are easy to solve. In the districts where the purchase price and the bride price of the women have become excessively high, the natives themselves admit that their disputes could formerly be solved easily, but that this is at present almost impossible.

It is unnecessary to say that this situation is harmful to the task of civilizing [the country] and to the mutual good relations of the natives. The natives are constantly coming to the District Administrator of the area to lay before him their disputes over women who have not been paid for. These disputes take up a great deal of the costly time of the administrator. He must hear and settle these usually very complicated disputes, for often the general peace of a village or district depends on it.

Also the natives themselves spend whole days and weeks doing nothing besides holding meetings to discuss the unpayable debts of bride price and the purchase price of wives, simply because the prices are excessive. For lack of currency, they pay each other with each other's debts, which usually complicates the business even more.

To improve this condition, the price of women and the bride price should be lowered, greatly lowered. We have seen that this was possible and practical when once a District Administrator who knew the native customs very well in the area of Coquilhatville really began to do it.

208 [547] Unfortunately the system was not continued. Also, it must not be said that it would be unjust to lower the price of the women. Rather, injustice would then be redressed, a degenerate custom be improved. Through the present system, ever more injustice is committed and suffered.

583 A few polygynists would suffer some material loss through 595 the lowering of the price of the women, namely, by receiving less for one woman than they (sometimes) paid for them, for they inherited most of the women. But they are also the ones who are responsible for the irregular situation. In a large part of the district, the polygynists are by far the minority of the population. They are the ones who are hostile to the Colonial Administration. They are in possession of the women and have a monopoly on them. They fix prices which a young man can almost never pay, namely, two [illegible] at least.

583 The difficulties for Christian marriages become daily still more difficult. This is true for the marriages already entered into and for the future marriages.

583 The bride price to be paid for the wife ought to be such that 428 every young man can pay that sum with his own money, with the 426 money that he has earned himself by his work. This sum cannot
(465) be high, for the ordinary working man in the Congo, who makes up 511] the large part of the population, does not earn much more than what he needs for board and clothing. Therefore to pay an excessively large sum as a bride price forces him to borrow and to run up debts among his relatives and friends. The result of this is that the system of the Nkita goes over unnoticed into the Christian marriages, and the woman remains an object for inheritance. Indeed, when the man dies the creditors will come, namely, those who have loaned him money -- and demand the wife. The disputes over the bride price then begin anew, and they will again give the wife in marriage in return for a new bride price. Thus, there is no end to it. The wife, the mother, will never achieve any rights but will always remain an object of inheritance. There has been talk about declaring the widow free at the death of her husband in order to prevent the inheriting of wives, but how will it be possible to [548] achieve that if the bride price is not lessened, considerably lessened? When a

583 young man can pay for his wife, or rather pay her bride price with 428 his own earned money, then that wife becomes his property. At 426 his death, no creditors or mortgage holders can come to demand the wife since she will then actually be free. There will also be no difficulty in making her heir to the property of her husband, for herself and her children. The bride price or payment for wives among the civilized Blacks could be very much simplified. To abolish it would not be so easy. Indeed, it seems to be in the customs and the habits of the whole Black race. Then too, with respect to bride price, usually still in entanglements with their heathen relatives.

The bride price, as it exists among the heathens, will always remain a source of difficulties for civilization and a support for polygyny.

000 When the price is lowered, the large number of wives of polygynists will be seen to disperse and go to the men who have no wife. Thus, single marriages will be increased, and the district, whose population is greatly decreased, will become populated again. Lowering the price will also prevent women being paid for with women; and thus the trading of women will be hindered, since then the whole bride price can be paid in currency. It is also anticipated that the woman will become less a material object; and by changing the wife from an object of inheritance to an heiress, her moral value will be raised in her own eyes and in the eyes of the men.

In order to civilize the land, Christian marriages must be established. In order to establish Christian marriages, the impediments that stand in the way must be removed, and everything be put to work to benefit what the good outcome of that can assure.

[549] Family Nomenclature

601

The name of:	is given to:
Ise, father	one's own father brothers of the father sons and grandsons of father's sisters

601

The name of:	is given to:
Ngoya Nyango mother	one's own mother sisters of the mother
Bana, children	one's own children children of brothers or sisters children of mother's brothers grandchildren of mother's brothers
Nkoko-nyango, grand-parent	grandfather and grandmother brothers and sisters of grandfather and grandmother children and grandchildren of grandfather's sisters
Nkan'ea jenda, brother Nkan'ey'omoto, sister	by natural brothers and sisters to: the children of two brothers the children of two sisters
Nkana l'ontamba	an expression for "one's own brother and sister
Botomolo	older brother or sister	also used for older or younger contemporaries
Bokune	younger brother or sister
Nyang-obika (1), uncle Ngompame	the brothers of mother

1. We could translate Nyangobika as male mother.

The name of:	is given to:
Ise-omoto (2), aunt	the sisters of father the daughters of father's sisters the granddaughters of father's sisters
Bokilo	son-in-law, brother-in-law, father-in-law, daughter-in-law, sister-in-law
Nkita, substitute	by the daughter to: the extra wife of her father, bought with her bride price her sister-in-law or extra wife of her brother, bought with her bride price

2. We could translate Iseomoto as female father.

CONGO

REVUE GENERALE DE LA COLONIE BELGE

ALGEMEEN TIJDSCHRIFT DER BELGISCHE KOLONIE

TABLE DES MATIÈRES

1922. Tomes I et II

ARTICLES DE FOND.

Engels. A propos de chefferies indigènes . . . . . . Tome I, page 1.
E. Michel. La soie indigène . . . . I, 11.
L. Bittremieux et J. Bruynseels. De legende der halve menschen I. 35.
P. Gallmin. Quelques coutumes matrimoniales des peuplades entre Congo-Ubangi . . . . I. 44.
J. Pieraerts. A propos de l'Heritiera Littoralis Ait. . . . . . I. 49.
B. Tanghe. L'exploration de l'Ubangi (18-4 1891). . . . I, 161 et 366.
Dr J. Maes. Armes de jet des populations du Congo Belge. . I, 181.
L. Bittremieux et J. Lestaeghe. Godsdienstbegrippen bij de Nkundu's van 't Leopoldmeer . . . . I. 194 et 356.
J. P. et F. D. Le copal (suite et fin) . . . . I, 208.
Engels. Administration directe ou administration indirecte au Congo . . . . I. 325.
P. Colle. Les clans au pays des Bashi. . . . . I. 337.
H. Vanderyst. La polyandrie existe-elle au Congo ? . . . . . I. 353.
E. De Jonghe. L'instruction publique au Congo belge . . . I. 501.
G. Kaptein. Familieleven en zeden bij de inboorlingen van den Evenaar . . . . I, 531.
J. Pieraerts. Une matière grasse nouvelle du Congo Belge. « L'huile de copalier » . . . . I. 550.
J. Van Wing. Routes carrossables dans la Mission du Kwango. I, 556.
Mgr. Classe. Le Ruanda et ses habitants. . . . . I. 677
G. Moulaert. La mobilisation industrielle belge au Tanganika en 1916 . . . . I, 691.
Ch. du Bus de Warnaffe. Le mouvement pan-nègre aux États-Unis et ailleurs . . . . I. 713.
L. Achten. Klankleer en spelling der Bantutalen . . . . . . I. 728.
L. Le Grand. De la légalité des villages chrétiens . . . . . II. 1.
R. Anthoine. La mise en valeur des champs aurifères de Kilo-Moto, par la « Régie industrielle des mines » . . . . . . II 8.
F. Mortier. De la réclame indigène pour l'intensification de notre commerce colonial . . . . II, 43.

[title page]

Familieleven en zeden bij de inboorlingen van den Evenaar.

Het zoogenaamde huwelijk, of liever de aanwerving der vrouw geschiedt :

1° Door een bruidschat aan de familie der vrouw gegeven;

2° Door het koopen, of het betalen eener som voor een vrouw die niet meer in de handen der familie is;

3° Door erfenis;

4° Door roof.

De aanwerving door bruidschat wordt genoemd : enga, njengenga : zich verbinden, verloven.

De aanwerving door een koop wordt genoemd : somba, nsasomba : koopen.

De aanwerving door erfenis behoudt gewoonlijk denzelfden titel waaronder de vrouw was aangeworven. Wanneer de overledene vader, oom of broeder de vrouw door bruidschat of koop hebben aangeworven, zal de erfgenaam zeggen : ik heb die vrouw aangenomen door bruidschat, koop, enz.

De aanwerving door roof gebeurde vroeger dikwijls in de onderlinge oorlogen.

In geschilllen zullen de inboorlingen dikwijls zeggen : hij heeft die vrouw gestolen. Dit is gewoonlijk om te kennen te geven dat de vrouw volgens hen op oneerlijke wijze is aangeworven.

De betaling voor bruidschat, koop, enz. geschiedde gewoonlijk met geld, voorwerpen en slaven of slavinnen te zamen.

Deze saamgestelde betaling werd genoemd : songa, nsasonga : gelijkmaken, vereffenen.

Wanneer een inboorling ondervraagd wordt op welke wijze hij zijn vrouw heeft aangeworven, zal hij gewoonlijk zeggen : njoloengaki (ik heb haar bruidschat betaald), omdat hij wel weet dat dit de eerlijkste wijze is. Er zijn echter zeer vele vrouwen die op de andere wijze aangeworven geweest zijn.

De aanwerving door bruidschat begint soms al vóór de geboorte van het vermoede dochtertje. De man, meestal een veelwijver, geeft dan een pand aan den vader van het kind. Dit pand bestaat uit een schoon bewerkt inlandsch mes, of lans, of mitakos. Bij de geboorte van het dochtertje was het in sommige streken de veelwijver die dan de moeder deed verzorgen. Hij liet dan hout sprokkelen, water halen en voedsel bereiden. Als nu het verwachte kind een jongen was, werd gewoonlijk het pand teruggegeven en het contrakt nietig verklaard. Als nochtans degene die het pand gegeven had een dorpshoofd was of een man van groot aanzien, dan trachtte de vader van het kind hem een andere dochter te geven. De vader had bijvoorbeeld reeds vroeger een dochter aan een anderen man gegeven van veel minder aanzien. In bovengenoemd geval gaf hij dan den ontvangen bruidschat terug, nam zijn dochter terug en gaf ze aan den veelwijver van wien hij grooteren bruidschat te wachten had.

Soms werd ook de jongen door den veelwijver aangenomen en bleef in diens familie totdat de vader hem kon inruilen voor een dochter.

Zeer jong en nog kind zijnde, werd het dochtertje in den harem van den veelwijver ingelijfd. Zij werd daar opgevoed tezamen met andere kinderen van haren ouderdom en staat; of liever zij groeide daar op tusschen die heidensche gebruiken zonder eenige opvoeding.

De samenstelling van den harem van een veelwijver :

De eerste vrouw werd genoemd de « Bomatsa »; deze ging alle andere vrouwen in waardigheid voor, en in afwezigheid van den veelwijver was zij de meesteres van den harem.

De tweede vrouw werd genoemd « Ekila »; deze was de meest beminde en ging al de overige vrouwen vóór. Zij werd ook genoemd « Nkonda ».

De derde vrouw werd genoemd « Bolumbu ». Bij de benoeming der Bolumbu hadden er zekere plechtigheden plaats; de vrouw werd bekleed met een dierenvel. De Nku's, een soort van oudvaders en tooveraars, hadden soms drie of vier Bolumbus; deze deden dienst als boodschappers naar andere dorpen. In deze hoedanigheid hadden zij bijzondere voorrechten. Bijvoorbeeld een Bolumbu lastig vallen was een reden tot oorlogverklaring.

De overige vrouwen, waren eenvoudig vrouwen van den harem, zonder onderscheid,

In de streek van Monjoku bij de Bolees werd de eerste vrouw genoemd « Nkisa » met dezelfde waardigheid als Bomatsa. De tweede vrouw werd genoemd « Lonkata ». Dit was echter meer een categorie, want er waren soms 4 Lonkata's in een harem. De overige waren gewone vrouwen. Bij de Ekonda's werd de eerste vrouw genoemd « Nkumokolo » evenals de Bomatsa. De tweede vrouw werd genoemd « Ekila » of « Nkonde ». De overige vrouwen waren de gewone vrouwen van den harem.

De eerste vrouw Bomatsa bleef altijd tehuis en verliet nooit den harem. De tweede Ekila of Nkonde vergezelde overal den veelwijver; op al zijn reizen bleef zij bij hem. De Bolumbu's gingen meestal geheel alleen uit om boodschappen te doen in andere dorpen.

Deze oude zeden van voorrang bij de vrouwen beginnen nu langzamerhand te verdwijnen.

Het was op zware straffen verboden betrekkingen te hebben met de eerste, tweede of derde vrouw van den veelwijver. De straffen waren : de doodstraf, de slavernij, of groote geldboete.

Dit was hun wet op het overspel met zware straf bekrachtigd.

De gewone vrouwen van den harem waren minder streng bewaakt. Dit hing al veeltijds af van de jaloersheid of onverschilligheid van den veelwijver. Degene die betrekking had gehad met deze vrouwen moest een geldboete betalen of liever een prijs van prostitutie. Daar de vrouwen bijna allen in het bezit waren van de veelwijvers, waren er natuurlijk veel mannen zonder vrouw. Dezen nu hadden dikwijls betrekkingen met de gewone vrouwen van de veelwijvers. Ook de zoons van den veelwijver hadden daar betrekkingen mee ; de veelwijver zelf had soms nog betrekkingen met de gewone vrouwen van zijn gebuur. En dit was het slecht gevolg en de onzedelijkheid van de veelwijverij.

Het is gemakkelijk te verstaan dat de gewone vrouwen van den veelwijver met anderen in betrekking zijnde, dikwijls hun man, of liever hun meester verlieten om bij een anderte gaan. De gewone vrouwen maakten het grootste getal uit. Vandaar dat men nu vele vrouwen vindt die opvolgelijk 3 of 4, ja soms 7 verschillende mannen gehad hebben. Bij sommige stammen, onder anderen bij de Ekondas, was men strenger : een vrouw die reeds tweemaal of meer haar man of meester verlaten had werd beschouwd als weinig waarde hebbende.

De slavinnen welke in den oorlog genomen waren, werden door den veelwijver aan zijn slaven als vrouw gegeven. Het gebeurde ook dat zij in den harem werden ingelijfd bij de gewone vrouwen. Hunne kinderen konden dezelfde rechten bekomen als de overige kinderen van den veelwijver.

De veelwijver zocht altijd het getal zijner vrouwen te vermeerderen, want daardoor steeg zijn aanzien en vermeerderde zijn fortuin. Als men in de beschaafde landen zijn fortuin zoekt te vergrooten, geschiedt dit, zegt men, om de toekomst zijner kinderen te verzekeren. De inboorling denkt daar weinig op ; zijn voornaamste inzicht is zelf te genieten en anderen in aanzien en achting te overtreffen. En wat de toekomst zijner kinderen betreft, er zijn veelwijvers die 20 of 30 vrouwen bezitten of nog meer en soms maar één of twee kinderen hebben. Ook is het weinig volgens hun begrip om voor de toekomst te zorgen : wie morgen nog leeft moet morgen maar zorgen, zoo redeneeren zij. Integendeel, in plaats van voor zijn kinderen te zorgen, maakte de veelwijver dikwijls veel moeilijkheid om een vrouw aan te werven voor zijn zoon. En dan werd de zoon nog geen eigenaar van zijn vrouw, het was als 't ware nog maar een leening. Slechts na den dood van zijn vader werd hij eigenaar. In sommige streken wanneer de vader een vrouw aangeworven had voor zijn zoon, hield hij deze vrouw eerst eenigen tijd voor hemzelf. Slechts na eenige maanden gaf hij ze aan zijn zoon. In andere streken, wanneer de vrouw van den zoon bevrucht was, moest hij ze eenige dagen naar zijn vader sturen : hij mocht alleen de eer van het vaderschap niet dragen, zijn vader moest dat met hem deelen. De vader behield zich de eer om alle kinderen zijn kinderen te noemen. In sommige streken van den Congo waren de zeden zoo laag en gemeen, dat de vader zelfs zijn eigen dochters in zijn harem behield. Dit gebeurde niet in den Evenaar, maar daar bestond een gebruik dat al niet veel beter was. De toovenaar werd namelijk soms geraadpleegd over den bruidschat welke de vader voor zijn dochter of de broer voor zijn zuster zocht te krijgen.

De toovenaar gaf hun dan den raad dat zij zelf eerst betrekkingen zouden hebben met hun eigen dochter of zuster. En dit gebruik bestond bijna overal in den Evenaar.

Bruidschat. — In 't algemeen werd de dochter ten huwelijk gegeven tegen betaling van een bruidschat. De vader had weinig voorkeur voor den toekomstigen man van zijn dochtertje. Degene die de meeste waarborg leverde van goed te betalen was zeker haar te krijgen? En daar in de meeste gevallen het dochtertje nog niet tot de jaren van verstand was gekomen, was er natuurlijk geen spraak van hare toestemming. De bruidschat werd niet in eens betaald maar langzamerhand met de jaren dat het dochtertje opgroeide. Daar het dochtertje zonder hare toestemming aan een ouden versleten grijsaard gegeven was, gebeurde het natuurlijk dikwijls dat, eenmaal tot volwassen ouderdom gekomen zijnde, zij niet langer bij hem wilde blijven. Zij verliet hem dus, en ging bij een ander ofwel naar haar familie terug. In dit laatste geval ontstonden er echter groote moeilijkheden, aangaande het teruggeven van den bruidschat. Immers met den bruidschat welken de vader voor zijn dochter ontvangen had kocht hij zich eene andere vrouw. Deze vrouw werd dan genoemd de « Nkita » van de dochter. Nkita zouden we in dit geval kunnen vertalen door « plaatsvervanger ». De Nkita vertegenwoordigde de waarde van de verkochte of uitgehuwde dochter. Ondertusschen was de dochter zelf ook dikwijls de Nkita van de dochter of zuster van haar man. Zoo waren vele vrouwen de Nkita van elkander. Volgens hun gebruiken waren in theorie de kinderen (de jongens) de erfgenamen van de Nkita hunner moeder. De Nkita was immers de waarde of de bruidschat hunner moeder.

Men zou kunnen vragen of de vrouw dan steeds tevreden was dat zij als 't ware een voorwerp van den handel was. In 't algemeen ja, zij was daarmee tevreden. Zoo immers waren de zeden, en niemand dacht er aan daar iets aan te veranderen. Meestal bevond de vrouw zich in een afgedane zaak, (fait accompli). Langzamerhand begint er een zeker eergevoel te ontstaan bij de christene vrouwen tegen die heidensche gebruiken.

En als de vrouw verlangde dat men voor haar een grooten bruidschat of prijs betaalde, was het dan ook omdat zij voor de toekomst harer kinderen wilde zorgen die de erfgenamen van haar bruidschat zouden zijn? Neen, zeggen ze, daarom niet — want, voegen zij er bij, welke vrouw wist vooraf dat zij kinderen zou hebben, en nog wel jongens. Er zijn namelijk zeer vele vrouwen welke geen kinderen hebben. — En voor de erfenis komen enkel de jongens in aanmerking, de meisjes zijn enkel erfgename bij name. En wanneer het op de erfenis aankwam, erfden de kinderen de Nkita van hunne moeder alleen dan, als er geen broers meer waren van de moeder of ooms van den kant haars vaders. De sterksten hadden altijd het meeste recht.

Meestal moest een jongeling zich een vrouw aanwerven met den bruidschat of supplement van den bruidschat van zijne zuster. — De erfenis van de Nkita zijner moeder kwam slechts op de tweede plaats. En nog dikwijls zien wij een heidensche vrouw haren man verlaten om bij eenen andere te gaan, zonder zich veel te bekommeren met hare kinderen die bij den verlaten man, hun vader blijven.

Als de vrouw tevreden was en er aan hield dat men een grooten bruidschat voor haar betaalde, was het uit ijdelheid en ook om geld te bezorgen aan haar familie (vader of broers) en niet uit voorzorg voor haar kinderen.

Echtscheiding. — Wanneer de vrouw haren man verliet om naar hare familie terug te gaan, moest deze den ontvangen bruidschat teruggeven. In 't algemeen was dit een zeer moeilijke zaak, omdat de bruidschat gebruikt was door den vader of den broer om zich een andere vrouw aan te werven, de « Nkita ». Dus om den bruidschat terug te kunnen geven, zouden zij deze Nkita moeten verkoopen of deze ook aan hare familie teruggeven en den bruidschat terugvragen. Andere middelen om den bruidschat terug te geven bestonden er weinig : al hun vermogen bestond in de vrouwen. — Daar de familie meestal den bruidschat niet kon of wilde teruggeven, zocht de verlaten man dan zich meester te maken van de moeder of van een zuster zijner weggeloopene vrouw, welke hij dan vasthield als gijzelaar. Dit was een gewoonlijk gebruikt middel bij de heidenen om de vrouw of den bruidschat terug te krijgen. Wanneer de weggeloopene vrouw vernam dat haar moeder of zuster gevangene was bij haar vroegeren man, ging zij dikwijls terug uit medelijden voor hare moeder of zuster. Wanneer de vrouw niet naar hare familie maar naar een anderen man was gegaan, wat dikwijls het geval was, zette de familie dezen tweeden man aan om den bruidschat te geven aan den eersten man. Dit was gewoonlijk het eenigste pratieke middel waardoor de moeilijkheid werd opgelost. Deze tweede man betaalde dan den bruidschat aan den eerste terug ; en, daar de bruidschat door den eerste dikwijls nog maar gedeeltelijk betaald was, betaalde hij het overige deel aan de familie.

Somtijds, als er geen middel was om den bruidschat terug te geven, werd de vrouw gedwongen naar haren verlaten man terug te gaan. Om onaangename behandeling te voorkomen, moest zij dan onderdanigheid huichelen.

Zoodra er een overeenkomst gesloten was 't zij met de familie, 't zij met den tweeden man over de teruggave van den bruidschat, werd de eerste verbintenis beschouwd als verbroken zijnde. Indien de vrouw in de familie was, werd zij beschouwd als vrij om een nieuwe verbintenis aan te gaan. Was zij echter bij een anderen man, dan werd zij na de overeenkomst beschouwd als verbonden te zijn met dien tweeden man. De voornaamste band van hun vereeniging schijnt dus te zijn de bruidschat.

Indien de vrouw kinderen had, bleven dezen bij hun vader, en de bruidschat werd maar gedeeltelijk teruggegeven. De waarde der kinderen werd om zoo te zeggen van de bruidschat afgetrokken.

Wanneer een vrouw van eenen veelwijver ongeoorloofde betrekkingen had met eenen anderen man van het zelfde dorp, noemde men dit « Bonsamba ». Wanneer zij zulke betrekkingen had met eenen man van een ander dorp heette men dit « Isoke ». Gelijk wij aangemerkt hebben, de gewone vrouwen van den harem hadden dikwijls zulke betrekkingen. Wanneer de vrouw er van door ging met haren bonsamba of isoke, of met gelijk wien, werd zij vervolgd door haren man of eigenaar welke trachtte haar terug te krijgen. Indien de vrouw weigerde, begonnen de onderhandelingen over den bruidschat.

Als men tot een overeenkomst kwam of als er een pand gegeven werd als waarborg voor de betaling, werd de eerste verbintenis beschouwd als verbroken zijnde, en de vrouw werd beschouwd als verbonden zijnde met dezen tweeden man, al was dit zelfs hare bonsamba of isoke geweest.

Het gebeurde ook wel dat de eerste man zoodanig jaloersch was, dat hij geen overeenkomst wilde maken; dan zocht hij of de schuldige vrouw of haren tweeden man te dooden. Indien de vrouw ziek werd bij haren man, ging deze hare familie verwittigen, en moest een pand geven aan de familie.

Dikwijls kwam de familie de vrouw halen om haar beter te kunnen verzorgen. Indien in zoo'n geval de vrouw kwam te sterven bij hare familie waren er geen verdere moeilijkheden meer over den bruidschat, volgens hun gebruiken. Indien echter de bruidschat nog niet geheel betaald was geweest, vroeg de familie aan hun schoonzoon om de rest te betalen.

In de laatste tijden, nu de heidensche gebruiken geschokt zijn door de Europeesche bezetting, zien wij dat de mannen wier vrouwen ziek naar de familie gegaan zijn en daar gestorven zijn, den bruidschat terugeischen van de familie — maar dit is geheel tegen hunne oude gebruiken. In één geval kon de man de bruidschat terug eischen, namelijk als de vrouw gezond naar hare familie vertrokken was en daar gestorven was.

Het koopen of de vrouwenhandel. De vrouw was in vele gevallen ook een recht voorwerp van den handel. De groote dorpshoofden o. a. Ibuka en Yoma, waarvan we verder nog zullen spreken, dreven een soort vrouwenhandel. Met Europeesche artikelen en ook inlandsche munt begaven zij zich naar andere streken van den Evenaar om daarvoor vrouwen te koopen, evenals iemand die naar de markt gaat, ofschoon er wel geen openbare vrouwenmarkten bestonden.

Overal bestonden ook geroofde vrouwen en slavinnen : deze werden eenvoudiglijk verkocht. Verder werden de vrouwen met vrouwen gekocht en betaald. Ook de vrouwen welke geërfd waren en niet meer in handen hunner familie waren, werden door hun tweeden, derden of zooveelsten man verkocht. In al deze gevallen komt de familie niet meer te pas voor bruidschat. Men zou in al deze gevallen al veel goeden wil moeten gebruiken om de betaalde sommen als bruidschat te beschouwen, en bijgevolg als een inlandsch gebruik « qu'il faut respecter ».

Of men zou moeten aannemen dat zoo'n inlandsche vrouw geheel haar leven lang « bruid » blijft. Men zal zeggen dat de vrouw in haren verkoop door den eenen man aan den andere toestemde.

Dikwijls was dit wel het geval, maar lang niet altijd want ook kinderen en slavinnen werden verkocht. En zelfs de toestemming der vrouw sluit toch den verkoop niet uit ; hare toestemming was eerder een bijkomende zaak die den verkoop van een met rede begaafd handelsartikel vergemakkelijkte. Het blijft altijd vrouwenhandel.

De Erfenis. — Bij den dood van een veelwijver, deed men de begrafenisplechtigheden volgens den stand en de waardigheid van den overledene. Met doodde een of twee of verschillende slaven welke met den veelwijver in hetzelfde graf begraven werden. Somwijlen brak men aan die slaven en slavinnen armen en beenen, en dan werden zij levend in het zelfde graf met het lijk begraven.

Wanneer deze slaven of slavinnen nog familie hadden, gebeurde het dat deze familieleden, het ongelukkig lot van hun familielid vernomen hebbende, van verre streken kwamen toegesneld, om hem of haar vrij te koopen als het nog niet te laat was. Verschillende negers hebben ons van die hartverscheurende tooneelen verhaald welke zij als kind hadden bijgewoond. De rouw en het weegeklag over den doode duurde van een week tot een maand.

De oudste zoon volgde terstond zijn vader in de waardigheid op, en nam terstond een van de vrouwen zijns vaders.

De andere zonen deelden onder hen de lansen en messen huns vaders.

Indien de overledene geen zoon had nagelaten, of dat deze nog te jong was, volgde de oudste broer des overledenen hem op. Alle vrouwen moesten in hun eigen woning blijven, behalve de vrouw die terstond door den oudsten zoon werd genomen. Zij moesten den dag voor de verdeeling afwachten. Deze dag werd uitgesteld van één tot vier maanden. Ondertusschen waren deze vrouwen aan een zekeren levensregel onderworpen. Zij werden « Bituka » genoemd, hetgeen wij nu door « weduwe » vertalen. Gedurende dezen tijd mochten zij spreken met de familieleden des overledenen, maar zij moesten te huis blijven; aan niemand was het toegelaten deze vrouwen aan te nemen.

Als de tijd voor de verdeeling gekomen was, riep de voorzitter, namelijk de zoon of de broeder des overledenen, de erfgenamen en belanghebbenden bijeen. Op den dag der verdeeling, 's morgens voor dag en dauw, verlieten de bitukas hunne woning en gingen naar den man met denwelke zij reeds overeengekomen waren, zoodat met het krieken van den dag alle hutten van de bitukas ledig stonden. De vrouwen van de veelwijvers hebben gewoonlijk ieder hun eigen hut. Op het aangewezen uur werd de vergadering aangekondigd door het gebruikelijk getrommel op den tamtam. De vrouwen, de erfgenamen en alle belanghebbenden kwamen dan te zamen.

Indien er vele vrouwen te verdeelen waren, was de orde der verdeeling als volgt : Op de eerste plaats kwamen de broers van den overledene om hun aandeel, op de tweede plaats kwamen de zoons, en op de derde plaats de kleinzoons, 't is te zeggen de zonen van de dochters die kwamen om hun aandeel van de « Nkita » hunner moeder. Indien nu de vrouw niet wilde meegaan met dengene aan wien zij toekwam, werd zij aan een ander verkocht. Somwijlen was de familie der vrouw daarmede niet tevreden en, indien zij konden, gaven zij den bruidschat terug om zoodoende hunne dochter of zuster vrij te maken. Zulke vrouw kwam dan aan hare familie terug, waar zij echter weer uitgehuwelijkt werd tegen een anderen bruidschat. De familie deed aldus om te beletten dat hun dochter of zuster eenvoudig verkocht werd. Wanneer de kleinzonen nog te jong waren ging hun aandeel « de Nkita hunner moeder » naar hun oom, de zoon des overledene. Deze moest hun dan later eene vrouw bezorgen, hetgeen hij gewoonlijk nooit deed zonder groote moeilijkheden te maken. Indien de dochters geen zonen hadden die hunne « Nkita » konden erven, ontvingen zij als erfenis het een en ander van 's vaders roerende goederen, geiten, honden, lansen, messen, prauwen, enz. Indien de overledene wel een dochter maar geen zonen of broers had nagelaten moest de dochter de verdeeling der erfenis voorzitten.

Ons beschaafd idée, dat de vrouw, de moeder des huisgezins, erfgename is op de eerste plaats, komt daar dus niet in aanmerking, immers de vrouw, de moeder zelf, wordt geërfd als ze niet te oud is.

Wat zal men er aan doen, indien zelfs in zulke gevallen wordt geleerd « il faut respecter » de inlandsche gebruiken.

Het erven der vrouwen bestond overal, 't was immers de eenige nagelaten rijkdom van den inlander. De bijzonderheden voor de verdeeling verschilde volgens sommige streken of rassen. Zoo b. v. in sommige streken was het de oudste zoon die alleen alle vrouwen zijns vaders erfde. Dit was om den rang en den stand der familie te bewaren. Aanzien en gezag immers hing ook enkel af van het getal der vrouwen welke men bezat. In dit geval echter moest deze oudste zoon zorgen in de plaats zijns vaders om een vrouw te bezorgen aan zijn jongere broers, en de zonen zijner zusters. Wat de beletsels voor het huwelijk betreft, zij onderhielden over 't algemeen streng de beletsels van bloedverwantschap, nooit zouden twee bloedverwanten zelfs in verren graad een huwelijksverbintenis aangaan, uitgenomen bovengenoemde ongeregeldheden. Wat aanverwantschap betreft, deze bestaat voor hen niet in geen enkelen graad. Er is nochthans één geval dat iets gelijkt op aanverwantschap : namelijk de « Nkita » mocht nooit bij een man zijn te zamen met de vrouw waarvan zij de Nkita was. De schoonzoon dus of de schoonbroer mocht nooit de Nkita zijner vrouw bij zich nemen. Als echter de vrouw vertrokken was of gestorven, was er geen beletsel meer.

Wanneer, bij de erfenis gelijk boven, de familie den bruidschat teruggegeven had en daarna de vrouw aan een anderen man uitgehuwelijkt had, moest deze tweede man ook nog een geschenk geven aan dengene welke, volgens erfrecht, recht op de vrouw gehad had. Men noemde dit geschenk een « bampanga ».

Indien de vrouw welke door de familie vrij gemaakt werd, kinderen had, moest er slechts een gedeelte van den bruidschat teruggegeven worden. Somwijlen was de vrouw zelfs geheel vrij door hare kinderen, immers de kinderen bleven aan de familie van den overleden man, en vertegenwoordigden dan de waarde van den bruidschat hunner moeder. Werd echter zulk een vrouw later door hare familie wederom uitgehuwelijkt, eischte zij daarvoor een tweeden bruidschat.

Somtijds was eene enkele vrouw de Nkita van verscheidene andere vrouwen. In de erfenis hadden dan verschillende personen recht op haar en iedereen eischte zijn aandeel. Bijvoorbeeld, een jong mensch moest zich een vrouw aanschaffen met den bruidschat of met een supplement van den bruidschat zijner zusters. Er waren, bijvoorbeeld, drie zijner zusters getrouwd, en hij had 3,000 mitako's noodig om zijn aanstaande vrouw te betalen. Nu ging hij met geschenken naar zijn drie schoonbroers en vroeg van hen elk 1,000 mitako's; de bruidschat was reeds vroeger betaald aan den vader, de 1,000 mitako's die hij vraagt zijn een supplement van den bruidschat.

Met deze 3,000 mitako's betaalt onze jonge man zijne vrouw. Deze vrouw nu wordt de « Nkita » van de drie zusters. En indien deze jonge man komt te sterven, zullen zijne drie zusters en zijne drie schoonbroers alle hun aandeel terug eischen van de weduwe. Indien zij verkocht wordt, moet de prijs verdeeld worden onder de drie schoonbroers. Indien zij in de familie van haar man blijft bij oom of broer, zoo blijft zij de « Nkita » van hare drie schoonzusters.

Er bestaat ook een algemeene regel en gewoonte dat de familie welke den bruidschat ontvangen heeft, geregeld geschenken geeft aan hunne dochter en schoonzoon of zuster en schoonbroer. Deze geschenken bestonden in geiten, honden (welke gewoonlijk ook een tamelijk groote waarde hebben bij de inlanders), eenden, enz.; maar nooit bestonden de geschenken in geld. Deze geschenken werden door den schoonzoon of schoonbroer opnieuw gegeven aan degenen welke hem zijne bruidschat hadden helpen betalen.

Bijvoorbeeld indien de jonge man waarvan we zoo even gesproken hebben, geschenken ontving van de familie zijner vrouw, zou hij dan deze geschenken gegeven hebben aan zijne drie schoonbroers. Deze geschenken waren dikwijls zooveel, dat de waarde ervan bijna gelijk was aan den bruidschat welken de man voor zijn vrouw betaald had. De gewoonte eischte in zoo'n geval dat de man dan een supplement van den bruidschat betaalde.

In geval dat de bruidschat moest terug gegeven worden, mochten de geschenken welke de familie reeds gedaan had van den bruidschat afgerekend worden. Wanneer zulke geschillen voor een Europeaan gebracht worden, is het voor dezen moeilijk daarin te beslissen, want door partijen wordt de waarde verschrikkelijk overdreven. De man zal veel grooteren bruidschat terug eischen dan hij in werkelijkheid gegeven heeft, terwijl de familie van haren kant de geschenken welke zij gegeven had veel hooger zal rekenen dan de werkelijke waarde of hoeveelheid was.

Iets over den prijs, den bruidschat der vrouwen en inlandsche geldwaarde.

Hun eerste oorspronkelijk geld was:

1° De Beukata, dit was dun ijzer- of koperdraad opgerold als kleine ringen, de dikte van den draad ongeveer 3 millimeters, de lengte 20 tot 25 centimeters;

2° Bingetele waren ijzeren of koperen staafjes ongeveer 8 millimeters dik en 15 centimeters lang, deze zijn nog in gebruik in Bikoro;

3° Bekata, koperdraad, dikte ongeveer 7 of 8 millimeters en 1 meter of 1^{m}50 lang, spiraalvormig: opgerold de vrouwen droegen deze rond haar beenen, als koperen laarzen;

4° Bakongas, koperen ringen die tot armbanden en voetbanden en ook als halsbanden dienden. De grootte verschilde voor kleine of groote personen, het gewicht is van een halven kilo tot 5 kilo;

5° De mitako, koperdraad ongeveer 4 millimeters dik en 25 centimeters lang gewoonlijk geplooid gelijk een haarspeld. De mitako diende als eenheidsmunt waar de andere waarden en prijzen op berekend werden, gelijk bij ons de frank. De waarde van de mitako was vroeger berekend op 5 centiemen.

Vroeger was de bruidschat op den prijs welken men voor een vrouw betaalde bijna in geheel den Evenaar van 5 tot 20 bakongas. (De waarde van de bakongas verschilde veel volgens het gewicht. Men schat echter de gemiddelde waarde aan fr. 2.50.) Deze betaling werd vervolgens aangevuld met slaven of vrouwen. Deze wijze van betaling en bruidschat bestaat nog in de streken waar de inlanders nog niet of bijna niet in aanraking gekomen zijn met de Europeanen. Men betaalde soms ook wel met enkel slaven of enkel vrouwen. De prijs voor eene slavin was betrekkelijk veel minder dan voor een andere vrouw.

Door de bezetting van Congo door de Europeanen heeft het familieleven der inlanders noodzakelijkerwijze groote veranderingen ondergaan, ook hunne zeden en gewoonten.

Vooreerst hebben de inlanders zich hunne vrouwen zien ontnemen door de sentinelles van den Onafhankelijken Congo Staat. Deze zwarte sentinelles in de dorpen aangesteld door den Staat om over het inoogsten der caoutchouc te waken, matigden zich, een onbeperkte macht toe. Zij namen zooveel vrouwen van de inlanders als zij verkozen en betaalden geen enkele.

Vervolgens hebben vele zwarte soldaten, de boys en de werklieden der Europeanen ook overal vrouwen genomen in het begin, zonder zich nog aan de inlandsche gebruiken te storen, 't is te zeggen zonder die vrouwen te betalen, en dit gebeurde dikwijls onder de beschermende macht van hunnen Blanke. Voegen we daarbij nog een groot getal zwarte vrouwen die « de fameuses ménagères » geworden zijn van de Europeanen. Ofschoon deze vrouwen meestal wel betaald werden aan hun eigenaars, werden zij toch ook aan het familieleven en de inlandsche gebruiken onttrokken. Eindelijk moet men ook noemen de christenvrouwen die nu in een christelijk huwelijk leven.

Ook heeft de prijs der vrouwen en de bruidschat groote veranderingen ondergaan, voornamelijk in die streken waar de inlanders meer dadelijk in betrekking kwamen met de Europeanen. Vóór de aanwezigheid der Europeanen was hun voornaamste betaalmiddel de vrouw zelf; men betaalde eene vrouw met eene vrouw. Nu is de vrouw een verboden betaalmiddel geworden. Daarom hebben de inlanders den prijs verhoogd in de betaling van bakongas en mitakos'.

In sommige streken, dicht bij de Europeesche centrums, hebben de inlanders den prijs voor de vrouwen en den bruidschat tot een vroeger nooit gekende hoogte gebracht. Voor eene vrouw vragen zij verscheidene « nkesi's ».

Een « nkesi » is 10,000 mitako's. Zulk eene som is veel te hoog in betrekking tot hunne middelen. Want in een dorp bijv. zijn 50 vrouwen; voor ééne vrouw vraagt men 40,000 tot 50,000 mitako's, terwijl men tegenwoordig in het geheele dorp tezamen de som van 50,000 mitako's niet meer zal vinden. Daarom iemand verplichten van 2 of 3 nkesi's te betalen, is hem gewoonlijk in de onmogelijkheid stellen te betalen, ofwel hem in de noodzakelijkheid zetten met vrouwen te betalen, hetgeen niet anders is dan den vrouwenhandel bevoordeelen, wat dan ook gebeurt.

Er valt hier ook een bemerking te maken over de benaming van de getallen. « Nkesi » is geen woord van de Evenaars bevolking, het is ingebracht van elders met de Europeanen. Hun getallen waren als volgt :

10 = was jum of bonkama.
100 = was nkoto; en met de aankomst der Blanken en vreemde bevolking kwam
1.000 = nkesi.

De tegenwoordige getallenwaarde is : 10 = jum, 100 = bonkama, 1,000 = nkoto en 10,000 is nkesi. Sommige zeer oude negers zeggen evenwel nog bonkama voor 10.

Ziehier de waarschijnlijke oorzaak van de groote prijsverhooging der vrouwen voornamelijk in de streek van Coquilhatville.

Wanneer de eerste Europeanen te Leopoldville en te Brazzaville waren aangekomen, duurde het niet lang of de Europeesche stoffen en andere artikelen kwamen ook tot Coquilhatville in de handen van de groote dorpshoofden, die handel dreven op de rivieren voornamelijk in slaven en ivoor. De dorpshoofden Yoma van het dorp Boyeka, Ibuka van Boyere, Yamba van Eala, Nkake van Bokele enz. voeren met deze Europeesche artikelen de rivieren de Tshuapa en de Ikelemba op, en zij kochten daarmede slaven en vrouwen.

Terug te huis gekomen kochten zij vrouwen van hun eigen streek et betaalden deze met de slaven en vrouwen, welke zij zelf goedkoop hadden gekocht met de Europeesche artikelen. Voor eene vrouw van hun streek betaalden zij dan drie of vier vrouwen. De aankomst van de Blanken en vreemde zwarten bracht hun in kennis met het getal « nkesi » dat in hun meening echter maar 1,000 was en dat zij vroeger 10 nkotos noemden of 10 × 100.

Het duurde niet lang of de Europeanen moesten zich inlaten met hun geschillen over de vrouwen te aanhooren. In het Zwarte land is zulks onvermijdelijk. Wanneer de Zwarten zich met hun geschillen bij de Blanken aanboden, durfden zij of wilden zij niet zeggen : ik heb die vrouw met drie vrouwen betaald; maar zij zegden dan, ik heb die vrouw met drie nkesis betaald, dat is te zeggen 3 × 1,000 mitako's. — Ondertusschen bekwamen de nkoto en de nkesi hunne waarde van 1,000 en 10,000. De benaming echter dat een vrouw met nkesis betaald werd, bleef bestaan door de vergissing der Blanken of door de hebzucht der veelwijvers of door allebei. En later zijn inderdaad verschillende vrouwen met nkesis betaald geworden, namelijk toen de gangbare munt in Congo de mitako was. Het was ook geen wonder, want de veelwijvers hadden de monopole van de vrouwen en hadden alle belang om den prijs te verhoogen.

Daarom, als nu de inlander van Coquilhatville zegt dat zijn vader of zijn oom die vrouw drie of vier nkesis betaald heeft, wil dit algemeen zeggen dat die vrouw met drie of vier vrouwen betaald is geworden. De prijs van de vrouwen in Wangata, bij Coquilhatville, was vroeger niet hooger dan in de andere streken. Vele vrouwen zijn betaald geworden met slechts vijf bakonga's, zoo o. a. in Bokala, bij Bamania, welk dorp behoorde aan het dorpshoofd Yoma van Boyeka.

Het is ook nog op te merken dat de nkesis die de laatste jaren in Wangata zijn betaald geworden niet in mitako's of in munt zijn betaald geworden, maar in artikelen aan welke de inlanders een conventionelen prijs vaststellen, gewoonlijk veel hooger dan de werkelijke waarde is. Zoo, b. v. een « pataki » of pistongeweer werd altijd gerekend voor 3,000 mitako's — het deed er niets toe dat het maar 1,500 waarde had. Er zijn daarom maar zeer weinig vrouwen die met nkesis betaald zijn in echte munt of mitako's.

Het noodlottig gevolg van deze overdreven prijsverhooging is dat de onderlinge schulden en moeilijkheden bij de inlanders verhoogd zijn, dat er bijna niet meer aan uit te komen is. Om een geschil op te lossen komen er vijf andere geschillen bij te pas, allen even erg ingewikkeld, om de eenvoudige reden, dat het geld « de mitako's » om te betalen niet bestaat, en met vrouwen betalen is verboden. Om een geschil op te lossen heeft men somwijlen verschillende maanden noodig, of een geheel jaar; andere geschillen eindigen nooit, maar gaan van vader op zoon over, die ze elk op hunne beurt aan elken nieuwen Staatsbestuurder komen voorleggen. In de streken waar de bruidschat niet verhoogd is geworden, zijn de moeilijkheden en geschillen lang zoo menigvuldig niet en gemakkelijk om op te lossen. In de streken waar de prijs en de bruidschat der vrouwen overdreven hoog geworden is, bekennen de inlanders zelf, dat hun geschillen vroeger gemakkelijk opgelost konden worden, maar dit tegenwoordig bijna niet meer mogelijk is.

Onnoodig te zeggen dat deze stand van zaken schadelijk is aan het beschavingswerk, en aan de onderlinge goede verstandhouding der inlanders. Gedurig komen de inlanders bij den Staatsbestuurder der streek om hem hunne geschillen van niet betaalde vrouwen voor te leggen. Deze geschillen nemen een groot deel in van den kostelijken tijd van den bestuurder. En hij moet deze meestal zeer ingewikkelde geschillen aanhooren en beslissen, want dikwijls hangt de algemeene rust van een dorp of streek daarvan af.

Ook de inlanders zelf brengen gansche dagen en weken door niets anders doende dan vergadering houden om te redeneeren over de onbetaalbare schulden van bruidschat en prijs der vrouwen, enkel omdat de prijs overdreven is. Bij gebrek aan munt, betalen ze elkander met elkanders schulden, hetgeen meestal de zaak nog meer inwikkelt.

Om dezen toestand te verbeteren zou men den prijs der vrouwen, den bruidschat moeten verminderen, veel verminderen. Dat dit middel mogelijk en pratiek was, hebben we gezien toen, in den tijd, een Staatshoofd die zeer wel de inlandsche gebruiken kende in de streek van Coquilhatville daarmede werkelijk begonnen was.

Ongelukkiglijk is men niet doorgegaan met dat systeem. Men moet ook niet zeggen dat men onrechtvaardigheid zou doen met den prijs der vrouwen te verminderen. Men zou hiermede veeleer eene onrechtvaardigheid herstellen, een ontaarde gewoonte verbeteren. Door het tegenwoordig systeem immers wordt er meer onrechtvaardigheid begaan en geleden.

Eenige veelwijvers zouden door de vermindering van den prijs der vrouwen eenige stoffelijke schade lijden, namelijk door minder voor eene vrouw te ontvangen dan zij er (somwijlen) voor betaald hebben, want de meeste vrouwen hebben zij geërfd. Maar 't zijn ook zij die de schuld zijn van den ongeregelden toestand. In een groot gedeelte van de streek zijn de veelwijvers ver de minderheid der bevolking. 't Zijn zij die vijandig zijn aan het Staatsbestuur. Zij zijn in het bezit der vrouwen en hebben er het monopool van. Zij stellen de prijzen vast welke een jongmensch bijna nooit kan betalen, namelijk twee nkesis op zijn minst.

De moeilijkheden voor de christelijke huwelijken zijn steeds met den dag moeilijker geworden. Dit geldt voor de reeds aangegane huwelijken, en voor de toekomende huwelijken.

De bruidschat, voor de vrouw te betalen, zou zoodanig moeten zijn dat elk jongmensch die som kan betalen met zijn eigen geld, met het geld dat hij zelf verdiend heeft met zijn werk. Die som kan niet hoog zijn, want de gewone werkman in Congo, die het grootste deel der bevolking vormt, verdient niet veel meer dan hetgeen hij voor kost en kleeren noodig heeft. Daarom een overdreven groote som als bruidschat te betalen, verplicht hem om leeningen te gaan doen en schulden te maken bij zijn bloedverwanten en vrienden. Het gevolg hiervan is dat het systeem van de « Nkita » ongemerkt in de christelijke huwelijken overgaat, en de vrouw een erfgoed blijft. Immers, wanneer de man komt te sterven, zullen de schuldeischers komen, namelijk die hem het geld geleend hebben, en de vrouw opeischen. De geschillen van den bruidschat herbeginnen dan en zij zullen de vrouw weer uithuwelijken tegen een nieuwen bruidschat, en zoo komt men tot geen einde. De vrouw, de moeder, zal nooit eenig recht bekomen, maar steeds een erfstuk blijven. Men spreekt wel van de weduwe vrij te verklaren bij den dood van haren man, om het erven der vrouwen te beletten, maar hoe zal men daartoe geraken als men den bruidschat niet vermindert, veel vermindert? Wanneer een jongmensch zijne vrouw of liever haren bruidschat kan betalen met zijn eigen gewonnen geld, dan wordt die vrouw zijn eigendom. Bij zijn dood, kunnen er dan geen schuldeischers of hypotheekhouders komen om de vrouw op te eischen, want zij zal dan waarlijk vrij zijn. Er zal dan ook geen moeilijkheid bestaan om haar erfgename te maken van de goederen van haren man voor haar en hare kinderen. Men zou den bruidschat of de betaling der vrouwen bij de beschaafde zwarten veel kunnen vereenvoudigen. Afschaffen zou zoo gemakkelijk niet gaan; immers het schijnt in de zeden te zijn en in de gebruiken van geheel het zwarte ras. Dan ook de christenen zijn in zake van bruidschat gewoonlijk nog in verwikkelingen met hun heidensche bloedverwanten.

De bruidschat, gelijk hij bestaat bij de heidenen, zal altijd een bron van moeilijkheden blijven voor de beschaving en een steun voor de polygamie.

Wanneer men den prijs vermindert, zal men langzamerhand de troepen van vrouwen van de veelwijvers zien uiteengaan naar de mannen die geen vrouw hebben. Zoo zullen de enkelvoudige huwelijken vermeerderd worden, en de streek, welker bevolking zeer verminderd is, weer bevolkt worden. Men zal met den prijs te verminderen ook voorkomen dat vrouwen niet meer met vrouwen betaald worden, en zoo den vrouwenhandel beletten, want de geheele bruidschat zal dan in munt kunnen betaald worden. Men zal ook voorkomen dat de vrouw minder als een voorwerp van materiale waarde beschouwd wordt, en door de vrouw van erfgoed in erfgename te veranderen, zal men hare morale waarde verheffen in haar eigen oogen en in de oogen der mannen.

Om het land te beschaven moet men christelijke huwelijken stichten. Om christelijke huwelijken te kunnen stichten moet men de beletselen wegnemen die in den weg staan en alles in het werk stellen om te bevoordeelen wat den goeden uitslag daarvan kan verzekeren.

Familiebenamingen.

De naam van :	wordt gegeven aan :
Ise = vader	eigen vader broers van vader zoons en kleinzoons van vaders zusters
Ngoya Nyango } moeder	eigen moeder zusters van moeder
Bana = kinderen	eigen kinderen kinderen van broers of zusters kinderen van moeders broers kleinkinderen van moeders broers
Nkoko-nyango = grootouder	grootvader en grootmoeder broers en zusters van grootvader en grootmoeder kinderen en kleinkinderen van grootvaders zusters
Nkan'ea jenda = broer Nkan'ey'omoto = zuster	door : eigen broers en zusters aan de kinderen van twee gebroers de kinderen van twee gezusters
Nkana l'ontamba	= een uitdrukking voor « eigen broer en zuster ».
Botomolo	= oudere broer of zuster
Bokune	= jongere broer of zuster
	} wordt ook gebruikt voor oudere of jongere evennaaste
Nyang-obika (1) Ngompame } oom	= de broers van moeder
Ise-omoto (2) = tante	de zusters van vader de dochters van vaders zusters de kleindochters van vaders zusters
Bokilo	schoonzoon, schoonbroer, schoonvader schoondochter, schoonzuster
Nkita = plaatsvervanger	door de dochter aan : de bijvrouw van haar vader, met haar bruidschat gekocht haar schoonzuster of bijvrouw van haar broer, met haar bruidschat gekocht

(1) Nyangobika, zouden we kunnen vertalen door mannelijke moeder.

(2) Iseomoto, zouden we kunnen vertalen door vrouwelijke vader.

Fr. Gregorius Kaptein
Missionaris.

7:Brown M-5 (ca. 1940) 1944 FO32 Mongo FO32
Ntomba

000

AFRICA

JOURNAL OF THE INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AFRICAN LANGUAGES AND CULTURES

JOURNAL DE L'INSTITUT INTERNATIONAL DES
LANGUES ET CIVILISATIONS AFRICAINES

ZEITSCHRIFT DES INTERNATIONALEN INSTITUTS
FÜR AFRIKANISCHE SPRACHEN UND KULTUREN

VOLUME XIV

1943–4

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
LONDON : HUMPHREY MILFORD

[Title page]

7:Brown M-5 (ca. 1940) 1944 FO32 Mongo FO32
Ntomba

THE NKUMU OF THE TUMBA

RITUAL CHIEFTAINSHIP ON THE MIDDLE CONGO

H. D. BROWN

101 THE tribes living round Lake Tumba, a lake some thirty-five miles long by twelve wide lying north of Lake Leopold II (approximately 0° 30′ south latitude, [133] and 18° east longitude) and draining into the Congo River at the confluence of the Ubangi, lack cohesion and show a considerable variety of custom and language. But they are known collectively as Tumba, the Government adaptation of the Native term Ntomba. Most of them are found to the east of the lake, the whole group numbering perhaps little more than forty to fifty thousand at the present time, though
[797] there is evidence that the last twenty years have seen a great decrease in population. European occupation of this area goes back barely fifty years, Protestant missions having been established for about the same length of time. The first mission post [177] was established at Ikoko on the north-east shore of the lake, one of the villages of a group known as Bonginda. In pursuing this investigation particular attention has been given to the practices of this group, but mention is occasionally made where considerable differences have been found elsewhere.

105 The Tumba are agricultural, hunting, and fishing people. Their country is flat
13 and swampy with dense forests, and there are many watercourses flowing into Lake Tumba. There are occasional small, less swampy plains, and one such area, more open, with quite wide stretches of prairie, is a haunt of buffalo. The forests are fairly wel supplied with game, and the swamps, streams, and lakes with fish. A heavy rainfall and no distinct dry season make agriculture reasonably easy and famine unknown. Every family has its plantation of manioc, the staple diet, which is supplemented by plantains and bananas. The people make their own tools, formerly smelting their own iron for this purpose, are fairly skilful at making dug-out canoes, engage in weaving raffia and making mats out of split cane, and are efficient at pottery production.

624 The role of the nkumu in the socio-religious activities of the community is one of the most interesting features of Tumba life. As a result of European contact the 101 ceremonies connected with the nkumu are rapidly disappearing, but it has been
178 possible to collect considerable information from the older men and women among whom the details are still vividly remembered.[1] The following report refers to the period previous to European occupation and control, a time within the memory of a large number of people, but already sufficiently remote to become a matter of hearsay before the lapse of many more years.

596 An understanding of the place of the nkumu among the Tumba requires a glance
[173] at the tribal organization. According to the people themselves, they migrated westward, and coming into these parts chose land for themselves. Among the several

---

[1] In My Children of the Forest, New York, 1924, pp. 48–51, Andrew F. Hensey has briefly outlined some of the items of interest observed among the nkumu of the district adjacent to that of the present study. These more detailed notes are, however, timely if a record is to be preserved that approximates to accuracy.

596 invading groups of kinsfolk there was always one who was considered as the family head, and this man could claim the title of momene mokonda, the owner of the land. Round this man the rest of the members of the family group clustered, and he had the general direction of their affairs. He could scarcely be termed a chief, having a paternal oversight rather than exercising any wide authority demanding organizing ability and political astuteness. The succession of momene mokonda runs collaterally through younger brothers in the first place; hence if a first-born male happens to hold that position, the succession among his younger brothers is in the order of their birth. When these have all died the succession passes to the next generation. If all the males of a group die, it is possible for a daughter's son to leave his father's side in order to assume the position of momene mokonda on his mother's side.

A momene mokonda can delegate his duties as head to another member of the family, who is then termed molomi o ehe, the husband of the settlement. For such a privilege payment is generally made to the momene mokonda. Round these momene mokonda and their immediate kinsmen others gathered, forming, it may be, another section of the same settlement, known then as an etuka, or, if numerous, another settlement.[1]

624 The momene mokonda (or molomi o ehe) hears and judges cases that come to him, aided always by a group of elders, and directs the activities of the settlement. However, 693 this does not entirely satisfy the Tumba; they want an nkumu also. The nkumu is chosen, not by the whole settlement, but by a single village, or it may be even one etuka of a village. If the villages of a settlement were without an nkumu it would generally, but not necessarily, be the etuka of the momene mokonda which would lead off by seeking one out. The group desiring an nkumu are known as the molembe, and they look about for a man of the same tribe but not of the same settlement or village, an outsider. He must be a man of some wealth, for actually he will buy his right of authority and pay heavily for it. If the man who is approached accepts, he is known from then on until his accession as Nkema Akuke, the term nkumu not being used until he is finally invested with the insignia of office, the montolo, or hat of special design. Nkema Akuke's family is known as the ekopo, or mango. This man, 556 once having accepted the invitation to become nkumu, sets about amassing wealth in the form of wives and brass rods. He may be years about it, but he does not thereby forfeit his right to the office, nor apparently weary those who extended the invitation.
Should Nkema Akuke die before he is installed as nkumu, or should he wish to withdraw from the honour bestowed upon him, the succession passes to another member of his ekopo. The succession would normally pass to the eldest male of the ekopo, 787 but many circumstances may interfere to give it to another member of the family.
A dream dreamed by a male of the ekopo to the effect that he should be the nkumu is sufficient to give him the right of succession over the eldest male. When asked 689 whether it was common to lie about such a dream having occurred, in order to gain the right of succession, those questioned received the suggestion with emphatic negatives, for this is no time to lie; any man so doing would be sure to die, and the fear of death would deter him from such baseness.

---

[1] Where practical, the invested chiefs set up by the Belgian Colonial Government are men chosen because of their right to be known as momene mokonda or molomi o ehe. Often, however, the settlements are so small and lacking in cohesion that it has been necessary to set up chiefs arbitrarily over chieftaincies very much larger then were their own hereditary spheres of influence.

fear of death would deter him from such baseness. Another sign of the chosen 624 successor is some untoward experience, such, for example, as finding cowrie shells (worn by nkumu) in a trap in the forest or a net that had been put out to catch fish.

Nkema Akuke, whether the first of his line or a man succeeding in the office, bears [293] the emblems of his rank. He wears an ilelembe (a branch of a special bush) stuck into his belt on the right side and hanging downwards. The special hat, montolo, worn [292] by nkumu is not yet his to wear, but he wears an ordinary skin hat known as lopope, which is the mark of any elder. This hat may be ornamented with feathers if so desired.

When Nkema Akuke decides that he has acquired sufficient wealth to enable him [302] properly to claim the right of being made an nkumu, he begins his preparatory arrangements. Mbili, a mixture of charcoal with some sticky substance, is smeared over his body with plantain leaves. All ornamented clothing is discarded and a single cloth [292] woven from raffia, and known as molele, is worn. He refuses to sit on the benches usually used and instead sits on the bare earth. All this is explained as an attempt on the [516] part of the man about to be raised to the office of nkumu to be different from others, a man apart, separate, peculiar, not partaking in the ordinary interests and affairs of his fellow men.

Nkema Akuke now leaves his own village accompanied by all his wives and [533] children, and also by a singer, nyemba, who is paid to sing his praises, and by several male Batwa (pygmies), up to half a dozen in number, known as ntotii because of their [563] duty of blowing gourds and producing sounds which indicate praise of the great [534] man. This party makes the round of villages wherever relatives are found, and the announcement is made that Nkema Akuke is about to become an nkumu. This 624 pilgrimage accomplished, a 'doctor' (nkanga) is visited by the aspirant to office, 791 who seeks by magic to discover whether it is the propitious time for the ceremony of installation. The whole company retires to the private enclosure at the rear of the 787 house belonging to the nkanga chosen, this being the place where he performs his wonders. The nkanga resorts to nningo, that particular branch of magic which has to do with reasons for strange and unaccountable phenomena.[1] Nkema Akuke now seeks some sign as confirmation of his determination to claim his office at this time. Some native pepper may be wrapped in a leaf or merely covered by it, and left within sight of all, and upon being opened it may be found to have turned into salt, or perhaps it may be some earth that is thus turned to salt. Or a cock may be placed upon Nkema Akuke's head and covered with a basket and thus left for some time. Upon removing the basket it may be discovered that an egg has been laid. All such tests, 624 if successful, will be regarded as indications that it really is time for Nkema Akuke to assume the office of nkumu, but if the test fails he will usually go ahead with his plans anyhow, fearing the shame that would come to him should he go back to his home after having made the triumphant round of his relatives' homes. However, should he act thus, and he most certainly will, he knows that his days are numbered,

---

[1] If a man's fields do not produce and he cannot understand why, he will resort to nningo. If it is suspected, for example, that the trouble is caused by someone making 'medicine', an arrow shaft is put into a small hole in the ground, and at each name mentioned, the arrow can be pulled out if the person is innocent, but remains stuck fast in the hole at the mention of the guilty name.

624 and that he may have no more than a month or perhaps a year in which to live and will surely die speedily.

The special objects attaching to the office of nkumu, among these the hat, montolo, and stool, mbata, are at the same time subject to similar magical arts to determine whether they may be produced for the new nkumu's use. They are not present, being in the possession of the molembe which will appoint him, but are mentioned by name. Apart from the montolo, no further ceremony is required to identify these [302] objects with their future owner.

The nningo ended, the Nkema Akuke smears black mbili all over his body again, 624 before the rites begin to determine which of his wives is to be known as Nsono, 787 the one who will be closest to her husband throughout his days. For this, magic formulae (bienzako, sing. eenzako) are used. All the wives sit round in a circle and the nkanga places some irritant such as ground pepper in the eyes of all the women. The wife whose eyes stream most and whose discomfort is also accompanied by a violent [827] shaking of the body is known to be Nsono. Here again, lying is believed to be out of the question, for the shaking of the body is something that is supposed to be impossible of simulation, the real being easily distinguished by all from the false. Nsono is now stripped of all clothing and her body smeared by the nkanga with yellow clay on one side, and with white on the other. A belt of leaves is put round her waist 624 and a small bit of cloth between the legs with each end attached to the belt. Near by 789 a gourd with 'medicine' in it has been standing ready for the next step in the ceremonies, and this is now smeared with white clay, a parrot's feather stuck in the neck, and handed to Nsono, who receives it in one hand. Into the other hand is put a section of plantain stalk, into one end of which has been stuck a parrot's feather. A third feather is placed in her mouth so that she cannot speak, greet anyone, or eat. She is now tied with a cord which is held by one of the young men attending Nkema Akuke. At this point of the procedure the nkanga states his price [791] for his work, which will be in the neighbourhood of one hundred brass rods, worth 435 to-day about fifty francs, but formerly double that amount. The future nkumu, accompanied as before, leaves for the village of the molembe. Nsono starts off at a tremendous pace, for she is now imbued with a sort of frenzied strength, and for this reason has been tied up and put in charge of a strong young man, otherwise she would be off so fast that no one could catch her, and would go into the forest, where she would live for days unseen.

624 In the village of the molembe the party all sit in an ebanga belonging to one of the elders. This is the place where the Tumba men really live—their houses are just [343 sleeping and cooking establishments, but the ebanga, having a roof for shade and no walls, is the place where the men congregate and spend their leisure time. It is also 342 the site of the village smithy, which takes up one end. Here, then, Nkema Akuke and his party sit for a day and a night, and neither he nor Nsono may eat food or drink [262] wine during this period. Games are played by the molembe—mock battles, dances, and [517] songs chiefly of battle, and before the first streaks of dawn appear the group in the ebanga begins to march up and down the village singing.

At dawn the whole party, accompanied by a large crowd, make their way to a place in the bush where there is an elevation of some sort. Here Nkema Akuke climbs up and takes his stand, accompanied by Nsono. Now the molembe choose the Bilepo

624
292
285

Mentole, the hat worn by the nkumu as the symbol of his office

[facing page 434]

Now the Molembe choose the Bilepo.

624 Okoke, a young woman of their own number, who will thereafter be known by this [533] name. She is an official cymbalist and must always begin beating before others may join in. In reality the members of the molembe have decided beforehand who shall be chosen for this position, and the woman of their choice now takes her stand on the elevation together with Nkema Akuke and his wife, Nsono.

624 The member of the molembe whose right it is by inheritance to place the montolo (see Plates) upon the head of the nkumu now comes forward with it. This hat, about 292 twelve inches in height, is woven of raffia and cylindrical in shape, but the brim, instead of being at the base, encircles the top of the crown. It is usually decorated with a burnished brass plate attached to the front, and perhaps a second one behind, and in these modern days it is quite in style to hang a row of safety pins from the 'brim' or 'halo' encircling the crown. When the nkumu is the first of his line, the montolo is purchased by him, but in the case of succession it is that used by the deceased predecessor, and has been kept by the molembe until this time. It is his badge of office and sign of authority. The bringing out of the montolo is an occasion for 624 merriment. Nkema Akuke calls for his montolo, but the molembe tease and tantalize him and ask for money. The amount is a fixed sum, but Nkema Akuke pays out at first but a few rods, is teased for more, and so on until he has provided the total amount, usually about one hundred. The member of the molembe whose duty it is to place the montolo on the head of the nkumu begins to tease the crowd. He chooses various names by which the nkumu might be called, everybody knowing all the time what his name must be. He asks the people, 'Shall we call him so-and-so?' 'We refuse', reply the people. 'Or so-and-so?' 'We refuse.' And each time names whereby nkumu are known are repeated. Finally the correct name is given, as, 'Shall we call him Nkumu Lobondola?' and the crowd roars its approval, 'Ooooo!' The montolo then being placed on Nkema Akuke's head he now becomes Nkumu and leaps down among the crowd, who bear him off to their village with rejoicing. In the choice of names, the first nkumu in a village is known as Nkumu Lobondola. If there is another section of the village with an nkumu of its own, he must take another name, such as Nkumu Iyeli Bokonga. Successors must always take the names of their predecessors whatever their own personal names may be. An nkumu chosen by a molembe [554] which is also the momene mokonda, the hereditary owner of the land, is known as Nkumu e Bitindi (Nkumu of the heels), for he occupies a more important position than his fellows, and is thus the support which holds up the whole group of nkumu chosen by other melembe.

624 The nkumu is borne off to his nongo, his residence, which in this case is temporary, to be replaced later by a permanent one. The nongo comprises the whole unit of 342 buildings for the nkumu, including his own sleeping quarters, the houses for his wives, the ebanga where he spends the daylight hours, and a row of houses for his children. His ebanga and his own sleeping quarters are screened from the public gaze, making [351] a place known as ipana. In the case of a new nkumu the screen is temporary, but when the permanent nongo is built, a permanent ipana is made by planting umbrella trees (melembe, sing. molembe) in a rectangular or circular fashion. Here, sheltered 624 from intrusion, the nkumu remains in retirement (auli) for a month.[1] While he remains

---

[1] Auli refers to the sitting of a hen on eggs, the seclusion of a woman after childbirth, or of the nkumu at this juncture of the ceremonies.

624
292
285

Montolo, the hat worn by the nkumu as the symbol of his office

[facing page 435]

624 thus, Nsono is a very prominent figure. Still arrayed as previously described, she sits outside the nongo near the road on the special stool of the nkumu. Nobody may pass her with food, a humane law, considering that she must spend the day fasting. If anyone attempts to do so she catches the unlucky individual, helps herself to as much of his food as she wants, the victim meanwhile begging her to be merciful and leave him a small portion, and the booty is taken into the ipana. During this sentinel duty Nsono must still keep the parrot's feather in her mouth and maintain silence, so, in case she catches an unsuspecting bearer of food, the remonstrance and argument are all one-sided.[1] After the first day Nsono no longer sits outside the nongo but goes from place to place in the village, choosing spots where people may least expect her, hoping thus to reap a bigger harvest for her pains. This is kept up for eight days, which comprise two Tumba ' weeks ' of three days' work and one of rest. The rest-day is appropriately named boina bo nsono after the duty of Nsono of sitting doing nothing day by day. The eight days of this ceremony over, Nsono lays aside her gourd and plantain stalk, which are placed at the foot of the first central supporting post [302] of the ebanga on entering. She is given a fresh coating of chalk and three coloured stripes are drawn the length of her back and down her arms. She still remains close to the nkumu.

[567] Various personalities are connected with the nongo of an nkumu. The Basele is a male slave, clothed in a skin breech cloth, whose duty it is to receive callers at the ipana before admitting them to the presence of the nkumu.

624 Mpenge is the name taken by the wife first married by the nkumu. From henceforth 595 she no longer accompanies her husband, and their cohabitation ceases unless the nkumu is willing to pay her each time the sum of one hundred rods. But the nkumu is obliged to eat all food she cooks for him even though they have a quarrel. Mpenge does not honour her husband with the special greeting accorded to nkumu, but greets her husband and all other nkumu as she would ordinary people.[2] The second wife of an nkumu must assume the name of Iyombo Anganda, but no importance attaches to her position.

624 Among the Tumba generally, apart from the Bonginda, a woman is chosen from 516 the molembe to bear the title Bolumbu Itina i Ekopo (Bolumbu, the ' raison d'être ' of the ekopo). She is, it would seem, a symbolical figure, a reminder that the ekopo owes its existence to the molembe of which this woman becomes the titular head. While the nkumu is still in seclusion the chosen woman is taken to the open space between the ipana and the row of sons' houses, known as the nanda. Here, in the presence of the assembled crowd she is praised by being addressed, 'Bolumbu Itina, bototo!' and the crowd exclaims, 'Bwoo!'[3] Strips of leopard skin, about eighteen

---

[845] [1] It is interesting to note that there are some exceptions to those who may be caught and robbed by Nsono during her eight days of watching. No member of the molembe may be thus treated, twins and their parents are exempt, and also all children born to the nkumu before he attains office, these being termed maomi.

[554
595] [2] Besides Mpenge, a mother of twins is also exempt from according nkumu special salutations, and among some groups the father of twins is also exempt.

[3] This ceremony gives husbands of any village, whether they are members of the molembe or not, the opportunity to single out a favourite wife for special honour, for at this time any woman may be given the name of Bolumbu, though not with the significant complement of Itina i Ekopo. The ceremony is similar, is performed at the nanda, but besides receiving the strips of leopard skin, she must be divested of all her clothing, a new lomboo and mpongo are then placed round her, and the strips of skin then attached to the new belt.

624

inches long and two inches in width, numbering up to seven are brought and attached [546] to the back of her lomboo by folding them over it.[1]

The first male child which was born to the nkumu before he acceded to the office is 852 known as Iyomi Nkoi. If he has none, then the right to this name passes to the first male child to be born to his younger brothers. Any child born on the day that the 624 nkumu is given his montole is also called Iyomi; if a male he will be Mala Iyomi; if a [551] female, Mpembe Iyomi.[2] These children must not see the nkumu until they are old enough to know his name and greet him properly, and so they are taken to some village other than the one in which he has his residence. When such children are considered old enough to take up residence in the village of the nkumu it is an occasion for revelry, a big dance, nteko, is held, and there is a feast. The child, Iyomi, is brought to the village of the nkumu with rejoicing, and this is a signal for everybody desiring to do so to help himself to anything belonging to the nkumu. Goats and fowls may be killed and eaten, sugar-cane rooted up, bananas, plantains, and other crops growing near by seized for food. Because of this custom the nkumu will take precautions and send his livestock, at least, off to some other village in order not to lose more than he can help.[3]

The nyemba, the singer or singers, and the ntotii, the praisers already mentioned, 624 remain with the nkumu during his period of seclusion. Added to these is ntombe 533 lokombi, the bearer of the lokombi, a stringed instrument played with the fingers, 534 similar to a bass viol in its general appearance.

Inside the ipana during the seclusion of the nkumu, few people have the right of 624 entrance, but as one enters the ehanga where the daylight hours are spent, one finds the couch of the nkumu on the left and towards the rear. On the same side and towards 342 the front are seated the ntombe lokombi and the nyemba. Nsono's couch is to the right 352 of, and parallel to, that of the nkumu, but still to the left of the centre posts. To the right of her couch is the fire in the centre, and beyond the fire on the right side is a couch for the maomi, likewise somewhat to the rear, with a space in front for the ntotii.

The month's seclusion being completed, the nkumu prepares to buy the homage of 624 the village. Nsono gets rid of her decorative colours, and assumes ordinary attire, becoming like any other of the wives, and is ready to take up all the usual duties of 576 a wife, whether in the garden or at the house. The people are called to come and render to the nkumu their homage and praise. The men come to the ipana, are admitted to the presence of their nkumu and seat themselves on the bare earth with their legs wide apart and facing him. They then, without uttering a word, greet him in the

---

[1] The lomboo is a belt which used to be worn by Tumba women encircling the buttocks, and this was used to attach their only garment, the ekoto among the Bonginda, this being a short loin cloth, or an nkongo among other groups, this being a woven cloth strip worn between the legs.

[2] When a new nkumu assumes office, one already in office will take this opportunity of getting more of his sons named Iyomi. He takes them to the molembe of the new nkumu, and having placed a bracelet of cowrie shells on the right wrist, and sometimes one on the right ankle, asks the member of the molembe whose right it is to give away the montole to name these sons Mayomi (pl. of 'Iyomi'). This man will then take such a son, and presenting him to the people introduce him by giving him a name, and following with praise as, 'Owe Iyomi Linime, botato!' and the crowd replies with the customary 'Bowo!' [291]

[3] It is well to remember that not every individual bearing names associated with the institution of the nkumu is directly concerned with it. With the practice of 'resurrecting' dead relatives by naming new-born children after them, such names as these become widespread. [551]

624 customary manner, with a double clap. They are told by the nkumu to repeat the salutation, and having done so may be asked to do it a third time. They are then 576 given a few rods in payment. If the nkumu sees some member of his own ekopo coming to greet him, he gives him special honour by ordering him to lie flat on his back instead of merely sitting, and at the end he gives him a larger gift of rods than the others receive. In this way the nkumu may pay out a great many rods to those who thus render him homage. Ordinarily a man will receive five or six, but one 624 specially honoured may be given as many as twenty. From the beginning the nkumu has to pay heavily for his honours, and only a wealthy man can hope to attain them.
[556] For this reason a lawful successor, if not wealthy, may be glad to give up his rights to another more fortunate member of the ekopo. Homage having been paid, word is sent out that the nkumu is about to come forth, and crowds begin to gather. A coat [302] of red camwood powder mixed with oil is smeared over the nkumu, the brass plates are attached to his montolo, and he is attired in all his finery. The crowd outside dances, and when tired sits on the ground to await the rest of the ceremony. Inside, [533] the lokombi begins to play, the nyemba to sing, and the Batwa ntotii to praise the nkumu by uttering an ululating sound. Accompanied by Nsono, Bilepo, and the maomi, the nkumu himself begins to dance. The temporary protecting screen round the ipana is pulled down, and he is seen by all. After his dance he retires again and the crowd disperses.

When Nkema Akuke becomes nkumu he changes everything possible so as to [481] become different from other men. Thus he assumes a different gait, a sort of bow-legged waddle, a different tone of voice, and it seems that under this influence even his facial features undergo a change. Accompanied by his retinue, he visits the various villages where he has friends and relatives in order to greet them. This over, the musicians wish to take their departure and are paid for their services by the nkumu.

624 At the conclusion of these ceremonies the nkumu with his ekopo and the molembe negotiate concerning their obligations to one another. If the nkumu is the first of his 596 line, he and his ekopo are given land to cultivate, while succeeding nkumu simply take over the land originally accorded. The molembe call their nkumu their wife, and they 621 designate themselves husband. They thus reckon the relationship between molembe and ekopo to be that of husband and wife, and, as in an actual marriage, there must be an interchange of obligations performed in a spirit of harmony. Also, as in marriage a wife may be divorced, so an nkumu with his ekopo could be sent off to their home and the arrangement terminated. It not infrequently happened that as strangers the ekopo fell out with their hosts and if such a disagreement could not be righted they might be refunded the payments with which they had purchased their rights, and sent off home.

Among the reciprocal obligations of molembe and ekopo are included the sharing 224 of certain animals and birds killed in the hunt, among which are the leopard and 624 elephant. All killed, whether male or female, must be divided. Of certain other animals, including the wild pig, antelope, and buffalo, if a female, no portion is given, 621 if a male, the required portion is presented. These reciprocal obligations are limited 596 strictly to the ekopo and molembe; if others outside of these groups wish to present the nkumu with meat to honour him or to curry favour, they may do so, but they are under no compulsion./ If one of the contracting parties fails to fulfil its pledges in this matter 224

of giving part of the kill, or in anything else, the aggrieved party may call the council 624 together. This consists not only of members of the molembe and ekopo, but of all 596 elders of the village or villages connected with this particular one. The party judged in the wrong, whether ekopo or molembe, will be fined, the injured party receiving its 621 share, and both parties will be charged to live together harmoniously and observe their contracts.

The power of the nkumu was apparently limited, and did not supersede that of 624
the momene mokonda. When trials came up, the aggrieved party might go either to the 695
momene mokonda or to the nkumu. If it was necessary to call the village elders together about it, both these authorities were present at the hearing. First the young men of the group were allowed to give their verdict, then the old men, after that momene mokonda (or the molomi o ehe), and finally the nkumu was given the privilege of the last word. He would comment on the opinions of each of the judges, criticizing one young man, commending another, and then giving his own verdict, at which the group would assent by saying, ' Even so, grandfather '. The whole group of judges would then fix the fines, a double portion of which went to the nkumu.

The actual manual labour which an nkumu may do excludes anything endangering 624 life or limb, or requiring agility and speed. He may clear the bush for his gardens:
this is a man's work. He may take part in the building of his houses, but may do no high work, and, among the inland groups, it is the work of the Batwa to put the [563] roof on for him. The nkumu may also prepare pitfalls for catching game, but cannot engage in any other type of hunting or do any fishing. Digging a grave is prohibited, for, as we shall see, everything pertaining to death must be ignored by the nkumu.

Other rules affecting the daily life of the nkumu may be roughly divided into three: those affecting his person, those having to do with his food, and social regulations.

One of the great points of observance in the first class of regulations is the impor- 624
tance of the montolo. The nkumu must on no account be seen during daylight hours 292 with an uncovered head. If he wishes relief from the cumbersome montolo he may take it off in the darkness of his house and put on an ordinary hat made of skins, and when night falls he may walk where he will bareheaded if he so desires. The skin hat, known as louku, may be made from two animals only, in the case of an [824]
nkumu, one being the nkulupa, a species of antelope with light-coloured hair, and the other the iyoko, an animal resembling a beaver. The skin of the nkulupa may be used by anyone, but the iyoko is reserved for the nkumu only with one exception. The skin of the iyoko may also be used for the carrying strap for infants known as nyambo, [854] which is worn over one shoulder in bandoleer fashion. For the nkumu the skin of the iyoko is limited to the informal hat, louku, and for making into the lokoto, a pouch used for carrying small objects and worn like a sporran. As a corollary to the importance of the montolo may be noted the importance attached to the head of the nkumu, which must never be seen uncovered in daylight.

The Bonginda nkumu never wash in the daytime, but may wash at night with hot 624 water. The inland nkumu never wash. Even the Bonginda nkumu never wash their 515 heads, and no nkumu ever cuts his hair. If the nkumu becomes too greatly inconvenienced, one of his wives may delouse his head, but only within the privacy of the [184] house, by the light that enters the rear opening.

624 An nkumu can never walk alone, but must always be accompanied by others, and on no occasion whatsoever may he run. Even though he never washes, if he is out [481] in the rain and sees everybody else hurrying for shelter, he will not quicken his pace. [513] His movements must be slow and deliberate. The nkumu never sleeps alone; waking and sleeping he is attended by someone. But apart from this he is free to go where he wishes. The nkumu is not indiscriminate, as others may be, in his private habits, but [514] must use his own latrine at all times, and if travelling must have his own latrine in each place where he stays. The inland nkumu frequently take advantage of this custom [556] by hiding their accumulated brass rods at the bottom of a freshly dug latrine. Such hidden wealth will be acquired by an inheritor at the decease of the nkumu.

In speaking of himself the nkumu never refers to himself by his title but always by his own name.

624 The couch upon which the nkumu sits or reclines during the daytime may not be shared indiscriminately with others, but those permitted to sit upon it at the same 352 time as the nkumu are maomi, women, and Batwa. The reservation of this couch for [562 the use of the nkumu is not surprising, but the exceptions are. One explanation given was that women and Batwa are not bato ba zse, persons in particular; they do not 563] count for anything in the social life of the community; they are not really 'people'. Another explanation was that they do not pay fines, this being tantamount to saying [672] that they are exempt from laws and therefore cannot break laws even by doing what would be for others an illegal act. The stool of the nkumu, however, has closer restrictions in the manner of its use. Besides the nkumu only two others may sit upon it, Nsomo and Mpenge. It is always carried by one of his wives, though not necessarily by any special one.

624 The restrictions concerning the food of the nkumu are many. He may eat food only in his own house, or, if on a journey, in one given over for his use. He may not 262 enter another house to partake of food even if invited to do so. Likewise the nkumu may not eat in the forest, or eat or drink anywhere along the road when on a journey, but must wait until he arrives at a village and has a house at his disposal in order to partake of food and drink. He never 'sleeps with hunger'; even if a wife or child should die causing him great sorrow he must partake of food before going to sleep. [765] The Bonginda nkumu must never go into mourning, and death must be ignored by them, but the inland nkumu are permitted to mourn. All food carried to an nkumu must be covered, this rule even applying to water. Food must not be placed in a basket with high sides (eboko), but in a shallow one (moyala), and no food that has been kept overnight in a pot may be eaten by him: swelling of the abdomen will result. Various foods are taboo, among these all fast-moving snakes, though slow- [824] moving ones may be eaten; light-coloured palm-nuts may not be eaten, and a variety of yam known as monkiki is shunned, for it is with the tough stems of the monkiki that the dying body of the nkumu will be bound to ensure the sitting posture necessary for burial.

624 Among regulations roughly classed as social, we have already covered several in references above, and have referred to the nkumu in council. It may be added here that [623] he is expected to agree with the majority of the councillors and not fall out with them. The rules affecting the mongo of the nkumu are accompanied by severe penalties. There [689] must not be any fighting; if anger is aroused to the point of blows the antagonists must go to the mankeke for their fight, this being the location of the houses belonging to the sons of the nkumu. 624

The penalty for breaking this law is a fine, and if no 689 fine were forthcoming hanging used to be the alternative. If a quarrel arises elsewhere and one party wishes to avoid fighting, he may retire to the nongo and thus be safe. No trees in the nongo may be climbed. There are, however, privileged classes exempt from all such rules, and these embrace a good many people. Thus, the mother [845] of twins, twins, Batwa, maomi, and all members of the molembe and ekopo are exempt from the laws of the nongo. If any of these commit acts which are illegal for those [672] coming under the law, they are not held guilty, but their actions will not be condoned; they will be considered breaches of good conduct, and will be dealt with informally; [626] the parties will be quietly reprimanded, and adjured to observe the proprieties of conduct. For outsiders breaking the laws of the nongo, what corresponds to a warrant is necessary. It is necessary to catch the culprit in the act and hale him before the [696] nkumu. The nkumu himself cannot do this, nor can any of the ekopo; it must be done by one of the molembe, and so if the nkumu sees someone infringing the law he will try to get one of the molembe on the spot in a hurry in order to catch the offender.

In war,[1] it is the moleni o eke who is most active in preparations, but the nkumu 624 will accompany his party to battle, keeping well in the rear, and surrounded by good fighters. 726
He does not wear his montolo but puts on the informal hat. If an nkumu were captured, he would never be tortured or killed as were other prisoners, unless he specifically sought such a fate. He could be ransomed, and his captors would [727] beseech him to let his people ransom him, but in many cases an nkumu would invite death rather than endure the shame of being yielded up as a prisoner of war.

An nkumu is always addressed by a double clap of the hands, and will not reply to 624 anyone rude enough to speak to him first. In answer to the clap he replies with a word of wisdom expressed in an aphorism or proverb. 576
Such a reply, however, is common to all elders, who have their favourite aphorisms ready for any who pay them special honour. Anything the nkumu says must be answered not by the customary ako boiko (even so) which ordinary people use, but with the special word, biongo, which is reserved exclusively for replying to an nkumu, and means the same thing.

When the hour of death approaches, an nkumu is attended by his Batwa. It is a 624 rule that he must not die a natural death, and near the end, while he is still conscious 763 and can still speak, all 'free men' clear out and leave the Batwa pygmies to their task of tying the nkumu very tightly with the fibrous yam vines known as monkiki. [563]
Often this secure lashing in the sitting posture, known as ilimo, is sufficient to finish the nkumu off, but sometimes the work is expedited by twisting his neck.[2] Then it is announced that he is dead, ankiloa, this being in contradistinction to the customary phrase ankama molako used of the death of ordinary people. While the latter means

---

[1] Owing to the lack of tribal cohesion, warfare was not on any considerable scale. The method of warfare consisted in sending groups of young men to fight first, the elders only joining in when one side began to get the worst of the fray. Victors and vanquished in such fights were designated 'husband' and 'wife' respectively, and members of the one group were free to come and go in the villages of the other, and even to help themselves to food. In future wars 'husband' and 'wife' were supposed to combine against their common foes.

[2] Besides nkumu, elderly and rich men, fathers and mothers of twins, and twins are buried in the ilimo or sitting posture, in contradistinction to the nsonje position which is the recumbent one used for ordinary people and slaves. [764]

7:Brown M-5 (ca. 1940) 1944 FO32 Mongo FO32
Ntomba

624

763 literally that the deceased has hanged the heart, the former is used of a tree which leans over and falls from a great cut at its base.

624 On the announcement of the death, an expert drummer drums out the news.
There will be at least four drums of the type known as lokole, and a nsaga.[1] The four 766 drums are called by the names, Epanda, having the 'biggest voice', that is a deep 594 bass note, Mongoye, having a higher note, Mongonda, a high pitched note, and Mankate, 202 having a very high penetrating note. To these four drums others are added; if the nkumu himself did not possess sufficient, they would be borrowed from the surrounding villages, and their notes matched with those of the first three drums, being beaten with them in their turn. Mankate is beaten simultaneously with Epanda, giving a rhythmic tattoo. When the news of the death has been sent out on Epanda, the funeral drumming commences, as follows:

539
Mongonda. Botianganu w'Amba lokolo,
Mongoye. Ntsala ikita, otongonoko,
Epanda. Tokund' ibenge molom' o nyama,
Ombolekeke mmenge,
Lobanga lolenda ntondo,
Biheku bilenda lobola.
Nsaga. Tobilake nkoi nkonge,
Tobilake nkoi nkonge, &c.

The English and the interpretation are as follows:

Mongonda. A scattering of Amba, the snail. (The mother of twins, always called Amba, here gives her name to the snail because of her prolific progeny, which, upon being introduced to the world, scatter, while the mother dies. So the death of the nkumu will cause a scattering of his many wives and children.)

Mongoye. Feathers fall; pick them up. (That is to say, for your arrow shafts, for if you don't, and come back later, the wind will have scattered them and you won't find them. So while the nkumu was alive it was the time for his children to learn his teachings so that when palavers came after his death they would be well acquainted with his wisdom and know how to settle them.)

Epanda. We are burying the ibenge, husband of animals, You have just eaten mmenge, The chin looks up at the ridge pole, The jaw bones look up at the sky.
825 (The ibenge is an animal much prized for its fat meat; the nkumu always gets his share when it is killed, and the skin is made into carrying straps for infants, and into belts.
563 Batwa are prohibited the use of it for any purpose. It is therefore fitting to liken the nkumu to the ibenge. Mmenge (sing. lobenge) is the equivalent of a snack. When a woman brings her cassava from the swamp where it has been soaking for several 261 days, her husband may be too hungry to wait the long hours required to cook it, 252 so to appease his hunger his wife takes a piece or two of the unprepared root, splits it in two, places salt between, wraps it in a lokamba leaf and roasts it in the hot ashes, where it is quickly cooked. So the nkumu just had time to eat a few mmenge; he didn't wait for the big cooking; his life was suddenly cut off.)

Nsaga. Don't pull out the leopard's eyelashes. (That is, while he is alive; now he is dead one can disregard his power.)

---

[1] A lokole is a slit gong made from a hollowed log. The two notes are produced by striking the two lips of the slit. A nsaga is a hollowed log, open at one end, across which is stretched a [illegible] hide.

This funeral drumming is kept up for a long time, off and on for days, and is very stirring in its rhythm. While it is going on, the elders congregate in an elonga. They fast and have nothing to do with their wives during this time. The elojo is mourning, and the molombe may be likewise mourning, but for the others it is a time of rejoicing, and also of the relaxing of moral restraints. It is an occasion for dancing by both Batwa and 'freemen', the former regarding this as a time for special rejoicing, for the nkumu was their master and now he is dead they are no longer under restraint. They are free to take any of their master's goods and even to snatch blankets off the corpse. Men and women do not dance together; the women, taking some of their husbands' weapons, go off in one direction, and the men, arrayed in finery, dance at the other end of the village. 624 766 [533] [535] [563]

While the nkumu is still unburied and the drumming is going on, the molombe look for a successor among the elojo. Often this man will, as we have seen, have already been designated. The molombe, Batwa, and others in the village make up a party, and attired in war finery go off with their weapons as though after a man they wished to kill. As they go they sing: [539]

Nkombe w'apiliu olombe
Wo olale we ako?
Hawk, thou hast destroyed the nest,
Where art thou going to sleep?

Before catching the real successor they catch one or another in fun, singing this song. The man of course refuses to be nkumu, and the point of the song is that because of his refusal the elojo no longer fulfils its function of supplying the molombe with nkumu and therefore ceases to be of any use to them. If this man by refusing thus destroys the family nest, where will they sleep?

Finally, after this fun, the real successor is caught, his face daubed with black, and the group sing: [302] [539]

Bolo lomo-o, konde ekola.
The cunning animal is hiding, reveal the tortoise.

Thus the new nkumu, like a cunning animal, is hiding, but when discovered, like the tortoise, he will not try to run away. The whole group conducts the new nkumu to the ipame and sits all night guarding him. Earlier on the day of the actual interment of the dead nkumu, the new one is installed with ceremonies as already described.

On the day the nkumu dies his people scatter to other villages to look for slaves for the executions on the day of the burial. Slave-owners or husbands of unwanted wives ask quietly how much money there is for the man or woman, accept the agreed amount, and tell the buyers to go quietly and catch the slave or wife before anything is suspected and an escape is made. In this connexion we may note two classes of wives, bopika and iboto. A third class, bosomba, acquired by the payment of a very small bride price, was not nearly as common formerly as at present and may be passed by. A bopika was a slave wife acquired by capture in war or stolen. If loved by her husband she will take her place practically on an equality with the members of the village, but she may be killed, for she is her husband's possession, 'his money' is the native expression. An iboto is a wife for whom a very high bride price has been paid, obliging her family to give wives to the other family in perpetuity, supplying 766 567 762 562

766 a successor to replace a deceased woman, and thus maintaining the balance between 587 the two families. Such wives were seldom killed, for they had relatives who cared for them and would object, and who had the power to do so by refusing to 782 fulfil their obligations and by retaining the bride price already received. The group 562 of men and women gathered together for execution thus comprised males and bepika women from the 'free' group (baoto, as applied to all men and women not Batwa), and Batwa men and women whose owners had consented to their death. It sometimes happened that a man, seeing a woman among this group who took his fancy, might obtain her by paying for her in money or substituting one of his own slaves.

766 In some cases the executioner, bomembe, was chosen from among the family of the dead nkumu, in others he was selected from among the whole group of people over 782 which the nkumu held sway. The man having been chosen, the knife is brought out of the house where it has been kept by some elder. This, a blade some sixteen [912] inches in length, two-edged, decorated by alternating longitudinal lines of polished and blackened steel and inserted in a wooden handle, is sharpened on one edge, carefully wrapped in a plantain leaf, and laid away for use on the following day.

At dawn the prisoners are taken to the water and washed to clean them, inland towns accomplishing this purpose by dragging them up and down the village in the dew-drenched grass tied by a liana. The prisoners then are arranged in a V shape, the apex nearest the spot where the nkumu's body is sitting in state. Low seats are made by resting a stick in the forks of two perpendicular ones, and this cross bar is straddled by the victim. His hands are tied behind his back and his head tied to a sapling securely fixed at one end in the ground, the other bent down sufficiently to allow for tying the head with considerable tension on the rope. When all is thus arranged an expert drummer begins to pound out a rhythmic beat, and the ceremony of handing over the knife takes place.

The executioner of the day is dressed in finery but no camwood powder is evident, for it is a time of mourning and not of rejoicing. He wears a hat with many feathers, a vine encircles his waist, and bracelets of the same his arms. Then the man who last occupied the position of executioner comes forward. An elder has already brought the knife wrapped in its leaf and also a heap of ash on a leaf, both of which are placed on the ground. The old executioner picks up the knife while the new one faces him. The former demonstrates with gestures how he used to go about his work, the motions, the attitudes, the fine arts of the task. Even though the executioner of the day may have had previous experience, this part of the ceremony must be gone [516] through. Then, holding the knife aloft, the instructor raises his right leg at right angles to his body, bends it at the knee so that the shin hangs perpendicularly, and the new executioner passes underneath it, returning the same way. He now faces the old executioner, who lays the knife in his own hands, arms outstretched and palms open, the handle resting in his right palm, the blade in his left. The new man, facing his instructor, places his outstretched and open palms on the shoulders of the other, draws his hands down his arms, finally coming to the knife, which, because of its position is thus received, handle in the left hand, blade in the right. Releasing his right-hand grasp of the blade, he stoops, sprinkles the blade with some of the ash, then rubs his right hand in the dirt to remove all slippery sweat. Then still grasping the knife with his left hand, with his free right hand he drains a gourd of palm wine to gain courage, hits the nearest victim on the head with the empty gourd, then transfers the knife to his right hand. He is now ready for his work which he proceeds to do methodically, sustained by the heady wine and the rhythm of the drum. When he had finished one of the lines, a pause would be made to bring out the body for burial. Just before this is done an armed band rushes down the path, returns, goes up in the other direction, then returns; this is said by some to ward off any spirits which might be about. The nkumu is now brought out by the Batwa slaves.[1] His grave, a circular hole with a crypt in one side of it, its entrance facing west, had been previously prepared. Few people in the Bonginda villages knew or had seen the actual burying place of an nkumu. While the corpse was carried to the grave followed by a crowd, the executioner finished his work. Those who stayed behind took the bodies of the decapitated men and women and divided them among all the participants of the funeral who would subsequently devour everything. 782 766 [26]

Accompanying the funeral procession to the grave were the ndeli, one or more men or women who were destined to accompany the nkumu to his grave and to the other world beyond. At the burial of an nkumu witnessed in 1930 at which the semblances of some of the old rites were carried out, a party of armed men contested the right of the procession to approach the grave, there was a mock battle for a few minutes between two bands of the funeral party, and then the procession gained right of way. At the grave-side the legs and sometimes the arms of one ndeli were broken by heavy clubs to prevent him from escaping. Then seated on the ground the body of the nkumu would be placed on the knees of this one, whose arms would be placed round the nkumu and securely fastened by driving a peg right through both wrists. Sometimes two ndeli were thus used. If the number of victims was sufficient, [514] others would be buried alive too, being placed in the grave in the recumbent monsepa position, with the corpse on top of them, its weight being sufficient, with the earth filling in the grave, to prevent escape. The nkumu was now ready for burial and was placed in the crypt, facing west.[2] The relatives of the nkumu approach, they pluck [824] the leaves and stem of a juicy bush known as mokako and chewing it, expectorate ceremonially on the body while they address it in language somewhat as follows: 'You are going to leave us now, we are mourning, for you were a good and wise man, your discernment in matters of justice was without parallel, &c. . . . we wish that you may be happy where you go, have many wives, beget many children, lack not for meat. But don't take with you our power to beget children, leave us also some of this wisdom of yours, for what you were, we would be.' This prayer over, the montolo would be slipped off the head of the corpse and replaced by the informal hat, all done so dexterously that the bare head was not seen. The entrance to the [184]

---

[1] The body was supposed to have remained in state for seven to nine days, but actually it was buried privately soon after death, a dummy being set up with the montolo on its head, and the succeeding ceremonies being conducted with only the dummy in the place of the actual body. The inland villages however did allow the body to remain unburied for the long period, the wives being forced to keep watch in the same house. The Bonginda buried their nkumu generally in their houses at the spot where they had been accustomed to pray, burying the dummy at some other spot farther off.

[2] All burials have particular regard to this east-west position, those buried in the recumbent position having the feet to the west. The native explanation is that this allows the spirit of the departed to follow the path of the sinking sun. [823]

766 crypt would then be barred by mats in order to leave it as a hollow chamber, and 782 the hole leading down to it filled in with earth.

For a month or two after the burial the festivities and orgies continued. Women 766 would be hanged to create some diversion, but those hanged were not eaten. Decapi-782 tations would continue. According to the informants only slaves brought in from a distance would have to be tied to prevent their escape. The slave members of the 587 household of the dead nkumu would await their turn stoically, content to die that [152] they might accompany their master in his journey to the land of spirits. This may be true but scarcely seems possible. Still another diversion in the funeral orgies was killing in the manner known as etumba. If some man who had a slave did not wish him to be hanged or beheaded, he might give him for this other method. As the weeks slipped by, such a one, his life having apparently been spared, would suppose that all was safe and that there was little chance of his being taken, and, thus emboldened, would, instead of keeping at a safe distance, join the crowd to watch a beheading. His death would be prearranged. At the moment of beheading a victim, someone would drive a spear into the unsuspecting man, the whole crowd then using spears and knives to stab and slash until he fell. Some might be tortured to death by being buried up to the neck and left thus exposed to the hot sun without food or water until death intervened, but this was not a common practice at such funerals.

768 The termination of the dead nkumu's affairs took place when the division of the inheritance was made, a long and complicated process.

178 Such were the old days before European penetration. The advent of the white 624 man half a century ago was the beginning of the end. The ceremonies had to be given up, though reluctantly. Occasionally now goats are beheaded in place of human victims, and many of the younger generation find that, even so, the sight is more than they can endure, and they seek refuge elsewhere. Nkumu are not anxious for the honours. They find little or no respect paid to them by the government officials and this is a distinct obstacle to their obtaining honour from their own people. When the nkumu resident in the village adjacent to the mission station died, one of the Natives was asked who would be next. The reply was that probably no one would appear as a successor. Asked why, he answered, 'There are too many trousers.' He meant that too many were adopting the ways of the white man to [693] make the inauguration of another nkumu a success. In his one useful function, that of judge, the paramount chief now takes his place, cases tried must be recorded by a clerk of the court, and fines paid into the treasury of the chieftaincy. With such a state of affairs the old ways drop into desuetude, and the younger generation grow up knowing less of the ways of their fathers as the years pass.

8: Müller E-5 (1951-1954) 1956 FO32 Mongo FO32
Ekonda

600

Sociological Terminology and Social Organization of the Ekonda [Soziologische Terminologie und soziale Organisation der Ekonda]

by Ernst W. Müller

Zeitschrift für Ethnologie
Vol. 81, pp. 188-202
Brunswick, 1956

Translated from the German by Helmut Handzik

Human Relations Area Files

1960

[Title page]

[188]

Introduction

114 This study is based on the preliminary work connected with the publication of the results of the "Mainz Congo Expedition 1951-54" in which I participated as an assistant to Dr. Sulzmann.

121 In order to describe and characterize the kinship and local groups of the Ekonda, they should first be regarded as ethno-sociological ideal types (1). For this purpose it was necessary to obtain a clear understanding of the meaning of the terms used to describe the types. Studies by Thurnwald (2), Kirchhoff (3), Murdock (4) (4a), Radcliffe-Brown (5), Lowie (6),

---

1. For the concept of type, see Thurnwald, Menschliche Gesellschaft [Human Society], Vol. 1, p. 7 ff.; Mühlmann, Methodik [Methodology], p. 114 ff.; and Wörterbuch der Soziologie [Dictionary of Sociology], p. 224 f.

2. Menschliche Gesellschaft [Human Society], Vols. 2, 4.

3. "Verwandtschaftsorganisation [Kinship Organization], Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Vol. 63, pp. 85-193; "Verwandtschaftsbezeichnungen [Kinship Terminology], "Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Vol. 64, pp. 41-71.

4. Social Structure.

4a. "Changing Emphasis."

5. "Study of Kinship Systems."

6. Primitive Society.

[121] and Lévi-Strauss (7) were consulted (8).

7. Structures élémentaires.

8. I am particularly indebted to Prof. Mühlmann for his advice and references to source material.

By their very nature, all attempts to recognize ethno-sociological ideal types must remain incomplete and are in constant need of revision on the basis of ethnographic reality (9).

9. Mühlmann, Methodik, p. 120.

Such revision can only be carried out if each field worker, while studying his material, compares the existing terminology with "his" realities and if he then submits the result of this comparison to the scrutiny of others. Unfortunately the use of ethno-sociological terms is often dictated primarily by the convictions and preferences of the individual author who may neither refer to the existing terminology nor otherwise inform the reader of what he means exactly by the various terms. Many authors in this respect follow such unreliable standards as their "feeling for the language" or they act under the delusion that their private terminology corresponds to what is generally accepted. Too often, however, the actual usage differs considerably from what has been suggested in terminological studies. As a result terms like "clan," "kinship group [Sippe]," and "large family [Grossfamilie]" create different impressions among different readers.

In the present study the terminology of the authors mentioned above will be discussed in relation to the kinship and local groups of the Ekonda. We are concerned here with the [101] northwestern subdivision of the Ekonda who live in the Bikoro territory. The Ekonda belong to the large group, the Mónga.

121 It was said before that kinship and local groups are to be discussed. This statement needs clarification. When speaking of local groups in the present study, we do not intend to refer to groups which consist of non-related subgroups. It is to be clearly understood that the residence pattern will be used as the decisive criterion for subdividing the groups. Thus, closely related groups may be excluded, more distantly related groups may be included. Occasionally such local units also include groups which are not related to each other. [189]

Also, among those groups which I have called kinship groups in this study, a biological or genealogical connection which can be proved and expressed in juridical terms is quite doubtful. We shall not concern ourselves, however, with this lack of precision; rather, we shall regard as related those persons or groups of persons whom the Ekonda themselves consider as related. In my opinion there is no justification for disregarding the attitude of the natives since it is their attitude which determines the character and function of the groups. Murdock (10) uses this approach to the kinship group, while using the term "lineage" for persons who can prove their relationship. We hasten to point out that also the local groups have a tendency toward "paternalization" (11), to construe a closer relationship.

10. Social Structure, p. 47.

11. Boelaert, "Clan équivoque," p. 17.

The Kinship Structure of the Ekonda

61
602 Among the Ekonda we find a system of groups which are ordered according to degrees of real or assumed kinship. This system is subdivided into a hierarchical structure of many ranks. Larger groups consist of between one to four groups of the next order. The relationships between the groups correspond to the relationships between their founding ancestors. In this fashion certain groups are described as the older or younger brother of 61 602 another group. According to their relationship to others, groups may be designated as:

- brother, younger or older;
- brother or half brother (descended from various wives of the polygynous ancestor);
- [848] Illegitimate child of the sister which, legally, as the child of the oldest brother or of the father of his mother, belongs to the group of the mother's relatives;
- child of a boy who together with his sister has moved to the unit of his brothers-in-law and has settled there permanently;
- son of a sister, who for some reason has separated from his paternal relatives and has moved in with the group of his mother or of one of his grandmothers.

601 Present-day social relationships are influenced by this variety of kinship relations. The kinship terms which refer to the relationships of the genuine or assumed ancestors to each other are occasionally transferred to the groups.

614 602 621 In this paper we shall describe the Isangi group (12) as an [101] example of hierarchical kinship structure. Isangi is a local group of the type described above (p. 1). Following the custom of the region, I shall refer to it as a "village." Until we have decided which terms are applicable to the various groups, I shall use the letters A to E for the individual ranks of the hierarchical structure. Within this system A shall stand for the smallest and E for the largest units (see Diagram 2).[1]

In addition to the three ranks of Group D in Isangi, there are others in the daughter villages (see Diagram 1). These may also include foreign groups, as, for example, the "Nkundó" group, Liimbu, in Wengá.

---

12. Müller, Fürstentum [Kingdom], pp. 68 ff., 125, 128 ff.

[1] [See page 6, category 116.—Analyst]

602
614
621
[552]
All the groups represented on the diagram (Diagram 2) are known by their names to the adults of Isangi. In addition to their regular name, all these groups also have a "drum" name and an "honorary" name. Only the three Boyeke groups of rank B have different drum names but no individual group names. The arrangement of groups as found on the diagram does not represent a genealogy. It is based simply on the characteristics and functions of the individual groups [190] which in each case are equal to each other on one rank. Thus, we have here an organizational diagram, not a genealogical table. [Diagrams 1 and 2 appear here.]

The people of Isangi are also well aware of the relationships between the individual groups, but they are not as clearly conscious of the system as it appears in our diagram. They are able to describe the kinship relations between the groups and they can point out which functions are assigned to the individual groups without, however, regarding the groups as equal to one another because they have like functions and without seeing them as part of a system as we do. Thus, our diagram represents a systematization which, by its very nature, does not wholly do justice to reality. Correspondingly, therefore, there is no satisfactory Ekonda social terminology.

[191] [Diagram 3 appears here.] Just as in nonscientific European usage, the terms lack sufficient precision. Furthermore, in principle the nature of the groups between rank A to E and of the still larger units is similar, and as a result all the terms are used almost indiscriminately for large and small units alike.

601
621
614
Usually, the word ikundɛ (literally, "lap") refers to small units, approximately those of ranks A and B, but it is also used for larger and larger units if their relatively close degree of kinship is to be stressed. Thus it approximately corresponds to the meaning of the word "family" as used in nonscientific language. The word ilongo refers both to what in European usage is described as the small family [Kleinfamilie] and also to groups of ranks A and B.

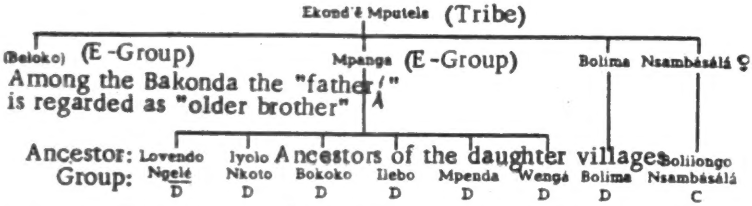
614
621



Ekond'é Mputela (Tribe)
(Beloko) (E-Group)
Mpanga (E-Group)
Bolima
Nsambásálá ♀
Ancestor: Lovendo Iyolo
Ancestors of the daughter villages
Boliiongo
Group: Ngelé Nkoto Bokoko Ilebo Mpenda Wengá Bolima Nsambásálá
D D D D D D D C

Among the Bakonda the "father/" is regarded as "older brother" Λ

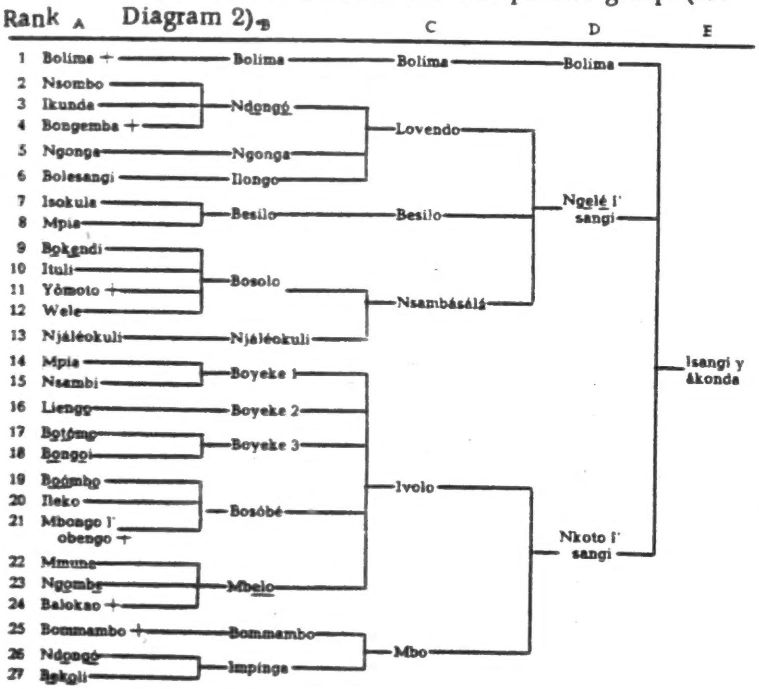
Diagram 1. Genealogy of the Bakonda. Letters below the group names refer to the rank of the respective groups (see Diagram 2).



Rank A
B
C
D
E
1 Bolima +
2 Nsombo
3 Ikunda
4 Bongemba +
5 Ngonga
6 Bolesangi
7 Isokula
8 Mpia
9 Bokendi
10 Ituli
11 Yòmoto +
12 Wele
13 Njáléokuli
14 Mpia
15 Nsambi
16 Liengo
17 Botómo
18 Bongoi
19 Boómbo
20 Ileko
21 Mbongo l' obengo +
22 Mmune
23 Ngombe
24 Balokao +
25 Bommambo +
26 Ndongó
27 Bokoli
Bolima
Ndongó
Ngonga
Ilongo
Besilo
Bosolo
Njáléokuli
Boyeke 1
Boyeke 2
Boyeke 3
Bosóbé
Mbelo
Bommambo
Impinga
Bolima
Lovendo
Besilo
Nsambásálá
Ivolo
Mbo
Bolima
Ngelé l' sangi
Nkoto l' sangi
Isangi y ákonda

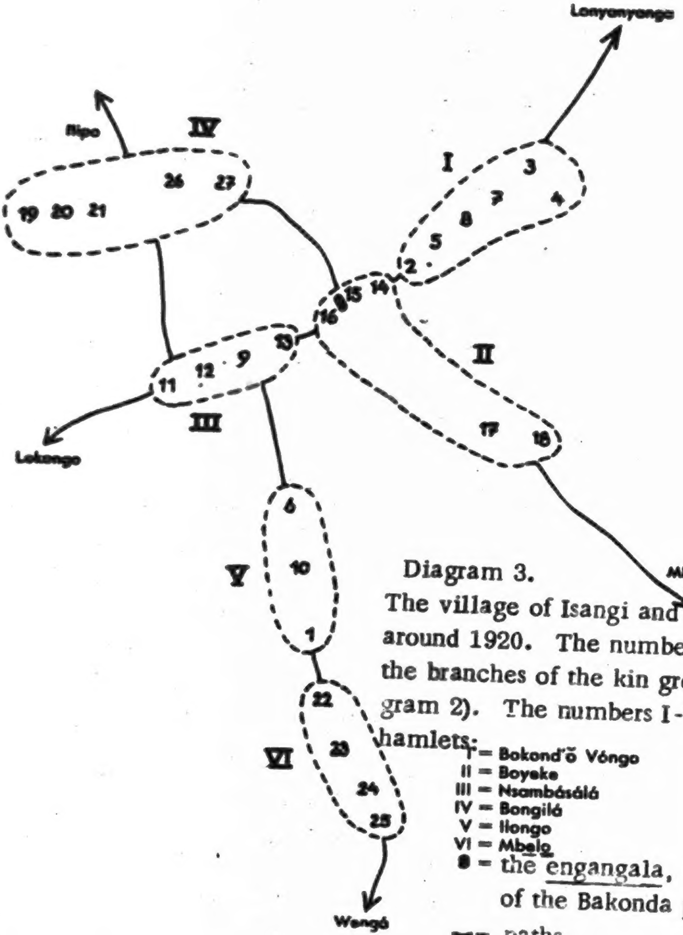
Diagram 2. Kinship Structure of Isangi.

1-27 = Numbering of the A-Groups shown in Diagram 3.

+ = extinct group.

Λ [tr. of LONYANYALUGA, L.]

621
361
614



Lonyanyanga
Ilipo
IV
I
II
III
V
VI
Lokongo
Mbongo
Wangó
1
2
3
4
5
6
7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14 15 16
17 18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26 27

Diagram 3.
The village of Isangi and its territory around 1920. The numbers 1-27 denote the branches of the kin groups (see Diagram 2). The numbers I-VI refer to the hamlets:

I = Bokond'ŏ Vóngo
II = Boyeke
III = Nsambásálá
IV = Bongiló
V = Ilongo
VI = Mbelo
● = the engangala, the meeting place of the Bakonda province
—– paths

601 621 614 Bonsonga and etúká are terms used for kinship groups of ranks B, C, and D, but occasionally they may also refer to [192] the groups listed under A and, in addition, to the local groups which in size approximately correspond to the kinship units mentioned above. Etúká is the term used for the oil palm grove and for a certain kind of termite hill; apparently it is used for local groups more frequently than the term bonsonga.

[571] [535] Another term whose meaning varies is ekíndá. This word designates, first of all, a dance group, a corps de ballet, and also the social unit which sends such a joint dance troupe to dance festivals.

Esé also has strong local connotations. It is usually identical with what we call a village, but frequently units which are larger or smaller than a village are designated as esé. Very large groups, tribes and even larger units, are called bonanga.

614 As a criterion for placing the individual groups within a certain rank, one or several functions have been chosen in each case. The groups of the individual ranks are described below relative to their functions. On the subject of groups it should be added that in general they do not differ from each other in certain traits. All groups of all ranks are kinship units of patrilineal descent. They consider themselves descendants of one ancestor. No continuous and complete genealogy which can be traced back to the original ancestor is known. The genealogy of the entire group of the Bakonda is shown in Diagram 1.

In Isangi two of the ancestors of the groups of rank D are brothers, the third is the brother of their father. A D-group (Ngelé) includes, in addition, the descendants of an illegitimate child of the paternal sister of the ancestor. These offspring form the C-group, Nsambásálá.

There is a gap between this ancient genealogy and the known ancestors from the recent past. In contrast with that of the neighboring Bokóté [Bokete] (see, for example, Boelaert, [173] "Les Bongili"), the genealogical memory of the Ekonda is weak.
It does not reach back to the ancestor of the group of rank A. In this connection we must take into account the fact that a group

614 splits up only after the death of the ancestor to whom the new groups can be traced back. The descendants of a patriarch split up into the groups of his sons only when these groups have reached the necessary size. Considering the size of even the smallest Ekonda groups this can occur only after several generations. By this time, however, the common patriarch and his sons, the ancestors of the new subgroups, are dead. Thus, at the present time we find a tendency to split in the Ndong'i-mpinga group; the ancestors of the two groups which are now in the process of forming died about 1920. Most probably these two groups, so far as their age relationship to one another is concerned, will not grade themselves according to the relationship of these "tribal ancestors," but according to the relationship of the "patriarchs" under whom the separation takes place. The exact process of such a split of A-groups cannot be established afterwards through questions; it can only be observed on the spot while it is taking place.

In the following chapters we shall describe the groups of the various ranks and their characteristics.

Groups of Rank A

These groups consist of as many as forty persons. In most 563 cases, a group of Batwá-Pygmoids is part of such a group. Having the function of helots, they belong to the A-group of their masters, and this membership is passed on through the male line in the same manner as among their masters. Excepting Pygmoids, the oldest member of the A group is the bomélé bokonda, the "owner of the land"; he is the personification of all authority within the group and its representative in the group's dealings with outsiders. He is the only person who is completely in charge. All members of the group are in a father-son relationship to him [193] even if the younger members -- as counted by generations -- have the rank of father in relation to him. He administers and issues the group's treasury of objects used for buying a bride. He also disposes of the landed property of the group.

614 He represents the A-group in the council of elders of the village and of the other large units. Since no members of the group [672] are considered capable of conducting affairs, all the legal transactions which they undertake are treated as though they had been sanctioned by the patriarch. To a large extent the members of the group may represent one another. In the absence of the elder, a younger member may act as the representative of the [623] group at council meetings. When the senior member dies, his function will be taken over by the next oldest member of the group.

An A-group will split up only through internal conflicts 614 602 which cannot be bridged or through a large population increase. The newly-formed A-groups continue to maintain a close relationship which, at first, is much closer than among the B-groups whose A-groups have split much earlier. In the higher ranks cohesion after the split diminishes only gradually; thus many gradations develop in the feeling of cohesion. These gradations could not be even approximately reproduced in a diagram with any degree of exactitude. There is no formula by which the split takes place, as there is, for example, among the Tallensi (13) where it is determined by a certain number of generations. 614 Theoretically the A-groups are "eternal." The A-groups are 596 subdivided into small families. Within the polygynous families 592 nuclear families [Familienkerne] (14) have a ~~semi~~-independent position economically. Each wife has her own house. A husband's wives and the wives of his sons have their houses within the same homestead. As the master of the homestead, the father has an open shelter where the men spend their time and [768] hold their meetings. Upon the death of the master of the 13. Fortes, The Dynamics of Clanship, p. 34 f.

14. Thurnwald, Menschliche Gesellschaft, Vol. 4, p. 12.

614 596 592 [768] homestead, it is deserted by the inhabitants. On the new dwelling site the sons each build their own shelter. In contrast to the groups of the type A-E, the group living within a homestead is finite: its existence ends with the father's death. Only a man whose father (in the European meaning of the term) has died may have a shelter. Thus the homestead community is interposed between the A-group and the small family.

To sum up the characteristic features of the A-groups:

614 Membership determined by male descent; unity of legal power, especially insofar as landed property and inheritance law is concerned the senior has full power; succession by simple seniority; theoretically unlimited existence of the group. The A-groups consist of small families who live together in homesteads under one father in each case.

Groups of Rank B

614 793 There is usually a friendly, neighborly relationship between the A-groups which form part of a B-group. People assist each other to a large extent, and there is joint consultation on most matters. Group B has only one Nkûmú iloki, "master of the hidden power," the priest of the kinship group, who is consulted by all the members of the group. He functions during the magical preparations for the hunt; he is consulted before any important undertaking. During the leave-taking ceremony after a burial, he converses with the deceased, and people turn to him when the ancestors have appeared to them in their dreams to transmit their desires, orders, or other information to the living. He protects the people of his group from the ill will, ndoki, of the dead and the living. The priest of the kinship group is used as the criterion [194] to determine which group of homogeneous A-groups represents a B-group. The priest of the kinship group is descended from a certain one of the related A-groups.

614 554 There is a difference in rank among the A-groups of a B-group -- one group will be regarded as older -- but this is

614 554 only of lesser importance (see below, under local groups). The headman of the B-group is the oldest of the seniors of the related A-groups, that is, the senior of the B-group. He is not, however, fully in charge of affairs like the elder of the A-group; he should rather be seen as princeps inter pares. This, of course, does not affect his position as senior of his own A-group.

614 423 Within a B-group landed property is often still regarded as belonging together, even though fixed boundaries between the territories of the constituent groups may already exist. In general, however, it may be assumed that the other elders will not object if a hunting expedition is extended to their territory, if, under certain circumstances, the soil of their district is used for planting, or if certain wild plants are taken from there for building a house or as raw material for a craftsman. Membership in a B-group is determined by membership in an A-group.

614 835 At this point we shall not enter into a discussion of the genealogical peculiarities which result from the significance of the bride price. We learned of one case of incest which occurred between members of two A-groups which formed a B-group, but we have not heard of anything like that occurring within an A-group. In this connection, however, we do not refer to those acts of incest which are required to make a particularly powerful charm become effective.

Summing up all that is characteristic of B-groups:

614 There is only one priest of the kinship group; cohesion within a B-group is very close, people cooperate extensively, all important matters are decided by the group, even those which, strictly speaking, concern only the constituent A-groups; in this connection, the oldest of the seniors has a somewhat privileged position.

Groups of Rank C

The cohesion within a group of this category is considerably looser, although on this level particularly one can find great differences among the individual groups. For example, the groups Lovendo and Besilo consider themselves much closer 614 to each other than either of these groups with Nsambɛ́sɛ́lɛ́ (see Diagram 2). It was for this reason that in my dissertation I divided this rank into two different ranks (kinship subgroups I° and II°). (15) Since there are no obvious criteria for the two ranks and since such a division is not possible in the other villages, I no longer make such distinctions.

[582] [835] The groups of rank C are the exogamous units of the future. Although marriage is not permitted between the members of different C-groups, sexual relations between them are permitted. This permission corresponds to the lonkana of the Bokótɛ́ (16).

Groups of Rank D

614 582 The groups of this category constitute the truly exogamous units. It is true that marriages between "advanced persons" ["evolués"] take place even within rank D, but this practice is still frowned upon by the old people. In Isangi we also find the special stipulation that members of two D-groups, Ngelé and Nkoto, may intermarry, [195] but they may not enter into marriage with members of the D-group, Bolíma. Since in present-day Isangi, Bolíma is extinct, this stipulation only works to the disadvantage of the emigrants in Bolíma w'ɛ́si and of the children of sisters in other villages. The Bolíma group is regarded as the father group of Isangi (see Diagram 1); Ngelé is the group of the older brother, Nkoto that of the younger brother. This serves as an explanation for the special position of Bolíma in the exogamous system. It is said that it would not be right for a "father" to marry one of his "children" even if these children are the offspring of such distant generations that they intermarry.

---

15. Müller, Fürstentum, p. 125.

16. Hulstaert, "Mariage," p. 97.f.

614
582 The exogamy rules of the Ekonda do not only refer to their own, agnatic group, but also to all cognate groups to whom kinship relations can still be traced back, i.e., a span of about five generations.

Groups of Rank E

614
621 It may be assumed that these groups always extend beyond the confines of a village. Those parts of a group who have settled next to each other have their communal meeting place, but even the dispersed fractions of the group may come there to consult. In former times probably only one such group had a nkúmú, a sacred prince who lived in the main village (e.g., Isangi), while the other villages were ruled by the senior. Once the title of nkúmú was also bestowed on persons from other villages, the importance of the E-groups almost completely disappeared. Also, in this category the local group plays a much greater role. Occasionally it even includes dependent [609] villages which have not yet been "paternalized," i.e., which are still regarded as alien. In this connection it should be mentioned that probably all larger local groups tend to reconstitute themselves into kinship groups by reinterpreting the genealogy to suit their purposes. It is certain that the "kinship relation" of many "kinship groups" has been created in this manner. We may dismiss the possibility that groups which are divided from one another by the rule of exogamy will invent a kinship relation so close that a previously possible marriage would be outlawed. Also, the combination of other important functions of the lower ranks resulting from the invention of a closer relationship would run counter to the tendency of progressive differentiation (17).

17. We know through statements of the natives that about one hundred years ago the exogamy limit was lowered to the present level. Before that time only the Lonkâna was permitted among the Ngele, Nkoto, and Bolfma.

614 621 In general one may assume that local groups will postulate only that kind of kinship relationship which does not necessitate a substantial functional reintegration. For this reason, units above the exogamy limit will easily tend to construe a genealogy which "proves" a kinship relationship. Groups of that type are functionally weak. One can observe processes of this kind both among the group of the Bakonda and among the neighboring E-group, Lonyanyanga. The institution of the nkúmú (see above, p. 14) also appears to have a leveling influence. The privileges of the oldest (and free) group diminish in importance and fall behind the office of nkúmú. The new office is also open to younger and dependent groups.

Sociological Terminology for Kinship Groups

128 Before dealing with the units which are to be regarded as settlement groups, we shall compare the kinship groups of the Ekonda with the sociological ideal types. Keeping in mind the authors mentioned at the beginning, I shall now discuss the various terms used for groups which are applicable to conditions found among the Ekonda. [196]

Family

121 596 The small family is of no importance in the organizational system of the Ekonda. Nevertheless it is very important as the smallest unit of economic life. Each small family is potentially polygynous, but monogynous marriages are more numerous at the present time, especially among the younger generation. In view of this difference between potential and practiced polygyny, it seems advisable to follow Thurnwald in classing the polygamous forms together with the small family and to differentiate its nuclear families (18). In my opinion this approach

18. Vol. 4, p. 12 f.

seems to correspond more closely to its functional importance than Murdock's view, according to which the polygamous family

121 596 together with the large family [Grossfamilie] is put into the category of "composite forms of family" (19). In Thurnwald's "Technical Terms" there are two passages dealing with the large family, one under the heading "Family," p. 12 f., the other under "Large Family," p. 14. Under "Family" Thurnwald writes:

"...The 'large family' differs from the family in that in the former several generations with a common grandfather live together in the same homestead or even under the same roof. The nuclear families, and the men forming part of them, remain relatively independent. Naturally, even in this unit relatives lacking any protection may be taken into the group. The large family differs from the kinship group (q. v.) in that in the former all its members live in the same dwelling site, and the degree of kinship between the members is mainly seen in a line descending from the head; in addition, it forms an economic unit. A further characteristic feature of the large family lies in the fact that it resembles any family in being tied to the life of the persons who constitute it and that it becomes extinct with them, while a kinship group renews itself automatically. It is, in a manner of speaking, 'eternal'."

Under the heading "Large Family," he writes only: "... The phenomenon of at least three generations descended from one another living together under a common head (grandfather with children and children's children) is defined as 'large family' (see Family, Kinship Group)." There is a discrepancy between these two definitions. If, according to the first definition, a group dissolves upon the death of the persons constituting it, i.e., the oldest generation, the phrase "at least" may be valid for the norm, but not for the specific case. Thurnwald defines the family in the same manner in Lehrbuch der Völkerkunde [Textbook of Ethnology] (20). If we accept Thurnwald's definition --

---

19. Murdock, Social Structure, p. 23.

20. Thurnwald in: Preuss (Ed.), Lehrbuch, p. 289.

121 596 the material collected by Kirchhoff (21) and the ancient Roman familia would serve as good examples -- a patrilineal large family could be described as a kinship group, living, working, and maintaining a household together, consisting of a husband, his wives, and all his offspring, and splitting into the large families of his sons upon the death of the father.

21. Kirchhoff, Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Vol. 63, p. 88 ff., p. 96 ff.

Kirchhoff defines the large family in the same fashion, yet he takes care to point out that here, in contrast to a kinship group, persons who have married into the group are part of it (22).

22. Kirchhoff, Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Vol. 63, p. 90.

Murdock's conception of the "extended family" is identical with this interpretation (23).

23. Murdock, Social Structure, p. 24.

On the other hand, in Vol. 2 (p. 22) Thurnwald regards the large family as a unilateral kinship group with persons who have married into it. This group lives in the same place and is governed by a common chief from whom all the members are supposedly descended. The kinship group, in contrast to the large family, may be scattered. [197] Thus, Thurnwald at this point puts other characteristics in the foreground, but the text allows the conclusion that for Thurnwald the dependence on the life of the head of the families and its temporary nature are the essential characteristics of a large family.

596 614 In this sense none of the units described under A-E[1] is a large family. The wives who have married into the group belong to the group of the husband, but they always remain part of their father's group; in case of divorce they return to the

[1] [pages 9-15, category 116.-Analyst]

596 latter group. Another factor which reminds us of the wife's con-614 tinuing membership in her original group is the connection, never completely severed, between the groups related by marriage, illustrated by the practice of gifts and counter-gifts which are all part of the bride price and the dowry. When she dies, the [764] wife is buried in the soil of her group. In addition, the group membership of the wife is transferred to the children, although this does not have the same effects in economic and political [611] terms. Matrilineal descent is important in relation to marriage restrictions, certain avoidance practices which are passed on through the wives, and also certain privileges. Quite a large number of persons has settled permanently in the group of their mother or that of their grandmothers.

The decisive factor that makes the term "large family" unsuitable is the "eternal" character of the A-E groups of the Ekonda. However, the subdivisions of the A-groups which live together in a common homestead (see p. 10) may be regarded as large families in the sense used by Thurnwald, Kirchhoff, and Murdock.

Kinship Group

614 In the definitions of the term "family" quoted above, we already learned something about Thurnwald's concept of a 121 kinship group, but there is an additional reference to the technical term "kinship group" ["Sippe"]" (p. 17 f.) (24):

24. Menschliche Gesellschaft, Vol. 4.

"...A kinship group is defined as a clan (q.v.) which is not politically independent. Usually the loss of independence is caused by the distribution of the people of the clan among the various settlements. A kinship group is held together by the consciousness of being descended from the same ancestors and by their common cult of the ancestors. The kinship group is of special importance for the regulation of marriage (q.v.). -- A kinship group may be divided into kinship subgroups (large 121 614 kinship group [Grosssippe], small kinship group [Kleinsippe]), or it may have a tendency to split in half. A kinship group or a kinship subgroup may at times have a chief, at times not."

On the term "clan" Thurnwald writes (p. 16) (24):

24. Menschliche Gesellschaft, Vol. 4.

"The word is of Old Irish origin, where it refers to children of common descent, approximately in the sense of a 'large family' (q.v.). We now use it for family agglomerations (see Horde) who have become stabilized, who have a religious substructure through their belief in common ancestors, and who support each other economically and politically. It is advisable to make a distinction between the 'clan' which settles exclusively within one region and which claims this region for itself, thus forming a politically sovereign community, and the splinters of a clan scattered among communities which are independent in their own right, which we designate as 'kinship groups' (q.v.) and which usually are not tied to each other by any organizational framework; their cohesion is simply the result of the ceremonial-religious cult of the ancestors and a certain degree of solidarity. The origin of the clan and kinship group is closely related to the cult of the ancestors which symbolizes descent lines. Membership in a clan or in a kinship group may be reckoned in the male or female lines. Frequently one of the living family heads represents this family agglomeration which is, so to speak, [198] 'crystallized.' In this respect it differs from familial structures which become extinct upon the death of the persons by whom they were founded. In a clan or a kinship group the families succeeding each other are permanently represented (see Family, Caste, State)."

We may state that a common feature of both forms is that we are dealing here with purely unilateral units which are tied to each other by ancestor worship (this ancestor worship may be -- in many cases, it will be -- absent in the large family as described above). If we disregard the attempt inherent in both

121 definitions to present a theory of development, the differentiation
114 between the two terms appears to me to be very useful, and this seems particularly true if we accept the first definition of clan given by Thurnwald and regard the second as completely irrelevant for our present purposes.

It is true that our A-group lives in a certain district 614 which it claims for itself as its own "province," but it is never-621 theless difficult to describe this district as a politically sovereign community. A political nature could rather be attributed to those groups which, up to now, we have not described at all, i.e., the settlement communities. Proceeding further, the A-group is integrated into the B-group, the B-group into the C-group, thus forming an endless chain; among those tribes who have a greater degree of genealogical consciousness than the Ekonda -- for example, the neighboring Bongili (25) -- the hierarchy of groups ends with mankind, the hierarchy of ancestors with God.

25. Boelaert, "Les Bongili."

Thurnwald emphasizes this ranked structure, especially 121 in discussing the kinship group. Kirchhoff, however, fails to 614 deal with the problem of the kinship group in a manner which would be of value to us in differentiating between kinship group and clan. Dealing with the organizational structure of the peoples he discussed, he naturally was more interested in defining the border between large family and kinship group. Lowie (26)

26. Primitive Society.

only discusses the kinship group, "sib," calling it the "'clan' of British anthropologists", (p. 105) or "clans," if patrilineal, and "gentes," if matrilineal, "of most American anthropologists." The "ad infinitum" (p. 106) is also stressed by him in relation to the kinship group. Lowie also admits the possibility of subdivision with respect to his "sib," and consequently he even includes in the kinship group such forms as the "moieties," which according to Thurnwald's definition are still part of it, but which in his view

614 and in general ethnological usage are units of a special type.
121 Thus Lowie's and Thurnwald's views correspond to a large extent.

Murdock (27) clearly differentiates between a kinship group and a "lineage." In his view a lineage consists of a group of individuals who are able to trace their descent to a common ancestor, which for him in the majority of cases is only the unilateral "stem" [Stamm] of a large family, excluding those who have married into the group, but including the members who have married out.

27. Social Structure, p. 45 ff.

Murdock's and Thurnwald's concepts of the kinship group are identical. On the other hand, Murdock differs in his definition of the clan (28).

28. Social Structure, p. 65 ff., especially p. 69 f.

Clan

618
614
121
Murdock regards the patrilineal clan as a local group which consists of the stem of a kinship group and which incorporates the wives of its members but excludes daughters who marry. As an example he mentioned the "groups" which in our society are connected by the same family name. If the group of persons bearing the birth-name "Wolf" in common functioned as a group of relatives, it would [199] be a Wolf kinship group, but those persons who actually call themselves "Wolf," i.e., the Messrs. Wolf with their wives, sons, unmarried sisters, and daughters, would constitute a Wolf clan (assuming, of course, that this group really functions). This concept of a clan is new. Even Murdock does not consider this definition very satisfactory and invites better suggestions. According to Murdock, the clan is a unit of eminent importance; terminologically it has not been possible so far to differentiate it from the kinship group. It is irrelevant in this connection whether the term clan is applicable to this

614 social group. It is true that the "Murdock clan" also exists
618 among the Ekonda on all the lower ranks, but only as a func-
121 tional unit which, like the large family and small family, is not really regarded as a group by the Ekonda. Among the Ekonda the feeling of cohesion between the indigenous group and those who have married into it has its basis not so much in the groups of relatives as described above, but rather in the local group of the type discussed further below.

614 The units which we described in the first part of this study correspond neither to the definition of Thurnwald nor to that of Murdock as regards the term clan. Our groups differ from the clan as described by Thurnwald by their hierarchical structure over which functions of authority are distributed. An added factor is that Thurnwald in the Lehrbuch (29) wants to define the difference between clan and kinship group by size and by ascribing to the former the element of political power. The only kinship group of the Ekonda which possesses strong authority, however, is the smallest, the one of rank A. If we let ourselves be guided by the criterion of authority, we would have to regard the smallest group (rank A) as a clan. Using the criterion of size, however, we would have to regard one of the groups of ranks D or E as a clan. Hence this term is unsuitable.

For the above reasons I have used the term "kinship group" [Sippe] for the groups of all ranks. With respect to the E-groups one might even speak of a subtribe [Unterstamm], but it should be pointed out that as far as the Ekonda are concerned all the groups mentioned above, including the tribes [Stämme] are groups or relatives of the same type, i.e., are "kinship groups."

For the purpose of differentiating between the kinship groups of the various ranks I have used the terms:

nuclear kinship group [Kernsippe] for groups of rank A;
small kinship group [Kleinsippe] for groups of rank B;

---

29. Thurnwald: in Preuss, Lehrbuch, p. 259 f.

614 kinship subgroup [Untersippe] for groups of rank C;
kinship group [Sippe] for groups of rank D (the exogamous units);
large kinship group [Grosssippe] for groups of rank E.

Local Organization

361 621 178 The second diagram[1] shows the settlement pattern of the Isangi group in its old settlement area up to 1949. At this time Isangi was relocated near the highway. Only two of the nuclear kinship groups of Isangi can lay claim to territory reaching far enough toward the east as to extend beyond the new highway. Thus, the resettlement process has led to a complete change of the settlement pattern. However, the functions of the settlement communities have not yet been adapted to the new settlement. At present the inhabitants are still so engaged in speculation about the possibility of a return to their own old territory that they have not yet reformed their village organization.

621 614 We observe that the village is divided into six settlement communities (30), each of which consists only of the members of one of the two kinship groups of Isangi. [200] We find that only the group of the father, which formerly was a kinship group in its own right, is attached to one settlement community of the kinship group Ngelé. Incidentally, we might point out that the names of the two kinship groups, Ngelé and Nkoto, mean "down the river" and "up the river." The older group is called "down the river" since in ngelé the river is large and wide. We come across this honorary term for the older group in some other villages although there is not always an "up-river" group. No corresponding settlement pattern can be found.

614 621 202 624 The degree of cohesion among the constituent kinship groups in settlement community I is so strong that the entire community has a communal bokendi, a communal messenger.

---

30. See Diagram 3.

[1] [page 7, category 116.—Analyst]

614 It is the task of the messengers to transmit all important mes-
621 sages to the other groups in accordance with a precise plan;
202 this is particularly true regarding the invitations to the meetings 624 of the village council with the nkúmú. At the same time they inform the other groups as to the program of the meeting. The first messenger calls on the messenger of the other community;
the old men are gathered at the latter's house in order to receive and to discuss the message. The messenger of this community, in turn, departs for the next in line. As a result of this practice the messenger and his home became one of the centers of social life.

621 The same uniformity is found in community II. Here
614 we can also see the engangala, the meeting place of the village
361 Isangi and of its branch villages. The meeting place is an open 623 space in which stands a short tree with a broad crown. The representatives of the several villages gather in the shade of this tree since one of the open men's houses could not accommodate all of them. The senior of the nuclear kinship groups Mpia (No. 14), Nsambi (No. 15), and Liengo (No. 16) has his house on this spot which is situated on the border of the territory belonging to these three groups. The elder of Mpia, however, is the messenger for the hamlet of Boyeke; he may of course be identical with the "elder on the engangala."

614 Cohesion within the third settlement community was also 621 so strong that it employs only one messenger. The kinship sub-group Nsambósálá which is concentrated in this hamlet is said to consist of the descendants of an illegitimate child of the daughter of the village founder (see Diagram 1). As is the case in many [782] other villages, it is therefore entrusted with the office of the [624] boténi, who carries out the sacrifice of human beings and animals on the proper occasions.

614 The three communities just described are relatively 621 homogeneous groups; the three following ones are quite hetero-
624 geneous. The two groups of hamlet IV belong to the kinship sub-202 groups Iyolo and Mbo. In contrast to the kinship subgroups Lovendo and Besilo, they regard themselves as sufficiently different from

614 each other to employ their own messengers. When the messenger
621 of settlement II arrives here, he first calls on the messenger of 624 the nuclear kinship group Bosóbé (No. 19) and then to Impínga 202 (No. 26). The messenger from Bosóbé calls on his relatives in settlement VI, who are the nuclear kinship group Mbelo-Mmuna
(No. 22), while the messenger from Impínga-Ndongó formerly had to call on the group Bommambo which is now extinct.

Settlement V consisted of three different groups. Bolíma, the group of the father, had its own messenger; however, he only received the messages without having to pass them on, which is also the case with all these last groups of the village. Both neighbors had their own messenger. The messenger from settlement I called on the nuclear kinship group Bolesangi, his relatives; the messenger from settlement III went to his relatives of the nuclear kinship group Ituli.

There were also two messengers in the last hamlet, but reports on this subject are insufficient since the nuclear kinship group Bommambo has been extinct for a long time.

178 All the settlements just mentioned have a common
614 characteristic: formerly, at important dance festivals, their 621 young men performed together in one joint corps de ballet. The 595 population was decimated as a result of the rigors of [201] the [161] occupation period and also as a result of the population movement into the cities. Consequently, there are not enough young people any more, and I with II, III with IV, and V with VI act together. Thus, in each case we find Ngelé and Nkoto united in one ballet. Although these groups have also been scattered [361] as a result of the new settlement pattern (next to the highway), the old organizational structure has been preserved, and the young people do not hesitate to walk the long distance to the practice field every day so they can dance in the old groupings.

621 All of Isangi, all three kinship groups, have one common
624 village chief, the Nkúmú, with an iyolo nsáka who gets the meet-622 ings started, and a village court with its judges. There are other groups which correspond to Isangi (31), but have more than one

---

31. See Müller, Fürstentum, pp. 73 ff., 76 ff., 133 f.

621 nkúmú. They, too, however, have only one man who opens a 624 meeting and one investigating judge. Only one of the nkúmú 622 has the function of judge. Consequently, we may say that even if the office is divided, the group still forms a unit as far as jurisdiction and political organization are concerned.

Among these groups we usually can observe a balanced 614 system of distribution as far as titles and offices are concerned.
621 It may either be predominantly democratic, as in Isangi, so 622 that all groups may lay claim to titles and offices, or it may be 624 oligarchic, as in Mbanga, where all power is vested in the oldest group of sons. In most cases, oligarchical groups tend to disintegrate; the younger groups attempt to free themselves from the rule. Democratic villages usually have a greater degree of cohesion.

In Isangi the small kinship groups of Ndongó (Nos. 2-4), Ngonga (No. 5), and Boyeke (Nos. 14-18) formerly had the privilege of furnishing the nkúmú. This practice has been discarded, and the honor is now rotated among the six local groups of the village. Only the small kinship groups of the Bolíma, Besilo, and Njáléokuli are excluded.

The six settlement communities of Isangi and similar 621 groupings found in other villages are parts of a village which 614 in my opinion are best described by the term hamlet [Weiler].

These are units which are predominantly intentional in nature. In spite of their functional weakness, they have survived even in the new settlement although they may not dwell together in a block. As a result of reintegration, they have lost their function as conscription district for the dancing groups in Isangi (see p. 28), but even at the present time they still represent the most important grouping in Isangi; we were aware of it before identifying any of the kinship groups. It is expected that they will lose their importance if Isangi does not return to its original site. By nature less closely connected with the or-[562] ganization of the village of their husbands, the women have become the point of departure for the new order of things (e.g., for dance groups) which fulfills the requirements of the new settlement conditions.

614 621 624 [202] Each hamlet includes one or several message districts. Even at the time of the old settlement pattern the messenger system was determined by the hierarchical structure and not at all by considerations of what was most practical (for example, the shortest route). Consequently this conservative institution of the conservative old men has not been affected at all by the relocation.

The villages are the communities of jurisdiction and of political life. Usually a nkúmú, presides over the meetings. If a village has several nkúmú, one of whom may be the judge or all may preside together, I have used the term "part of a village" [Dorfteil] for the district from which each nkúmú originates.

361 621 178 Those areas which have a special meeting place are here referred to as a "province" [Gau]. The meeting place lies within the territory of the oldest or second-oldest kinship group. The practical importance of this institution for the entire province is minimal, but the two meeting places [202] which we discovered still constituted, until a short time ago, important social centers for the duplicate villages forming the administrative centers of the respective provinces. As a result of the relocation, the meeting places have now lost their function completely.

000 I hope that this paper has added new material to the discussion on the subject of ethno-sociological terminology, and that it will stimulate criticism and a new discussion of this important subject.

Bibliography

113 Boelaert, Edmond: Les Bongili, Aequatoria 10, S. 17—34. Coquilhatville 1947.

— Le Clan équivoque, Aequatoria 11, S. 13—19. Coquilhatville 1948.

Fortes, Meyer: The Dynamics of Clanship among the Tallensi. London 1945.

Hulstaert, Gustav: Le mariage des Nkundó, Mémoires des IRCB, Sect. des Sciences Morales et Politiques, 8 (8°) 1938. Bruxelles 1938.

Lévi-Strauss, Claude: Les structures élémentaires de la parenté. Paris 1949.

Kirchhoff, Paul: Verwandtschaftsbezeichnungen und Verwandtenheirat, Zeitschrift für Ethnologie 64, S. 41—47. Berlin 1932.

— Die Verwandtschaftsorganisation der Urwaldstämme Südamerikas, Zeitschrift für Ethnologie 63, S. 85—193. Berlin 1931.

Lowie, Robert Heinrich: Primitive Society. New York 1949^{3}.

Mühlmann, Wilhelm Emil: Methodik der Völkerkunde. Stuttgart 1938.

Müller, Ernst Wilhelm: Das Fürstentum bei den Südwestmóngo. Philosophische Dissertation. Mainz 1955.

Murdock, Georg Peter: Changing Emphasis in Social Structure, Southwestern Journ. of Anthropology 11, S. 361—370. Albuquerque 1955.

— Social structure. New York 1949.

Preuss, Konrad Theodor (Herausgeber): Lehrbuch der Völkerkunde in 2., teilweise veränderter Auflage, herausgegeben von Richard Thurnwald. Stuttgart 1939.

Radcliffe-Brown: The study of Kinship systems, Journal of the Royal Anthr. Institute 71, S. 1—18. London 1941.

Thurnwald, Richard: Die menschliche Gesellschaft in ihren ethno-soziologischen Grundlagen, 5 Bände. Berlin 1932—35.

Wörterbuch der Soziologie, herausgegeben von W. Bernsdorf und Fr. Bülow, Stuttgart 1955.

8: Müller FO32 Mongo

ZEITSCHRIFT
FÜR
ETHNOLOGIE

Organ der Deutschen Gesellschaft für Völkerkunde

Band 81

[title page]

BRAUNSCHWEIG
VERLAG ALBERT LIMBACH
1956

[p. 188]

Soziologische Terminologie und soziale Organisation der Ekonda

Von

Ernst W. Müller

Mit 3 Abbildungen

Einleitung

Diese Arbeit ist entstanden aus Vorarbeiten zur Publikation der Ergebnisse der „Mainzer Kongo-Expedition 1951/54", an der ich als Assistent von Fräulein Dr. Sulzmann teilnahm.

Um die Verwandtschafts- und Lokalgruppen der Ekonda beschreiben und bezeichnen zu können, mußte versucht werden, sie als ethnosoziologischen Idealtypen [1]) zugehörig zu erkennen. Dazu war es notwendig, Klarheit über den Inhalt der die Typen bezeichnenden Termini zu gewinnen. Es wurden Arbeiten von Thurnwald [2]), Kirchhoff [3]), Murdock [4]), Radcliff-Brown [5]), Lowie [6]) und Levi-Strauß [7]) herangezogen [8]).

Alle Versuche, ethnosoziologische Idealtypen zu erkennen, müssen ihrer Natur nach unvollkommen sein und bedürfen der ständigen Revision an Hand der ethnographischen Realität [9]). Eine Revision kann nur erfolgen, wenn jeder Feldforscher die vorhandene Terminologie bei der Bearbeitung seines Materials mit „seinen" Realitäten vergleicht und das Ergebnis dieses Vergleichs zur Diskussion stellt. Leider werden aber die ethnosoziologischen Termini oft in einer individuellen Weise verwandt, ohne daß der Autor sich auf die vorhandenen Terminologien bezieht, oder ohne daß er anderweitig die Leser darüber informiert, was er unter den verschiedenen Termini versteht. Man richtet sich dabei nach so unzuverlässigen Maßstäben wie dem „Sprachgefühl" oder glaubt, daß die eigene Terminologie einer allgemeinen Konvention entspräche. Oft weicht aber der Gebrauch stark von dem ab, was in den terminologischen Arbeiten vorgeschlagen wird. Das Ergebnis ist, daß Ausdrücke wie „Klan", „Sippe" und „Großfamilie" bei verschiedenen Lesern verschiedene Vorstellungen erwecken.

Bei der vorliegenden Arbeit soll die Terminologie der obengenannten Autoren mit den Verwandtschafts- und Lokalgruppen der Ekonda verglichen werden. Es handelt sich um die nordwestliche Abteilung der Ekonda, die im Territorium Bikoro wohnen. Die Ekonda gehören zu der großen Gruppe der Mongo.

Es wurde gesagt, daß es sich um Verwandtschafts- und Lokalgruppen handelt, eine Feststellung, die der Erläuterung bedarf. Wenn hier von Lokalgruppen die Rede ist, so soll damit nicht gesagt werden, daß es sich um Verbände handelt, die aus nicht verwandten Untergruppen bestehen. Es soll nur ausgedrückt werden, daß die Wohnweise das entscheidende Kriterium für ihre Abgrenzung ist. Es können nahverwandte Gruppen ausgeschlossen, fernerstehende eingeschlossen sein. Gelegentlich umfassen solche Lokalverbände auch Gruppen, die untereinander nicht verwandt sind.

---

[1]) Zum Typusbegriff siehe Thurnwald, Menschl. Gesellschaft, Bd. 1, S. VII ff., Mühlmann, Methodik, S. 114 ff. und Wörterbuch der Soziologie, S. 224 f.

[2]) Menschl. Gesellschaft, Bd. 2, 4.

[3]) Verwandtschaftsorganisation, ZE 63, S. 85—193; Verwandtschaftsbezeichnungen, ZE 64, S. 41—71.

[4]) Social Structure.

[4a]) Changing Emphasis.

[5]) Study of Kinship Systems.

[6]) Primitive Society.

[7]) Structures élémentaires.

[8]) Für Beratung und Literaturhinweise bin ich Herrn Prof. Mühlmann zu besonderem Dank verpflichtet.

[9]) Mühlmann, Methodik, S. 120.

Auch bei den Gruppen, die ich hier Verwandtschaftsgruppen nenne, ist ein biologischer oder ein genealogisch nachweisbarer juristischer Zusammenhang oft sehr zweifelhaft. Doch wird diese Ungenauigkeit hier nicht beachtet, verwandt ist, was die Ekonda selbst als verwandt betrachten. Es scheint mir nicht gerechtfertigt, über die Auffassung der Eingeborenen hinwegzusehen, da sie Charakter und Funktion der Gruppen bestimmen. Diese Auffassung vertritt Murdock[10]) für die Sippe, während die lineage für ihn aus Menschen besteht, die ihre Verwandtschaft nachweisen können. Es sei hier gleich darauf hingewiesen, daß auch die Lokalgruppen die Tendenz haben, sich zu „paternisieren"[11]), eine engere Verwandtschaft zu konstruieren.

Die Verwandtschaftsgliederung der Ekonda

Wir finden bei den Ekonda ein System von Gruppen vor, die nach wahrer oder angenommener Verwandtschaft einander zugeordnet sind. Das System ist vielstufig hierarchisch gegliedert, indem größere Gruppen eine bis vier Gruppen der nächsten Ordnung umfassen. Die Beziehungen zwischen den Gruppen entsprechen den Beziehungen zwischen ihren Gründerahnen. So werden Gruppen als älterer und jüngerer Bruder usw. einer anderen Gruppe bezeichnet. Gruppen können im Verhältnis zu anderen bezeichnet werden als:

Bruder, jüngerer oder älterer,

Bruder oder Halbbruder (von verschiedenen Frauen des polygynen Stammvaters), uneheliches Kind der Schwester, das juristisch als Kind des ältesten Bruders bzw. des Vaters seiner Mutter zu der Gruppe der Verwandten der Mutter gehört, Kind eines Jungen, der mit seiner Schwester in den Verband seiner Schwäger gezogen ist und sich dort für dauernd niedergelassen hat, Schwestersohn, der sich aus irgendeinem Grunde von seiner väterlichen Verwandtschaft getrennt hat und zu der Gruppe seiner Mutter oder einer seiner Großmütter gezogen ist.

Die Verschiedenartigkeit der verwandtschaftlichen Beziehungen wirkt sich auf die sozialen Verhältnisse von heute aus. Die Verwandtschaftsbezeichnungen, die das Verhältnis der wahren oder angenommenen Ahnen zueinander bezeichneten, werden gelegentlich auf die Gruppen übertragen.

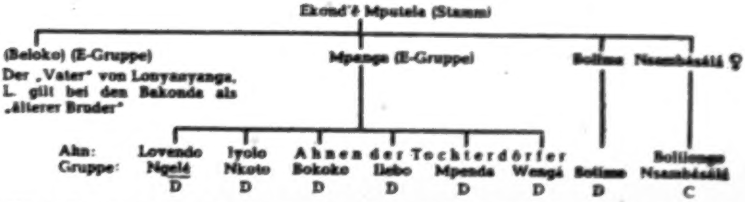
Als Beispiel einer hierarchischen Verwandtschaftsgliederung wird hier die Gruppe Isangi[12]) beschrieben. Isangi ist eine Lokalgruppe der oben (S. 188) erwähnten Art, die ich, entsprechend dem allgemeinen Brauch im Lande selbst, als „Dorf" bezeichne. Bis zu einer Entscheidung über die Bezeichnung der Gruppen verwende ich für die einzelnen Stufen der hierarchischen Ordnung die Buchstaben A bis E. Dabei bezeichnet A die Stufe der kleinsten und E die der größten Verbände (s. Abb. 2).

Außer den drei Stufen der Gruppe D in Isangi gibt es weitere in den Tochterdörfern (s. Abb. 1), die aber auch fremde Gruppen umfassen können, wie z. B. in Wengá die „Nkundó"-Gruppe Liimbu.

Alle Gruppen, die in dem Schema (Abb. 2) dargestellt sind, sind den Erwachsenen in Isangi mit ihren Namen bekannt. Die Gruppen haben alle neben ihrem normalen Namen noch einen Trommelnamen und einen Ehrennamen. Nur die drei Gruppen Boyeke der Stufe B haben zwar verschiedene Trommelnamen, aber keine eigentlichen Gruppennamen. Die Zuordnung der Gruppen, wie wir sie in dem Schema finden, entspricht keiner Genealogie, sie basiert nur auf den Charakteristika und Funktionen der einzelnen Gruppen,

---

[10]) Social Structure p. 47.
[11]) Boelaert: Clan équivoque p. 17.
[12]) Müller, Fürstentum, S. 68 ff., 125, 128 ff.



Ekond'ě Mputela (Stamm)
(Beloko) (E-Gruppe)
Der „Vater" von Lonyasyanga.
L. gilt bei den Bakonda als „älterer Bruder"
Mpanga (E-Gruppe)
Bolima
Nsambásálá ♀
Ahn:
Gruppe:
Lovendo
Ngelé
D Iyolo
Nkoto
D
Ahnen der Tochterdörfer
Bokoko
D Ilebo
D Mpenda
D Wengá
D
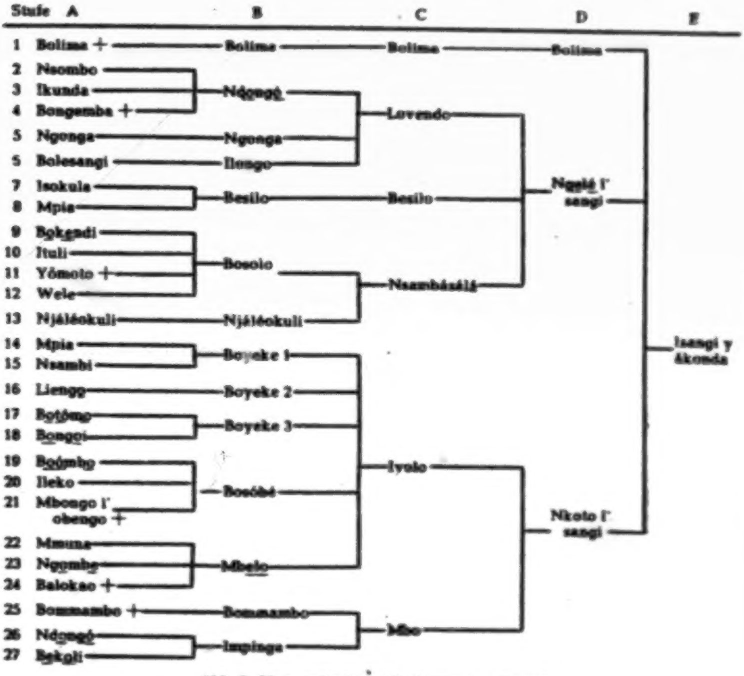
Bolima
D
Boliionga
Nsambásálá
C

Abb. 1. Genealogie der Bakonda. Die Buchstaben unter den Gruppennamen beziehen sich auf die Stufe der betreffenden Gruppen (s. Abb. 2)



Stufe A
B
C
D
E
1 Bolima +
2 Nsombo
3 Ikunda
4 Bongemba +
5 Ngonga
5 Bolesangi
7 Isokula
8 Mpia
9 Bokendi
10 Ituli
11 Yőmoto +
12 Wele
13 Njáléokuli
14 Mpia
15 Nsambi
16 Lienge
17 Botóme
18 Bongoi
19 Boómbo
20 Ileko
21 Mbongo l' obengo +
22 Mmuna
23 Ngombe
24 Balokao +
25 Bommambo +
26 Ndongó
27 Bekoli
Bolima
Ndongó
Ngonga
Ilongo
Besilo
Bosolo
Njáléokuli
Boyeke 1
Boyeke 2
Boyeke 3
Bosóbé
Mbelo
Bommambo
Impinga
Bolima
Lovendo
Besilo
Nsambásálá
Iyolo
Mbo
Bolima
Ngelé l' sangi
Nkoto l' sangi
Isangi y ákonda

Abb. 2. Verwandtschaftsgliederung von Isangi
1—27 = Numerierung der A-Gruppen im Lageplan Abb. 3
+ = ausgestorbene Gruppe

die jeweils auf einer Stufe gleich sind. Es handelt sich also um ein Organisationsschema, nicht um eine Stammtafel.

Die Beziehungen zwischen den einzelnen Gruppen sind den Leuten von Isangi ebenfalls bekannt, doch ist ihnen das System nicht in der Weise transparent, wie es hier im Schema erscheint. Sie stellen die Verwandtschaft unter den Gruppen fest, sind auch in der Lage anzugeben, welche Funktionen den einzelnen Gruppen zukommen, ohne deswegen Gruppen gleicher Funktion als gleichartig zu betrachten und ohne sie in ein solches Schema einzuordnen. Das Schema stellt somit eine Systematisierung dar, die, da sie eine Systematisierung ist, nicht ganz der Wirklichkeit gerecht wird. Dementsprechend gibt es auch Abb. 3.

Das Dorf Isongi auf seinem eigenen Territorium um 1920
Die Zahlen 1–27 bezeichnen die Sippenzweige (s. Abb. 2)
Die Zahlen I–VI bezeichnen die Weiler:
I = Bokond'ó Vóngo
II = Boyaka
III = [illegible]
IV = Bongiló
V = [illegible]
VI = [illegible]
● = der engangelo, der Versammlungsplatz des Gaues der Bokonda keine zureichende Ekonda-Sozialterminologie. Die Ausdrücke sind — wie im nichtwissenschaftlichen europäischen Sprachgebrauch — nicht genau genug festgelegt. Im übrigen führt der prinzipiell gleichartige Charakter der Gruppen der Stufen A bis E und der noch größeren Verbände dazu, daß alle Ausdrücke fast wahllos für große und kleine Einheiten verwendet werden.
— = Wege

Das Wort ikundi (eigentlich = Schoß) bezeichnet normalerweise kleine Einheiten, etwa der Stufen A und B. Doch gebraucht man es auch für größere und große Verbände, wenn man ihre relativ enge Verwandtschaft betonen will. Es entspricht damit ungefähr der Bedeutung, die das Wort „Familie" im nichtwissenschaftlichen Sprachgebrauch hat. ilongo bezeichnet sowohl die Kleinfamilie im europäischen Sinne als auch Gruppen der Stufe A und B.

Bonsonga und etúká sind Bezeichnungen, die für Verwandtschaftsgruppen der Stufen B, C und D verwendet werden. Doch können sie gelegentlich auch die Gruppen A bezeichnen, außerdem die Lokalgruppen, die in der Größe den genannten Verwandtschaftsverbänden etwa entsprechen. Etíkâ ist die Bezeichnung für den Ölfruchtstand und eine bestimmte Art von Termitenhaufen und wird anscheinend häufiger als bonsonge für Lokalgruppen verwendet.

Ebenfalls schwankend im Gebrauch ist ekindâ. Dieses Wort bezeichnet in erster Linie eine Tanzgruppe, ein corps de ballet und die soziale Einheit, die eine solche gemeinsame Tanzgruppe zu Tanzfesten entsendet.

Esé ist ebenfalls stark lokal bestimmt, es deckt sich meist mit dem, was wir Dorf nennen, doch werden häufig Einheiten als „esé" bezeichnet, die größer oder kleiner als ein Dorf sind. Sehr große Gruppen, Stämme und noch größere Verbände, heißen bonanga.

Für die Einteilung der einzelnen Gruppen in eine der Stufen wurden jeweils ein oder mehrere Funktionen als Kriterium gewählt. Weiter unten werden die Gruppen der einzelnen Stufen in diesen Funktionen geschildert. Allgemein wäre noch zu allen Gruppen zu sagen, daß sie sich in einigen Zügen nicht voneinander unterscheiden. Alle Gruppen aller Stufen sind Verwandtschaftsverbände patrilinearer Abstammung, die sich als Nachkommen eines Ahnherren betrachten. Eine durchlaufende und vollständige Genealogie bis zum Ahn ist nie bekannt. Die Genealogie der Gesamtgruppe Bekonda ist in Zeichnung 1 dargestellt.

Von den Ahnherren der Gruppen der Stufe D in Isangi sind also zwei Brüder, der dritte ist deren Vaterbruder. Eine D-Gruppe (Ngelé) umfaßt außerdem noch die Nachkommen eines unehelichen Kindes der Vaterschwester des Gründers, die die C-Gruppe Nsambásálá bilden.

Zwischen dieser alten Genealogie und den bekannten Vorfahren aus naher Vergangenheit klafft eine Lücke. Im Gegensatz zu den benachbarten Bokóté (s. z. B. Boelaert, Bongili) ist das genealogische Gedächtnis der Ekonda sehr schwach. Es reicht nicht bis zum Begründer der Gruppe der Stufe A zurück. Dabei ist zu berücksichtigen, daß sich eine Gruppe erst dann spaltet, wenn der Ahn, auf den die neuen Gruppen zurückgehen, längst tot ist. Die Nachkommenschaft eines Patriarchen wird sich ja erst in die Gruppen seiner Söhne teilen, wenn sie so groß geworden ist, daß das notwendig erscheint. Bei der Größe auch der kleinsten Ekonda-Gruppen kann das erst nach mehreren Generationen der Fall sein. Dann sind aber der gemeinsame Patriarch und seine Söhne, die Stammväter der neuen Untergruppen, tot. So finden wir zur Zeit eine Tendenz zur Spaltung in der Gruppe Ndong'Tmpinga; die Ahnen der beiden in Entstehung befindlichen Gruppen sind um 1920 gestorben. Wahrscheinlich werden sich die beiden Gruppen in ihrem Altersverhältnis zueinander nicht nach dem Verhältnis dieser „Stammväter", sondern nach dem Verhältnis der „Patriarchen", unter denen sie sich trennen, einstufen. Der genaue Vorgang der Spaltung von A-Gruppen kann nur an Ort und Stelle beobachtet, nicht durch Befragung nachträglich ermittelt werden.

Im Folgenden sollen jetzt die Gruppen der verschiedenen Stufen in ihrer Charakteristik beschrieben werden.

Gruppen der Stufe A:

Diese Gruppen bestehen aus bis zu 40 Personen. Zu einer solchen Gruppe gehört in den meisten Fällen eine Gruppe Batwá-Pygmoide, die als Heloten zu der A-Gruppe ihrer Herren gehören und diese Zugehörigkeit in der männlichen Linie weitervererben, ebenso wie ihre Herren. Das älteste Mitglied der A-Gruppe — Pygmoide ausgeschlossen — ist der „bomóté bokonda", der „Eigentümer des Bodens", die Verkörperung aller Autorität im Innern und der Vertreter der Gruppe nach außen. Er ist die einzige Person mit voller Geschäftsfähigkeit. Alle Mitglieder der Gruppe stehen zu ihm im Vater-Sohn-Verhältsein, selbst wenn die jüngeren Mitglieder nach Generationen gerechnet ihm gegenüber Vaterrang haben. Er hat den Schatz der Gruppe an Brautpfandgütern, den er verwaltet und ausgibt. Er hat das Verfügungsrecht über das Grundeigentum der Gruppe. Im Ältestenrat des Dorfes und der anderen größeren Verbände vertritt er die A-Gruppe. Gelten auch alle Mitglieder der Gruppe als nicht geschäftsfähig, so werden doch alle Rechtshandlungen, die sie vornehmen, als im Einverständnis des Patriarchen eingegangen angesehen. Die Mitglieder der Gruppe können sich weitgehend untereinander vertreten. In Abwesenheit des Ältesten kann auch ein jüngeres Mitglied als Vertreter der Gruppe bei Ratsversammlungen fungieren. Beim Tode des Seniors folgt ihm das nächstälteste Gruppenmitglied in seiner Funktion.

Nur innere Zwistigkeiten, die nicht zu überbrücken sind, und große Zunahme der Bevölkerung führen zu einer Teilung der A-Gruppe. Die neu entstandenen A-Gruppen behalten weiterhin einen engen Zusammenhang, der zu Beginn größer ist als in den B-Gruppen, deren A-Einheiten sich schon früher geteilt haben. Da auch auf höheren Stufen der Zusammenhalt nach der Trennung nur allmählich abnimmt, entsteht eine Vielstufigkeit im Zusammengehörigkeitsgefühl, die durch kein Schema auch nur annähernd richtig wiedergegeben werden kann. Eine Regel zur Teilung, etwa nach einer bestimmten Generationszahl wie bei den Tallensi[illegible], existiert nicht. Die A-Gruppen sind also theoretisch „ewig". Die A-Gruppen unterteilen sich in Kleinfamilien. Innerhalb der polygynen Familien haben die Familienkerne[illegible] eine ökonomisch halbwegs unabhängige Stellung. Jede Frau hat ein eigenes Haus. Die Frauen eines Mannes und die Frauen seiner Söhne haben ihre Häuser in einem Gehöft. Der Vater als Gehöftsherr hat einen offenen Hangar als Aufenthalt der Männer und als Versammlungshaus. Stirbt der Gehöftsherr, so wird das Gehöft verlassen. Die Söhne errichten auf ihren neuen Wohnplätzen je einen eigenen Hangar. Im Gegensatz zu den Gruppen vom Typ A—E ist die Gruppe, die ein Gehöft bewohnt, endlich: sie endet mit dem Tode des Vaters. Nur ein Mann, dessen Vater (im europäischen Sinne des Wortes) gestorben ist, kann einen Hangar haben. Zwischen A-Gruppe und Kleinfamilie steht somit noch die Gehöftsgemeinschaft.

Fassen wir alles, was für die A-Gruppen charakteristisch ist, noch einmal zusammen:

Zugehörigkeit nach männlicher Folge geregelt, Einheit des rechtlichen Lebens, insbesondere im Grund- und Erbrecht, der Senior hat die volle potestas. Nachfolge nach reinem Seniorat, theoretisch unbegrenzte Dauer der Gruppe. Die A-Gruppen bestehen aus Kleinfamilien, die in Gehöften unter jeweils einem Vater zusammenwohnen.

Gruppen der Stufe B:

Zwischen den A-Gruppen, die zu einer B-Gruppe gehören, besteht normalerweise ein freund-nachbarliches Verhältnis. Man unterstützt sich gegenseitig weitgehend, berät auch die sozialen Angelegenheiten gemeinsam. Die Gruppe B hat nur einen Nkúmú [illegible], den „Herrn der verborgenen Kraft", den Sippenpriester. Er wird von allen zugehörigen Leuten konsultiert. Bei der magischen Jagdvorbereitung tritt er in Funktion, bei allen Unternehmungen von Bedeutung wird er gefragt. Er spricht zu dem Verstorbenen bei dessen Verabschiedung nach der Beerdigung, an ihn wendet man sich, wenn die Ahnen im Traum erscheinen und Wünsche, Befehle oder Mitteilungen an die Lebenden übermitteln wollen. Er schützt die Leute seiner Gruppe vor dem bösen Willen — ndoki — der Toten und der Lebenden. Dieser Sippenpriester wird als das

---

[illegible] Fortes, Dynamics of Clanship, S. [illegible].

[illegible] Thurnwald, Menschl. Gesellschaft, Bd. 4, S. [illegible].

Kriterium dafür betrachtet, welche Gruppe zusammengehöriger A-Gruppen eine B-Gruppe darstellt. Der Sippenpriester stammt aus einer bestimmten der zugehörigen A-Gruppen.

Zwischen den A-Gruppen einer B-Gruppe gibt es zwar ein Rangverhältnis — eine Gruppe gilt als die ältere —, doch ist dies von untergeordneter Bedeutung (s. unten, unter Lokalgruppen). Der führende Mann der B-Gruppe ist der älteste der Seniores der zugehörigen A-Gruppen, d. h. der Senior der B-Gruppe. Jedoch ist er nicht ein Inhaber voller potestas wie der Senior der A-Gruppe, er ist mehr ein princeps inter pares. Das berührt natürlich nicht seine Stellung als Senior in seiner eigenen A-Gruppe.

Innerhalb einer B-Gruppe wird oft das Grundeigentum noch als zusammengehörig betrachtet, obwohl schon festgelegte Grenzen zwischen den Territorien der konstituierenden A-Gruppen bestehen. Im allgemeinen kann man das Einverständnis der anderen Seniores voraussetzen, die Jagd auf ihr Gebiet auszudehnen, unter gewissen Umständen Pflanzungen auf ihrem Gebiet anzulegen oder bestimmte Wildpflanzen als Rohmaterial für Hausbau und Handwerk zu suchen. Die Zugehörigkeit zur Gruppe B bestimmt sich durch die Zugehörigkeit zur Gruppe A.

Auf eine Reihe Besonderheiten in der Abstammungsfolge, die sich aus der Bedeutung des Brautpfandes ergeben, soll hier nicht eingegangen werden. Wir hörten von einem Fall von Inzest zwischen Mitgliedern zweier A-Gruppen, die eine B-Gruppe bilden, nicht aber innerhalb einer Gruppe A. Dabei sind allerdings die Inzeste nicht berücksichtigt, die nötig sind, ein besonders kräftiges Zaubermittel wirksam zu machen.

Fassen wir alles, was für die B-Gruppen charakteristisch ist, noch einmal zusammen:

Es gibt nur einen Sippenpriester. Der Zusammenhang in einer B-Gruppe ist sehr eng, es besteht starke Zusammenarbeit, man berät in allen Dingen gemeinsam, auch in solchen, die sich eigentlich nur auf eine der zugehörigen A-Gruppen beziehen, dabei hat der älteste der Seniores einen gewissen Vorrang.

Gruppen der Stufe C:

Der Zusammenhang in einer Gruppe dieser Stufe ist wesentlich loser, obwohl gerade auf diesem Niveau sehr starke Unterschiede zwischen den einzelnen Gruppen bestehen. So betrachten sich z. B. die Gruppen Lovando und Bosilo als viel enger zusammengehörig, als eine dieser beiden mit Nsambéndá (s. Zeichnung 2). Das hatte mich veranlaßt, in meiner Dissertation diese Stufe in zwei verschiedene Stufen (Untergruppen I° und II°) aufzuteilen [illegible]. Da keine markanten Kriterien für zwei Stufen existieren, in anderen Dörfern überhaupt eine Scheidungsmöglichkeit fehlt, mache ich keine Zwischenunterscheidung mehr.

Die Gruppen der Stufe C sind die exogamen Einheiten von morgen. Zwischen den Angehörigen verschiedener C-Gruppen ist zwar die Ehe verboten, doch sind sexuelle Beziehungen zwischen ihnen gestattet. Diese Erlaubnis entspricht dem [illegible] der Bokilé [illegible].

Gruppen der Stufe D:

Die Gruppen dieser Stufe sind die wahren exogamen Einheiten. Zwar kommen bei „ovdudu" auch innerhalb der Stufe D Heiraten vor, doch wird diese Praxis noch nicht von den Alten als richtig anerkannt. In Isangi besteht außerdem noch die besondere Bestimmung, daß die Angehörigen der beiden D-Gruppen Ngelú und Nkoto zwar untereinander heiraten dürfen, ihnen aber

---

[illegible] Müller, Dissertation, S. [illegible]

[illegible] Hulstaert, Mariage, S. [illegible] nicht die Ehe mit Angehörigen der D-Gruppe Bolima gestattet ist. Da Bolima in Isangi heute ausgestorben ist, wirkt sich diese Bestimmung heute nur gegen die Ausgewanderten in Bolima w'äsi und gegen die Schwesterkinder in anderen Dörfern aus. Die Gruppe Bolima gilt als die Vatergruppe von Isangi (s. Abb. 1). Ngelé ist die Gruppe des älteren Bruders, Nkoto die des jüngeren. Daraus erklärt man die besondere Stellung von Bolima in der Exogamieordnung. Man sagt, es ginge nicht, daß der „Vater" eines seiner „Kinder" heiratet, selbst wenn diese „Kinder" Urenkel so entfernter Generation sind, daß sie untereinander heiraten.

Die Exogamiebestimmungen der Ekonda beziehen sich nicht nur auf die eigene, agnatische Gruppe, sondern auch auf alle cognatischen Gruppen, zu der die Verwandtschaftsbeziehungen noch bekannt sind, d. h. zirka fünf Generationen zurück.

Gruppen der Stufe E:

Diese Gruppen gehen wohl immer über den Umfang eines Dorfes hinaus. Ihre zusammen siedelnden Teile haben einen gemeinsamen Versammlungsplatz, zu dem aber auch die abgesprengten Teile zur Beratung kommen können. Früher hatte wohl nur eine solche Gruppe einen Nkúmú, einen sakralen Fürsten, der aus dem Vorort stammte (z. B. Isangi), während die anderen Dörfer durch den Senior geleitet wurden. Mit der Austeilung der Nkúmúwürde an die anderen Dörfer ist die Bedeutung der E-Gruppen nahezu vollkommen verschwunden. Auch spielt in dieser Größenordnung die Lokalgruppe eine viel größere Rolle. Sie umfaßt gelegentlich auch abhängige Dörfer, die noch nicht paternisiert worden sind, d. h. die noch als fremd aufgefaßt werden. Hierbei ist zu sagen, daß wahrscheinlich alle größeren Lokalgruppen dazu tendieren, sich in Verwandtschaftsgruppen umzukonstituieren, indem die Genealogie dementsprechend umgedeutet wird. Sicherlich ist die „Verwandtschaft" zahlreicher „Verwandtschaftsgruppen" auf diese Weise entstanden. Es ist dabei ziemlich ausgeschlossen, daß Gruppen, die durch die Exogamieregel voneinander getrennt sind, eine Verwandtschaft erfinden, die so eng ist, daß die vorher mögliche Heirat später verboten wird. Auch die Zusammenlegung anderer wichtiger Funktionen der unteren Stufen infolge Erfindung einer engeren Verwandtschaft liefe der Tendenz einer fortlaufenden Differenzierung entgegen [77]. Allgemein kann man annehmen, daß Lokalgruppen nur solch eine Verwandtschaft postulieren, die keine wesentliche funktionelle Reintegration notwendig macht. Einheiten oberhalb der Exogamiegrenze werden daher leicht eine Genealogie konstruieren, die eine Verwandtschaft „nachweist". Gruppen dieser Art sind funktionsschwach. Vorgänge dieser Art lassen sich sowohl in der Gruppe der Bakonda wie in der benachbarten E-Gruppe Lonyanyanga feststellen. Die Institution des Nkúmú (s. o. S. 195) scheint ebenfalls einen nivellierenden Einfluß auszuüben. Das Recht der ältesten (und freien) Gruppe verliert an Bedeutung und tritt hinter die Nkúmúwürde zurück. Die neue Würde steht auch jüngeren und abhängigen Gruppen zu.

Soziologische Terminologie für Verwandtschaftsgruppen

Bevor wir die Einheiten behandeln, die als Siedlungsgruppen verstanden werden müssen, sollen die Verwandtschaftsgruppen der Ekonda mit den soziologischen Idealtypen verglichen werden. Ich behandele nach den zu Beginn genannten Autoren nun die verschiedenen Gruppentermini, die für unsere Ekondaverhältnisse in Frage kommen.

---

[77] Aus Angaben der Eingeborenen wissen wir, daß die Exogamiegrenze vor etwa 100 Jahren auf die gegenwärtige Stufe herabgesetzt wurde. Vorher war zwischen Ngele, Nkoto und Bolima nur der [illegible] gestattet.

Familie

Die Kleinfamilie hat für das organisatorische System der Ekonda keine Bedeutung. Doch ist sie als kleinste Einheit des Wirtschaftslebens sehr wichtig. Potentiell ist jede Kleinfamilie polygyn, doch sind die monogynen Ehen — vor allem in der jüngeren Generation — heute zahlreicher. Es erscheint wegen dieses Unterschiedes zwischen potentieller und praktischer Polygynie empfehlenswerter, im Sinne Thurnwalds die polygamen Formen mit unter die Kleinfamilie zu rechnen und in ihr Familienkerne zu unterscheiden[illegible]. Dies erscheint mir auch mehr der funktionellen Bedeutung zu entsprechen als die Auffassung von Murdock, der die polygame Familie zusammen mit der Großfamilie zu den „composite forms of family" rechnet[illegible].

Über die Großfamilie schreibt Thurnwald in seinen „Fachausdrücken" an zwei Stellen, unter „Familie" S. XIII f. und unter „Großfamilie" S. XIV. Unter Familie sagt Thurnwald:

> „. . . . Die ‚Großfamilie' unterscheidet sich von ihr dadurch, daß in ihr mehrere Generationen unter einem gemeinsamen Großvater entweder auf dem gleichen Hof oder sogar unter demselben Dach zusammen leben. Die Familienkerne mit den dazugehörigen Männern bleiben relativ selbständig. Natürlich können auch hier schutzlose Verwandte angegliedert werden. Von der Sippe (s. d.) unterscheidet sich die Großfamilie dadurch, daß bei ihr alle Mitglieder auf demselben Wohnplatz ansässig sind und die Verwandtschaft der Mitglieder vorwiegend in absteigender Linie vom Haupt besteht; außerdem bildet sie eine Wirtschaftseinheit. Die Eigenart der Großfamilie liegt ferner darin, daß sie, wie jede Familie, an das Leben der sie konstituierenden Persönlichkeiten geknüpft ist und mit ihnen stirbt, während sich die Sippe automatisch erneuert, gewissermaßen ‚ewig' ist."

Dagegen schreibt er bei Großfamilie nur: „. . . . Das Zusammenleben von wenigstens drei voneinander abstammenden Generationen unter einem gemeinsamen Haupt (Großvater mit Kindern und Kindeskindern) wird als ‚Großfamilie' bezeichnet (s. Familie, Sippe)." Dazwischen besteht eine Diskrepanz. Wenn eine Gruppe sich, entsprechend der ersten Charakterisierung, beim Tode der konstituierenden Persönlichkeiten, d. h. der ältesten Generation, auflöst, kann das „wenigstens" zwar für die Norm, aber nicht für den Einzelfall gelten. Ebenso versteht Thurnwald die Familie im Lehrbuch der Völkerkunde[illegible]. Wollen wir die Auffassung von Thurnwald beibehalten — das Material von Kirchhoff[illegible] und die altrömische familia wären dann gute Beispiele —, dann wäre eine patrilineare Großfamilie eine zusammenwohnende und -wirtschaftende Verwandtschaftsgruppe, die aus einem Mann, seinen Frauen und allen seinen Nachkommen besteht und die sich beim Tode des Alten in die Großfamilien seiner Söhne auflöst.

Kirchhoff versteht die Großfamilie ebenso, legt aber Wert darauf, daß im Gegensatz zur Sippe hier die Angeheirateten zur Gruppe gehören[illegible].

Die Vorstellungen von Murdock über die extended family decken sich mit dieser Auffassung[illegible].

Demgegenüber sieht Thurnwald in Band 2 (S. 22) in der Großfamilie eine unilaterale Verwandtschaftsgruppe mit Angeheirateten, die gemeinsam siedelt und unter gemeinsamem Oberhaupt steht, von ihm sollen die Mitglieder abstammen. Im Gegensatz zur Großfamilie kann die Sippe verstreut wohnen.

[illegible] Bd. 1, S. XIII.
[illegible] Murdock, Social Structure, S. [illegible]
[illegible] Thurnwald in Preuß (Hg.) Lehrbuch, S. [illegible]
[illegible] Kirchhoff, ZE [illegible], S. [illegible]
[illegible] Kirchhoff, ZE [illegible], S. [illegible]
[illegible] Murdock, Social Structure, S. [illegible]

Damit stellt Thurnwald hier andere Charakteristika in den Vordergrund. Der Text läßt aber den Schluß zu, daß das Abhängigsein vom Leben des Familienhauptes und die Endlichkeit für Thurnwald immer ein wesentliches Charakteristikum der Großfamilie war.

In diesem Sinne ist keine der unter A—E beschriebenen Einheiten eine Großfamilie. Die angeheirateten Frauen gehören ökonomisch zur Gruppe des Mannes, bleiben aber immer der Gruppe ihres Vaters zugehörig; im Falle einer Scheidung kehren sie dorthin zurück. Die nie abreißende Verbindung zwischen den verschwägerten Gruppen durch Geschenke und Gegengeschenke, die alle zum Brautpfand und der Mitgift gehören, läßt die Zugehörigkeit der Frau zu ihrer Herkunftsgruppe nicht vergessen. Nach dem Tode wird die Frau in der Erde ihrer Gruppe bestattet. Die Gruppenzugehörigkeit der Frau wird zusätzlich auf die Kinder übertragen, nur wirkt sie sich nicht so sehr im ökonomisch-politischen Bereich aus. Wichtig ist die Mutterlinie bei den Heiratsbeschränkungen, bestimmten Meidungen, die über die Frauen vererbt werden, und auch in bestimmten Rechten. Es gibt nicht wenige Leute, die sich in der Gruppe ihrer Mutter oder einer ihrer Großmütter definitiv angesiedelt haben.

Entscheidend für die Unbrauchbarkeit des Terminus Großfamilie ist der „ewige" Charakter der Gruppen A—E der Ekonda. Doch sind die Unterabteilungen der A-Gruppen, die in einem gemeinsamen Gehöft beieinanderwohnen (s. S. 183), eine Großfamilie im Sinne von Thurnwald, Kirchhoff und Murdock.

Sippe

Schon bei den zitierten Erläuterungen zu „Familie" finden wir etwas über die Vorstellung Thurnwalds über die Sippe. Darüber hinaus sagt er zu dem Fachausdruck „Sippe" (S. XVII f.)[illegible]:

> „. . . . Als Sippe wird ein politisch nicht selbständiger Klan (s. d.) bezeichnet. Der Verlust der Selbständigkeit ist gewöhnlich durch Verteilung des Klanvolkes auf verschiedene Siedlungsgemeinden verursacht. Eine Sippe wird durch das Bewußtsein der Abstammung von denselben Ahnen und dem gemeinsamen Ahnenkult zusammengehalten. Die Sippe hat ihre besondere Bedeutung für die Heiratsordnung (s. d.). — Eine Sippe kann in Untersippen aufgeteilt sein (Großsippe, Kleinsippe), oder sie kann zu einer ‚Halbierung' führen. Sippe oder Untersippe besitzen manchmal ein Oberhaupt, manchmal nicht."

Beim Stichwort Klan sagt Thurnwald (S. XVI)[illegible]:

> „Das Wort bezeichnet im Altirischen, dem es entnommen ist, Kinder gemeinsamer Abstammung, etwa im Sinne einer ‚Großfamilie' (s. d.). Es wird heute für Familienagglomerationen (s. Horde) gebraucht, die stabil geworden und durch den Glauben an gemeinsame Ahnen religiös unterbaut sind und oft auch wirtschaftlich und politisch einander stützen. Es ist ratsam, einen Unterschied zwischen dem innerhalb eines Gebietes ausschließlich siedelnden und auf diesen Gau Anspruch erhebenden ‚Klan' zu machen, der eine politisch souveräne Gemeinde darstellt, und den auf verschiedene, ihrerseits selbständige Gemeinden verteilten Klansplittern, die wir als ‚Sippen' (s. d.) bezeichnen, die untereinander gewöhnlich nicht organisiert sind und nur durch zeremoniell-religiösen Ahnenkult und durch eine gewisse Solidarität zusammengehalten werden. Die Entstehung von Klan und Sippe ist eng mit dem Ahnenkult verwachsen, der die Stammeslinie symbolisiert. Die Klan- oder Sippen-Zugehörigkeit kann in männlicher oder weiblicher Linie gerechnet werden. Diese gewissermaßen

---

[illegible] Menschliche Gesellschaft, Bd. 4

kristallisierte Familienagglomeration wird häufig durch eines der lebenden Familienhäupter vertreten. Dadurch unterscheidet sie sich von familialen Gebilden, die mit dem Leben der sie tragenden Personen erlöschen. In Klan oder Sippe sind die sich ablösenden persönlichen Familien dauernd vertreten (s. Familie, Kaste, Staat)."

Als gemeinsam können wir für beide Formen festhalten, daß es sich um rein unilaterale Verbände handelt, die durch Ahnenkult verbunden sind (der der Großfamilie im obigen Sinne fehlen kann, in den meisten Fällen sogar fehlen wird). Lassen wir den Versuch, in beiden Beschreibungen eine Theorie der Entstehung zu geben, fort, so erscheinen mir im übrigen die Unterscheidungen zwischen den beiden Termini sehr brauchbar, vor allem, wenn man nur den ersten Fall von Klan bei Thurnwald annimmt, den zweiten als für uns hier irrelevant vollkommen außer acht läßt.

Unsere Gruppe A wohnt zwar in einem bestimmten Gebiet und erhebt Anspruch auf diesen „Gau", doch ist es schwierig, ihn als eine politisch souveräne Gemeinde zu bezeichnen. Die Politik hat viel mehr mit jenen Gruppen zu tun, die wir bisher noch gar nicht beschrieben haben, den Siedlungsgemeinschaften. Darüber hinaus ist die Gruppe A integriert in die Gruppe B, diese in eine Gruppe C, eine Kette fast ohne Ende, denn bei Stämmen mit stärkerem genealogischen Bewußtsein als die Ekonda es haben, etwa bei den benachbarten Bongili[68]), endet die Hierarchie der Gruppen mit der Menschheit, die Hierarchie der Ahnen mit Gott.

Diesen Stufencharakter hebt Thurnwald besonders bei der Sippe hervor. Für Kirchhoff ist die Sippe nicht in einer Weise behandelt, die für eine Differentialdiagnose zwischen Sippe und Klan von Wert für uns wäre. Ihm war es, entsprechend der Organisationsform der von ihm behandelten Populationen, mehr um die Abgrenzung von Großfamilie und Sippe zu tun. Lowie[69]) spricht nur von Sippe, „sib" und nennt sie „'clan' of British anthropologists" (S. 105) oder „clans", wenn patrilinear, und „gentes", wenn matrilinear „of most American anthropologists". Das „ad infinitum" (S. 106) ist für ihn ebenfalls wichtig für die Sippe. Auch die Möglichkeit der Untergliederung ist bei Lowie für seine sib vorhanden, und so schließt er auch solche Formen in die Sippe ein, die zwar nach der Erläuterung von Thurnwald eigentlich noch dazu gehören, die für ihn und den sonstigen ethnologischen Sprachgebrauch aber doch schon Einheiten eines besonderen Typs sind: die moieties. Lowie hat damit eine weitgehend gleiche Auffassung wie Thurnwald.

Murdock[70]) unterscheidet streng zwischen Sippe und lineage. Für ihn ist die lineage eine Gruppe von Individuen, die ihre Abstammung von einem gemeinsamen Ahnen nachweisen können, das heißt für ihn in der Mehrzahl der Fälle nur der unilaterale „Stamm" einer Großfamilie, ohne die zugeheirateten und einschließlich der fortgeheirateten Mitglieder.

Die Sippe ist für Murdock dasselbe wie für Thurnwald. Dagegen unterscheidet er sich in seiner Auffassung vom Klan[71]).

Klan

Für Murdock ist der patrilineare Klan eine Lokalgruppe, die aus dem Stamm einer Sippe besteht, die aber die Ehefrauen ihrer Mitglieder in sich aufnimmt, die sich verheiratenden Töchter dafür entläßt. Als Beispiel führte er die „Gruppen" an, die in unserer Gesellschaft durch gemeinsamen Familiennamen verbunden sind. Würde der Personenkreis, der sich durch den gemeinsamen

---

[68] Boelaert, Les Bongili.
[69] Primitive Society.
[70] Murdock, Social Structure, S. 46 ff.
[71] Murdock, Social Structure, S. 65 ff., insbesondere 66.

Geburtsnamen „Wolf" auszeichnet, als Verwandtschaftsgruppe funktionieren, so wäre es eine Wolf-Sippe. Die Personen aber, die den Namen wirklich führen, also die Herren Wolf mit ihren Frauen, ihren Söhnen und ihren unverheirateten Schwestern und Töchtern, wäre ein Wolf-Klan (wiederum vorausgesetzt, daß diese Gruppe wirklich funktioniert). Diese Auffassung von Klan ist neu. Auch Murdock findet die Bezeichnung nicht glücklich und lädt zu besseren Vorschlägen ein. Der Klan nach Murdock ist eine Einheit von eminent wichtiger Bedeutung, den von der Sippe terminologisch zu unterscheiden bisher nicht möglich war. Ob der Terminus Klan angebracht ist für diese Sozialgruppe, ist hier nicht von Bedeutung. Zwar existiert der „Murdock-Klan" bei den Ekonda auf allen unteren Stufen auch, aber nur als funktionale Einheit, die wie Großfamilie und Kleinfamilie den Ekonda weniger als Gruppe bewußt ist. Ein Zusammengehörigkeitsgefühl der Einheimischen mit den Zugeheirateten hat bei den Ekonda zur Grundlage nicht so sehr eine der Verwandtschaftsgruppen, wie sie oben beschrieben wurden, sondern vielmehr eine Lokalgruppe der weiter unten dargestellten Art.

Weder der Auffassung von Thurnwald noch der von Murdock über Klan entsprechen die Einheiten, die wir im ersten Teil beschrieben haben. Von dem Klan Thurnwalds unterscheiden sich unsere Gruppen durch ihre hierarchische Gliederung, in der die Autoritätsfunktionen aufgeteilt sind. Dazu kommt, daß Thurnwald im Lehrbuch[29]) den Klan nicht nur durch die Ausstattung mit politischer Gewalt, sondern auch durch die Größe von der Sippe unterscheiden will. Die einzige Verwandtschaftsgruppe der Ekonda mit starker Autorität ist aber die kleinste, die der Stufe A. Würden wir uns nach dem Kriterium der Autorität richten, so wäre die kleinste Gruppe (Stufe A) ein Klan. Nach dem Kriterium der Größe aber wäre es etwa eine Gruppe der Stufe D oder E, die wir als Klan ansprechen müßten. Das macht die Verwendung dieses Terminus unzweckmäßig.

Deswegen verwende ich für die Gruppen aller Stufen den Ausdruck „Sippe". Bei den Gruppen E könnte man schon von einem Unterstamm sprechen, wobei darauf hinzuweisen ist, daß für den Ekonda alle genannten Gruppen einschließlich der Stämme Verwandtschaftsgruppen gleicher Art, d. h. also „Sippen" sind.

Zur Unterscheidung der Sippen verschiedener Stufen verwende ich für die Gruppen der

Stufe A den Terminus Kernsippe
Stufe B den Terminus Kleinsippe
Stufe C den Terminus Untersippe
Stufe D (den exogamen Einheiten) den Terminus Sippe Stufe E den Terminus Großsippe.

Die Lokalgliederung

Die zweite Zeichnung stellt die Siedlungsweise der Gruppe Isangi im alten Wohngebiet bis 1949 dar. Zu dieser Zeit wurde Isangi an die Straße umgesiedelt. Von den Kernsippen Isangis haben nur zwei ein Territorium, das so weit nach Osten reicht, daß es die neue Straße überschneidet. So hat die Umsiedlung zu einer völligen Veränderung der Siedlungsform geführt. Doch sind die Funktionen der Siedlungsgemeinschaften noch nicht an die neue Siedlung angepaßt. Die Einwohner rechnen noch zu stark mit einer Rücksiedlung auf ihr eigenes Territorium, als daß sie die Dorforganisation umgestalten würden.

Wir sehen das Dorf in sechs Siedlungsgemeinschaften aufgegliedert[30]), die jeweils nur aus den Angehörigen einer der beiden Sippen von Isangi bestehen.

---

[29]) Thurnwald in Preuß, Lehrbuch S. 280.
[30]) S. Zeichnung 2.

Nur die Gruppe des Vaters, die ja eine eigene Sippe war, finden wir bei einer Siedlungsgemeinschaft der Sippe Ngelé angeschlossen. Hier sei noch nebenher vermerkt, daß die beiden Sippen Ngelé und Nkoto, flußab und flußauf heißen. Die ältere Gruppe heißt flußab, da in ngelé der Fluß groß und breit ist. Diese Ehrenbezeichnung finden wir für die ältere Gruppe in manchen Dörfern wieder, ohne daß immer eine Flußaufgruppe vorhanden sein muß. Eine Entsprechung in der Wohnweise findet sich nicht.

In der Siedlungsgemeinschaft I ist der Zusammenhang zwischen den konstituierenden Sippen so groß, daß die ganze Gemeinschaft einen gemeinsamen bokendi hat, einen gemeinsamen Boten. Die Boten haben die Aufgabe, alle wichtigen Nachrichten nach einem genau festgelegten Plan zu den anderen Gruppen zu bringen, vor allem die Einladungen zu den Versammlungen des Dorfrates beim Nkúmú. Dabei informieren sie die anderen Gruppen über das Programm der Sitzung. Der Bote kommt dabei in der anderen Gemeinschaft wiederum zum Boten; hier versammeln sich die alten Männer, um die Nachricht zu erhalten und zu besprechen. Der Bote dieser Gemeinschaft macht sich dann auf den Weg zur nächsten. Dadurch wird der Bote und sein Gehöft zu einem Mittelpunkt des gesellschaftlichen Lebens.

In der Gemeinschaft II findet sich dieselbe Einheitlichkeit. Hier finden wir auch den engangala, den Versammlungsplatz des Dorfes Isangi und seiner Tochterdörfer. Er besteht aus einem freien Platz mit einem niedrigen breitkronigen Baum; unter der schattenspendenden Krone versammeln sich die Vertreter der zahlreichen Dörfer, die in einem offenen Männerhaus keinen Platz Liengo (16) wohnt auf diesem Platz, der an der Grenze der Territorien dieser finden würden. Der Senior der Kernsippen Mpia (14), Nsambi (15) und drei Gruppen liegt. Der Bote des Weilers Boyeke dagegen ist der Älteste von Mpia, der natürlich mit dem „Ältesten auf den engangala" identisch sein kann.

In der dritten Siedlungsgemeinschaft war die Einheit ebenfalls so stark, daß es nur einen Boten gab. Die Untersippe Nsambésálá, die sich in diesem Weiler konzentriert, gilt als die Nachkommenschaft eines unehelichen Kindes der Tochter des Dorfgründers (s. Zeichn. 1). Wie auch in vielen anderen Dörfern hat sie daher das Amt des „boténi", der bei entsprechenden Gelegenheiten das Menschen- oder Ziegenopfer vollzieht.

Hatten wir es bei diesen drei Gemeinschaften mit verhältnismäßig einheitlichen Gruppen zu tun, so sind die drei folgenden sehr heterogen. Die beiden Gruppen des Weilers IV gehören zu den Untersippen Iyolo und Mbo. Sie betrachten sich, im Gegensatz zu den Untersippen Lovendo und Besilo, als so stark voneinander getrennt, daß sie zwei Boten haben. Der Bote der Siedlung II kommt hierher, geht erst zum Boten in der Kernsippe Bosóbé (19), dann zu Impinga (26). Der Bote von Bosóbé geht zu seinen Verwandten in der Siedlung VI zur Kernsippe Mbelo-Mmuna (22), während der Bote von Impinga-Ndongó früher zur jetzt ausgestorbenen Gruppe Bommambo gehen mußte.

Die Siedlung V bestand aus drei verschiedenen Gruppen. Bolima, die Gruppe des Vaters, hatte ihren eigenen Boten, der aber die Nachricht nur empfing, nicht mehr weitergab, wie alle diese letzten Gruppen des Dorfes. Beide Nachbarn hatten ihren eigenen Boten. Der Bote der Siedlung I kam zur Kernsippe Bolesangi, seinen Verwandten, der Bote der Siedlung III kam zu seinen Verwandten der Kernsippe Ituli.

Wiederum zwei Boten gab es auch im letzten Weiler, doch sind die Nachrichten darüber unzureichend, da die Kernsippe Bommambo schon lange ausgestorben ist.

Alle genannten Siedlungen zeichnen sich dadurch aus, daß früher ihre junge Mannschaft bei großen Tanzfesten geschlossen als ein corps de ballet auftrat. Nachdem wegen der starken Dezimierung der Volkszahl in den Wirren der Okkupationszeit und wegen der Abwanderung in die Städte die Zahl der jungen Leute nicht mehr ausreicht, treten I mit II, III mit IV und V mit VI zusammen auf. Wir finden also jeweils Ngelé und Nkoto in einem Ballett vereinigt. Obwohl diese Gruppen in der heutigen Siedlungsweise (an der Straße) ebenfalls versprengt sind, ist die alte Organisation erhalten geblieben, und die jungen Männer scheuen nicht den täglichen weiten Weg zum Übungsplatz, um in der alten Gruppierung tanzen zu können.

Ganz Isangi, alle drei Sippen, haben zusammen einen Dorffürsten, den Nkúmú, mit einem Iyolo nsáka, der die Versammlungen einleitet, ein Dorfgericht mit den zugehörigen Richtern. Es gibt andere Gruppen, die Isangi entsprechen[81]), aber mehr als einen Nkúmú haben. Aber auch sie haben nur einen Mann, der die Versammlung eröffnet, und einen Untersuchungsrichter. Nur einer der Nkúmú funktioniert als Richter. So können wir auch dann, wenn die Würde geteilt ist, sagen, daß die Gruppe in bezug auf Rechtsprechung und politische Organisation weiterhin zusammengehört.

In diesen Gruppen finden wir meist ein ausgewogenes System der Verteilung der Ämter und Würden. Entweder ist es, wie in Isangi, überwiegend demokratisch, indem allen Gruppen Rechte auf Würden und Ämter zustehen, oder aber, wie in Mbanga, oligarchisch, wo alle Macht auf die älteste Sohnesgruppe beschränkt ist. Oligarchisch bestimmte Gruppen tendieren meist zur Desintegration, die jüngeren Gruppen versuchen, sich von der Vorherrschaft zu lösen. Demokratische Dörfer halten meist besser zusammen.

In Isangi ist das frühere Vorrecht der Kleinsippen Ndongó (2-4), Ngonga (5) und Boyeke (14-18), den Nkúmú zu stellen, aufgegeben zugunsten eines Wechsels zwischen den sechs Lokalgruppen des Dorfes. Nur die Kleinsippen Bolima, Besilo und Njáléokuli sind ausgeschlossen.

Die sechs Siedlungsgemeinschaften von Isangi und ähnliche Gruppierungen in anderen Dörfern sind Teile eines Dorfes, für die mir der Ausdruck Weiler am geeignetsten erscheint.

Sie sind Einheiten vornehmlich intentionaler Art. Sie haben sich trotz ihrer Funktionsschwäche auch in der neuen Siedlung erhalten, wenn sie auch nicht mehr geschlossen wohnen. Durch Reintegration haben sie ihre Funktion als Aufgebotsbezirk für die Tanzgruppen in Isangi eingebüßt (s. S. 200 f.). Doch sind sie auch heute noch die wichtigste Gruppierung in Isangi, von der wir Kenntnis hatten, bevor wir irgendeine der Verwandtschaftsgruppen kannten. Es ist zu erwarten, daß sie ihre Bedeutung verlieren werden, wenn Isangi nicht wieder auf sein eigenes Gebiet zurückkehrt. Die Frauen, von Natur aus weniger mit der Organisation des Dorfes ihrer Männer verbunden, sind (z. B. für Tanzgruppen) Ausgangspunkt einer neuen Ordnung, die den neuen Siedlungsverhältnissen gerecht wird.

Jeder Weiler umfaßt einen oder mehrere Botschaftsbezirke. Auch in der alten Wohnsituation richtete sich das Botschaftersystem nach der hierarchischen Ordnung und in keiner Weise nach Zweckmäßigkeitsgesichtspunkten (etwa der Kürze der Wege). So ist diese konservative Institution der konservativen Alten auch von der Änderung bisher völlig unberührt geblieben.

Die Dörfer sind die Gemeinschaften der Rechtsprechung und der Politik. Den Versammlungen präsidiert normalerweise ein Nkúmú. Hat ein Dorf mehrere Nkúmú, von denen einer die Rechtsprechung wahrnimmt, oder die gemeinsam präsidieren, so nenne ich den Herkunftsbereich eines jeden Nkúmú Dorfteil.

Gau nennen wir jene Bereiche, die sich durch einen besonderen Versammlungsplatz auszeichnen. Der Platz liegt im Territorium der Primogenitur- oder Sekundogenitursippe. Die praktische Bedeutung dieser Einrichtung für den ganzen Gau ist gering, doch stellten die beiden Versammlungsplätze, die wir kennenlernten, bis vor kurzem noch wichtige soziale Zentren für die Doppeldörfer dar, die die Vororte der betreffenden Gaue bilden. Durch die Umsiedlung sind die Versammlungsplätze jetzt ganz ihrer Funktion beraubt.

---

[81]) E. Müller, Fürstentum, S. 72 ff., [illegible], 1951.

Ich hoffe, mit diesem Aufsatz neues Material zur Diskussion um die ethnosoziologische Terminologie beigetragen zu haben und Anregung zur Kritik und zu einer neuen Auseinandersetzung mit diesem wichtigen Thema zu geben.

Literaturverzeichnis

Boelaert, Edmond: Les Bongili, Aequatoria 10, S. 17—34. Coquilhatville 1947.

— Le Clan équivoque, Aequatoria 11, S. 13—19. Coquilhatville 1948.

Fortes, Meyer: The Dynamics of Clanship among the Tallensi. London 1945.

Hulstaert, Gustav: Le mariage des Nkundó, Mémoires des IRCB, Sect. des Sciences Morales et Politiques, 8 (8°) 1938. Bruxelles 1938.

Lévi-Strauss, Claude: Les structures élémentaires de la parenté. Paris 1949.

Kirchhoff, Paul: Verwandtschaftsbezeichnungen und Verwandtenheirat, Zeitschrift für Ethnologie 64, S. 41—47. Berlin 1932.

— Die Verwandtschaftsorganisation der Urwaldstämme Südamerikas, Zeitschrift für Ethnologie 63, S. 85—193. Berlin 1931.

Lowie, Robert Heinrich: Primitive Society. New York 1949^2.

Mühlmann, Wilhelm Emil: Methodik der Völkerkunde. Stuttgart 1938.

Müller, Ernst Wilhelm: Das Fürstentum bei den Südwestmóngo. Philosophische Dissertation. Mainz 1955.

Murdock, Georg Peter: Changing Emphasis in Social Structure, Southwestern Journ. of Anthropology 11, S. 361—370. Albuquerque 1955.

— Social structure. New York 1949.

Preuss, Konrad Theodor (Herausgeber): Lehrbuch der Völkerkunde in 2., teilweise veränderter Auflage, herausgegeben von Richard Thurnwald. Stuttgart 1939.

Radcliffe-Brown: The study of Kinship systems, Journal of the Royal Anthr. Institute 71, S. 1—18. London 1941.

Thurnwald, Richard: Die menschliche Gesellschaft in ihren ethno-soziologischen Grundlagen, 5 Bände. Berlin 1932—35.

Wörterbuch der Soziologie, herausgegeben von W. Bernsdorf und Fr. Bülow, Stuttgart 1955.

9: Boelaert E,M-5 (ca.1945) 1951 FO32 Mongo FO32
Nkundu

080

Classificatory Terminology of the Nkundu
[Terminologie classificatoire des Nkundo]

by E. Boelaert

Africa
Vol. 21, pp. 218-222
London, 1951

Translated from the French by Anne R. Coleman

Human Relations Area Files

1960

[Title page]

101 114 [218] The Nkundo [Nkundu], or Mongo, are an important ethnic group of the central basin of the Belgian Congo. They are patriarchal (1). I lived among their west-central tribes for 20 years.

614 We call a clan, in the ethnic sense, the group of paternal blood relatives who have an autonomous territory in common. This resembles closely what Anglo-Saxon researchers like to call a "lineage" (2).

I. Wise

601 614 A Nkundo calls his own clan his wise, from the word ise which means "father." My wise thus includes:

1. My paternal grandfather and his brothers and sisters who are called nkoko (pl., bankoko), "grandfather, grandmother."
2. The sons of my male bankoko, including my own father, all of whom are my "fathers" (ise; pl., baise).

The sisters of my "fathers" are my "female fathers" (isomoto, composed of isé and bomoto, "woman").

3. The sons of my "fathers" are my older brothers (botomolo; pl., batomolo) and younger brothers (bokune; pl., bakune). The daughters of my "fathers" are my sisters (nkâna; pl., bankâna).

---

1. The rules and many details of the classificatory system of the Nkundo have already been set forth in Le Mariage des Nkundo by Father G. Hulstaert (Belgian Royal Colonial Institute, 1938).

2. The quotations in this article are from The Pattern of Hera Kinship, by J. F. Holleman (Capetown University Press, for Rhodes-Livingstone Institute, 1949).

601 614 The children of my "female fathers" do not belong to my clan.

4. Like my children, the children of my older and younger brothers are my "children" (bona; pl., bana). The Nkundo does not have any special terms for "son" and "daughter." He simply says "male child" and "female child."

5. The children of my "sons" are my grandchildren (bonkana; pl., bankana).

6. The children of these male grandchildren are my great grandchildren (bonkanola; pl., bankanola).

II. Bonyango

The mother's clan is called bonyango, from the word nyango, "mother," and includes:

1. The mother's father and his brothers, who are also nkoko.

2. Their daughters, including my own mother, who are "mothers" (nyango; pl., banyango). The brothers of my "mothers" are my "male mothers" (nyangompame; pl., ba-).

3. The sons and daughters of my "male mothers," who are thus of my generation in our sense but who, to the Nkundo, are my "children," since to them I am legally identified with my mother and therefore I am their "male mother." This explains [602] the unusual and privileged position which I hold in my mother's clan.

4. The children of my "children" are my "grandchildren." [219] [Table 1 appears here.] [220]

III. Bokanga and Banankana

601 602 A Nkundo has other blood relatives scattered among the clans who have married a woman of his own clan, be it a "female father," a sister, or a daughter. A Nkundo calls all the unrelated members of these clans bokanga. The related members, including children born to the women of his clan, he calls impersonally sisters' children, "children of a sister of the clan" (bonankana; pl.,

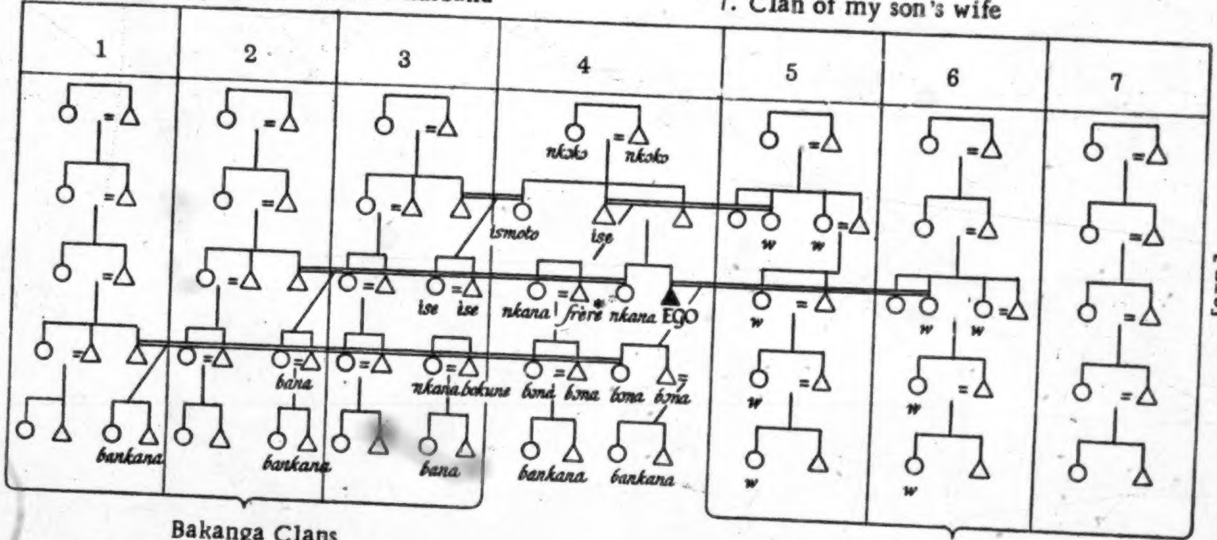
[text continues on page 4]

601
602
614

Table 1

Relatives and Affinals through the Paternal Clan

1. Clan of my daughter's husband
2. Clan of my sister's husband
3. Clan of my father's sister's husband
4. My own clan
5. Clan of my father's brother's wife
6. Clan of my wife
7. Clan of my son's wife



1
2
3
4
5
6 7 nkɔkɔ nkɔkɔ ismoto
ise
ise
ise
nkana frère*
nkana
EGO
w
w
w
w
w bana nkanabokune bɔna bɔna bɔna bɔna bankana
bankana
bana
bankana
bankana
w
w
w
w
w

Bakanga Clans
All those undesignated = bakanga

Bakiló Clans
All those undesignated = bakiló

[*frère = brother IN FRENCH]

w = wali (wife)

601 602 bananankana). As a result, the children are legally identified with their mothers. Thus, my sister's child is a child (bona) to me, or a sister's child (bonankana), but to my own child he would be father (ise).

In addition, he has maternal blood relatives, children of my mother's sisters, who are thus his "brothers and sisters," or children of the daughters of his "male mothers." Since these last daughters are his "children," their children would be his "grandchildren." Again, all the members of these clans who are unrelated by blood are his bokanga.

IV. Likilo

601 602 582 There are affinal clans which have given wives (wali; pl., baali) to my clan. This does not, of course, concern my mother's clan, which is a clan related by blood, but rather clans which have given wives, be it to a classificatory "father," to one of their sons, or to one of the sons of the latter. The Nkundo calls all the members of these clans -- with the exception of the woman -- bokilo (pl., bakilo). The Nkundo, merely by marrying a woman, at the same time marries all her legal younger sisters, that is to say, all the bakune [Ed., bankana?] and bana of this woman. Similarly, the woman marries not only a man, but at the same time all his legal younger brothers, that is, all the bakune and bana of this man (except the children of their own union).

601 602 Just as the clans which have received a wife from my clan thus include bokanga and sisters' sons, so also clans that have given us a wife include bakilo and "wives." Clans which have given a wife to my bonyango follow the same rules.

Comments

121 In several recent studies, especially in South Africa, four rules have been defined which govern classificatory terminology.

614 602 The first rule is that of the "unity of the lineage": The lineage as a whole is classified as belonging to a particular 'generation'

121 in its relations to another lineage as a whole" (Holleman, *op.
614 cit.*, p. 9). The author adds, "the unity of the lineage may be 602 broken by a division into affines and cognatic, each with their distinctive terminology, in which the cognatic section is one 'generation' lower than the affinal section" (p. 5.).

121 Just as we speak of a mother society or a sister society, so
614 the Nkundo can also consider an affinal clan as a moral person
602 and speak of his mother's clan as of his mother, of a bokanga
601 clan, of a bokilo clan. I do not think that the term bokanga or bokilo implies an idea of generation when it is applied to an individual, any more than does the French term "parent-in-law," or member of my family-in-law. The Nkundo would certainly not admit what the author cited here writes [221] [Table 2 appears here.] [222] about the Hera: "in inter-lineage relations, ... once the relationship between Ego and any cognatic relative is determined, all the cognates of the same lineage as that relative will bear the same degree of kinship as himself to Ego, regardless of the differences in generation . . . between themselves or as compared with Ego" (p. 5.).

The second rule would be that the clan which provides us a wife (bokilo clan of the Nkundo) is considered our "father," and thus the clan which receives a wife from our clan would be considered a "son." Moreover, among the Nkundo is understood: "We have given you our daughter as a wife, so you are our son." But also implied is: "We have enriched you by our marriage payment, and our children are your "fathers." These ideas, however, are not reflected in the terminology between affinals. Moreover, the fact that the Nkundo readily uses the term bokilo for his bokanga is significant.

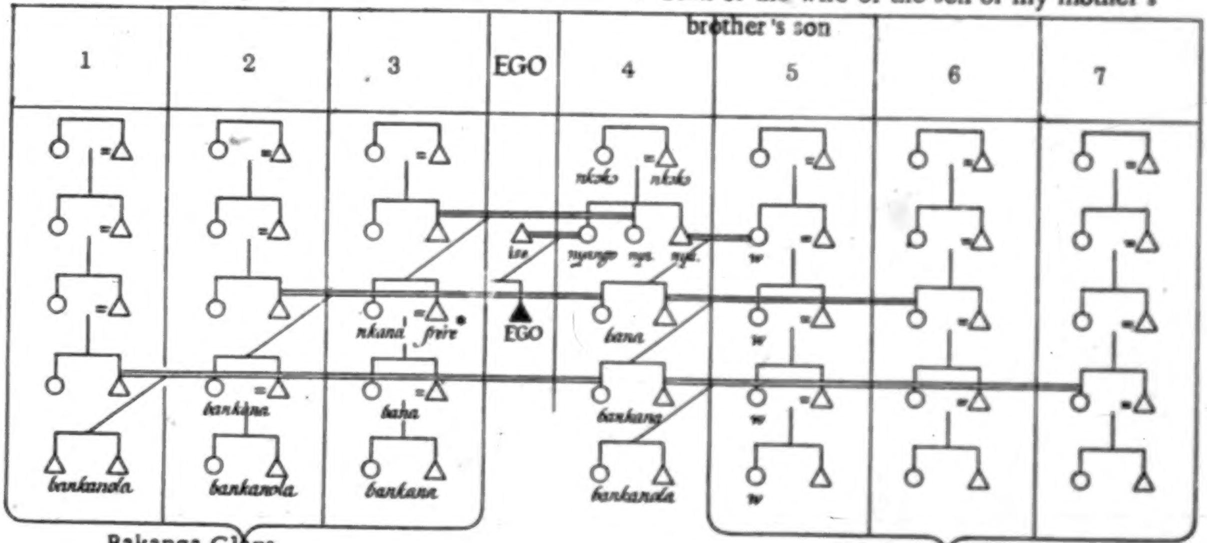
Third rule: In lineages directly related to Ego's lineage, "the female line seems to be potentially one 'generation' lower than the agnatic male line" (p. 11). The author tells us that: "This duality is even revealed in agnatic relations . . . Ego calls his . . . father's sister either vatete (father's sister) or hanzwadzi (sister)." Thus, the women of directly related clans would be considered to belong to a lower generation than the men.

[Text continues on page 7]

601
602
614

Table 2
Relatives and Affinals through the Paternal Clan

1. Clan of the husband of the daughter of my mother's brother's son
2. Clan of the husband of my mother's brother's daughter
3. Clan of my mother's sister's husband
4. My mother's clan
5. Clan of my mother's brother's wife
6. Clan of the wife of my mother's brother's son
7. Clan of the wife of the son of my mother's brother's son



1
2
3
EGO
4
5
6 7 nkɔkɔ nkɔkɔ
ise
nyango nya.
nya.
w nkana frère*
EGO
bana
w bankana
bana
bankana
w bankanda
bankanda
bankana
bankanda
w

Bakanga Clans
All those undesignated = bakanga
[*frère = brother in French]

Bakilo Clans
All those undesignated = bakilő
w = wali (wife)

9: Boelaert--6 E.M-5 (ca.1945) 1951 FO32 Mongo FO32
Nkundu

121
602
614
601

It must be stated that the tables of the bakanga clans presented by the author do not reflect this rule, since all members of these clans not related by blood, males as well as females, are designated as vakwasha= children-in-law. In the bakilo clans the rule seems to be founded on the Hera idea (according to the interpretation of the author) that all the women of my wife's clan are my "wives," no matter what their generation or age. This rule is not applicable to the Nkundo either in ideas or terminology.

There is still the fourth rule which the author quoted here uses often but does not interpret in his tables where it is completely opposed to the second rule: the child is legally identified with its mother. According to the second rule, the child of my father's sister would be my grandchild, and at the same time, according to the fourth rule, it would be my "father."

For the Nkundo, the fourth rule explains how this child is my "father," while the child of my mother's brother is my "child."

One may thus conclude that two rules explain the details of the classificatory system of the Nkundo:

1. In clans which have given a wife to our clan, all the women who are legally younger sisters of this wife, exclusively, are "wives" of all the men, exclusively, who are legally younger brothers of the husband.

2. In clans which have received a wife from our clan, the children born of this wife are identified with their mother by the children of this wife's brothers.

AFRICA

JOURNAL OF THE
INTERNATIONAL AFRICAN INSTITUTE

JOURNAL DE
L'INSTITUT INTERNATIONAL AFRICAIN

ZEITSCHRIFT DES
INTERNATIONALEN AFRIKANISCHEN INSTITUTS

Editor
DARYLL FORDE

Assistant Editor
B. E. WYATT

VOLUME XXI
1951

LONDON
OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
GEOFFREY CUMBERLEGE

[title page]

TERMINOLOGIE CLASSIFICATOIRE DES NKUNDO

E. BOELAERT

LES Nkundo ou Mongo forment une ethnie importante de la cuvette centrale du Congo belge. Ce sont des patriarcaux.[1] Pendant vingt ans j'ai habité parmi leurs tribus du centre-ouest.

Nous appelons clan, au sens ethnique, le groupement des consanguins patrilinéaires qui possèdent en commun un territoire autonome. Ce qui correspond beaucoup à ce que les chercheurs anglo-saxons aiment à désigner par 'lineage'.[2]

I. Wise

Un Nkundo appelle son propre clan son wise, du mot ise qui signifie 'père'. Mon wise comprend donc:

1. Mon grand-père paternel, ses frères et sœurs qui sont appelés nkɔkɔ (pl. bankɔkɔ), grand-père, grand'mère.

2. Les fils de mes bankɔkɔ masculins, dont mon propre père, et qui sont tous mes 'pères' (ise, pl. baise);

Les sœurs de mes 'pères' sont mes 'pères féminins' (iseamoto composé de isé et de bomoto = femme).

3. Les fils de mes 'pères' sont mes frères aînés (botomolo, pl. batomolo) et puînés (bokune, pl. bakune). Les filles de mes 'pères' sont mes sœurs (nkána, pl. bankána).

Les enfants de mes 'pères féminins' n'appartiennent pas à mon clan.

4. Comme mes enfants, les enfants de mes frères aînés et puînés sont mes 'enfants' (bona, pl. bana). Le Nkundo n'a pas de mot spécifique pour 'fils' et 'fille'. Il dit simplement 'enfant masculin' et 'enfant féminin'.

5. Les enfants de mes 'fils' sont mes petits-enfants (bonkana, pl. bankana).

6. Les enfants de ces petits-fils masculins sont mes arrière-petits-enfants (bonkanale, pl. bankanale).

II. Bonyangɔ

Le clan de la mère s'appelle bonyangɔ, du mot nyangɔ = mère, et comprend:

1. Le père de la mère et ses frères, qui sont aussi nkɔkɔ.

2. Leurs filles, dont ma propre mère, et qui sont 'mères' (nyangɔ, pl. banyangɔ). Les frères de mes 'mères' sont mes 'mères masculines' (nyangompame, pl. ba-).

3. Les fils et les filles de mes 'mères masculines', qui sont donc de ma génération, dans notre sens, mais qui, pour les Nkundo, sont mes 'enfants', puisque pour eux je suis juridiquement identifié à ma mère, et ainsi leur 'mère masculine'. Ceci explique le rôle exceptionnel et privilégié que j'ai dans le clan de ma mère.

4. Les enfants de mes 'enfants' sont mes 'petits-enfants'.

---

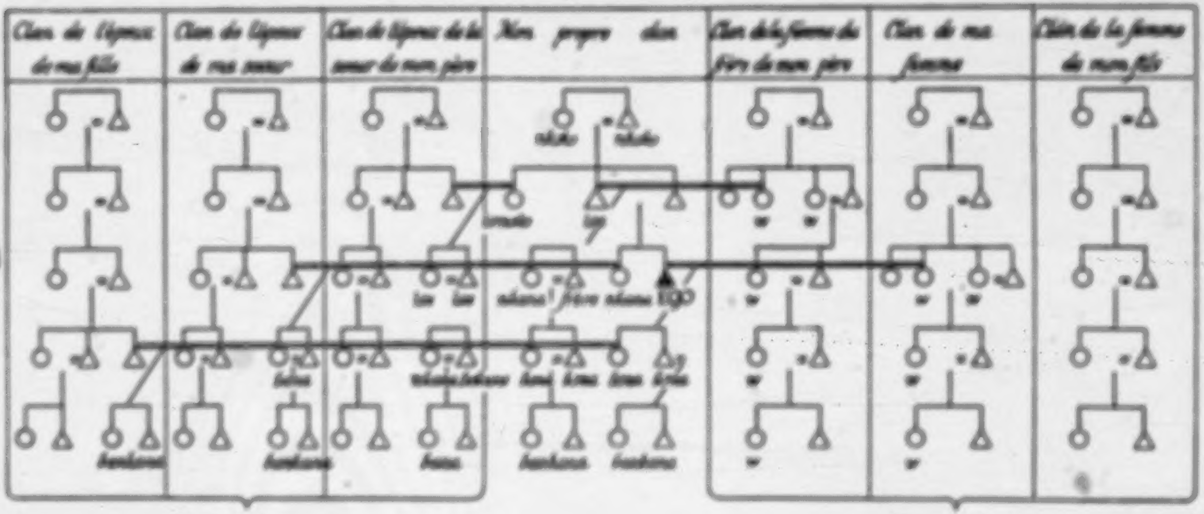
[1] Les règles et beaucoup de détails du système classificatoire des Nkundo se retrouvent déjà dans Le Mariage des Nkundo du R.P. G. Hulstaert (Institut Royal Colonial Belge, 1938).

[2] Les citations dans cet article renvoient à The Pattern of Hera Kinship, de J. F. Holleman (Capetown: Oxford University Press, for Rhodes-Livingstone Institute, 1949).

[p.218]

TABLEAU 1

Parents et Alliés par Clan paternel



Clan de l'époux de ma fille
Clan de l'époux de ma soeur
Clan de l'époux de la soeur de mon père
Mon propre clan
Clan de la femme du frère de mon père
Clan de ma femme
Clan de la femme de mon fils EGO
w bankana
bana

Clans bakonga
Tous les membres appelés « bakonga

Clans bakilo
Tous les membres appelés « bakilo

w = wali (épouse)

III. Bokango et Bonankana

Un Nkundo a d'autres consanguins, qui sont dispersés dans les clans qui ont marié une femme de son propre clan: soit un 'père féminin', soit une sœur, soit une fille. Tous les membres non-consanguins de ces clans, un Nkundo les appelle bokango. Les membres consanguins, donc les enfants issus de ces femmes de son clan, il les appelle d'une manière impersonnelle: enfants de sœur = enfants d'une sœur du clan (bonankana, pl. banankana). Là où cela porte à conséquence, ces enfants sont juridiquement identifiés à leur mère. Ainsi l'enfant de ma sœur reste pour moi un enfant (bona) ou enfant de sœur (bonankana), mais pour mon propre enfant il sera père (ise).

En outre, il a des consanguins matrilinéaires, issus des sœurs de sa mère et qui sont donc ses 'frères et sœurs', ou issus des filles de ses 'mères masculines'. Puisque ces dernières filles sont ses 'enfants', leurs enfants seront ses 'petits-enfants'. De nouveau tous les membres non-consanguins de ces clans sont ses bokango.

IV. Bokilo

Il y a des clans affins, qui ont donné une épouse (wali, pl. baali) à mon clan. Naturellement, il ne s'agit pas ici du clan de ma mère, qui est clan consanguin, mais bien des clans qui ont donné une épouse soit à un 'père' classificatoire, soit à l'un de leurs fils, soit à l'un des fils de ceux-ci. Tous les membres de ces clans — à l'exception de la femme — le Nkundo les appelle bokilo (pl. bakilo). Seulement le Nkundo, en mariant une femme, marie en même temps toutes les puînées juridiques, c'est-à-dire, toutes les bakane et toutes les bana de cette femme. Tout comme cette femme marie non seulement un homme, mais en même temps tous les puînés juridiques, c'est-à-dire, tous les bakane et tous les bana de cet homme (à l'exception des enfants issus de leur propre union).

Comme les clans qui ont reçu une épouse de mon clan contiennent donc des bokango et des fils-de-sœur, ainsi les clans qui nous ont donné une épouse contiennent des bokilo et des 'femmes'. Les clans qui ont donné une épouse à mon bonyango suivent les mêmes règles.

OBSERVATIONS

Dans plusieurs études récentes, surtout en Afrique du Sud, on a dégagé quatre règles qui régissent la terminologie classificatoire.

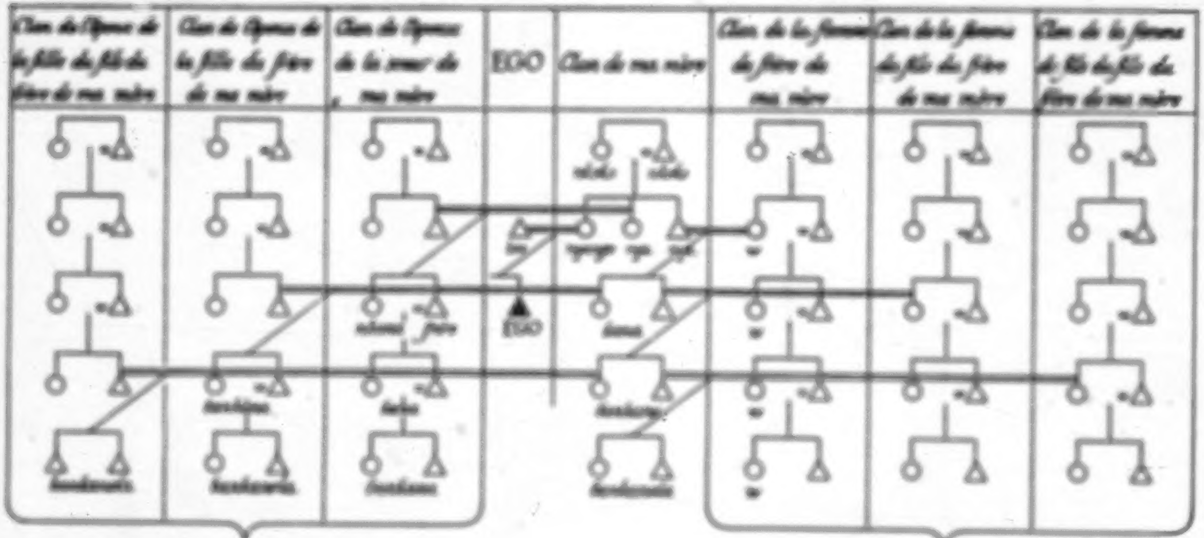
La première règle est celle de l'' unity of the lineage ': 'The lineage as a whole classified as belonging to a particular " generation " in its relations to another lineage as a whole' (Holleman, op. cit., p. 9). L'auteur ajoute, 'the unity of the lineage may be broken by a division into affines and cognatic, each with their distinctive terminology, in which the cognatic section is one " generation " lower than the affinal section' (p. 9).

Tout comme on parle chez nous d'une société-mère, ou d'une société-sœur, le Nkundo aussi peut considérer un clan allié comme une personne morale et parler du clan de sa mère comme de sa mère, d'un clan bokango, d'un clan bokilo. Mais je ne pense pas que le terme bokango ou bokilo implique, quand il est appliqué à un individu, une idée de génération, pas plus que le terme français de 'beau-parent', ou membre de ma belle-famille. Et le Nkundo n'admettra certainement pas ce qu'écrit l'auteur

[p. 221]

TABLEAU 11

Parents et Alliés par Clan maternel



Clan de l'époux de la fille du fils du frère de ma mère
Clan de l'époux de la fille du frère de ma mère
Clan de l'époux de la sœur de ma mère
EGO
Clan de ma mère
Clan de la femme du frère de ma mère
Clan de la femme du fils du frère de ma mère
Clan de la femme du fils du fils du frère de ma mère
EGO

Clans bokango
Tous les non-désignés = bokango

Clans bokilo
Tous les non-désignés = bokilo
w = wali (épouse)

cité pour les Hera: ' in inter-lineage relations, . . . once the relationship between Ego and any cognatic relative is determined, all the cognates of the same lineage as that relative will bear the same degree of kinship as himself to Ego, regardless of the differences in generation . . . between themselves or as compared with Ego ' (p. 5).

La seconde règle serait que le clan qui nous procure une épouse (clan bokilo des Nkundo) est considéré comme notre ' père ', et donc que le clan qui reçoit une épouse de notre clan serait considéré comme notre ' fils '. Chez les Nkundo aussi on peut entendre dire: ' nous vous avons donné notre fille comme épouse, donc vous êtes nos fils .' Mais on entend aussi: ' nous vous avons enrichis par notre dot, et nos enfants sont vos " pères ".' Mais ces conceptions ne se reflètent pas dans la terminologie entre affins. D'ailleurs le fait que le Nkundo emploie couramment le terme bokilo pour son bokango est significatif.

Troisième règle: In lineages directly related to Ego's lineage ' the female line seems to be potentially one " generation " lower than the agnatic male line ' (p. 11). L'auteur nous dit que: ' This duality is even revealed in agnatic relations . . . Ego calls his . . . father's sister either satete [father's sister] or hanamwalai [sœur].' Donc les femmes des clans directement apparentés seraient considérées comme appartenant à une génération inférieure aux hommes.

Il faut dire que les tableaux des clans bokango, données par l'auteur, ne traduisent pas cette règle, puisque tous les membres non-consanguins de ces clans, tant mâles que femelles, y sont renseignés comme nokwaeko = beaux-enfants. Dans les clans bokilo la règle semble se baser sur la conception Hera (dans l'interprétation de l'auteur), que toutes les femmes du clan de ma femme sont mes ' femmes ', n'importe leur génération ou leur âge. Pour le Nkundo cette règle ne s'applique ni dans les conceptions ni dans la terminologie.

Reste la quatrième règle, que l'auteur cité emploie souvent mais n'interprète pas dans ses tableaux où elle s'opposerait complètement à la seconde règle: que l'enfant est juridiquement identifié à sa mère. Selon cette deuxième règle, l'enfant de la sœur de mon père serait mon petit-enfant, et en même temps, selon la quatrième règle, il serait mon ' père '.

Pour le Nkundo cette quatrième règle explique comment cet enfant est mon ' père ' tandis que l'enfant du frère de ma mère est mon ' enfant '.

On peut donc conclure que deux règles expliquent les particularités du système classificatoire des Nkundo:

1. Dans les clans qui ont donné une épouse à notre clan toutes et seules les femmes juridiquement puînées de cette épouse sont ' épouses ' de tous et des seuls hommes qui sont juridiquement puînés de l'époux.

2. Dans les clans qui ont reçu une épouse de notre clan, les enfants issus de cette épouse sont identifiés à leur mère par les enfants des frères de cette épouse.

Take F133

M
764
761

young man! [Ed., the text is not translated from mid-page 17 to the second paragraph, page 19.]

M
121

[19] Since the chief goal of our expedition was to study the practices and customs connected with the material and everyday life of the native, as well as to gather objects for our collection, our stay among the various tribes was too short to permit a thorough study of their religious life and its attendant customs.

M [732].

Fig. 14. Natural Deformations among the Natives.
(1) Bankutu woman; (2) Barakata woman; (3) Bankutu child.

M
I
776

We ascertained that the native, as a rule, acknowledges the existence of a higher spirit. During my stay in the village of Kapanda, Banfumungu tribe, I had the opportunity to question a chief on the subject.

"Who causes the sun and the moon to rise? Who gave you the fish of the river and the animals of the plain, Matali?"

The chief looked at me for an instant, dumbfounded, and then replied, "Nzambi ve Mundele?" "Was it not Nzambi, White man?"

"Why, then, do you not call upon Nzambi to protect your crops, favor your fishing, and grant you success in hunting, Matali?" [20]

771 In matters of religion the Nkundó recognize the existence of a Supreme Being: Njakomba or Mbombiɛndɛ, creator and ruler of all that exists. They do not worship him in any way, however; all their religious practices are addressed to guardian and ancestral spirits. (2)

197 The language of the Nkundó is beautiful, harmonious, flexible, and rich. It has all the qualities needed to become a literary language and is admirably suited to the requirements of teaching. Furthermore, its various dialects are spoken over a considerably large territory, in fact over one of the largest language areas [13] of the Congo. 797 214 In addition to the religious and devotional books of the Catholic missions, a fairly large collection of various academic textbooks is available in this language, thanks primarily to the zeal of the Protestant missionaries. The latter have also published a complete translation of the Bible. Several vocabularies and small grammars have been compiled, and in recent years a large dictionary and an expanded grammar have been added to these, both compiled by A. and L. Ruskin of the Bongandanga Mission. For several years the Protestant mission at Bolenge has been publishing a native magazine, and the Catholic mission is pushing ahead with preparations to publish one also.

114 Father Shebesta's book, Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, includes a chapter on the Nkundó in which the author gives a good general description of this people. Nevertheless, some of the details given must be accepted with reservations.

● 121 The general information given above is enough to give the reader a superficial knowledge of the Nkundó.

The purpose of this work is to give a more extensive account of their institutions pertaining to marriage.

As we have previously stated, we are considering only a portion of this people. All our statements cover only the fraction we have delimited. The family institutions of other Nkundó groups are not accounted for, as they are less known to us and we do not want

---

2. On the subject of the religious conceptions of the Nkundó, see a detailed study by Father Boelaert, M.S.C., in Hooger Leven, 1934, pp. 1612 and 1636, and 1935, pp. 12 and 60.

121 to present anything we have not thoroughly investigated. We have not stepped outside the geographic limits set forth except for a few incidental remarks. Although the cultural uniformity of the Nkundó-Móngo is remarkable it is not, of course, absolute. And if we have used the title Mariage des Nkundó (Marriage among the Nkundu), we have done so because it was difficult to find one which would be more appropriate for the geographic and ethnic limits of [14] this study. It is very likely that in most cases our data are valid beyond the limits we have laid out, but to generalize upon it before making a thorough study of each group would be contrary to all scientific method. The reader is therefore earnestly requested to take these remarks into account and to abstain from giving our conclusions too broad a scope.

Familial institutions in themselves and in their totality are outside the scope of this book. But since they are based on marriage, they have an important place within our framework. We must necessarily touch upon them, but we will limit our excursions into that realm to what is required to make the general description intelligible. On the other hand, the study of marriage throws a good deal of light on familial institutions.

The words "family," "clan," "group," etc. recur frequently. 128 596 614 The family is an entity smaller than the clan, and the latter is subordinate to the group. Since it is very difficult to give a precise definition, however, we have taken the trouble to make a clear distinction only when necessary. (1) [Editor's Note: Elsewhere we use them more as generic terms or even as synonyms. In order to make family relationships and the expressions used by the Nkundó to designate them more comprehensible, we are attaching an example of a genealogical table.]

113 I know of the following previous studies on the same subject:

Engels, "Les Wangata," Revue Congolaise, 1910, which also deals with marriage.

G. Kaptein, "Familieleven en -zeden bij de Inboorlingen van den Evenaar," Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 531. [15] This study covers

---

1. See Chapter V, Article III.

113 more ground than ours, since it even includes a discussion of the Mbole.

H. Brepoels, "Het Familiehoofd bij de Nkundó-Negers," Congo, 1930, Vol. 2, p. 332.

124 We have tried to make our data as complete as possible. We have given here not only the major trends and basic principles, but also the particulars, even those that seem most insignificant. They are always interesting, and sometimes more so than one may have suspected at first. All the material has been discussed over and over again, in private and in public, with very varied people at different times and places, and the points that presented the greatest difficulty were gone over countless times.

● 121 In general we have preferred to use the descriptive and analytic method. We have drawn conclusions and principles from the data. Although case histories naturally lengthened the text of this work, we have not hesitated to insert them at various points. They are the best means of bringing out certain rules or customs and bringing to life the psychology of our people.

121 69 In this respect a remark should be made whose importance deserves our attention for a moment. The examination of judicial cases of which we have been direct or indirect witnesses does not provide a scientific certainty about the laws -- or "the customs," to use the term so frequently applied (1). For not all [16] that is done

---

1. It is unfortunate that this term has become so fashionable, for it lacks precision. Indeed, it may mean simply "practice, usage," or it may be used in the legal sense of "a practice having the force of a law." Often a confusion between the two meanings is created, and all customs are considered to be legally obligatory, when actually, some practices are outside common law, and others are in opposition to it. For the sake of precision in ethnographic and ethnological works, it would be well to use this ambiguous term as little as possible and to distinguish clearly among legal procedures, the laws and custom or usage.

121 is in accordance with justice. The observation that the natives be-69 have in one fashion or another, and that this or that palaver is often settled in a particular way, is not a sufficient basis for concluding that such is the law.

Infractions of the rules of social justice are more frequent than one would suspect. The principles are good, but often passions prevent their application, and frequently there are neither sanctions to support a weakness of will nor rewards to stimulate loyal adherence.

Furthermore, one should not invoke the variability and con-121 tinuous transformation of native law (as does Dr. T. Seitz, for ex-114 ample, in Africa, Vol. 3, No. 1, p. 89) without first establishing 69 whether the judgments rendered have been in conformity with the law. The remark made by this eminent author further on in his article, "Welche Rolle dabei das Machtmoment," etc. . . . weakens his first statement and shows precisely that an accurate knowledge of legal prescriptions cannot be attained solely on the basis of the verdicts of tribunals, and that partiality often plays a considerable part. The observation made by the former governor of the Cameroons may be applied to the Belgian Congo and often to "civilized" countries as well -- partially and the abuse of power are nowhere unknown.

We must also take into account the possibility of the judges'
121 ignorance, as well as our own difficulty in understanding their sentences, 69 since important points of fact and law are sometimes left unmentioned, and yet are implied.

It is not surprising that there are complicated cases where it is very difficult for the natives, however intelligent and impartial, to settle the dispute and provide a fair and legitimate solution. The law cannot foresee for every case the infinite variety of personal, local, and modal circumstances that may occur.

Only the analysis and comparison of diverse cases, [17] their solutions, sanctions, and consequences, together with discussions with discreet and impartial natives who are knowing and skillful and who have learned to know us and to understand what we want to learn from them, and who are sincerely disposed to help us at the same time, can produce a rational and reasoned certainty which conforms to reality. These conditions are numerous, and it is difficult to find them

121 all fulfilled in one person. But such individuals do exist, if in the 69 person of the investigator they find sympathy, broad ideas, a lack of all European racism, understanding, a knowledge of their language, and a benevolent devotion to their interests, individually and as a group.

Even if one has the good fortune to find a native who, after 121 much experience, reaches the point where he will say spontaneously:
124 "This is done often, but it is against the law; the law says thus and so; this decision of the tribunal was partial for such or such reason," -- an infinitely valuable situation, but one which arises very rarely -- one is not thereby absolved of the need to check his statements. But the further one goes, the more it is possible to be aware of the reality and to appraise the informant's value in this sphere and the usefulness of his statements.

These considerations are particularly valuable in making the 121 distinction between obligations and social decorum or good manners,
183 between legal obligations and obligations of kinship and mutual 671 assistance. In current practice the Nkundó make no clear lines of demarcation between these categories, since they have never codified their law or attempted to set up a clear and precise classification.
They feel no more need for this than, for instance, they or even we "civilized" people bother about setting up a grammar for our native tongue, which we speak correctly and without the slightest difficulty, purely out of habit.

An investigation in the legal domain is made [18] very difficult [124] by the patriarchal and feudal character of these peoples, added to the lack of writing. Not only is there an adaptation to circumstances -- the felicitous flexibility of native laws -- in which jurisprudence plays a great rôle, but the Nkundó, while knowing well what is lawful and what is not, generally does not clearly understand the nature of an obligation, and above all he does not know its source.

One's chances of obtaining good results in the inquiry are 121 greatly increased by the use of hypothetical cases, presented to the 124 individuals one knows best and whom one knows to be in no way involved. It is always worthwhile to use this method as a means of completing and perhaps correcting conclusions based on the examination

121 of actual legal cases. It is almost impossible to gain access to the 124 latter unless one is armed with an official order. A thorough knowledge of the language of the tribe in question is required, however, for the use of imaginary cases.

In describing various laws and practices, we have tried to reproduce the explanations given by the Nkundó and to add our own views when it has seemed appropriate to do so. The careful reader will have no trouble distinguishing between these two very different sources.

I am very well aware that many ethnologists do not like 121 chercheurs de brousse [bush explorers] to become involved in these questions, and that they prefer to receive from the latter only raw data on which they can build their theories. All ethnographers of the bush and forest will readily recognize their inadequacy in matters of theory. But this very real disadvantage due to a lack of training is offset by a definite advantage. They know the natives much more intimately, not only with respect to the immediate subject of their study, but also as regards other aspects of their lives, particularly their psychological make-up and general mentality, with which they may have had direct and daily contact for many years. [19] They are therefore more likely to come to conclusions which are in accordance with reality. The "armchair" ethnologists sometimes seem to assume that the men in the bush are capable of being no more than collectors of data. Yet the majority of them have had an intermediate education, especially in the humanities, and many of them have attended institutions of higher learning (universities and others). There are professional jurists among them, for example. Therefore, these observers are capable of reliable judgments, and many of them, through their studies in philosophy, are equipped with the rules of logic and highly developed critical powers.

It is true that it is not up to us to build theories; the range of our investigations is always limited. A knowledge of theories is very interesting and useful, but it is by no means necessary. In fact such knowledge may sometimes be dangerous, since it is easy for it to unduly influence our judgment in a way that is against the best interests of science. Thus we do not care whether our facts are in

● 121 conformity or in opposition to this or that ethnological theory. We are presenting the facts in their entirety, the material portion of the culture as well as its intellectual, psychological, and moral basis. Theory should be based on these facts, not the facts adapted to suit the theories.

In the text of this work the reader will find repetitions, foot-121 notes, and references. We would have preferred to omit these,
114 since they are always tedious, but their presence was dictated by the nature of the material and by the strictly scientific nature of this work, which we wanted to retain at all costs. We hope in fact that those who wish to study it thoroughly will find these repetitions not an obstacle, but a valuable aid which will help them to obtain a total and precise picture of the material.

Although I have taken the greatest care and all possible precautions to present to the reader only facts and evidence which correspond to reality, and to document [20] everything as completely as possible, this work will inevitably contain gaps, imperfections, even one mistake or another. (1)

This material is not exempt from such faults, and it would be pure presumption to pretend otherwise. But science could not advance, nor could the practical purpose of our knowledge ever be accomplished, should we try to achieve the perfection that can be the result only of successive studies by different people, before presenting the results of our research to the public. I would be gratified if others would check my data, criticize it, and supplement and correct it wherever necessary. I hope that this work will also stimulate them to make a similar study of the other segments of the Nkundó-Mongo so that at last we may have a total picture of the matrimonial institutions of this very important people.

---

1. This is especially true with regard to the legal significance of certain practices, a most delicate point of inquiry, which has yet to be thoroughly investigated -- particularly, certain questions concerning the origin of marriage in its various forms.

Nkundu

121 The question about the real structure of the native society begins to be asked only now that it has been brought completely to the tottering point. The question as to whether that society is, in its foundations or basic elements, really in conflict with natural law, the general welfare of mankind, and faith -- the question, thus, of the right of that society to exist -- is still shoved aside in favor of the supposed duty of the moment: to make that society like ours.

In this article, I have tried to outline the social order of the Nkundo [Nkundu] -Mongo as clearly as possible, in order to find an answer to the last question.

1. The Ethnic Clan

When we keep saying that the family is the nucleus of the community, we are ultimately merely clutching a legal fiction, or rather, we say what it ought to be. In fact, the family is, among us, only the producer of individuals who play their role in the community. The family, as such, is neither socially nor legally nor politically an intermediary, a mediator, between the individuals and the higher organs of the society.

613 Second, the nuclear family has, in our society, developed into a completely separate conception, compared to the extended family. The patriarchal household, the model of which Le Play portrayed, or the extended family, has completely disappeared. Among the Nkundo-Mongo, on the contrary, it is precisely the patriarchal family which, in the most absolute sense, is still the nucleus of the community and the foremost independent organ of that community.

Most often, this extended family is designated by the term "clan," to which vaguely different characteristics are attached: [150] blood relationship, totemism, exogamy, community of property, and others. One speaks of ethnic (patriarchal or matriarchal), legal, exogamic, and political clans, without further giving a clear description of these concepts.

The ethnic clan includes all of the persons who are descended in the male line from a particular ancestor. It is his descent in the male line from that particular ancestor which ties each Nkundo to that clan. Each ethnic clan has its own name, which is indicated in our society by the family name. When the Nkundo wish, however, to indicate that name,

[188]

Introduction

114 This study is based on the preliminary work connected with the publication of the results of the "Mainz Congo Expedition 1951-54" in which I participated as an assistant to Dr. Sulzmann.

●121 In order to describe and characterize the kinship and local groups of the Ekonda, they should first be regarded as ethno-sociological ideal types (1). For this purpose it was necessary to obtain a clear understanding of the meaning of the terms used to describe the types. Studies by Thurnwald (2), Kirchhoff (3), Murdock (4) (4a), Radcliffe-Brown (5), Lowie (6),

---

1. For the concept of type, see Thurnwald, Menschliche Gesellschaft [Human Society], Vol. 1, p. 7 ff.; Mühlmann, Methodik [Methodology], p. 114 ff.; and Wörterbuch der Soziologie [Dictionary of Sociology], p. 224 f.

2. Menschliche Gesellschaft [Human Society], Vols. 2, 4.

3. "Verwandtschaftsorganisation [Kinship Organization], Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Vol. 63, pp. 85-193; "Verwandtschaftsbezeichnungen [Kinship Terminology], "Zeitschrift für Ethnologie, Vol. 64, pp. 41-71.

4. Social Structure.

4a. "Changing Emphasis."

5. "Study of Kinship Systems."

6. Primitive Society.

● [2] and Lévi-Strauss (7) were consulted (8).

7. Structures élémentaires.

8. I am particularly indebted to Prof. Mühlmann for his advice and references to source material.

By their very nature, all attempts to recognize ethno-sociological ideal types must remain incomplete and are in constant need of revision on the basis of ethnographic reality (9).

9. Mühlmann, Methodik, p. 120.

Such revision can only be carried out if each field worker, while studying his material, compares the existing terminology with "his" realities and if he then submits the result of this comparison to the scrutiny of others. Unfortunately the use of ethno-sociological terms is often dictated primarily by the convictions and preferences of the individual author who may neither refer to the existing terminology nor otherwise inform the reader of what he means exactly by the various terms. Many authors in this respect follow such unreliable standards as their "feeling for the language" or they act under the delusion that their private terminology corresponds to what is generally accepted. Too often, however, the actual usage differs considerably from what has been suggested in terminological studies. As a result terms like "clan," "kinship group [Sippe]," and "large family [Grossfamilie]" create different impressions among different readers.

In the present study the terminology of the authors mentioned above will be discussed in relation to the kinship and local groups of the Ekonda. We are concerned here with the [101] northwestern subdivision of the Ekonda who live in the Bikoro territory. The Ekonda belong to the large group, the Mongo,

62 It was said before that kinship and local groups are to be discussed. This statement needs clarification. When speaking of local groups in the present study, we do not intend to refer to groups which consist of non-related subgroups. It is to be clearly understood that the residence pattern will be used as the decisive criterion for subdividing the groups. Thus, closely related groups may be excluded, more distantly related groups may be included. Occasionally such local units also include groups which are not related to each other. [183]

Also, among those groups which I have called kinship groups in this study, a biological or genealogical connection which can be proved and expressed in juridical terms is quite doubtful. We shall not concern ourselves, however, with this lack of precision; rather, we shall regard as related those persons or groups of persons whom the Ekonda themselves consider as related. In my opinion there is no justification for disregarding the attitude of the natives since it is their attitude which determines the character and function of the groups. Murdock (10)

10. Social Structure, p. 47.

uses this approach to the kinship group, while using the term "lineage" for persons who can prove their relationship. We hasten to point out that also the local groups have a tendency toward "paternalization" (11), to construe a closer relationship.

11. Boelaert, "Clan équivoque," p. 17.

The Kinship Structure of the Ekonda

61
602 Among the Ekonda we find a system of groups which are ordered according to degrees of real or assumed kinship. This system is subdivided into a hierarchical structure of many ranks. Larger groups consist of between one to four groups of the next order. The relationships between the groups correspond to the relationships between their founding ancestors. In this fashion certain groups are described as the older or younger brother of

614
621 In general one may assume that local groups will postulate only that kind of kinship relationship which does not necessitate a substantial functional reintegration. For this reason, units above the exogamy limit will easily tend to construe a genealogy which "proves" a kinship relationship. Groups of that type are functionally weak. One can observe processes of this kind both among the group of the Bakonda and among the neighboring E-group, Lonyanyanga. The institution of the nkúmú (see above, p. 14) also appears to have a leveling influence. The privileges of the oldest (and free) group diminish in importance and fall behind the office of nkúmú. The new office is also open to younger and dependent groups.

Sociological Terminology for Kinship Groups

128 Before dealing with the units which are to be regarded as settlement groups, we shall compare the kinship groups of the Ekonda with the sociological ideal types. Keeping in mind the authors mentioned at the beginning, I shall now discuss the various terms used for groups which are applicable to conditions found among the Ekonda. [196]

Family

121
596 The small family is of no importance in the organizational system of the Ekonda. Nevertheless it is very important as the smallest unit of economic life. Each small family is potentially polygynous, but monogynous marriages are more numerous at the present time, especially among the younger generation. In view of this difference between potential and practiced polygyny, it seems advisable to follow Thurnwald in classing the polygamous forms together with the small family and to differentiate its nuclear families (18). In my opinion this approach seems to correspond more closely to its functional importance than Murdock's view, according to which the polygamous family

---

18. Vol. 4, p. 12 f.

● 121 596 together with the large family [Grossfamilie] is put into the category of "composite forms of family" (19). In Thurnwald's "Technical Terms" there are two passages dealing with the large family, one under the heading "Family," p. 12 f., the other under "Large Family," p. 14. Under "Family" Thurnwald writes:

> "...The 'large family' differs from the family in that in the former several generations with a common grandfather live together in the same homestead or even under the same roof. The nuclear families, and the men forming part of them, remain relatively independent. Naturally, even in this unit relatives lacking any protection may be taken into the group. The large family differs from the kinship group (q. v.) in that in the former all its members live in the same dwelling site, and the degree of kinship between the members is mainly seen in a line descending from the head; in addition, it forms an economic unit. A further characteristic feature of the large family lies in the fact that it resembles any family in being tied to the life of the persons who constitute it and that it becomes extinct with them, while a kinship group renews itself automatically. It is, in a manner of speaking, 'eternal'."

Under the heading "Large Family," he writes only: "... The phenomenon of at least three generations descended from one another living together under a common head (grandfather with children and children's children) is defined as 'large family' (see Family, Kinship Group)." There is a discrepancy between these two definitions. If, according to the first definition, a group dissolves upon the death of the persons constituting it, i.e., the oldest generation, the phrase "at least" may be valid for the norm, but not for the specific case. Thurnwald defines the family in the same manner in Lehrbuch der Völkerkunde [Textbook of Ethnology] (20). If we accept Thurnwald's definition --

---

19. Murdock, Social Structure, p. 23.

20. Thurnwald in: Preuss (Ed.), Lehrbuch, p. 289.

[2] 596 the material collected by Kirchhoff (21) and the ancient Roman

21. Kirchhoff, Zeitschrift für Ethnologie,
Vol. 63, p. 88 ff., p. 96 ff.

familia would serve as good examples -- a patrilineal large family could be described as a kinship group, living, working, and maintaining a household together, consisting of a husband, his wives, and all his offspring, and splitting into the large families of his sons upon the death of the father.

Kirchhoff defines the large family in the same fashion, yet he takes care to point out that here, in contrast to a kinship group, persons who have married into the group are part of it (22).

22. Kirchhoff, Zeitschrift für Ethnologie,
Vol. 63, p. 90.

Murdock's conception of the "extended family" is identical with this interpretation (23).

23. Murdock, Social Structure, p. 24.

On the other hand, in Vol. 2 (p. 22) Thurnwald regards the large family as a unilateral kinship group with persons who have married into it. This group lives in the same place and is governed by a common chief from whom all the members are supposedly descended. The kinship group, in contrast to the large family, may be scattered. [197] Thus, Thurnwald at this point puts other characteristics in the foreground, but the text allows the conclusion that for Thurnwald the dependence on the life of the head of the families and its temporary nature are the essential characteristics of a large family.

596 614 In this sense none of the units described under A-E$^{1}_{A}$ is a large family. The wives who have married into the group belong to the group of the husband, but they always remain part of their father's group: in case of divorce they return to the

$^{1}_{A}$ [pages 9-15, category 116.--Analyst]

596 latter group. Another factor which reminds us of the wife's con-
614 tinuing membership in her original group is the connection, never completely severed, between the groups related by marriage, illustrated by the practice of gifts and counter-gifts which are all part of the bride price and the dowry. When she dies, the [764] wife is buried in the soil of her group. In addition, the group membership of the wife is transferred to the children, although this does not have the same effects in economic and political terms. Matrilineal descent is important in relation to marriage [68] restrictions, certain avoidance practices which are passed on through the wives, and also certain privileges. Quite a large number of persons has settled permanently in the group of their mother or that of their grandmothers.

The decisive factor that makes the term "large family" unsuitable is the "eternal" character of the A-E groups of the Ekonda. However, the subdivisions of the A-groups which live together in a common homestead (see p. 10) may be regarded as large families in the sense used by Thurnwald, Kirchhoff, and Murdock.

Kinship Group

614 In the definitions of the term "family" quoted above,
we already learned something about Thurnwald's concept of a [12] kinship group, but there is an additional reference to the technical term "kinship group' ["Sippe"]" (p. 17 f.) (34):

34. Menschliche Gesellschaft, Vol. 4.

"...A kinship group is defined as a clan (q.v.) which is not politically independent. Usually the loss of independence is caused by the distribution of the people of the clan among the various settlements. A kinship group is held together by the consciousness of being descended from the same ancestors and by their common cult of the ancestors. The kinship group is of special importance for the regulation of marriage (q.v.). -- A kinship group may be divided into kinship subgroups (large [197] kinship group (Grosssippe), small kinship group (Kleinsippe)), or it may have a tendency to split in half. A kinship group or a kinship subgroup may at times have a chief, at times not."

On the term "clan" Thurnwald writes (p. 16) (34):

34. Menschliche Gesellschaft, Vol. 4.

"The word is of Old Irish origin, where it refers to children of common descent, approximately in the sense of a 'large family' (q.v.). We now use it for family agglomerations (see Horde) who have become stabilized, who have a religious substructure through their belief in common ancestors, and who support each other economically and politically. It is advisable to make a distinction between the 'clan' which settles exclusively within one region and which claims this region for itself, thus forming a politically sovereign community, and the splinters of a clan scattered among communities which are independent in their own right, which we designate as 'kinship groups' (q.v.) and which usually are not tied to each other by any organizational framework; their cohesion is simply the result of the ceremonial-religious cult of the ancestors and a certain degree of solidarity. The origin of the clan and kinship group is closely related to the cult of the ancestors which symbolizes descent lines. Membership in a clan or in a kinship group may be reckoned in the male or female lines. Frequently one of the living family heads represents this family agglomeration which is, so to speak, [198] 'crystallized.' In this respect it differs from familial structures which become extinct upon the death of the persons by whom they were founded. In a clan or a kinship group the families succeeding each other are permanently represented (see Family, Caste, State)."

We may state that a common feature of both forms is that we are dealing here with purely unilateral units which are tied to each other by ancestor worship (this ancestor worship may be -- in many cases, it will be -- absent in the large family as described above). If we disregard the attempt inherent in both

[2] 614 definitions to present a theory of development, the differentiation between the two terms appears to me to be very useful, and this seems particularly true if we accept the first definition of clan given by Thurnwald and regard the second as completely irrelevant for our present purposes.

It is true that our A-group lives in a certain district 614 which it claims for itself as its own "province," but it is never-621 theless difficult to describe this district as a politically sovereign community. A political nature could rather be attributed to those groups which, up to now, we have not described at all, i.e., the settlement communities. Proceeding further, the A-group is integrated into the B-group, the B-group into the C-group, thus forming an endless chain; among those tribes who have a greater degree of genealogical consciousness than the Ekonda -- for example, the neighboring Bongili (25) -- the hierarchy of groups ends with mankind, the hierarchy of ancestors with God.

25. Boelaert, "Les Bongili."

Thurnwald emphasizes this ranked structure, especially [1] in discussing the kinship group. Kirchhoff, however, fails to 614 deal with the problem of the kinship group in a manner which would be of value to us in differentiating between kinship group and clan. Dealing with the organizational structure of the peoples he discussed, he naturally was more interested in defining the border between large family and kinship group. Lowie (26)

26. Primitive Society.

only discusses the kinship group, "sib," calling it the "'clan' of British anthropologists", (p. 105) or "clans," if patrilineal, and "gentes," if matrilineal, "of most American anthropologists." The "ad infinitum" (p. 106) is also stressed by him in relation to the kinship group. Lowie also admits the possibility of subdivisions with respect to his "sib," and consequently he even includes in the kinship group such forms as the "moieties," which according to Thurnwald's definition are still part of it, but which in his view

61| and in general ethnological usage are units of a special type.
12| Thus Lowie's and Thurnwald's views correspond to a large extent.
Murdock (27) clearly differentiates between a kinship

27. Social Structure, p. 45 ff.

group and a "lineage." In his view a lineage consists of a group of individuals who are able to trace their descent to a common ancestor, which for him in the majority of cases is only the unilateral "stem" [Stamm] of a large family, excluding those who have married into the group, but including the members who have married out.

Murdock's and Thurnwald's concepts of the kinship group are identical. On the other hand, Murdock differs in his definition of the clan (28).

28. Social Structure, p. 65 ff., especially p. 69 f.

Clan

61| Murdock regards the patrilineal clan as a local group
64| which consists of the stem of a kinship group and which incorporates
12| the wives of its members but excludes daughters who marry. As an example he mentioned the "groups" which in our society are connected by the same family name. If the group of persons bearing the birth-name "Wolf" in common functioned as a group of relatives, it would [199] be a Wolf kinship group, but those persons who actually call themselves "Wolf," i.e., the Messrs. Wolf with their wives, sons, unmarried sisters, and daughters, would constitute a Wolf clan (assuming, of course, that this group really functions). This concept of a clan is new. Even Murdock does not consider this definition very satisfactory and invites better suggestions. According to Murdock, the clan is a unit of eminent importance; terminologically it has not been possible so far to differentiate it from the kinship group. It is irrelevant in this connection whether the term clan is applicable to this

614 social group. It is true that the "Murdock clan" also exists
611 among the Ekonda on all the lower ranks, but only as a functional
● [2] unit which, like the large family and small family, is not really regarded as a group by the Ekonda. Among the Ekonda the feeling of cohesion between the indigenous group and those who have married into it has its basis not so much in the groups of relatives as described above, but rather in the local group of the type discussed further below.

614 The units which we described in the first part of this study correspond neither to the definition of Thurnwald nor to that of Murdock as regards the term clan. Our groups differ from the clan as described by Thurnwald by their hierarchical structure over which functions of authority are distributed. An added factor is that Thurnwald in the Lehrbuch (29) wants to define the difference between clan and kinship group by size and by ascribing to the former the element of political power. The only kinship group of the Ekonda which possesses strong authority, however, is the smallest, the one of rank A. If we let ourselves be guided by the criterion of authority, we would have to regard the smallest group (rank A) as a clan. Using the criterion of size, however, we would have to regard one of the groups of ranks D or E as a clan. Hence this term is unsuitable.

For the above reasons I have used the term "kinship group" [Sippe] for the groups of all ranks. With respect to the E-groups one might even speak of a subtribe [Unterstamm], but it should be pointed out that as far as the Ekonda are concerned all the groups mentioned above, including the tribes [Stämme] are groups or relatives of the same type, i.e., are "kinship groups."

For the purpose of differentiating between the kinship groups of the various ranks I have used the terms:

nuclear kinship group [Kernsippe] for groups of rank A;
small kinship group [Kleinsippe] for groups of rank B;

---

29. Thurnwald: in Preuss, Lehrbuch, p. 220 f.

601 banankana). As a result, the children are legally identified 602 with their mothers. Thus, my sister's child is a child (bona) to me, or a sister's child (banankana), but to my own child he would be father (ise).

In addition, he has maternal blood relatives, children of my mother's sisters, who are thus his "brothers and sisters," or children of the daughters of his "male mothers." Since these last daughters are his "children," their children would be his "grandchildren." Again, all the members of these clans who are unrelated by blood are his bokanga.

IV. Likilo

601 These are affinal clans which have given wives (wali; pl., 602 baali) to my clan. This does not, of course, concern my mother's 592 clan, which is a clan related by blood, but rather clans which have given wives, be it to a classificatory "father," to one of their sons, or to one of the sons of the latter. The Nkundo calls all the members of these clans -- with the exception of the woman -- bokilo (pl., bakilo). The Nkundo, merely by marrying a woman, at the same time marries all her legal younger sisters, that is to say, all the bakune [Ed., bankana?] and bana of this woman. Similarly, the woman marries not only a man, but at the same time all his legal younger brothers, that is, all the bakune and bana of this man (except the children of their own union).

601 Just as the clans which have received a wife from my clan thus 602 include bokanga and sisters' sons, so also clans that have given us a wife include bakilo and "wives." Clans which have given a wife to my bonyango follow the same rules.

Comments

121 In several recent studies, especially in South Africa, four rules have been defined which govern classificatory terminology.

614 The first rule is that of the "unity of the lineage": The lineage
602 as a whole is classified as belonging to a particular 'generation'

121 614 602 in its relations to another lineage as a whole" (Holleman, op. cit., p. 9). The author adds, "the unity of the lineage may be broken by a division into affines and cognatic, each with their distinctive terminology, in which the cognatic section is one 'generation' lower than the affinal section" (p. 5.).

121 614 602 601 Just as we speak of a mother society or a sister society, so the Nkundo can also consider an affinal clan as a moral person and speak of his mother's clan as of his mother, of a bokango clan, of a bokilo clan. I do not think that the term bokango or bokilo implies an idea of generation when it is applied to an individual, any more than does the French term "parent-in-law," or member of my family-in-law. The Nkundo would certainly not admit what the author cited here writes [221] [Table 2 appears here.] [222] about the Hera: "In inter-lineage relations, . . . once the relationship between Ego and any cognatic relative is determined, all the cognates of the same lineage as that relative will bear the same degree of kinship as himself to Ego, regardless of the differences in generation . . . between themselves or as compared with Ego" (p. 5.).

The second rule would be that the clan which provides us a wife (bokilo clan of the Nkundo) is considered our "father," and thus the clan which receives a wife from our clan would be considered a "son." Moreover, among the Nkundo is understood: "We have given you our daughter as a wife, so you are our son." But also implied is: "We have enriched you by our marriage payment, and our children are your "fathers." These ideas, however, are not reflected in the terminology between affinals. Moreover, the fact that the Nkundo readily uses the term bokilo for his bokango is significant.

Third rule: In lineages directly related to Ego's lineage, "the female line seems to be potentially one 'generation' lower than the agnatic male line" (p. 11). The author tells us that: "This duality is even revealed in agnatic relations . . . Ego calls his . . . father's sister either vatete (father's sister) or hanzvadzi (sister)." Thus, the women of directly related clans would be considered to belong to a lower generation than the men.

[Text continues on page 7]

121
602
644
601

It must be stated that the tables of the batanga clans presented by the author do not reflect this rule, since all members of these clans not related by blood, males as well as females, are designated as bokwasho = children-in-law. In the bakilo clans the rule seems to be founded on the Hera idea (according to the interpretation of the author) that all the women of my wife's clan are my "wives," no matter what their generation or age. This rule is not applicable to the Nkundo either in ideas or terminology.

There is still the fourth rule which the author quoted here and often but does not interpret in his tables where it is completely opposed to the second rule: the child is legally identified with its mother. According to the second rule, the child of my father's sister would be my grandchild, and at the same time, according to the fourth rule, it would be my "father."

For the Nkundo, the fourth rule explains how this child is my "father," while the child of my mother's brother is my "child."

One may thus conclude that two rules explain the details of the classificatory system of the Nkundo:

1. In clans which have given a wife to our clan, all the women who are legally younger sisters of this wife, exclusively, are "wives" of all the men, exclusively, who are legally younger brothers of the husband.

2. In clans which have received a wife from our clan, the children born of this wife are identified with their mother by the children of this wife's brothers.

113 more ground than ours, since it even includes a discussion of the Mbole.

H. Brepoels, "Het Familiehoofd bij de Nkundó-Negers," Congo, 1930, Vol. 2, p. 332.

124 We have tried to make our data as complete as possible. We have given here not only the major trends and basic principles, but also the particulars, even those that seem most insignificant. They are always interesting, and sometimes more so than one may have suspected at first. All the material has been discussed over and over again, in private and in public, with very varied people at different times and places, and the points that presented the greatest difficulty were gone over countless times.

121 In general we have preferred to use the descriptive and analytic method. We have drawn conclusions and principles from the data. Although case histories naturally lengthened the text of this work, we have not hesitated to insert them at various points. They are the best means of bringing out certain rules or customs and bringing to life the psychology of our people.

121 69 In this respect a remark should be made whose importance deserves our attention for a moment. The examination of judicial cases of which we have been direct or indirect witnesses does not provide a scientific certainty about the laws -- or "the customs," to use the term so frequently applied (1). For not all [16] that is done

---

(1) It is unfortunate that this term has become so fashionable, for it lacks precision. Indeed, it may mean simply "practice, usage," or it may be used in the legal sense of "a practice having the force of a law." Often a confusion between the two meanings is created, and all customs are considered to be legally obligatory, when actually, some practices are outside common law, and others are in opposition to it. For the sake of precision in ethnographic and ethnological works, it would be well to use this ambiguous term as little as possible and to distinguish clearly among legal procedures, the laws and custom or usage.

121 all fulfilled in one person. But such individuals do exist, if in the 69 person of the investigator they find sympathy, broad ideas, a lack of all European racism, understanding, a knowledge of their language, and a benevolent devotion to their interests, individually and as a group.

Even if one has the good fortune to find a native who, after 121 much experience, reaches the point where he will say spontaneously:
124 "This is done often, but it is against the law; the law says thus and so; this decision of the tribunal was partial for such or such reason," -- an infinitely valuable situation, but one which arises very rarely -- one is not thereby absolved of the need to check his statements. But the further one goes, the more it is possible to be aware of the reality and to appraise the informant's value in this sphere and the usefulness of his statements.

These considerations are particularly valuable in making the 121 distinction between obligations and social decorum or good manners,
183 between legal obligations and obligations of kinship and mutual
671 assistance. In current practice the Nkundó make no clear lines of demarcation between these categories, since they have never codified their law or attempted to set up a clear and precise classification. They feel no more need for this than, for instance, they or even we "civilized" people bother about setting up a grammar for our native tongue, which we speak correctly and without the slightest difficulty, purely out of habit.

An investigation in the legal domain is made [18] very diffi-[illegible] cult by the patriarchal and feudal character of these peoples, added to the lack of writing. Not only is there an adaptation to circumstances -- the felicitous flexibility of native laws -- in which jurisprudence plays a great role, but the Nkundó, while knowing well what is lawful and what is not, generally does not clearly understand the nature of an obligation, and above all he does not know its source.

One's chances of obtaining good results in the inquiry are 121 greatly increased by the use of hypothetical cases, presented to the 124 individuals one knows best and whom one knows to be in no way involved. It is always worthwhile to use this method as a means of completing and perhaps correcting conclusions based on the examination

121 of actual legal cases. It is almost impossible to gain access to the 124 latter unless one is armed with an official order. A thorough knowledge of the language of the tribe in question is required, however, for the use of imaginary cases.

In describing various laws and practices, we have tried to reproduce the explanations given by the Nkundô and to add our own views when it has seemed appropriate to do so. The careful reader will have no trouble distinguishing between these two very different sources.

I am very well aware that many ethnologists do not like 121 chercheurs de brousse [bush explorers] to become involved in these questions, and that they prefer to receive from the latter only raw data on which they can build their theories. All ethnographers of the bush and forest will readily recognize their inadequacy in matters of theory. But this very real disadvantage due to a lack of training is offset by a definite advantage. They know the natives much more intimately, not only with respect to the immediate subject of their study, but also as regards other aspects of their lives, particularly their psychological make-up and general mentality, with which they may have had direct and daily contact for many years. [12] They are therefore more likely to come to conclusions which are in accordance with reality. The "armchair" ethnologists sometimes seem to assume that the men in the bush are capable of being no more than collectors of data. Yet the majority of them have had an intermediate education, especially in the humanities, and many of them have attended institutions of higher learning (universities and others). There are professional jurists among them, for example. Therefore, these observers are capable of reliable judgments, and many of them, through their studies in philosophy, are equipped with the rules of logic and highly developed critical powers.

It is true that it is not up to us to build theories; the range of our investigations is always limited. A knowledge of theories is very interesting and useful, but it is by no means necessary. In fact such knowledge may sometimes be dangerous, since it is easy for it to unduly influence our judgment in a way that is against the best interests of science. Thus we do not care whether our facts are in 124 I should like to express one more wish relevant to this subject. A number of studies by civil servants and government agents, containing a good deal of ethnographic data on various subjects, lie in bales in the bureaus of the Congo, waiting for the day when they will serve as fodder for ever-hungry termites. Would it not be possible to make these documents -- at least the better ones -- available to the public? Even if they contain gaps and errors, they will be gratefully received. They will lead other researchers to explore these questions thoroughly, and through emulation, criticism, and discussion, we will develop an increasing and more accurate knowledge of the natives, [21] their history, their way of life, their laws, their customs, and their mentality, which will be of great benefit for all colonial work.

Some of the terms used in one or another part of this study may appear too coarse. I would rather have avoided them, but I would have had to use veiled expressions and circumlocutions which would have adversely affected the clarity of this work and therefore its value, for it is intended for a purely scientific purpose. I trust the indulgent reader will therefore excuse their presence.

121 Here and there case histories are given in full. I believe that the details are not without interest, since they give a living picture of the mentality of our people. Most of the incidents were [vi] collected in the vicinity of Flandria, the area with which I am most familiar. Here and there I have taken the liberty of passing judgment and of recommending solutions to certain problems. I should like to say that in these cases I am expressing opinions which are purely personal.

000 The map appended to this work makes it possible for the reader to find a tribe or village which is under discussion and shows its geographic position amidst the groups that comprise the Mongo-Nkundo people.

I wish to express my sincere gratitude to all those who have in some way contributed to this work: His Excellency Monsignor Ed. Van Goethem, our venerable vicar apostolic, who gave me permission to carry it out and always encouraged me in my research, understanding fully its practical value for a sensible adaptation which will enable us to establish the Church on a firm foundation; my colleagues, Father Trigalet and Father Wauters, as well as Brother Braam, who took upon 177/176 C. An attempt to explain the modern changes. The facts themselves as much as a knowledge of human nature, together with the lenient attitude of parents and the lack of sanctions (the last two points are relevant only to relations between adults), are in direct contradiction to the statements of the natives. Should these not therefore be explained as exaggerations, stemming from a desire for national glory and a resentment of the situation created by colonization? The [illegible] natives whose strange assertions I have cited are elderly and serious; they demonstrate all the qualities of truthful witnesses. But are they not -- perhaps unconsciously -- laudatores temporis acti? I thought so for a long time and never allowed their statements to carry any weight. I have discussed this question over and over again, not with one or two natives, but with dozens of the most serious and sincere people, under various circumstances and in regions far removed from one another. Yet all supported the same argument, and I could never make my point of view prevail. I always received the same reply: "You Whites are not willing to believe us when we tell you what we know better than you, what is the pure truth. You are so involved in your own point of view!" Finally, before so much formal testimony -- uniform, unchanging, repeated ad nauseam in such varied circumstances as to individuals, times, and places -- my attachment to my own idea began, with some regret, to falter.

But how is it possible to resolve the contradiction between a rather broad liberty and the practice of chastity? And above all how can less than fifty years have sufficed to transform any attachment to virginity into licentiousness? The difficulty presents itself for relations between adults, but it is especially great with respect to reprehensible contacts between nonadults, because of the terrible sanction that we have described above.

The first objection may be partially met if we take into account the habit of "the fear of men," which is acquired and maintained through the severe prohibition against sexual relations before physical maturity and the terrible punishment with which the transgressor is threatened. ([illegible])

The second objection on the other hand is much more serious. It is the one which above all has always kept me from accepting the

[2] to present anything we have not thoroughly investigated. We have not stepped outside the geographic limits set forth except for a few incidental remarks. Although the cultural uniformity of the Nkundó-Móngo is remarkable it is not, of course, absolute. And if we have used the title Mariage des Nkundó (Marriage among the Nkundo), we have done so because it was difficult to find one which would be more appropriate for the geographic and ethnic limits of [14] this study. It is very likely that in most cases our data are valid beyond the limits we have laid out, but to generalize upon it before making a thorough study of each group would be contrary to all scientific method. The reader is therefore earnestly requested to take these remarks into account and to abstain from giving our conclusions too broad a scope.

Familial institutions in themselves and in their totality are outside the scope of this book. But since they are based on marriage, they have an important place within our framework. We must necessarily touch upon them, but we will limit our excursions into that realm to what is required to make the general description intelligible. On the other hand, the study of marriage throws a good deal of light on familial institutions.

● [illegible] 596 [illegible] The words "family," "clan," "group," etc., occur frequently. The family is an entity smaller than the clan, and the latter is subordinate to the group. Since it is very difficult to give a precise definition, however, we have taken the trouble to make a clear distinction only when necessary. (1) [Editor's Note: Elsewhere we use them more as generic terms or even as synonyms. In order to make family relationships and the expressions used by the Nkundó to designate them more comprehensible, we are attaching an example of a genealogical table.]

113 I know of the following previous studies on the same subject:

Engels, "Les Wangata," Revue Congolaise, 1910, which also deals with marriage.

G. Kaptein, "Familieleven en -zeden bij de Inboorlingen van den Evenaar," Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 521. [15] This study covers

---

1. See Chapter V, Article III.

614
621 In general one may assume that local groups will postulate only that kind of kinship relationship which does not necessitate a substantial functional reintegration. For this reason, units above the exogamy limit will easily tend to construct a genealogy which "proves" a kinship relationship. Groups of that type are functionally weak. One can observe processes of this kind both among the group of the Bokonda and among the neighboring E-group, Looyenyanga. The institution of the nkumu (see above, p. 14) also appears to have a levelling influence. The privileges of the oldest (and first) group diminish in importance and fall behind the office of nkumu. The new office is also open to younger and dependent groups.

Sociological Terminology for Kinship Groups

● 128 Before dealing with the units which are to be regarded as settlement groups, we shall compare the kinship groups of the Ekonda with the sociological ideal types. Keeping in mind the authors mentioned at the beginning, I shall now discuss the various terms used for groups which are applicable to conditions found among the Ekonda. [196]

Family

121
596 The small family is of no importance in the organizational system of the Ekonda. Nevertheless it is very important as the smallest unit of economic life. Each small family is potentially polygynous, but monogynous marriages are more numerous at the present time, especially among the younger generation. In view of this difference between potential and practiced polygyny, it seems advisable to follow Thurnwald in classing the polygynous forms together with the small family and to differentiate its nuclear families (18). In my opinion this approach

18. Vol. 4, p. 11 f.

seems to correspond more closely to its functional importance than Murdock's view, according to which the polygynous family

THE NKUMU OF THE TUMBA

RITUAL CHIEFTAINSHIP ON THE MIDDLE CONGO

H. D. BROWN

[illegible] [illegible] THE tribes living round Lake Tumba, a lake some thirty-five miles long by twelve wide lying north of Lake Leopold II (approximately 0° 50′ south latitude, and 18° east longitude) and draining into the Congo River at the confluence of the Ubangi, lack cohesion and show a considerable variety of custom and language. But they are known collectively as Tumba, the Government adaptation of the Native term Ntomba. Most of them are found to the east of the lake, the whole group numbering perhaps little more than forty to fifty thousand at the present time, though [illegible] there is evidence that the last twenty years have seen a great decrease in population. European occupation of this area goes back barely fifty years, Protestant missions having been established for about the same length of time. The first mission post [illegible] was established at Ikoko on the north-east shore of the lake, one of the villages of a group known as Bonginda. In pursuing this investigation particular attention has been given to the practices of this group, but mention is occasionally made where considerable differences have been found elsewhere.

[illegible] 13 The Tumba are agricultural, hunting, and fishing people. Their country is flat and swampy with dense forests, and there are many watercourses flowing into Lake Tumba. There are occasional small, less swampy plains, and one such area, more open, with quite wide stretches of prairie, is a haunt of buffalo. The forests are fairly well supplied with game, and the swamps, streams, and lakes with fish. A heavy rainfall and no distinct dry season make agriculture reasonably easy and famine unknown. Every family has its plantation of manioc, the staple diet, which is supplemented by plantains and bananas. The people make their own tools, formerly smelting their own iron for this purpose, are fairly skilful at making dug-out canoes, engage in weaving raffia and making mats out of split cane, and are efficient at pottery production.

[illegible] 101 [illegible] The role of the nkumu in the socio-religious activities of the community is one of the most interesting features of Tumba life. As a result of European contact the ceremonies connected with the nkumu are rapidly disappearing, but it has been possible to collect considerable information from the older men and women among whom the details are still vividly remembered.[1] The following report refers to the period previous to European occupation and control, a time within the memory of a large number of people, but already sufficiently remote to become a matter of history before the lapse of many more years.

[illegible] [illegible] An understanding of the place of the nkumu among the Tumba requires a glance at the tribal organization. According to the people themselves, they migrated westward, and coming into these parts chose land for themselves. Among the several

---

[1] In My Children of the Forest, New York, 1924, pp. [illegible], Andrew F. Hanney has briefly outlined some of the forms of nkumu observed among the tribes of the district adjacent to that of the present study. These more detailed notes are, however, timely if a record is to be preserved that approximates to accuracy.

Teke FI 33
Sakata FO33

M 137 361

The few groups of natives who inhabit this region have built their villages along the river on raised ground, safe from the periodic floods.

In the forest region the villages seem to be scattered purely at random.

The huts are built in the center of a large clearing, surrounded by manioc plots and banana groves which are encircled in the distance by uncleared forest.

Such is the region that we crossed from Stanley Pool to Kasai-Kwango, from the Fimi to Lake Leopold II, and over the entire basin of the Lukenie.

5 M 101 13

The first peoples we encountered there belong to the Bateke [Teke] group. Their territory lies around Stanley Pool and extends to the north as far as the Lefimi. Beyond that live the Banfumungu [Fumu], also called Banfugunu, Banfumuka, Beumbu, or simply Banfumu.

North of the Kasai and along the banks of the Congo live the Bayanzi [Yanzi] or Babangi. Their neighbors to the east, the Baboma [Boma] or Babuma, occupy the whole of the confluence of the Fimi and the Kasai, up to the left bank of the lower Kwango.

The Wadia [Dia] live to the north of the Baboma between Nioki and Kutu and extend along the Boriempa and the western shore of Lake Leopold II up to the territory of the Mosengere [Sengele].

The region occupied by the Basakata [Sakata] stretches along the left bank of the Lukenie-Fimi between Bokoro and Moleka.

The Mosengere or Monsengere are settled along the Olonga-Uele in the region of Bongo. Northwest of this group we encountered the Bakutu [Kutu], whose territory extends beyond the boundaries of the Lake Leopold II district. [8]

Fig. 3

Bateke Woman and Child.

T [154 291]

The Bolia occupy the country northeast of Bongo as far as the Bolia-Kiri region.

The Tumba [Ntomba] are settled all along the eastern shore

Bokala FO43
Yaelima

5
M
101 131 of Lake Leopold II.

The Bokala [Baye] are the northern neighbors of the Basakata in the Inoko-Tolo region.

The Balesa [Lesa] -- Basese -- occupy the left bank of the Lukenie between Bokoro and Pokombo.

The Ipanga and the Batitu or Ashitu, inhabit the Oshwe sector both north and south of the Lukenie. The region occupied by the Bokala lies farther east, between the Lodimo and Bumbuli.

The Yaelima are found from east of Bumbuli to the Dekese sector and up to Dengese country.

A few Bashilele [Lele] groups are settled at the confluence of the Kasai and Sankuru. Their territory extends far to the south between the Kasai and the Loange.

The Bankutshu [Wankutshu], also called Basongo-Meno [Songomeno], live on the left bank of the Sankuru up to the sector of Bena-Dibele and Kole. [Ed. the text from here to mid-page 14 is not translated.]

M
[142]
591
5
764 152

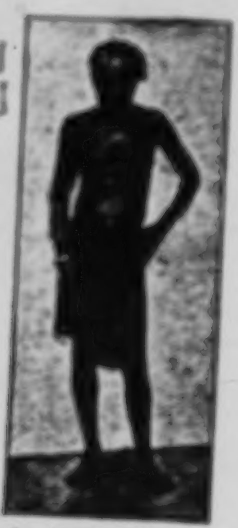

Fig. 4. Bankutshu.

[14] During our stay in the village of Chief Pokei, Baboma tribe, one of the dignitaries died. This death gave rise to an important mourning ceremony, as required by custom. The whole gunpowder supply of the deceased had been used to announce his death to the neighboring villages. Sorrow was expressed in the noisiest and most unexpected ways. The sobs of the women, the cries of despair of the relatives, and the plaintive chanting of the official female mourners mingled with the roll of the drums and the guttural and incoherent cries of the men, who kept drinking in order to express their sorrow more convincingly. All this display is an act. The screams and cries of grief are duties and are all feigned. [15] The Banfumungu cry over the death of a neighbor in the same way as they go hunting: the women mourn and cry just as they prepare food. All this is done as another job, because it is customary, because it is obligatory.

Introduction

|O| This study deals with the marriage laws and customs of a large group of the Nkundó [Nkundu] people. Therefore, it would be useful at the beginning to give some general information about this people, who are very interesting from the ethnological standpoint. Then we can define the specific purpose of our investigation.

|O| The Nkundó or Mongo occupy almost the entire length of the central basin of the Belgian Congo, from the Lulonga-Lopori [rivers] in the north all the way to Lake Leopold II, and beyond the Lukenie [River] as far as the Kasai [River]. In the west they touch the Congo River only south of the "Ruki" (1); the western part of the old Lulonga District is occupied by the Ngombe, whose territory extends as far as the Maringa [River] (known to the natives as Lŏwo) upstream from Basankusu (Basǎnkoso according to the natives). (2) In the east they may be found as far as, and even beyond, the Lomami. In the southeast they have penetrated into the northwestern part of Sankuru District. At the present time it is still impossible to delineate precisely their eastern and southeastern boundaries; the Bambole, the Bahamba, the Mĩtuku, the Bangelengele, [4] the Balengola, the Basongola, and even the Batetela and the "Bakusu," are either Mongo or very closely related. (1)

---

1. Ruki is probably a corruption of Bolóki, a tribe of fishermen living downstream on the banks of this river, which the natives prefer to call Loilaka.

2. According to Bittremieux and Lestaeghe, a few Nkundó remain on Nsumba Island near Nouvelle-Anvers (Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 194).

|O| 1. See Donckerwolcke, in Kongo-Overzee, Vol. 1, p. 235, and my article in Congo, Vol. 1, p. 13. The fact that Donckerwolcke

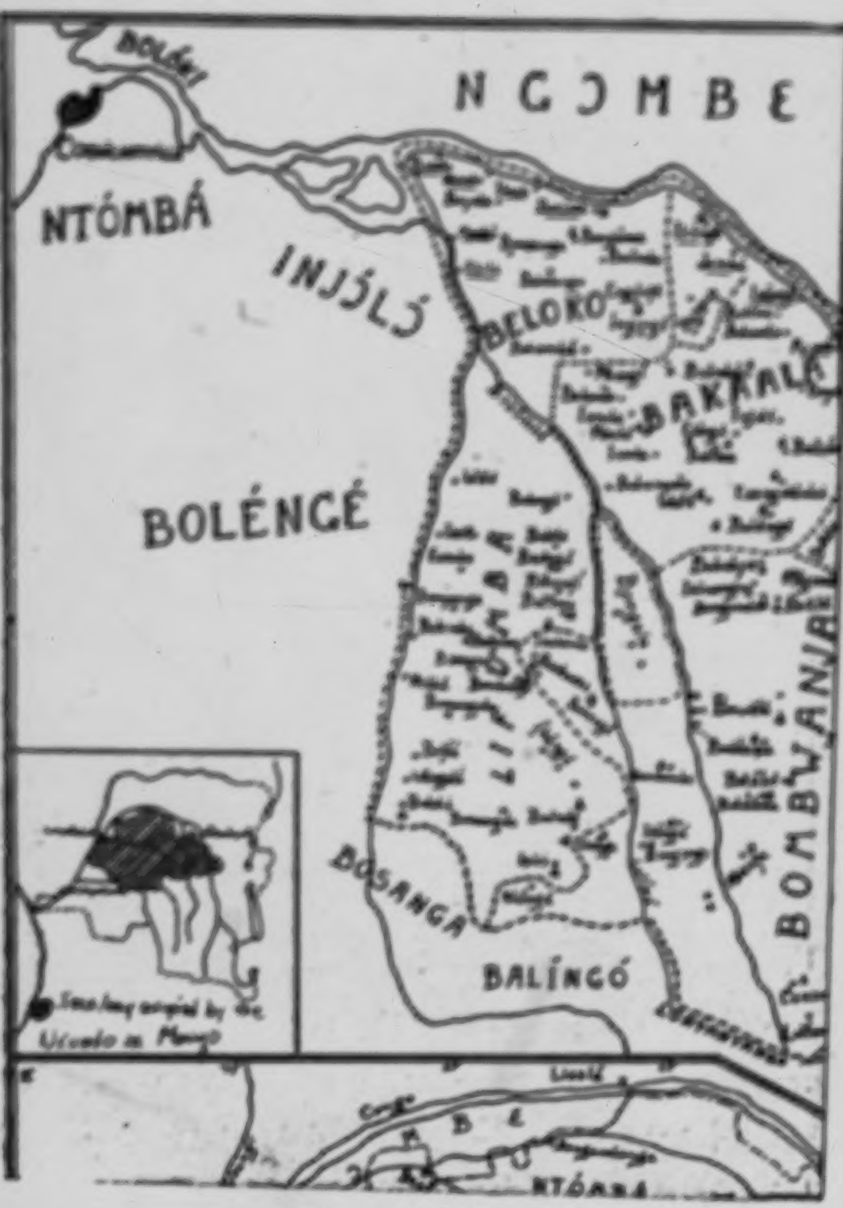
2: Hulstaert
101, 131, 563, 619

Mongo FO32

/The division of sections in the end map is as follows:/

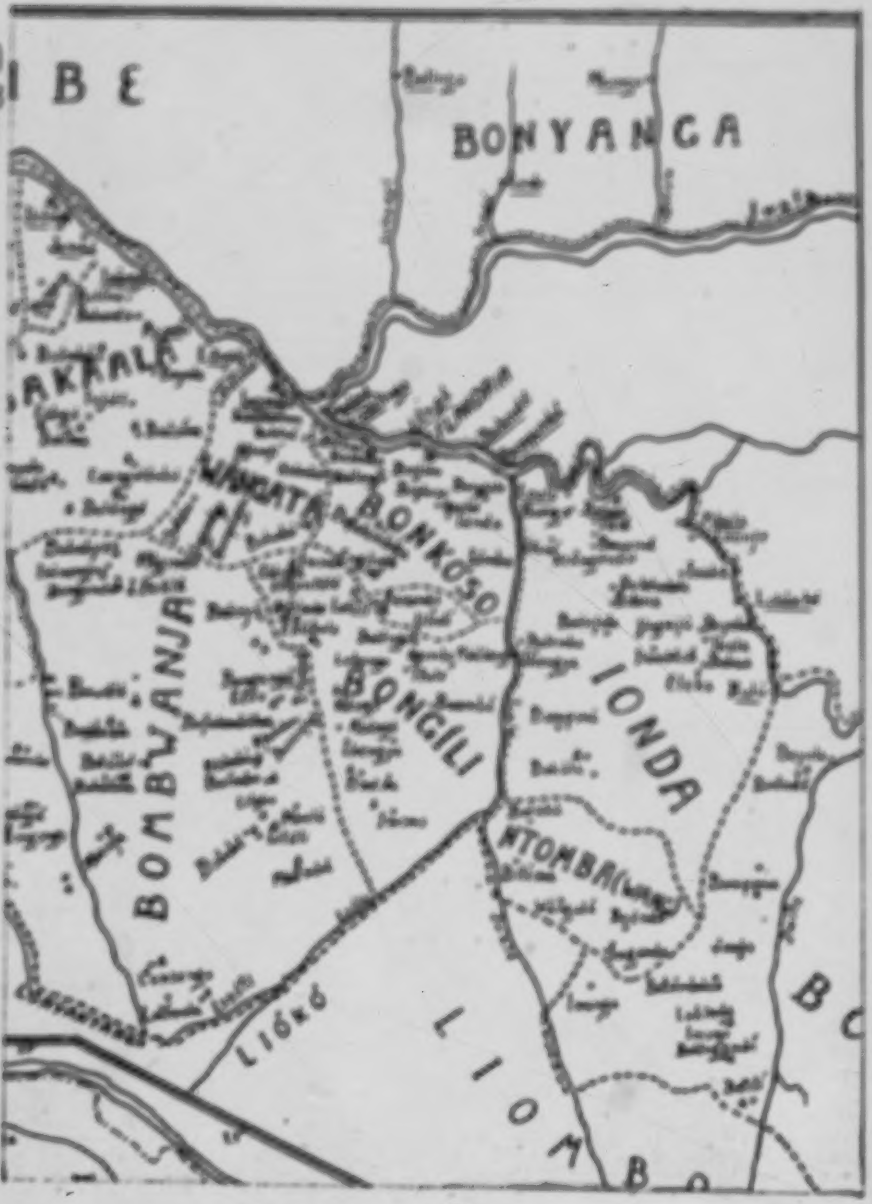
A	B	C	D
E	F	G	H

101
131
983
619



BOLÓKI
NGƆMBE
NTÓMBÁ
INJƆ́LƆ́
BELOKO
BAKALI
BOLÉNGÉ
BOMBWANJA
BOSANGA
BALÍNGÓ
Territory occupied by the Nkundo or Mongo
NTÓMBA

[End Map (A)]



IBE
BONYANGA
AKALE
WANGATA
BONKOSO
BOMBWANJA
BONGILI
IONDA
NTOMBA (Lac)
LIOKO
LIOMBO
BO
B
BO

[End Map (B)]

101
● 171
56.8
617

A BOKÁLA
BOANGI
BESƆMBƆ
BOMBOMB
B O

[End Map (c)]

101
13 563
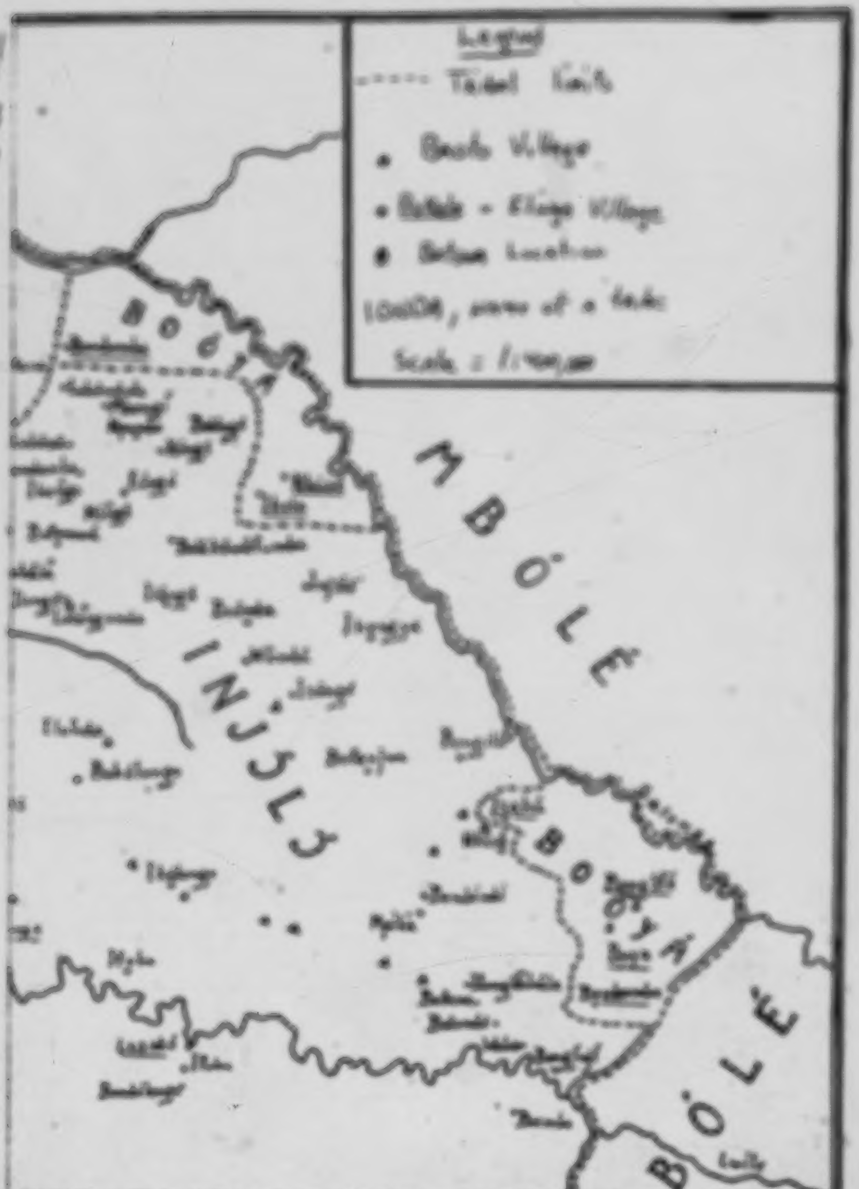
69



Legend
Tribal limits
Village Scale
BOÔJA
MBÖLE
INJÔLÔ
BOÔJA
BÖLE

[End Map (D)]

81
131 363
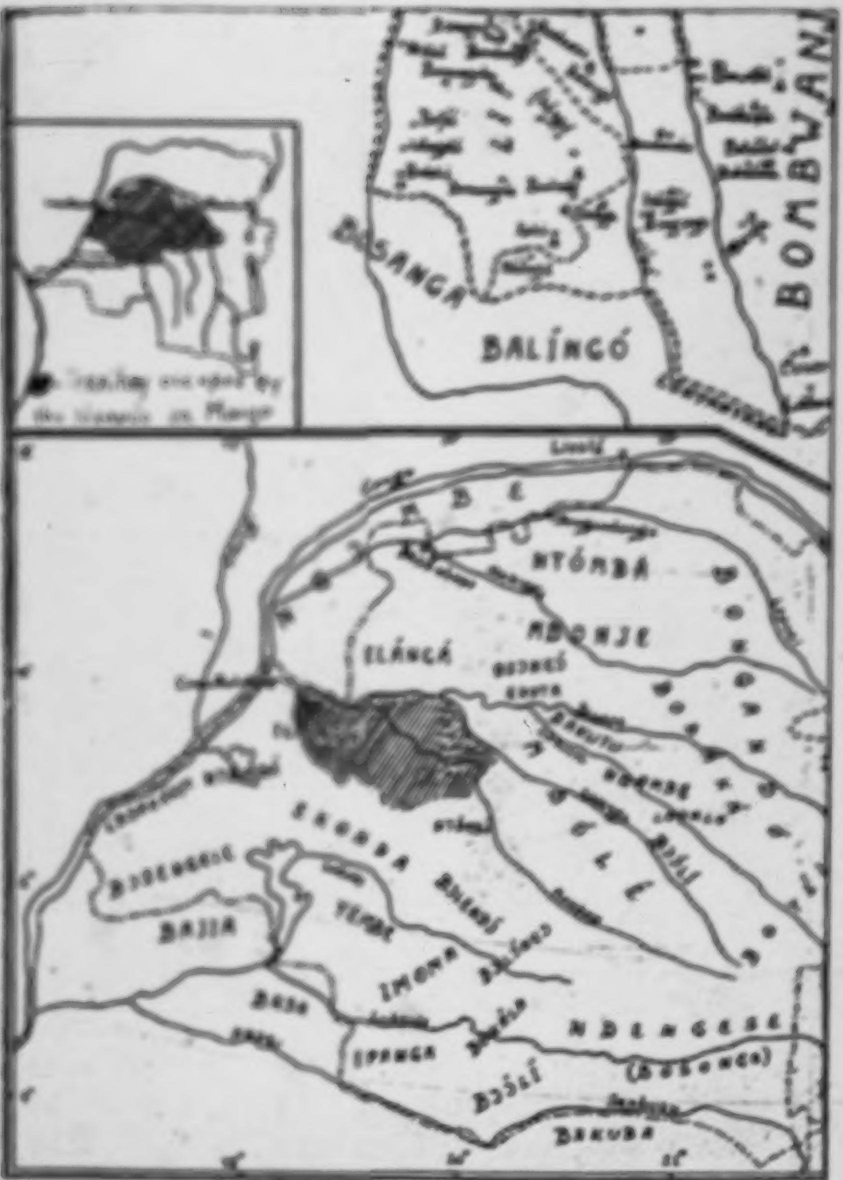
619



BOMBWANJ
BOSANGA
BALÍNGÓ
NTÓMBÁ
NDONJE
ELÁNGÁ
EKONDA
BOŁENGE
BAJIA
IMOMA
NDENGESE
(BOSONGA) BƆƆLÍ
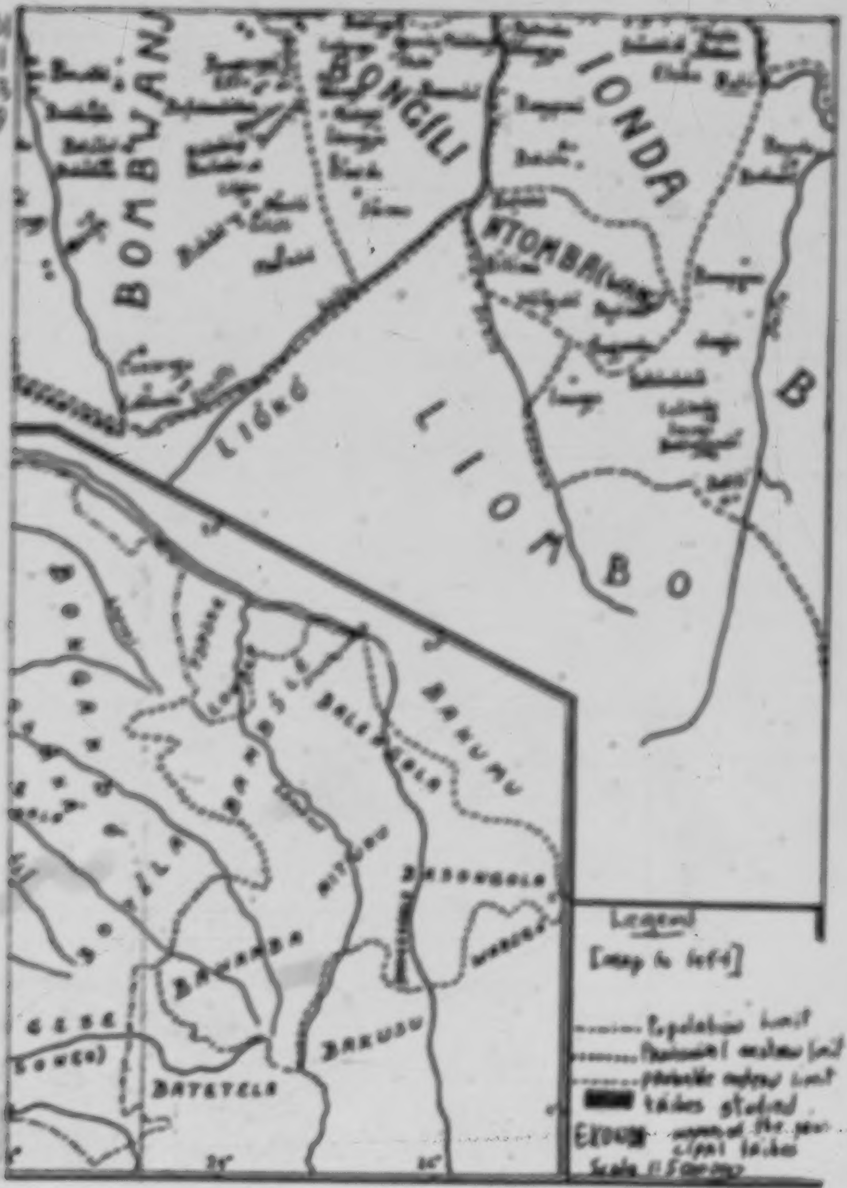
BEKUBA
EPANGA
BASO
TEMBE
the localities occupied by the Nkundo, or Mongo

[End Map (E)]



BOMBWANJ
NGILI
IONDA
NTOMBA
B
BO
BATETELA
BAKUSU
Legend
[map to left] tribes studied

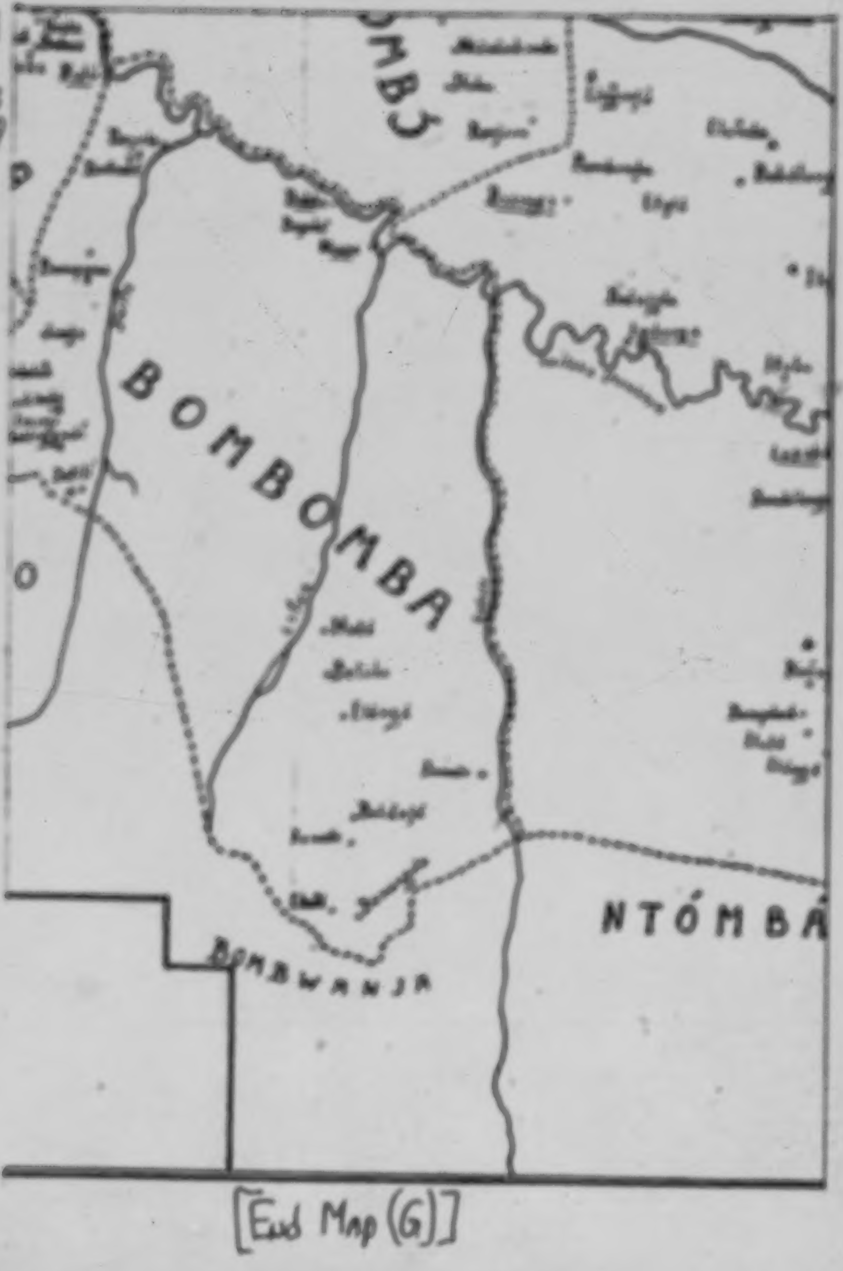
[End Map (F)]



OMBƆ
BOMBOMBA
NTÓMBA
BOMBWANJA

[End Map (G)]

INJOLO
LE
BO
MBÖLÉ
WÄNGATÄ
ÓMBÄ

[End Map(H)]

THE NKUMU OF THE TUMBA

RITUAL CHIEFTAINSHIP ON THE MIDDLE CONGO

H. D. BROWN

[1] THE tribes living around Lake Tumba, a lake some thirty-five miles long by twelve wide lying north of Lake Leopold II (approximately 0° 50' south latitude, [illegible] and 18° east longitude) and draining into the Congo River at the confluence of the Ubangi, lack cohesion and show a considerable variety of custom and language. But they are known collectively as Tumba, the Government adaptation of the Native term Ntomba. Most of them are found to the east of the lake, the whole group numbering perhaps little more than forty to fifty thousand at the present time, though [illegible] there is evidence that the last twenty years have seen a great decrease in population. European occupation of this area goes back nearly fifty years, Protestant missions having been established for about the same length of time. The first mission post [illegible] was established at Ikoko on the north-east shore of the lake, one of the villages of a group known as Bonginda. In pursuing this investigation particular attention has been given to the practices of this group, but mention is occasionally made where considerable differences have been found elsewhere.

[illegible] 13 The Tumba are agricultural, hunting, and fishing people. Their country is flat and swampy with dense forests, and there are many watercourses flowing into Lake Tumba. There are occasional small, low swampy plains, and one such area, more open, with quite wide stretches of prairie, is a haunt of buffalo. The forests are fairly well supplied with game, and the swamps, streams, and lakes with fish. A heavy rainfall and no distinct dry season make agriculture reasonably easy and famine unknown. Every family has its plantation of manioc, the staple diet, which is supplemented by plantains and bananas. The people make their own tools, formerly smelting their own iron for this purpose, are fairly skilled at making dug-out canoes, engage in weaving raffia and making mats out of split cane, and are efficient at pottery production.

[illegible] 101 [illegible] The role of the nkumu in the socio-religious activities of the community is one of the most interesting features of Tumba life. As a result of European contact the ceremonies connected with the nkumu are rapidly disappearing, but it has been possible to collect considerable information from the older men and women among whom the details are still vividly remembered.[1] The following report refers to the period previous to European occupation and control, a time within the memory of a large number of people, but already sufficiently remote to become a matter of history before the lapse of many more years.

[illegible] [illegible] An understanding of the place of the nkumu among the Tumba requires a glance at the tribal organization. According to the people themselves, they migrated westward, and coming into these parts cleared land for themselves. Among the several

---

[1] In My Children of the Forest, New York, 1924, pp. 48-71, Andrew F. Hensey has briefly outlined some of the items of interest observed among the nkumu of the district adjacent to that of the present study. These more detailed notes are, however, timely if a record is to be preserved that approaches to accuracy.

[2]

Chapter 1

The Land and Its Inhabitants

The appearance of the land. -- Location of the tribes. -- General characteristics of the natives. -- Maternal feelings. -- The fetishes. -- Religious beliefs. -- Cult of the dead. -- The Mfumu. -- Medicine.

● [3] The area between the Congo, the Kasai, and the Kwango is covered with tall grass interspersed with stunted trees and a few small forests whose verdant canopy rises majestically over a boundless plain. A curtain of trees stretches along the rivers and gradually thins out as one penetrates into the interior. The path [97] beaten by the regular passage of endless columns of natives, walking Indian file, winds sadly and monotonously across these lightly rolling plains. During the rainy season the grass, whose stems grow as high as two or two and a half meters, obstructs the view. During the dry season, destroyed by brush fires, it has given way to a blackish-yellow plain from which all life seems to have been [56] banished. From time to [6] time, at distances of 30 and sometimes 40 kilometers apart, we find groupings of huts, surrounded by a few manioc fields, [Fig. 1 appears here] banana groves, and sometimes small plots of maize and peanuts. Upon our arrival, [68] the men look at us without concern, the mistrustful women hide [Fig. 2 appears here] in their huts or take refuge in the forest and fields, and the less timid children stare at us with the insouciance characteristic of their age. [7]

Beyond the Kasai, in the region of the Fimi, around Lake Leopold II, and along the Lukenie, the bush gives way to the forest, damp, swampy, dark, and mysterious.

[3] 36 At the confluence of the Fimi and the Kasai, a vast swampy area stretches as far as the eye can see, bare of all arborescent vegetation, crossed by innumerable channels which are narrow and shallow during the dry season and wide to the point of covering practically the whole region during the rainy season.

[text continues on p. 3]

Teke FO 33
Sakata FO45

M
137
764

The few groups of natives who inhabit this region have built their villages along the river on raised ground, safe from the periodic floods.

In the forest region the villages seem to be scattered purely at random.

The huts are built in the center of a large clearing, surrounded by manioc plots and banana groves which are encircled in the distance by uncleared forest.

Such is the region that we crossed from Stanley Pool to Kasai-Kwango, from the Fimi to Lake Leopold II, and over the entire basin of the Lukenie.

S
A 101
131

The first peoples we encountered there belong to the Bateke [Teke] group. Their territory lies around Stanley Pool and extends to the north as far as the Lefini. Beyond that live the Basfumungu [Fumu], also called Basfuguma, Basfumuko, Baumbu, or simply Bamfumu.

North of the Kasai and along the banks of the Congo live the Bayanzi [Yansi] or Bahangi. Their neighbors to the east, the Baboma [Boma] or Baburna, occupy the whole of the confluence of the Fimi and the Kasai, up to the left bank of the lower Kwango.

Fig. 3
Bateke Woman and Child.

T
[109
191]

The Wadia [Dia] live to the north of the Baboma between Nioki and Kutu and extend along the Bolempa and the western shore of Lake Leopold II up to the territory of the Mosengere [Sengele].

The region occupied by the Basakata [Sakata] stretches along the left bank of the Lukenie-Fimi between Bokoro and Molake.

The Mosengere or Monsengere are settled along the Olonga-Uele in the region of Bongo. Northwest of this group we encountered the Bakutu [Kutu], whose territory extends beyond the boundaries of the Lake Leopold II district. [8]

The Bolia occupy the country northeast of Bongo as far as the Bolia-Kiri region.

The Tumba [Ntomba] are settled all along the eastern shore

Sakata FO43
Yaelima

S
M
101 131 of Lake Leopold II.

The Bobaie [Baye] are the northern neighbors of the Basakata in the Isoko-Tolo region.

The Balesa [Lesa] -- Batete -- occupy the left bank of the Lukenie between Bokoro and Pobombo.

The Ipanga and the Batitu or Atshitu, inhabit the Oshwe sector both north and south of the Lukenie. The region occupied by the Bokala lies farther east, between the Lodima and Bumbuli.

The Yaelima are found from east of Bumbuli to the Dekese sector and up to Dengese country.

A few Bashilele [Lele] groups are settled at the confluence of the Kasai and Sankuru. Their territory extends far to the south between the Kasai and the Loanga.

The Bankutshu [Wankutshu], also called Basongo-Meno [Songomeno], live on the left bank of the Sankuru up to the sector of Bena-Dibele and Kole. [Ed. the text from here to mid-page 14 is not translated.]

M
●[142]
[291]
S
764 152

Fig. 4. Bankutshu.

[14] During our stay in the village of Chief Pokei, Baboma tribe, one of the dignitaries died. This death gave rise to an important mourning ceremony, as required by custom. The whole gunpowder supply of the deceased had been used to announce his death to the neighboring villages. Sorrow was expressed in the noisiest and most unexpected ways. The sobs of the women, the cries of despair of the relatives, and the plaintive chanting of the official female mourners mingled with the roll of the drums and the guttural and incoherent cries of the men, who kept drinking in order to express their sorrow more convincingly. All this display is an act. The screams and cries of grief are duties and are all feigned. [15] The Banfumungu cry over the death of a neighbor in the same way as they go hunting; the women mourn and cry just as they prepare food. All this is done as another job, because it is customary, because it is obligatory.

Yaelima

764 At the village of Tik-ke-Tik in Yaelima territory, we witnessed a similar scene following the death of a young man.

At nightfall his body was wrapped in mats or rattan splints, solidly plaited, tied up, and completely sealed. At dawn the 482 mortuary bundle, attached to a strong branch, was lifted by two men. Instead of taking the village lane, they carried the corpse behind the hut and then through the bush. A few men walking Indian file made up the procession, at the end of which was the mother of the deceased in mourning costume. The path they followed was quite irregular. Largely avoiding the trodden paths, the bearers often retraced their steps and took almost two hours to reach the cemetery, four kilometers from the village.

742
291
301
516

Fig. 12. Mother and Child, Bankutshu Tribe.

764
761 On the way back, the natives explained to me that the numerous turns and the walk through untrodden bush were meant to lead astray the evil spirit who had entered the village and killed the

302 fashioning most of the statuettes, figurines and bowls that we 532 possess from this region, which are so remarkably decorated. Moreover, we find these same forms among the Babuba and Bashilele, up to the region of the Bankutshu of Bena Dibele-Kole. These various tribes have also reproduced in their sculpture the designs of the shaved parts of the head, which are so uniform and so characteristic. In this respect these various tribes are related, and their ethnic affinity seems very clear. Despite their present remoteness from each other and the absence of all tribal intercourse, their ethnic kinship is clearly shown in the mementos they have preserved of the ancestral culture.

•[142
304]

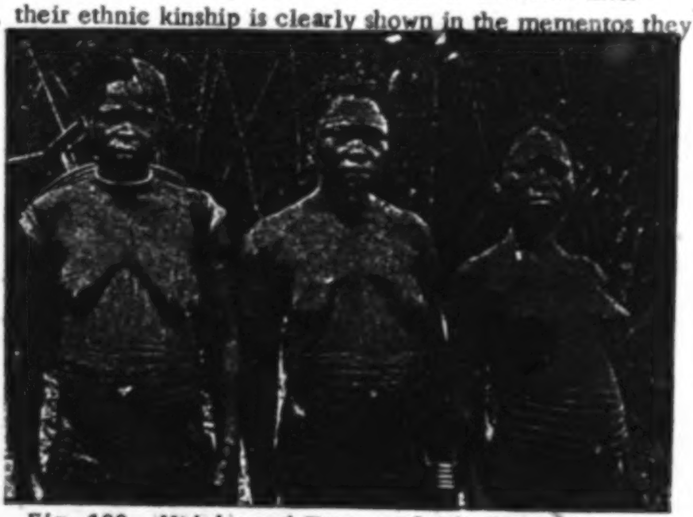

Fig. 100. Hairdos and Tattoos of Lake Leopold II.

302 These various observations permit us to divide the peoples
161 into three very distinct groups.

1) The Bateke-Banfumu group, with its chignon hairdo over the nape of the neck and the rest of the head shaved or with the hair cut short.

2) The group including the Ipanga and the eastern peoples, with their hairdo of two braids passing behind the ears and under the chin and the upright roll on top of the head. [179]

3) The group including the tribes of Lake Leopold II and the lower Lukenie up to the Ipanga region, where having the hair arranged in tiny braids predominates.

The love of finery is more or less developed among all the 301 peoples of the Kasai-Lake Leopold II-Lukenie region. Ornaments

The first one includes the Bateke-Banfumu-Baboma, among whom ornaments are relatively rare for the women as well as for the men. 301 171

The second one encompasses all the peoples in the region of Lake Leopold II and the lower Lukenie and is characterized by the solid brass necklace worn by the women and the ornaments trimmed with cowries and the brass plaques worn by the dignitaries and chiefs.

The third one includes the Ipanga and the Batitu, with the belt ornamented with brass beads, rings on the fingers and toes, and solid brass rings worn above the ankles, all of which are peculiar to the women.

Fig. 107. A Group of Batitu Children.

142 516 855

The fourth group is characterized by the sheath of brass rings covering the arm from wrist to elbow and worn as much by the men as by the women of the Bokala-Yaelima.

The fifth group includes the Bena Dibele-Kole region, where imported ornaments have replaced the primitive ones. [186]

In addition to all these adornments used regularly in common, everyday life, the native also has ornaments reserved for show and ceremony. 301

304
832
[TT
291] personal vanity, and to excite the male. At the present time only the latter reason accounts for the practice in the region where our influence has been effective. The introduction of European fabrics, the expansion of the economy and the progress of civilization have led the women to clothe themselves and to hide and screen a large part of the body from indiscreet glances. [189] The small primitive loincloth has given way to a toga of variable length, which hides from the public eye that part [Fig. 112 appears here] of the body which is covered with tattoos. In such cases, the woman can no longer display her tattoos for the sake of vanity. [Figs. 113 and 114 appear here] If, despite this, some of them continue to have themselves tattooed just like the old matrons, it is because they hope to attract a man, to please him, and to be able to participate sooner in the pleasures of intimate life. When questioned on this subject, the natives are very definite. The men maintain that the raised tattoos [190] on [291

301
304
142]

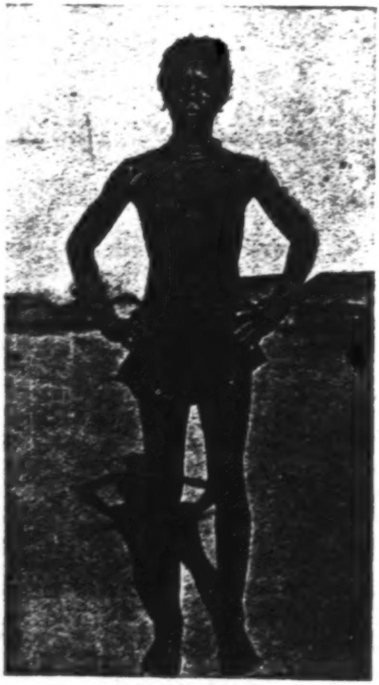

Fig. 115. Elegant Lady of the Bokala-Yaelima Region. Tattoos, Bracelets, and Necklaces.

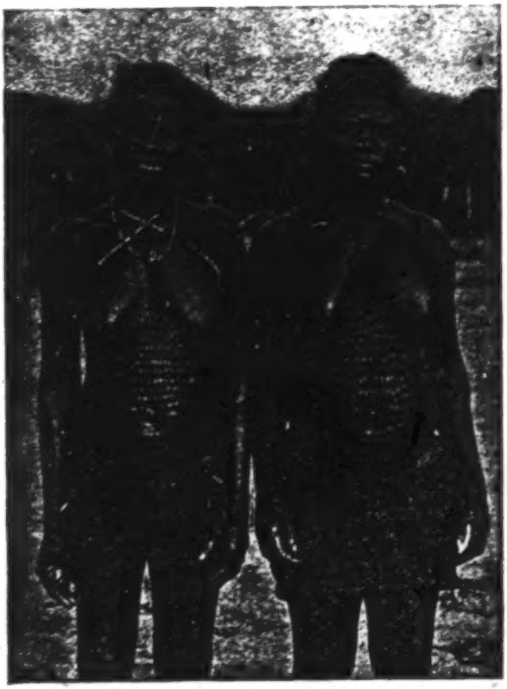
304
833

SAkAtA FO43
TeKe F133

M
5
304
171

We have seen earlier that among the Bateke, Banfumungu, and Baboma, the man's characteristic tattoo consists of lines scratched on the face, while that of the woman consists of small dots in relief, juxtaposed in parallel lines, more or less horizontal, covering the body from the pit of the stomach to the lower abdomen. This same design [192] is found among the women of all the riparian peoples of Lake Leopold II and among the tribes of the Lukenie up to the Bumbuli sector. It must be noted, however, that in this last region the relief is less clear and less pronounced.



M
304
171
[142]

Fig. 116. Tattooing among the Women of Lake Leopold II and the Lower Lukenie.

Moreover, as a general rule, the relief gradually decreases as one goes farther from the lake. In this respect, then, all these peoples seem to belong to the same ethnic group, and it is probable that this characteristic tattooing is one of the traits of the ancestral civilization, retained until the present time by all bent, running from the top of the breastbone to the navel. To the left and right of this main line, we see a double row of small oblique lines separated from each other by a space from one to three centimeters wide. The facial tatto consists of a double or triple row of oblique lines, arranged in such a way that they look like palm leaves, and a small crest formed by short, curved incisions at the root of the nose. According to a photograph sent by Mr. Timmermans, this same type of tattoo is also found among

Yaelima

304

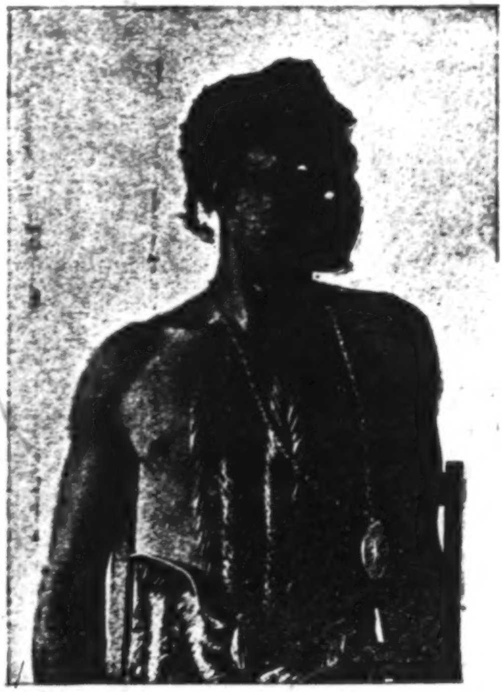

Fig. 118. Inunu, the Young and Excellently Endowed Batitu Chief of the Oshwe Region.

[622
142]

the Yaelima. We ought to note in this connection that in the course of our journey [194] through this region we did not observe this anywhere, despite numerous investigations. We therefore believe that an error was made in transmitting the information. The persons involved were probably Ipanga-Batitu who happened to be in the Yaelima region.

Yaelima

304
171

we made of the many figures we saw in this region showed us that the variations are so numerous, so diverse, and so closely intertwined that it is totally impossible to use this as a basis for determining ethnic sectors with clearly-defined characteristics.

304
171
833

Finally, if we consider only those tattoo figures to which [307

142]

Fig. 124. Yaelima Headdress and Tattooing. Typical Longomo or Dignitary.

we attributed, if not a familial origin, at least a familial nature [200] (incitement to sexual relations), we see that throughout the region this type of tattoo is peculiar to women.

From Leopoldville to the confines of Batitu territory and even among some Bokala women, this tattoo consists (where it still exists) of a number of small, aligned dots, just like the ornamental tattoos.

Among the Ipanga-Batitu, these figures sometimes embellish the arms and part of the back, while among the other tribes they are less elaborate.

304
171
833 In the region of the Yaelima, Dengese, and some of the Bokala, this tattoo consists of a series of broken, concentric lines with the pubic region as the main center.

We do not know if this tattoo is also worn by the Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu women, but this seems probable to us. We can, however, assert that among those peoples this tattoo does not extend to the upper thighs, except for one or two lines of small incised dots running parallel to the fold of the groin.

[142]
[302]

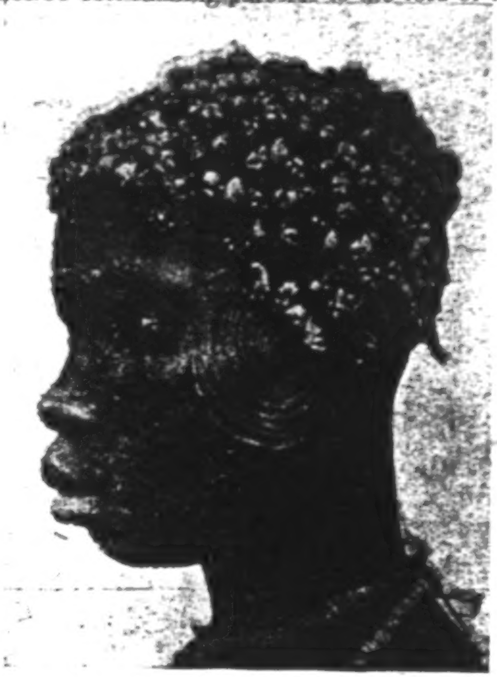

Fig. 125. Yaelima Tattoing and Headdress Adorned with Peanuts Smeared with Ngula.

The incisions for ornamental and sexual tattoos are usually made by women, although a man sometimes takes over this task.

304 The operation is carried out at very irregular intervals and at practically any [201] time of life. Moreover, it requires several sittings, usually spaced from 10 to 15 days apart.

The tattooing knife, which is also used for depilation, consists of a small, broad iron blade with a curved, very sharp cutting edge.

M 101 563 does not exclude the possibility of a distant kinship, but the present state of our knowledge makes the solution to this question impossible; for very close resemblances may be explained by a common origin as well as by a period of living in close contact, and differences may be due to diverse origins [5] or to a temporary separation at a certain point in history.

P M 101 563 144 A considerable number of Pygmoids or Pygmiforms (1) (Batswá, Jǒfe, Balúmbe, Bilángi, Boné) are to be found scattered among the Nkundó. They share a community of social and economic interests with their "masters." The Botswá belongs to his master and depends on him, but he is not, strictly speaking, his slave. His master not only has rights over him; he also has obligations to fulfill. Most of the Pygmoids are to be found in the western part of Nkundó territory; in the east they are very rare.

M 101 173 The Nkundó-Móngo came from the north or northeast, while the Mbólé claim to have come from the northwest, and the Bakutu from the west. (2)

M 101 A word should be said about the name of these people. Ordinarily, we call them the Nkundó-Móngo. The first of these names is used in the west and in the south, the second especially in the north and in the east. The Elángá of the Losanganya region are called the Mongo éâ Lolo, or the Upstream Móngo, by the peoples to the west of them. Foreigners call all these peoples, including the Nkundó, the Mbólé, the Bakutu, etc., by the name of Móngo. In literature one sometimes encounters the name of Lolo or Balolo. (3) But, as we have seen, lolo is not a proper noun but simply the word meaning "upstream"

---

1. This name was proposed by Father Schebesta, op. cit., p. 170.

2. See my study, previously cited, passim.

3. For example, the name of the Protestant mission of the Lulonga is "Congo Balolo Mission."

Article I. Girls

584 According to Nkundó custom it is acceptable for an expected child, not yet born or still very young, to be promised in marriage to X or Y. This practice was formerly very common and is still quite prevalent today. It is called banda bǒna or bǒmoto, literally, "to count a child" or "to count a woman." The ikulá is paid at the time of the promise. Later the matter is carried out in the usual fashion; the other parts of the bride price are paid either while the fiancée is young or, preferably, at the time when she goes to her husband.

584
855 Until that time, if one of the girl's relatives is already a wife of a polygamist husband-to-be or of one of his relatives, the child is brought up in her husband's family from a fairly early age, depending on the circumstances. She lives with her relative. She may be barely seven or eight years old, for example. If no one in her husband's clan can take care of her, [232] she spends only one or two weeks there to become acquainted, little by little, with people and places; she repeats the visit from time to time. Her mother accompanies her, for being so young she could not get used to being there alone, without support, without her parents. Therefore it is necessary to wait till she is old enough to be somewhat independent and able to manage by herself. That time usually comes around the [145] beginning of puberty, thus sometime between the ages of twelve and fifteen.

584
833 Like an adult woman, she is already called bompáka or wǎlí, depending on the portion of the bride price that has been paid. She has all the duties and privileges of a wife: sexual relations, food preparation, care of the household, etc. There is no set date or age for the beginning of cohabitation. This matter is settled between the husband and his parents-in-law. The latter do not have the right to [606] delay the time, even if their daughter is still too young, but they can make use of their great influence over their son-in-law. The modern
[178]
[577] generation is not shocked by sexual relations between an adulterer [sic] and a girl who has not reached puberty. Besides, all is in order from the legal standpoint; since the man has paid the bride price, he is the

304
174
These facts prove that when the elders of the present generation were young, tattooing, if it was customary, was practiced with some regularity only by the women and originally had an essentially familial character in this region.

304
152
A woman bears the pain of the incisions without showing the least sign of suffering, without a complaint or a sigh. She even submits to this custom with some joy, mixed with a bit of pride, knowing that she will be held in higher esteem by the man.

This point, in our opinion, is much more important to the women among primitive peoples than one would generally suppose. It appears to us to be the leitmotiv of the major part of the variations that we observed in the grooming of the native woman.

The anxiety to please, the wishes of the man, these lead the woman to seek constantly the means that would enable her to be tattooed as soon and as often as possible. This natural desire and inner necessity are the reasons why the woman stoically bears all the torture, all the suffering. In primitive life the sexual side naturally is dominant. In this way we can explain, and in a way understand, why tattooing in the beginning was the exclusive appanage of the woman in this region and how she came to decorate the sexual organ and its immediate vicinity in order subsequently to display it; covering nearly all the body with decorations came about, perhaps, simply through coquetry.

581 Moral qualities are often involved in the choice of a wife. But strictly speaking, the marriage is not one of reason; the cause of it is more likely to be affection.

The affective and sexual aspects of the question require longer discussion.

Therefore this chapter is divided into two parts:

I. The emotional life
II. The sexual life of the Nkundó [24]

Part 1

The Emotional Life of the Nkundó

000

[Editor's Note: The Nkundó are capable of real affection. That affection takes varying forms and attains different degrees according to the nature of the persons in question. In successive articles, we will treat:

I. Affection among relatives
II. A special form of the latter: the creation of a Bolũmbó
III. Friendship
IV. Love between husband and wife]

Article I. Affection among Relatives

152
602 The Nkundó feel a deep affection toward members of their kin group. I am of the opinion that they love them as much, if not more, than most Europeans, but are not capable of as great a devotion. To understand this condition, one need only consider that affection is instinctive. Our people say: botéma nd'iko̱ma, "the heart is like a package," that is to say, it does not choose the object of its love, but rather the object presents itself spontaneously. (1) Devotion on the

1. Or lolango ale nse̱mbe̱ éy'otéma, "love is an innate, spontaneous product of the heart."

152 602 other hand almost always involves reasoning and is founded on a high morality based on religion. Furthermore, the questions (of property, inheritance, etc.) which so often divide relatives from each other do not exist among the Nkundő, whose patrimony is held in common. [25] Among them the members of a family need each other absolutely and constantly; they cannot sustain the struggle for existence unless they remain well united. A man isolated from his kin is a pariah, for in all matters of importance he must count on them for help, protection, and defense. Therefore he is, so to speak, forced to make common cause with the rest of the family and to keep his proper place within it.

This may help us to understand that among these people there are fewer reasons for a cooling of family affections and more reasons for maintaining good relations. But it would be wrong to attribute their love to some kind of egoistic calculation. Their affection is sincere and spontaneous. But the above facts explain why the dis-[578] unity and quarrels which are so frequent in Europe are unknown among the Nkundő; they are settled at once and do not have time to become bitter or deeply rooted. A very rare exception does not invalidate this generalization.

1. Parents and children

593x Parents sincerely love their children. Their affection is not lessened with age; there is only a somewhat greater tenderness toward the very young, whom they readily carry and fondle. The indulgence which they show for the faults of their offspring is tempered by anger when they are exasperated by misbehaviour, more often than by a rational concern for the child's training. The spouse who has not suffered from the child's error does not react against him but on the contrary is led by his affection to protect him. Parents insistently try to excuse and defend their children when they have misbehaved. (1)

(1). It should be noted that the same thing may also frequently be done among many Europeans.

Nevertheless, the general good of the clan wins out over affection.

593 receive more attention, will get his way more readily -- as among ourselves. These preferences do not give rise to jealousy among brothers as long as they remain within the limits of fairness, which they almost always do.

[556] Some rich men who have a dominant social rank have a means of expressing their preference for one of their daughters, a means which is a demonstration of their wealth and at the same time an assertion of their position. This practice will be described in the article that follows.

The children for their part sincerely love their parents. This love is composed more of respect for the father and of more tenderness for the mother, as is the case among Europeans. The same variants of sentiment, depending on whether the child is a boy or girl, are to be found among the Nkundô. The children may be remiss in their dutiful affection and respect, but these are exceptions due to thoughtlessness, stubbornness, or sudden anger. (1) Here one does [152] not encounter the deep discord that among Europeans divides parents and children, nor the coarseness and brutality of which one reads quite often in our newspapers. Among the Nkundô these family dramas are unknown.

[155] Nevertheless, what we have said above does not exclude disobedience. The Nkundô child, too, prefers play to work and freedom to discipline. He tries to shun the commands of his parents which tie him down and keep him from frolicking with his companions. (2)

Love for the mother is especially deep. No matter how old a Nkundô may be, his feelings of tenderness for her do not decrease; he always remains her child. Whenever he feels pain, disappointment, or sorrow, one word is on his lips: ngôya, "mother." Among these

---

1. For an example see Chapter X, Article VIII.

2. One of the first words learned by a Nkundô child is mbôi, "I don't want to."

593x people the innate feeling which links mother and children retains all its original spontaneity. [28]

593x Nkundó parents and children do not give each other any special external signs of affection, however, as do some other peoples.

152 At death the sincerity of affection between parents and children is plainly visible. Their moving anguish comes to the surface noisily and often pathetically. Even older men are not ashamed to weep like children. What we have said is in no way altered by the fact that the light-heartedness of their character makes it easy for them to shift from one emotion to another. (Actually, the same thing may be noted in Europe.) (1)

1. See my article on the funeral customs of the Nkundó which is to appear in Anthropos.

2. Brothers and sisters

From the love that Nkundó children feel for their parents naturally springs their affection for their brothers and sisters, which is strong and sincere. Our remarks concerning the nature and qualities of the children's feeling toward their parents are applicable here. Such quarrels as occur seldom become bitter. On the one hand, the affection between brothers and sisters is deep and sincere, and on the other, their social and economic interdependence naturally reinforces the ties between them.

Mutual assistance is an outgrowth of their love; brothers and sisters often help each other.

After the death of his father and uncles, the eldest brother is the natural defender and protector of his younger brothers and his sisters, even though they may be married.

593x 595 152 A definite difference can be observed between the intensity of affection present among uterine brothers and sisters and the sentiments shared with others. The bonds between children of the same mother are much more intimate and their affection much greater than it is toward brothers and sisters who have different mothers. This too is entirely [29] in accordance with the universal qualities of human nature and shows that monogamy is superior to polygamy in bringing about the unity, harmony, and happiness of families.

593x 152 With reference to signs of affection, grief at the time of death, etc., the observations made for parent-child relationships hold true here -- mutatis mutandis.

3. Various relatives

602 The Nkundo's affection extends toward all members of his family, that is, all those with whom he feels linked by blood and common origin. These relatives are much greater in number than in Europe, because Nkundó kinship includes many more generations. The intensity of affection decreases with the distance of the degree of kinship. But the Nkundó knows and feels that he belongs to a large family, and he remains attached to all its members. He can find a home with any of them. This accounts for the fact that in the centers, men from the same village will look for each other and consider [621] each other "brothers." Actually, that is what they are, since in general each village consists of only a single kin group.

Although here, as in the case of brothers and sisters, common interests play a part in maintaining bonds between family members, the feelings of affection are not based on selfish considerations. The latter only reinforce these feelings, which are truly innate among the Nkundó. Among the various relatives the strongest attachments are developed between grandparents and grandchildren, uncles and aunts and nephews and nieces, male cousins and female cousins, etc.

603 Among the Nkundó as among Europeans there is a very strong affection between grandparents and grandsons, even greater, one might say, than between parents and children (the expression is: bǒna [30] l'onkɛ́nɛ́, ndekɛ́ nd'ǒnkɛ́nɛ́). But the relationship degenerates into compliance and weakness on one side, and into disrespectful carelessness on the other.

604 A Nkundó loves his paternal uncles and aunts and treats them like "fathers," and his maternal uncles and aunts like "mothers." Naturally, his feelings toward them are not as affectionate as for his parents, but they are an extension of these in an attenuated form.

605 The same situation holds true for the bonds which link him to his cousins, whom he calls "brothers" and "sisters." The children of his paternal aunt are his "fathers," however.

593x against the presence of love are based chiefly on the instability of 581 unions, the high frequency of divorce, infidelity, and polygamy -- objections which we shall examine in somewhat greater detail.

To judge the situation properly, we must first distinguish 593x between the sexes, which are not at all alike in this respect. Fur-562 thermore, among women [42] we must distinguish between those who are wives of polygamous men and those who are not.

Let us speak first of all of the men. They seem superior to the opposite sex in the matter of conjugal love, at least if we base our conclusions on their greater fidelity. Divorce is almost always [586] caused by the wife. As a matter of fact, this is quite natural. The man marries at a fairly mature age and therefore becomes involved when he is well aware of what he is doing, while the girl most often becomes engaged before the age of discretion and is thus unable to choose according to her own heart.

On the other hand, the polygamous man's heart must be divided.
595x As we will see suo loco, he has a special love for one of his wives. His love for the first one deepens, becomes more rational, more deliberate, whereas his love for his favorite would seem to be more a matter of emotion in the strict sense of the word. As to the others, he has usually chosen them of his own will and perhaps has even seduced them to the point of making them leave a previous husband. It would therefore seem unfair to deny the presence of some affection toward them.

But is the term "love" still applicable? According to the 562 593x European point of view, conjugal love is exclusive. Among the 152 Nkundó this does not seem to be the case. It has often been said 595x that the polygamist considers his wives, with one or two exceptions, as human capital, so many production machines. I would not deny that the harem constitutes human capital and a source of wealth, but in my opinion such a statement is much too extreme and absolute. In most cases a real affection for his wives must be attributed to the polygamist. I understand this affection to be a kind of love in reduced proportions. And I compare this situation -- mutatis mutandis -- to that of someone who loves several friends at the same time. It is 593x possible to speak of love toward several individuals in spite of differ-562 ences in its intensity, depending on the various persons who [43] are 595x its objects, although we may consider such a divided love as very 152 imperfect. But whatever name one calls it and however weak in intensity one finds it, it is impossible to deny its existence.

Among women, it is necessary to distinguish between wives
595x of monogamous men and those of polygamists, especially in the case
152 of "supplementary" wives. It is not hard to understand that among the latter, love is more likely to cool. Since the husband must divide his attentions and signs of affection, if only to preserve harmony, the situation could hardly be otherwise, even without the fact of very early marriages. In addition to the above-mentioned case of the cooling of affection among wives in polygamous marriages, there is no question that in these marriages, a community of souls, feelings, and interests is not established between wives and husbands to the same extent as in monogamous marriages. However, one could not state as a general rule that the wife of a polygamist does not love him, at least to some extent, depending on the individual. To maintain a priori that a man cannot be loved simultaneously by several women is logically inadmissible and contrary to the facts. Here it happens quite often that a wife leaves her polygamous husband for another because she has transferred her love to the latter. It is for the exceptions that proof should be required. Even if there are many of them, they do not invalidate the cases of real affection.

When a polygamist returns home after a long absence, he is often the object of affectionate demonstrations by his wives which are surprising to Europeans. The women fall at his feet, embrace his legs, roll on the ground, and perform contortions out of joy and emotion. It is true that the freedom resulting from colonization has done much to cool these fine sentiments.

Is it beside the point to quote the saying of [44] polygamists'
[539] wives: bokungɔ́ ákafola bitáfɛ́, lolango ákafola botɛ́ma, "the bokungɔ́ tree divides its branches, love divides the heart"? And then there is the following fable which teaches true love: a polygamist who has three wives, is accidentally wounded and lies dying on the opposite side of the river. His wives run to the shore but find no canoe. The river is infested with crocodiles. The chief wives refuse to risk their 595^ 152 lives by swimming across; it is the least important one who throws herself in the midst of the dangers to go and help her husband.

In most cases a woman no longer feels affection for her husband when she has given her heart to a lover. She stays with him because it would be hard to do otherwise. Her husband continues to have the use of her body and her arms, but she no longer gives him a place in her heart. As this proverb so subtly expresses it:
[539] bɔ̌m'akwɛ̌ta, m̂bw'â nkánge; bonsámb'ákwɛ̌ta, omeka é ńtegume,
"the husband calls you, 'I am sick and may die'; the lover calls you, 'I will try to come.' "

595 X 586 X The objection concerning the frequency of divorce is difficult to handle because the question is very complicated. First of all, the fact that a couple remains together, that they remain faithful to one another, is no proof of love in a society where the idea of duty is very strong. A Christian woman may come to feel a real aversion for an unfaithful husband, yet she may remain with him out of a sense of duty, out of love for the children, etc. Conversely, in a society where the idea of duty is relaxed or does not exist spouses may readily be unfaithful to one another, although basically they love each other; if it is easy to divorce they will do so rashly, for trivial reasons, without realizing that there is still love between them. (1)

1. The Honorary Attorney General A. Sohier has informed me that the experiences of his long judiciary carreer entirely confirms my statements. Their truth is reflected in the fact that for some years now in European countries, it has been necessary to permit divorced couples to remarry each other. Thus we see that they find each other again after several years of separation.

The first of my two assertions is not to be found among the Nkundó, [45] since they have no moral concept of duty in our sense. But it sometimes happens that a couple who no longer love each other remain together because it is not possible for them to separate.

595x 837 548 Finally, let us not forget the spirit of gain and greed. Except in a few instances, a woman expects remuneration from a man to whom she has surrendered her body. Many infidelities may be explained by this practice, at least at the present time. But on the other hand, it should be noted that the woman's demand for a "wage" from her lover may be explained by an amorous concern; by giving the woman a gift or an amount of money the man shows [49] his regard for her; it is a demonstration of his affection for her, and the woman wants to be paid in order to be sure of her lover's love. That is not to say that such instances are common or frequent, but such a feeling is natural and actually exists in more than one case. (1)

1. See Chapter VI, Article VII, 2.

It is not surprising that the woman who lives in circumstances which are always unfavorable to chastity and marital fidelity is easily led to adultery and often falls. That is the basis of the proverb: [589] bǒmoto ndé lofolókó, nkó ngonda ěfá'nd'ósengámé, "the woman is a chrysalis; there is no forest where she does not hang" -- a clear condemnation of the frivolity of the daughters of Eve in the land of the Nkundó. Nevertheless, these moral criticisms in the form of proverbs can be accepted only in a general way and must be understood cum grano salis; they leave the door wide open for exceptions.

595x 152 In his Blancs et Noirs au Congo Belge [Whites and Blacks in the Belgian Congo], (p. 38), Jadot has written: "The Bantu is capable of love . . . and that is all, and his wife -- no matter what has been said -- of a certain amount of marital fidelity. In general, neither the one nor the other go too far. Platonism, Petrarchism, and Romanticism are foreign to the love of the natives . . . I know . . . of cases of fierce jealousy and of beautiful faithfulness." (2)

2. See also ibid., p. 208 ff.

152 We conclude that love exists among the Nkundó. This feeling is subjected to harsh attacks and is affected by many unfavorable circumstances, which may account for its imperfection and for certain

152 anomalies in its manifestations. The objections raised against the idea of its existence among the Nkundó do not prove its absence; rather they indicate the adverse conditions under which it is found, conditions which prevent its development and bring about its shortcomings or destruction. [50]

Part 2

000

The Sexual Life of the Nkundó

In this section we will examine successively:

I. The feeling of sexual modesty.
II. Preparation for sexual life.
III. Prostitution.
IV. Premarital sexuality.
V. Sexual practice.
VI. Unnatural vices.
VII. Incest
VIII. Love philtres.

Article I. Sexual Modesty

Sexual modesty is defined, at least by modern psychologists, more or less as a "a sensitive dynamism (or principle of action) of fear which is quasi-instinctive and directly related to sexual processes." (1)

(1) J. De La Vaissière, S.J., La Pudeur instinctive [Instinctive Modesty], p. 13.

It is a good instinct rather than a virtue, and facilitates the practice of chastity. Understood in this sense, modesty tends to hide the sex act and anything that is closely or remotely connected with it.

Sensual excesses do not exclude the existence of modesty and, conversely, a modest person may allow himself to be led into a violation of morals. Nevertheless, the greater the development and 515 834 are reassured by the fact that they are in a group, so that no one feels singled out by the gaze of the passer-by. Washing away from major streams is always surrounded by more propriety. For this purpose a [343] small enclosure (ikomba) is built behind the hut or among the banana trees, or a small thicket is allowed to grow there. By this means the native is sheltered from indiscreet glances if he wants to take a [757] bath or give himself an enema. As a matter of fact these things are done preferably after dark.

834 152 5) Violent anger or sorrow drown out modesty, just as they momentarily destroy the use of reason and suppress all feelings which are contradictory of simply different. In this situation, too, the man shows himself superior to the woman. He is less impulsive, calmer, less prone to lose control of his actions, to be carried away by his anger. Thus he almost never strips himself bare. The woman, on the other hand, readily strips off all her clothing. This behavior is extremely common; a woman undresses completely whenever she experiences great sorrow or intense anger. Luckily for propriety's sake some friend or relative always hastens to cover at least the essential parts. For a woman who throws off her clothing exposes herself to the mockery and jeers of spectators. (1)

[593]x [578]

1. An angry woman may also undress to shame her husband; it is a way of insulting and mocking him.

833 6) The Nkundó practice sexual intercourse only at night. I believe that this custom is due to their sense of propriety, [57] supplemented by a superstitious explanation which will be described in detail in Article V.

593x 834 7) The sense of modesty has its fullest expression in relation to parents, brothers, sisters, etc. Thus it is unheard of that a son should see his mother naked: bɔ̌na átɛ́náká ɛ̌sunví nvangɔ́. If an adult daughter is ill and requires personal care (such as an enema, for example), the father has to take care of her himself if no other female relative is near by. But their sense of modesty is such that they both shed tears over the event. As a matter of fact this situation

291
301
832 According to what I have been told, this type of ornament may also have a sexual significance. Normally -- and this statement is applicable only to the present time -- the beads are entirely covered by clothing and are visible only on a few occasions. If a large number of strings (as many as six, eight, or ten) or very many beads are worn, attention may be attracted to them because there will be a bulge in the clothing worn over them. Their sound will reveal their presence during a race or a dance. And according to my informants, that is enough to awaken passion. Making an allusion to the beads and especially touching them deliberately is considered as an invitation. For her part, a woman sometimes rubs them together in her fingers so that they will make their characteristic noise and thus attract a man's attention and arouse his interest.

The preceding does not mean that simply the wearing of the beads is necessarily intended for a bad purpose. Not only must such an intention be excluded in the case of serious persons, especially if they are elderly and content themselves with wearing a single string, seldom a second one to support the first. But there is also the possibility that a young Black beauty may adorn herself with ten or more ● [152] strands out of sheer vanity, so that the whole world may see that she has so many. [70]

Furthermore, it has been shown that attention to appearance is not necessarily directed to another person. Though that may be generally true, many people like to dress for the pleasure of being well dressed, and girls who never dream of an adventure may still enjoy wearing pretty undergarments. This desire for adornment for its own sake can, no doubt, explain the belts, as well as other embellishments on more than one Nkundó woman.

We should add that those who adhere to the theory that the tattoos have an immediate sexual influence could apply such a theory here as well.

302
831

5. Depilation

All Nkundó of both sexes practice depilation of the genital organs and even the armpits. The natives believe that the hair growing 583x 184 a new element from the legal standpoint. This is clearly apparent in the repugnance with which these same Bombwanja who practice the form of exchange just described regard an exchange pure and simple, which will be described below.

The exchange of widows is also practiced by the Elíngɔ. Like the Bombwanja, they also have the two forms of quasi-exchange described at the beginning of this article.

4) On the other hand, a true exchange of wives exists among the riverain peoples known as the Boɔyɔ and the Longa (1); in their dialect it is called iengyɔ. Two men exchange wives. If the bride price of one is greater than that of the other, the difference is refunded. Such an exchange is carried out with the consent of the women involved.

583x 184 ● 152 [837] Let us see how such an exchange usually comes about. Imagine two men, Bokulɔ and Mpolɛ, with their respective wives, Mbindo and Baɔnɔ. Suppose that Bokulɔ falls in love with Baɔnɔ, the wife of Mpolɛ, and the pair become involved in an adulterous relationship. There is a cooling of Baɔnɔ's love for her husband Mpolɛ; she performs fewer and fewer services for him, etc. The same thing happens to Bokulɔ's relationship with his wife Mbindo. The latter is jealous; her patience is soon at an end. She discusses the matter with Mpolɛ, her rival's husband. "See how your wife deceives you; she no longer loves you. My husband is forsaking me [217] for her; he no longer loves me. This is a challenge to you as well as to me. If you are a man (1), pick up the challenge."

---

1. They live near the mouth of the Salonga (in the villages of Bonsela, Pomputɔ, Nkɔse, Bombomba, Isakɔ, etc.)

1. "Man" in the sense of vir (jwende); the meaning is: "If you have any courage, show that you are not a coward."

583x According to the native view, a man must take this woman
184 home for the sake of his honor. If he did not do so, he would be-152 come the butt of malicious comments and scorn on the part of all,
● both men and women. He would be considered a coward, just as in European "cultured" society a man is considered a coward if he does not pick up the glove thrown down by his adversary.

The rejected woman's hatred for her husband is transformed into a love for the man who has been similarly hurt by her rival. The joint misfortune of the pair creates a mutual feeling of affection. The woman is accepted as wife and is thus saved from dishonor. The man, on his part, feels affection for the woman who offers him her heart and preserves his good name. Harmony is at last established among all four of them, the two men arrange the matter of bride price in the way we have described, and then they live in peace without any enmity toward one another.

589x This way of handling the situation is very strange to us, be-
581 cause it is indefensible from the point of view of a sound philosophy
184 and of Catholic morality. But it seems normal to the natives. The pagan conscience has no trouble coming to terms with it, since no pagan law explicitly prohibits such behavior. Everyone comes to an agreement in the end, and that is all their conscience requires. Everything considered, there is no infraction of the rights of any individual, and since the native mentality is not concerned with morality as we conceive of it, this solution seems altogether natural to them.

Nevertheless, the ethnic groups who do not practice this true exchange in no way approve of it. Not that they fail to understand the psychology underlying this practice; on the contrary, if the situation arises they accept it. But they condemn [218] the legal procedure. They require that the two marriages be broken in the regular fashion and that two new marriages be contracted. That is, they demand the restitution and payment of the bride prices through the ndonga and through the respective parents of the women. For them therefore an exchange is not a true marriage, but a sort of sale and purchase. Also, from their point of view, the women who have been exchanged are slaves and not wives, because they live with their

Pygmies FO4
Batswa

M
593x
578 Since the impetuous youth did not want to observe the ancestral custom and considered his strength superior to the law, his action is not justifiable. We must admire among many of the old natives the innate feeling of justice and impartiality that makes them disapprove of and condemn their own children. Furthermore, if the passionate avenger of his honor does not change his ways and endeavor to combat the thoughtless violence of his temperament by replacing it with a sense of measure, his marriage will not last. And he will be the one [276] accused of having caused the break. The matter is clear; it is quite true that the woman started it. The husband therefore had all the trumps in his hand. Why, then, did he not use them? If he had followed the procedure required by law he would have gained his case all the way down the line.

The fact that a husband must first inform the ndonga and the family authorities does not mean that he has not the right to punish his wife in a violent fashion. This practice is observed to avoid excesses and abuses. The husband is not given the freedom to do as he pleases. Recourse to the representatives of family authority may be considered as a kind of delegation of their power.

These legal provisions of the Nkundó are truly wise. While they give an outraged husband the right to punish his wife and, therefore, to hold her in check, the law imposes a rein on the impetuousness of unthinking anger. Furthermore, by requiring that these matters be made public, they avoid interminable discussions and palavers on the subjects of fines to be paid, etc.

M
● [152] In the past certain men were capable of becoming exasperated by the disgrace to the point where they were no longer able to master their rage. Women were killed for this reason. The Nkundó say that a man would not let himself be carried to this extreme unless driven to it by the great love he bore his wife. This comment has a psychological validity. Nevertheless, such an action was not praised and could even produce a war.

M
593x
578
P
674 It sometimes happened that an enraged man who wanted to kill his wife under such circumstances was prevented from doing so because he had to abstain from assassination to maintain the efficacy (nsimbo) of a practice (bote) in his possession. He therefore had

C. Against a husband and his accomplice. There is no 684 specific sanction in Nkundɔ́ law against a husband's adultery, [323] but an outraged wife may take revenge on him, as on her rival. Her weapons against her husband include invective, the refusal of food, drink, baths, and finally of debitum conjugale. These are appreciable punishments about which the husband can in no way complain, for he would be found entirely in the wrong. The woman's actions stem from a legitimate jealousy. Sometimes her feeling [834] becomes so intense that she tears off her clothing and stands before her husband completely naked; this shames him greatly and constitutes a stinging reproach. Invectives flow out of the wife's mouth in torrents: ilolɛ́ ingɛ, itutula ingɛ, inyanyama inɛ́, owá lɔ́í ɔ̂ ndá [578] nyongo, ndá ntɛ́mbɔ́, "that imbecile, that good for nothing, that beast, one day you'll die of penalties, of being caught in flagrante delicto . . . ." Then there is a whole string of the usual in- [152] sults. Our Nkundɔ́ say that the more abundant the insults, the greater is the woman's love. She may carry on like this for days, even for weeks. Her responses to her husband's adultery are thus of the same sort as those she makes use of under other circumstances.

If a jealous wife sets fire to the hut in which her husband yielded to his passion, no one can reproach her. The damage was caused on her husband's account.

Against the woman accomplice, the wife may use more violent means. She may fight her, strike her, even injure her. The rival's husband will demand a liombo, or payment "for blows and wounds," which has to be paid not by the wife's family, but by the guilty husband. Thus in the final analysis it is again he who is punished. If the offending woman is killed, it is again the unfaithful husband who is obliged to pay an indemnity to the widower. (See Article II.)

One form of punishment to which a wife likes to have recourse to take revenge on her adulterous husband and his accomplice if she catches them in the act is to pour a pot of hot or boiling water on their bodies. [324]

626 The shame attached to the discovery of this sort of miscon-
837 duct in the better circles in Europe is unknown among the Nkundó.
This is natural since isolated instances are readily excused. As to ● [152] the habitual offenders, they are sensitive [326] to the above-mentioned epithets but will not correct their ways on this account any more than people in other parts of the world.

837 An adulterous husband is criticized as much as an adulterous 626 wife in spite of the difference in the means of repression which 684 Nkundó law provides for their respective misconduct.

Public opinion therefore corroborates the conclusion toward which our examination of sanctions has pointed, namely that adultery is condemned by the Nkundó. Opinion is not based on the existence of the sanction but seems to spring from their innate mentality, which makes them perceive adultery as a disorder.

6. Aggravating circumstances

837 If a case of adultery is followed by conception, it becomes 842 especially serious, and for the husband as much as for the natural 672 father. Indeed the latter must assume all the consequences. When circumstances permit the husband makes his wife denounce her accomplice, and she does not refuse to do so. The husband then calls a meeting and demands a pledge (ndanga) from the culprit, who in that way acknowledges that he is at fault and shows his willingness to assume all responsibility. If there is a miscarriage or the child dies during delivery, the natural father must pay the legal father an indemnity of "a slave" or more (sometimes 50 rings); a smaller indemnity is required for a child who is only deformed or sickly. If the mother dies the indemnity consists of a slave and 50 rings, and it may go as high as 100 rings.

In the interim the husband no longer goes near his wife. He leaves her to her lover, who must "preserve the foetus" and observe all the rites and practices associated with pregnancy and childbirth, since, physically, he is the father. (1) [327]

1. For fuller details see Chapter X, Article II, 3. For analogous practices 595ˣ She does no work in the farm or kitchen. She always has an ebísa to wait on her. If her family has no member they can let her have, she will borrow an ebísa from a distant relative or a friend.

A nkóndé does not travel on foot; she is carried in a hammock [482] (hunting net). Her husband accompanies her on foot, however. But [556] this was done only for a true nkóndé of a rich man, and the custom is disappearing today.

A favorite may not leave her husband, even to go and see her parents. In the past some men were so jealous of their favorites [514] that they would not allow them to satisfy even their most private needs unless they themselves or some sentinel (usually a Botswá) stood watch. A man could not even go into the vicinity of her hut, which is built just behind the husband's shed. For although the husband is sometimes tolerant of the passions of his other wives, he always shows [152] an intransigeant jealousy [346] in relation to his favorite. He never travels without having her accompany him.

The favorite has the honor of performing small personal serv-[515] ices for her husband; she cuts his hair, helps him in the removal of body hair, scratches his pustules from ringworm or prickly heat, anoints him with oil, paints him with ngóla, and, in a word, performs all the tasks connected with his appearance and hygiene.

595ˣ Out of love for his favorite, her husband can buy her corpse 766 for the price of a slave (in kind or in money). By doing so he obtains the right to have it buried beside his own while those of the other wives must be buried with their native clans. That is why in some regions a husband calls his favorite his ikundaka (from kunda "to bury").
Nevertheless, if her husband dies before she does, his heirs may not trouble themselves about his wishes and no longer require that the favorite be buried in their cemetery. That is what happened to Bongóla of Bongíli, whose husband Ikilinganya of Bongangá (Boéndé) had paid the price of two slaves for this right. When the husband has [224] killed large game, the favorite, like the bomátsa, has the right to receive her personal predetermined portion (boando). Her part is the neck or a chop, which in her absence, goes to the sons or their wives.
The other wives do not have the same right; each one obtains only an ordinary piece (liondo).

Article VII. Monogamy

595x 522 The Nkundó do not esteem monogamy. It is polygamy that they desire. If a man has only one wife, that is because he is poor. Thus he is made fun of and called etula or bololé, "a nobody," or bosú, "a weak man." Songs dealing with this theme [533] can often be heard during drinking parties, especially among the Elinga. All this is a great obstacle in the struggle against polygamy. Not only is the Nkundó tempted by the material advantages of polygamy, but he is unable to bear teasing. He is ● [152] extremely sensitive to humiliation and is the slave to other men's respect.

595x In spite of all this, and apart from the influence of the Christian religion, monogamous marriages that were not simply imposed by necessity but were spontaneously desired, have existed in the past and still exist, although they are extremely rare. Here are the names of a few men who wished to remain united to one woman, although they had the means to establish a harem for themselves. I have chosen them at random from two villages: Bonjoku-Bonkoso (27 taxpayers in 1931) and Bongíli wǎ Ndongó together with the affinally related clan Ilekó (47 taxpayers in 1931).

Bonjoku-Bonkoso:

Esalé éâ Ekutu of Bokenyola married to Iombe of Nkélengo;
Bokató of Bokenyola married to Wanga of Likolí;
Bofanga w'ôfónge of Bokenyola married to Baléngola;
Itéú yǎ Lokékola of Bofétola married to Nkúmí of Bongale.

All died before 1895.

Bongílí:

Nsenge (still alive) married to Toyôngwa of Elángá. Even when he was widowed, he did not want to remarry, because of his attachment to his deceased wife.
Efoloko éâ Bonkóngyá married to Bambúla of Boálá;
Bongelé married to Bakúkú of Bompángá;
Bolúmbe w'embengá married to Bokelé of Ekúla;
Lofalanga of Ilekó married to Imote of Besombó. After his wife's death, he remained a widower until he himself died.

Chapter IX

Death

Since the subject of our study is only Nkundő marriage, we 152 will examine matters relating to death only from this limited stand-593 point. As to the general aspects of the question, the reader will 761 find them in our article on the funeral customs of the Nkundő, about to be published in Anthropos.

Article I. Sorrow and Mourning

In the study cited above, a word was said concerning the varying degrees of intensity that may be reached in the sorrow caused by the death of a cherished being.

Of course the suffering does not always exclude a mixture of egoistic elements, such as regret of the financial loss involved in the death of a wife and the obligation of continence and various other prohibitions of widowhood. This is rather natural and does not merit discussion. On the other hand, it would be unjust and contrary to the truth to attribute all the sadness to those base feelings. In general, this sorrow must also be taken as evidence of a true love which is often its primary cause. Exceptions do occur, however, for instance in the case of an old woman who has been inherited by a polygamist.

When we compare the various manifestations of sorrow at the death of a spouse with those observed at the death of a relative, we note certain practices specific to the former case. One might say that at the death of a spouse, the signs of sorrow reach a culminating point [418], as if native law wished to underline the predominance of the relationship created by marriage over the bonds of kinship and thus manifest its agreement with divine law.

Nevertheless it is clear that practice does not always correspond to theory, here any more than elsewhere. We should not be astonished in not finding among the natives a perfect and ideal love

152
761 593x someone

free of all egoism. When even among peoples universally recognized as superior, self-pity during the pain felt on the death of someone beloved is neither rare nor reprehensible, can we be shocked that our natives experience similar regrets? Do we condemn a young widow who, although sincerely and intensely regretting the husband she loved tenderly and whom death has just removed from her affection, thinks at the same time of the unhappy situation in which she and her small children find themselves as a result? And is not the reasonable hope of finding someone who will take care of her and the orphans an effective and legitimate consolation that will help her to endure the trial?

All things considered, it is therefore not at all surprising that our Blacks react that way. And it is quite natural that, in practice, they should suffer more from the death of a father and especially a mother or a child than from the loss of a husband or wife. The situation here is entirely different from that in Europe. And the system of polygamy, with all its consequences, is not exactly discouraging to egoism and favorable to an ascension toward the ideal of a more sublime love.

Therefore we should not be surprised that a wife at the death of her husband laments: ngóy 'ɔ́m 'ɔ́kám óye! ("Mother, my husband, ah!"); but at the death of a child or a mother or father she wails: ngóya njɔ̂lélengana óye! ("Mother, I am bereft, ah!"), thus expressing a more intense sorrow. For a father or a mother cannot be replaced, but she will always find someone who will want to marry her. As to a child, between it and its parents there is more of a life in common [419] than between spouses under the system of polygamy. More marks of tenderness are also exchanged between mother and child than between native couples.

764
152
593x

Immediately after his wife's death, a husband is surrounded by all the women of the village who come and mistreat him. They vie with each other in smearing him with charcoal smut, soil, and mud, and in rubbing him with the plant called linsánsǎ, which causes a stinging rash comparable to that caused by nettles in Europe. There are no relatives among the women who engage in this 152 rough behavior, only strangers married to village men (those known 593x as báajâála). This ill treatment is often extended to close rela-

764 tives of the widower, that is, to those whom the women in question call bóome, "potential husbands," never to fathers and higher relatives. (1) The purpose of this practice seems to be to intensify, by physical pain, the sorrow caused by death. In addition, provocatively obscene words, gestures, and movements remind the widower that from then on he must be continent, as described in extenso in the study cited above.

765 Afterwards, relatives dress the widower in a lisáki, a banana leaf which is torn all over horizontally. For all other mourning garments, as well as for all regulations and prohibitions that apply to all cases, see the detailed study.

The ill treatment described is not inflicted on the widow. It is meted out exclusively to men.

The general rules pertaining to seclusion apply to a widower; in fact they are especially severe for a man. His kinswomen prepare his simple meals. However, if his relations with his father-[587] in-law were excellent, the latter sends a woman [420] to him who will attend to his needs. She often becomes his wife when, after the lifting of mourning, he brings the ibóleóko (Chapter III, Article IV).

During the entire first period of seclusion, he cannot go anywhere, at least ostensibly. If he needs to go out, he must go through the back. If he wants to visit a relative or friend, he must go behind the huts, in the banana grove, even if it is evening. In any case, he may not leave the village. Such was the ancient law, though nowadays it is observed less and less.

Furthermore, he cannot have the slightest contact with any woman who is not a relative. He cannot even shake her hand, greet her out loud, or look at her even in passing.

---

1. See Chapter V, Article IV, 1, no. 3, and Chapter VI, Article VI.

764 When the family of the deceased bars the route to the 578 funeral procession, they are manifesting the anger provoked by the
● 152 death of one of their members. [428] For they feel anger and [584] resentment, in spite of the fact that the ndonga carries a spear at the head of the procession as a sign that they come as friends, without evil intentions.

This does not mean that the natives attribute the cause of death to the husband and his family. In most cases they are convinced that the latter could not prevent it. Although they express themselves in those terms: lóótoomela bǒna (nkâna, eóto), "you have killed our child (sister, relative)," they do not maintain that the husband's clan has really killed her, but only that she died among them. Under the circumstances do they feign anger to obtain valuables, for example? I do not think so. The Nkundó do not say that they simulate anger; they categorically state that they feel it and that they want to show it in the manner described. We should not be astonished at this since -- as we have noted in the study on the funeral customs of the Nkundó (Les Coutumes funéraires des Nkundó), the emotions of anger and sorrow seem to be intimately related among these peoples.

When the funeral procession passes through the last barrier, 764 that which bars the entrance to the village, the husband's clan puts down the body, and it is subsequently lifted up by the family of the deceased, who carry it into the house of the head of the family. They are followed by the ndonga, the bǎnambóuswâ, the husband, and his relatives. The family of the deceased wail over her. Her kinswomen (biúnanyi) show their sorrow-anger by mistreating the clan wives (baájâála), by smearing their bodies with mud, dressing them in basáki, and hitting them with stinging plants (bansǎnsǎ). For the deceased is the baájâála's "husband," that is, a kinswoman of their husbands. The baájâála treat the widower and his relatives in the same way, because "their husband" has died among them.

The corpse is thus deposited in the hut of the head of the family. Each time that kinswomen who are married elsewhere arrive [429] to mourn over the deceased, the baájâála forbid them

892 upon them; their upbringing costs them nothing, whereas among 855 Whites the maintenance, dress, food, instruction, and occupational placement involve considerable expenses. It cannot be [465] denied that while the modern European is exacting from all these viewpoints, enchained and blocked by an ever growing multitude of needs, the material life of the native is simple and his necessities are reduced to an indispensable minimum. Nevertheless, it can hardly be said that it is as easy for him to raise a large family with many children as it is to have the responsibility of a smaller number. Without speaking of clothing -- especially at the present time -- there is the food for growing children, which forces him to clear a greater expanse of forest and to work harder at the various ways of fishing and hunting; and when the time comes for the sons to find wives, he is the one who must arrange to procure the valuables needed for a bride price.

For their part, Nkundó women like to transmit life as much as the men, if not more so. Pregnancy may make them disagreeable and grumpy and sometimes cause them pain, but they put up with it and, as a very general rule, do not think of depriving themselves on that account of the happiness of giving birth to a cute little creature, of nursing it, of carrying it in their arms or on their shoulders. The difficulties and pains of maternity do not repel them. Although later, during the payment of her daughter's bride price, a Nkundó woman's greed will lead her to loudly claim the payment due her and even sometimes destroy her child's love because of delaying this financial operation, the delay does not come to their minds until the time comes.

In short, the Nkundó woman feels a perfectly natural, maternal love for her child.

There are of course exceptions to this general rule. And 842 the contrary would be astonishing for a pagan population who give 855 free rein to all their passions or, at least, restrain them only very
● 152 [466] slightly, and whose love is far from the perfection one may find among a people ennobled by fifteen centuries of Christianity. Moreover -- as all the preceding pages testify -- our Nkundó are not fashioned from a uniform mold notwithstanding the impression given by certain colonial and ethnological works. All the individual

842 differences can be found here, although they are less apparent to 855 a European observer since we usually approach the natives as a /152 group and our contact with them is often too impersonal.

2. Abortion

847 A great enemy of maternal love is the practice of abortion, which has always been known to the Nkundó. Here we cannot describe all the prescriptions used for that purpose. It will be sufficient to enumerate the reasons for which they have recourse to this practice. They are as follows:

1) A woman's lasciviousness: the procreation and subsequent care of a child to some extent prevent the indulging in carnal pleasures. Formerly this cause of abortion was nonexistent or very [178] rare. Needless to say, it has become more common, especially in the centers where it is constantly on the increase and where, in addition, occasional or regular "housekeepers" learn new means of sterilization and abortion.

2) A woman's antipathy or persistent anger toward her husband may encourage her to prevent conception or destroy its effect.

3) An excessive weakening of the mother's organism caused by a large number of conceptions and childbirths at too short intervals.

4) The encumberance and the difficulty of watching, carrying, and taking care of many small children -- bɔ́lota bɔkɔkɔsano [467] [535] wǎ bána nsɔ́tɛ́lá nsɔ́tɛ́lá. This reason is especially important for well-known dancers.

It goes without saying that several of these motives may be combined in the same person. For instance, I knew of a woman who aborted at the time of her eighth child. Her recurrent pregnancies, together with continuous work, had greatly reduced her strength. A palaver with her husband was the last straw; she decided to get rid of the fruit she carried in her body.

Outside of these exceptions the natives of this country ardently desire their own continuation through a large number of progeny. (1)

[184]

1. The same is not true elsewhere. Examples to that effect are cited from regions that are

764 crypt would then be barred by mats in order to leave it as a hollow chamber, and 762 the hole leading down to it filled in with earth.

For a month or two after the burial the festivities and orgies continued. Women
764 would be hanged to create some diversion, but those hanged were not eaten. Decapi-762 tations would continue. According to the informants only slaves brought in from a distance would have to be tied to prevent their escape. The slave members of the 567 household of the dead nkumu would await their turn stoically, content to die that [152] they might accompany their master in his journey to the land of spirits. This may be true but scarcely seems possible. Still another diversion in the funeral orgies was killing in the manner known as esombo. If some man who had a slave did not wish him to be hanged or beheaded, he might give him for this other method. As the weeks slipped by, such a one, his life having apparently been spared, would suppose that all was safe and that there was little chance of his being taken, and, thus emboldened, would, instead of keeping at a safe distance, join the crowd to watch a beheading. His death would be prearranged. At the moment of beheading a victim, someone would drive a spear into the unsuspecting man, the whole crowd then using spears and knives to stab and slash until he fell. Some might be tortured to death by being buried up to the neck and left thus exposed to the hot sun without food or water until death intervened, but this was not a common practice at such funerals.

768 The termination of the dead nkumu's affairs took place when the division of the inheritance was made, a long and complicated process.

178 Such were the old days before European penetration. The advent of the white 624 man half a century ago was the beginning of the end. The ceremonies had to be given up, though reluctantly. Occasionally now goats are beheaded in place of human victims, and many of the younger generation find that, even so, the sight is more than they can endure, and they seek refuge elsewhere. Nkumu are not anxious for the honours. They find little or no respect paid to them by the government officials and this is a distinct obstacle to their obtaining honour from their own people. When the nkumu resident in the village adjacent to the mission station died, one of the Natives was asked who would be next. The reply was that probably no one would appear as a successor. Asked why, he answered, 'There are too many trousers.' He meant that too many were adopting the ways of the white man to [613] make the inauguration of another nkumu a success. In his one useful function, that of judge, the paramount chief now takes his place, cases tried must be recorded by a clerk of the court, and fines paid into the treasury of the chieftaincy. With such a state of affairs the old ways drop into desuetude, and the younger generation grow up knowing less of the ways of their fathers as the years pass.

595 receive more attention, will get his way more readily -- as among ourselves. These preferences do not give rise to jealousy among brothers as long as they remain within the limits of fairness, which they almost always do.

[556] Some rich men who have a dominant social rank have a means of expressing their preference for one of their daughters, a means which is a demonstration of their wealth and at the same time an assertion of their position. This practice will be described in the article that follows.

The children for their part sincerely love their parents. This love is composed more of respect for the father and of more tenderness for the mother, as is the case among Europeans. The same variants of sentiment, depending on whether the child is a boy or girl, are to be found among the Nkundó. The children may be remiss in their dutiful affection and respect, but these are exceptions due to thoughtlessness, stubbornness, or sudden anger. (1) Here one does [152] not encounter the deep discord that among Europeans divides parents and children, nor the coarseness and brutality of which one reads quite often in our newspapers. Among the Nkundó these family dramas are unknown.

[155] Nevertheless, what we have said above does not exclude disobedience. The Nkundó child, too, prefers play to work and freedom to discipline. He tries to shun the commands of his parents which tie him down and keep him from frolicking with his companions. (2)

Love for the mother is especially deep. No matter how old a Nkundó may be, his feelings of tenderness for her do not decrease; he always remains her child. Whenever he feels pain, disappointment, or sorrow, one word is on his lips: ngóya, "mother." Among these

1. For an example see Chapter X, Article VIII.

2. One of the first words learned by a Nkundó child is mbói, "I don't want to."

584 When the presents have been accepted, the ndonga plants the 585 arrow in the ground in front of the wife's parents. Hence the expression -sumya ikulɛ́ or -lubya likulɛ́, "to plant the arrow," which remains very much the fashion even though nowadays the ndonga deposits rings in its place.

2. Consent

584 Asked by her parents or the ndonga, or on her own initiative, -- depending on her own inclinations, -- the girl pulls up the arrow or picks up the rings and gives them to her father. That is how she expresses her consent to the proposed engagement.

Her promptness, her nonchalance, or even the recalcitrant manner in which she performs this gesture show her [113] feelings. Usually her movements are lively. As we have explained, the union will have been anticipated for some time, and a Nkundó girl glories 584 in being the object of a man's love and in having a husband. Never-156 theless there are cases where the girl has to be persuaded to make the decision, especially if she is still young. Within herself she is not enthusiastic about the marriage. But in the end she bows to her father's wish, preferring a union which is contrary to her desires to fairly serious trouble with her family.

Naturally we find the whole range of variations which depend on individual temperament and on circumstances. A categorical refusal must certainly be very rare. It would be the act of a very strong-willed woman. But the union would have been called off much earlier, so that such an extreme situation would not be allowed to occur.

The case of a woman who submits to the ceremonies with resistance and against her wishes is more frequent. Not only does she have to be urged and persuaded, but her frowning face expresses her discontent. She picks up the objects with an apathetic gesture, turns her back to her father, and drops the valuables behind her without even 584 looking at him. None of the people present misunderstand the meaning of such gestures. Consequently members of the family and the notables who are present never fail to attract the father's attention to 584 the gravity of this situation. They try to make him change his mind and to dissuade him from accepting the bride price. To that end they try to make him see the consequences of his obstinacy: at the first favorable opportunity the woman will take flight, leading to palavers (and in the past often war), imprisonment, all sorts of [578] troubles, and finally the bride price will have to be returned for the divorce. Sometimes they succeed; other times all their wisdom and eloquence are in vain. Cupidity, the need to obtain the means of a ●[156] [114] bride price for a wife (for oneself, a son, a brother, etc.) and the profit he reaps from the union silence all other feelings. Here again, everything depends on the character of the individual. Nowadays the greater freedom resulting from colonization has reduced the frequency of such cases. Nevertheless, because of the reasons given, they still occur. But more frequently the ceremony takes place in a normal fashion. As long as it has not taken place, no further bride-price payments are made. This fact is sufficient to show the importance of the ceremony in Nkundô law, and thus the importance of the woman's public and official consent to the marriage proposed, though this consent is not expressed in words but only implied in a special, meaningful act. Cases which seem in contradiction to this statement are clearly breaches of that law.

In normal cases the father accepts the arrow or the rings from his daughter's hands and thus establishes his consent to the engagement and consequently to the marriage.

In other forms of marriage, which we will discuss later on (Chapters III and IV), consent is expressed in an entirely different fashion.

3. Abduction

583[x] Even before the coming of the Europeans there were instances where lovers persisted in their desire to marry in spite of the opposition of the woman's parents. When the parents refused to accept the ijulɛ, the engaged pair arranged an opportunity to flee. The woman tried to win her brother over to her cause, and out of brotherly love he usually 595x 556 less influence than a monogamist or bigamist who is intelligent and fearless. And in the present circumstances one meets monogamists who, because of either their economic situation or their social or political position, enjoy a much greater authority [371] than many polygamists. Intellectual and moral superiority on their part is beginning to make its value felt.

2) Fame and vanity. Because of the very nature of the marriage system, which is intimately bound to -- not to say based on -- financial transactions, the number of wives determines the extent of a man's wealth. And here as everywhere wealth has a fascination; it is considered a mark of superiority. Vanity seizes upon it. And since the possession of wives is the most obvious expression of wealth, the Nkundó see it as a superior means by which to acquire great renown and an illustrious name.

3) A concern over keeping the capital in the family. Personal wealth consists almost entirely of metals (especially copper) and domestic animals. Thus this is the capital involved in the financial transactions accompanying marriage, and in that way it is invested with interest (children, work, influence).

595x 556 ●157 Like all pagan people the Nkundó are essentially covetous and egoistic. They do not like to give but want everything for themselves. Except for persons to whom he is bound by natural ties or sincere affection, a Nkundó does not help others except through interdependence or in the hope of reciprocity in some form or other. Thus when he possesses an excess of wealth, even [431] if it is considerable and entirely superfluous, he does not yield it. The idea would never occur to him to give a few copper rings to an indigent bachelor, for example, if he is not forced to do so because of interdependence in the family. Thus, if there are more girls than boys, the excess bride price will be used by him to augment the number of his own wives. For in order that his daughter not be deprived of her nkita, the bride price received must be used again as a bride price. Note that this reasoning has but a limited validity. It is a fact that the ancient custom [372] was for the father to take all his daughters' bride prices for himself, as we have seen in Chapter IV. He did not become polygamous because of excess [bride price]; he was polygamous before his sons married.

595* 842 5) The desire to increase the number of children is one of the reasons most frequently given; it is the chief, and sometimes the only, one cited by ethnographers. There is no question that it has a great deal of validity, for the Nkundó like to have many children. It is one of the things on which they pride themselves as well as a powerful means for reinforcing a social position (and we are thus led back to the first reason cited).

The question of knowing whether polygamy actually does favor the birth rate is irrelevant here, even if the results of a comparison were clearly against this system and were it proved that "the more wives a polygamist has, the fewer children he has." For the Nkundó never make this statistical computation. He sees only the principle: several women give more children than one. And for them, that is the gist of the matter. Furthermore, the interest of the people as a whole does not appear on the
● [157] horizon of the Nkundó's thoughts and feelings: they think only of themselves, and in their egoism, they consider only their own interests.

595* 831 6) To all these reasons given by the Nkundó to justify the practice of polygamy, we must add a sixth, which they never mention, sensuality. Without colonization it would have been difficult for us to make this statement. [374] But the new state of affairs shows several flaws in our people's arguments. We have already pointed out some of them. Furthermore, all the reasons mentioned up to now do not suffice to account for the existence of polygamy. They do not explain why in the past the old men wanted to keep all the women to themselves, or why a given individual becomes a polygamist. It is a fact that for more than one man none of these alleged reasons have been involved. It is also known that several natives have acquired fortunes by European work (as clerks, salesmen, traders, etc.) in order to be able to establish a harem, though there could have been no motive of vanity or gain in social influence. On the basis of my knowledge of circumstances, persons, and places, I am convinced that even for some natives living in their villages, the primary purpose was clearly sexual. I am acquainted with more than one such case.

768
584 In the past the widower and his family sometimes refused to pay, with the result that the parties took up arms. The right of war was involved. For when the hostilities ended, the culprit was required to indemnify all the families on his side for any member who was killed or wounded. Therefore he ran the risk of seeing all his property confiscated and being sold as a slave if they did not suffice. He found it was wiser simply to submit to normal sanctions rather than run such serious risks.

The situation with which we are dealing in this article may involve further complications if the woman has been living with her own family, or if she belongs to another man whose bride price has not yet been refunded. But it is preferable to deal with these complications in separate articles.

768 2. Before the bosóngo

If the woman dies before the bosóngo is paid, the widower is not required to pay an indemnity. However, he must complete the bride price by handing over "the slave." [450]

If he does not do so: (1) the alliance is broken ipso facto, and therefore he cannot bring the ibóleóko and does not receive a substitute; 2) the family of the deceased is entitled to one of the daughters if there are any, or to one of the boys if there are none. This is a compensation for the loss of the bosóngo.

Naturally, the woman's family can in practice refrain from claiming their rights. Thus, they may do so out of regard for their son-in-law who is influential, generous, and well disposed toward them, in anticipation of greater financial and social benefits. The similar remarks made throughout this study have already ● [157] familiarized us with the "broad-mindedness" of these peoples.

It might be observed that this situation is in no way different from the preceding one, since the woman's family is indemnified in either case. But, first of all, if the woman has left no children, the situation is not at all identical. Secondly, even if the financial aspect of the two situations is the same, the legal aspect is entirely different. The taking of a child and the refusal to accept the ibóleóko are not considered as compensation. The 593x everything. But they only succeed if they have no sons old enough 586x to defend their mother. Differences in behavior are due to the character of the persons involved. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Article I.

797
593x
159 Only religion can bring about a radical change in this domain. We are still far from our goal, but a few serious Christians have already begun to adapt to the requirements of a higher morality and to deal with their wives in conformity with the sanctity of marriage though he or she may be ill. Yet it is more difficult for them to do this than for the others, since this same morality forbids [39] polygamy and all other means of satisfying passion.

An admirable case is that of Bekau Marie, daughter of Esalé D'Iámbo (Bonkoso). Her husband, Bo̲ko̲mbeembe Pierre of Mbalá, suffered from leprosy for many years. He could no more perform the sexual act than do any real work. His wife therefore had to support herself with the help of her son. In spite of her freedom, her separation from her native village, and the ill feelings borne her by her husband's family, she did not want to leave him but decided that she would continue to devote herself to him. (1)

1. Her action is due only in part to Christian influence. That is why this case belongs here to the exclusion of some others I could describe, which are due solely to the influence of Christian morality upon the souls of the individuals.

593x
578 If there is a dispute between her family and her husband, it is hard to know in advance which side the wife will take. Similarly, if difficulties arise between the husband's family and his wife, he can take either his wife's side or that of his relatives. It is all a matter of individual temperament. Some people spontaneously lend support to their families; others on the contrary take sides with their wives. A woman or a man who without good reason habitually takes

593x sides with his family against his wife does not have the approval of 578 those who judge the conflict simply as neutral spectators. In such a case it is usually felt that the couple do not love each other very much. And often the marriage soon breaks up. But if the union is maintained nevertheless, its continuation is generally attributed to a fear of the consequences of dissolving the marriage, which would be even worse. The same sort of variation among individuals is to be found in the matter of a wife's devotion to the interests of her husband's family.

593x It is not possible to compare a native household to the 593 households of good simple people at home, where [40] the family
596 is composed solely of parents and their children. Here it extends further; the husband's interests are also those of his parents, brothers, uncles, etc. As we will see in connection with marriage by inheritance it is not unusual for a woman to remain attached to her deceased husband's family. Others are more interested in enriching their own families.

593x The following is a historical instance of a wife who was very
● 159 devoted to her husband's interests, though there seemed to be room
579 in her make-up for pride and personal glory. (1): Bolɔ́mbɔ́ wǎ nsánjí, daughter of Bokombe of Litɔ́li (Bombwanja), was married to Bonyeme w'ɛ̌nyuká of Bonganda (Bonkoso). One day (her father having died in the meantime) she went back to visit her brother, Bompelí w'ělombo, who had left Litɔ́li to settle in his maternal village, Etɔ́o of the Boɛ́ndɛ́. They began to quarrel. Bompelí maintained that Bonyeme wasn't worth much, that his wealth was exaggerated, that it was a mistake to honor him, etc. Bolɔ́mbɔ́

1. According to my estimates, this episode is about a hundred years old. I knew two men who had recollections of it: the eldest (Longwokɔ́ of the Basɛ́ká Bengɔ́ngɔ́, Bongîli) was about twenty years old when it occurred. A greatgranddaughter of Bonyeme (Mputɔ́ Sofie) is now in her forties.

593x defended her husband. Finally, since they could not agree, Bompelí
● 159 ordered his sister not to return to her husband, so that she could be 579 married to another man. For he had decided to test the valor of Bonyeme by making war on him, and she could not see her husband taken prisoner by her own brother. Nevertheless, Bolámbá remained determined and departed in haste. When she reached her husband she told him everything. In the meantime all the Boéndé and other Bombwanja clans were taking up arms. Enyuká, for his part, passed the news on to all Bonkoso villages, as well as their relatives by marriage, dependents, and Batswá. The various groups of combatants stationed themselves near the village of Bonganda in what is today the forest of [41] Boóngónjou, between the Lomeké and the present location of Besombó, Lofelí, and Engónjó. The Boéndé army was taken unawares by the Bonkoso, who attacked and after furious combat routed them, leaving a number of dead on the field. Bonyeme proposed a peace. He took pride in not being surpassed in generosity. With a truly princely munificence he was not satisfied with only paying all the clans who had lost members but in addition sent Bompelí all that the latter needed in order to compensate Bombwanja groups for the loss of their members and, on top of this, brought him a whole fortune to complete Bolámbá's bride price.

589
587 The Nkundó are well acquainted with cases of widows who, having reached middle age, take a solemn oath not to remarry or ever go near a man again. Among the stronger sex such cases are almost nonexistent. Cases of women who, when sick and dying wanted to remain near their husbands, cited later (Chap. VI, Art. II, 4) should be noted here, as well as preferences for monogamy (Chap. VII, Art. VI, VII).

581
593x Bearing in mind the explanation given at the outset, I think I can state that most marriages contracted by the Nkundó are love matches. Marriage for political reasons or for certain material advantages have certainly existed. And especially at the present time, there are parents who push their children into marriage for the sake of financial or social gains.

Our conclusions may not be accepted by a number of colonials. Yet I feel they are valid in the limited sense indicated here. Arguments

101 classifies the Bakela (or Boyéla), who are unquestionably pure Móngo, among the Wakutshu [Wakusu] or Batetela is highly significant.

●161 It is impossible to give an exact figure for the size of the population we have just defined. In any case one can estimate that it is more than a million.

184 Throughout the huge territory occupied by this people, only insignificant differences in institutions or language can be observed. Greater divergences appear in the material manifestations of culture.

101
563 In my opinion it is likely that certain groups which belong among the Nkundo-Móngo as far as culture and speech are concerned, may be distinguished from them in genealogy and history. Among these are the true Elima or riverain people (the Bolóki, the Eleku, the Elingá of the upper Lomela and the upper Tshuapa), (2) the Ngombe tribes of the Lomela, the Mbólé, the Bakutu of the Lomela-Tshuapa (with whom one should probably include the Ntómbá and the Nkóle), (3) and perhaps also the Mpámá and the Losakanyi. (4). This likelihood

---

2. We exclude a few Libinja and Basokó clans living near Coquilhatville, since they are clearly of alien origin. The native name for the Tshuapa [River] is Jwafa or Jafa and, higher up, Lwafa. Among the Bongandó and the Bahamba it is called the Laha.

3. See my article in Congo, 1931, Vol.1, pp. 21 ff.

4. The latter are erroneously called Losakanja by Father Schebesta in Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 199. They seem to have lived formerly on the lower Momboyo River (Luilaka); the land on which Flandria Mission has been established still bears their name.

Nkundu

10. Conclusion

182 Nkundo society was a fully alive, organic community. All of its organs functioned and were able to adjust continually to the changes in its life. Ethnically, socially-legally, and politically, they were open to every improvement. The organs with which it was built stood nearest to natural law and drew their rights and duties from it, and also the spirit which inspired them.

The facts prove that this society could survive. It arose at the source of the Lomako; in a short time it had extended itself peacefully over the whole central area of the Congo; it pressed eastward across the Lomami and Lualaba, and southward across the Kaisai /Kasai/-Sankuru, to occupy about a fifth of the present Congo at the time of the arrival of the Whites.

182 This society was open to all healthy influences and could adapt it-
171 self to all reasonable demands of civilization. It was, however, not reconcilable with what precisely is wrong in our European ideas about progress and civilization: elimination of all ethnic intermediary organs, equalization of all individuals, materialization of all life on the basis of economic competition, slave-like submission to the impersonal, unpaternal State, with that terrible pretense of freedom, of being able to do everything that is not forbidden by the State.

178 This suddenly attained freedom, which was accompanied by the 161 abolition of all the former joints of society, means the death of the Nkundo /161/ community, not only in its soul, its being, but also in its existence. The gradual depopulation, the dying out in the Middle Congo, has had repercussions now and then, even in government circles. "The Nkundo-Mongo population is melting away like snow before the sun," is the brief content of the last official report. The Waola, between the Ruki and the Ikelemba /rivers/, had in 1939 ninety deaths and three births. The official statistics of 1939 of the territory of Coquilhatville give one hundred adults for every twenty-four children. The official data of the same year for the Vicariate of Coquilhatville, with its 382, 736 inhabitants, give a ratio of 415 children to 1, 000 adults. According to these data, the whole population will be decreased by more than 50 percent by the following generation, thus dwindled to less than one-half.

Coquilhatville, 1939

614 each other to employ their own messengers. When the messenger
621 of settlement II arrives here, he first calls on the messenger of 624 the nuclear kinship group Bosɔ́bɛ́ (No. 19) and then to Impɛ́nga 202 (No. 26). The messenger from Bosɔ́bɛ́ calls on his relatives in settlement VI, who are the nuclear kinship group Mbelo-Mmuna
(No. 22), while the messenger from Impɛ́nga-Ndongɔ́ formerly had to call on the group Bommambo which is now extinct.

Settlement V consisted of three different groups. Bolíma, the group of the father, had its own messenger; however, he only received the messages without having to pass them on, which is also the case with all these last groups of the village. Both neighbors had their own messenger. The messenger from settlement I called on the nuclear kinship group Bolesangi, his relatives; the messenger from settlement III went to his relatives of the nuclear kinship group Ituli.

There were also two messengers in the last hamlet, but reports on this subject are insufficient since the nuclear kinship group Bommambo has been extinct for a long time.

178 All the settlements just mentioned have a common
614 characteristic: formerly, at important dance festivals, their 621 young men performed together in one joint corps de ballet. The 535 population was decimated as a result of the rigors of [201] the [661] occupation period and also as a result of the population movement into the cities. Consequently, there are not enough young people any more, and I with II, III with IV, and V with VI act together. Thus, in each case we find Ngelɛ́ and Nkoto united in one ballet. Although these groups have also been scattered [361] as a result of the new settlement pattern (next to the highway), the old organizational structure has been preserved, and the young people do not hesitate to walk the long distance to the practice field every day so they can dance in the old groupings.

All of Isangi, all three kinship groups, have one common
621 village chief, the Nkúmú, with an iyolo nsáka who gets the meet-
624 ings started, and a village court with its judges. There are other 622 groups which correspond to Isangi (31), but have more than one

---

31. See Müller, Fürstentum, pp. 73 ff., 76 ff., 133 f.

583 to an old, worn-out, gray-haired man, it naturally often occurred that when she arrived at maturity, she no longer wished to remain with him. She therefore left him and went to another, or back to her family. In the latter case, however, great difficulties arose concerning the return of the bride price. Indeed, with the bride price the father had received for his daughter, he bought himself another wife. This wife was then called the Nkita of the daughter. We could translate Nkita in this case as "substitute." The Nkita represented the value of the sold or married daughter. Meanwhile, the daughter herself was often the Nkita of the daughter or sister of her husband. Thus, many women were the Nkita of each other. According to their customs, the children (boys) were in theory the heirs of the Nkita of their mother. The Nkita was, in fact, the value or the bride price of their mother.

One might ask whether the wife was then always content that she was, so to speak, an object of trade. In general, yes, she was satisfied with this. This is how the customs were, and nobody gave a thought to changing them. Usually the wife simply found herself in an arranged situation (fait accompli). Gradually a certain sense of honor is coming into being among the Christian wives against these heathen customs.

If the woman desired that a large bride price or purchase price be paid for her, was it also because she wished to care for the future of her children who would be heirs of her bride price? No, they say, not for that reason -- for, they add, what woman knew in advance that she would have children, and moreover boys? There
●[163] are, in fact, many women who have no children. Also, [536] only 583 the boys are eligible for the inheritance; the girls are heirs only in 428 name. When it came to the inheritance, the children inherited the 587 Nkita of their mother only if there were no more brothers of the mother or uncles on their father's side. The mightiest always had the greatest right.

Usually a youth had to acquire a wife with the bride price or supplement of the bride price of his sister. The inheritance of the Nkita of his mother was only secondary. Still we often see a heathen wife leave her husband in order to go to another, without bothering much about her children who remain with the deserted husband, their father.

582 593 864 conquered only by repeated assaults of passion. Thus it is generally known among the natives that young women used to seek refuge in their mother's house when the husband wanted to begin making use of his rights as a husband. The mother would try to persuade her daughter to submit to the law of life. But sometimes, if her child seemed too resistant, the mother made excuses for her and asked the husband to consider her daughter's youth. The man usually wanted to remain on good terms with his mother-in-law so he did not insist and resigned himself to waiting till nature influenced the spirit and heart of his wife.

Since young people were brought up in deep fear of dangerous relations, it should not surprise us that this feeling became a real habit and did not disappear spontaneously the moment a certain degree of liberty was permitted. As a matter of fact, could we not make similar observations in Europe?

This is the natural explanation for the praiseworthy degree of morality among adolescents in the past.

171 836 864 Nowadays all that has changed. The young people follow where their passions lead them. Not the slightest check is placed on their impulses. Parents pay only slight attention to the conduct of their children. [82] It is better not to inquire into the morality of modern youth. Husbands no longer respect the bodies of their adolescent brides, who are themselves quite used to a sexual life and eagerly look forward to it, and no longer know the feeling of "the fear of men." Should we then be astonished at the frightening de- ● [161] crease in the birth rate (1) and the ever increasing spread of venereal diseases, which seem to have been unknown in the past?

The reasons for this change will be investigated further on, under the letter C.

836 B. Between adults. Here the Nkundó are very lenient. There is a difference, however, between the socio-legal and moral viewpoints, although as we shall see the latter is influenced by the former.

[582] A woman is entirely free, legally speaking, as long as the first payment on her bride price has not been made. No man has

---

1. The natives say that in the past young wives quickly became pregnant. And now ...

Teke FI33
Sakata FO43

M 224 weapon. As he passes, the pachyderm strikes and dislodges the crossbar, springs the trigger, disrupts the suspension, and the spear falls heavily upon him. The trap is arranged in such a way as to hit the animal on the nape of the neck.

M 224 411 The native hunts with bow and arrow as well as with spear. The bow and arrow, however, is more a weapon than a hunting instrument.

The peoples in the territory between the Congo and the Kasai, as well as the Baboma of the Fimi have now given up these weapons. A few privileged persons own percussion guns which are usually more dangerous to the hunter than to the hunted. When the native fires a shot, he extends his arms, directs the barrel towards the prey, and turns his head aside. If, through cunning and patience, he gets to within a few meters of the game without arousing its attention, the shot has a chance [66] of success. Ordinarily the animal is more or less gravely wounded, unless the overloaded gun explodes in the hands of the imprudent hunter.

S T 411 322 The Bateke, Banfumu, and Baboma store powder in small receptacles made of a simple calabash or cut out of a block of hard wood. The calabashes are sometimes covered with a sheath of serpent or lizard skin to protect the powder more effectively from dampness. The wooden powder flasks are usually pear-shaped, probably to imitate the shape of the calabash. They have a wooden cover that fits very tightly into the body of the object, and the leather strap for hanging it up is attached to two holes cut in the body of the receptacle and drawn through two side openings in the cover. S T [53] Very often these carved powder flasks are decorated with designs engraved in bas relief, linear motifs arranged in bands. The lines are sometimes curved, sometimes straight, and sometimes also oblique. The bottom of the powder flask is flat so that it may be placed upright [67] on a horizontal surface. The body of the powder flask extends into the straight cylindrical neck onto which the cover is fitted.

M 411 [71] The bow with rattan thong is relatively rare. We found it only among the Tumba, Balesa, Bobaie, Batete [Tete], Ipanga, Batitu, and the Pygmies. This bow is made with a rattan stem, its convex section facing out and its flat section facing in. The rattan thong is attached to the two ends after having been drawn through

FO32
Sakata FO43

S
224
346
778

"Did not the bananas belong to the nkisi? This bunch was taboo! No one had the right to take a banana from it!" Several natives rushed into the banana groves and brought back quantities of bananas. They had their hands full of them. They offered all of them to me in exchange for the one banana taken from the tree of the nkisi, and when I finally gave it to them, they fastened it under the roof inside the nkisi shelter.

S
224
778

In the Bobaie village of Madjulu, the nkisi hut is replaced by a large basket, surrounded by large blocks of wood and covered with grass. A large, broken pot for cooking chikwangue [Ed., [illegible] manioc cakes] was placed on top of it. Several sticks were placed around it, and at the top of two of them the natives had hung large calabashes. Here again I found it impossible to get precise information about the use or [80] significance of each of these objects. The few skulls of small antelopes inside the basket were again vaguely reminiscent of the Bateke-Bamfumu custom of huts for the nkisi of the hunt.

M
[171]●

Among the Tumba, the Wadia on the right shore of Lake Leopold II, and the Mosengere, all traces of such huts disappear. In the Wadia village of Ibeli, a large pot was placed on top of a branch which ended in a trident with diverging spikes. This pot was three-fourths full of a reddish, very thick mud. A few splints

Fig. 50. Bobaie Hunting Fetish, Village of Madjulu.

Take F133

M 276 Aside from this characteristic form, we found another which is no less interesting. The bowl and tube are always made from the hollowed branch of a special species of tree. The shape is slightly curved, and the top end slightly flared to form the bowl. At the other end of the tube, the native attaches a small spheroidal calabash with two holes, one of which serves as the mouthpiece. This calabash is lightly stuffed with raffia fibers and dry grass to filter the tobacco smoke.

M 276 531 Other than this primitive form, we collected a few pipes belonging to the same category, but with the calabash mouthpiece replaced by a wooden one, sometimes decorated with carved linear designs and with small copper strips inlaid in the wood.

M 276 ● 171 We found, then, two very characteristic pipe shapes in the Yaelima-Bankutsu region which seem to indicate a certain ethnic relationship among these different peoples. We do not know if these same shapes are found among the peoples of the Dekese region, but it seems quite probable to us. We found this same type along the north bank of the Sankuru between Lodi and Isaka, so the ethnic zone characterized by these two special forms of the native pipe, at least in the region south of Dekese, includes the whole area from Bumbuli to Bena Dibele-Kole. These types are also found outside this territory, notably to the north among the Bakuba and Bashilele. It must be noted, however, [159] that the pipe with a femur for the mouthpiece is extremely rare in the north, while that with a calabash mouthpiece is very seldom seen in the south. This seems to indicate that we have here a zone of contact where we once more find evidence of ethnic relationships between the peoples of this region and the tribes to the north and south. It may be inferred from this that the Bakuba and Bashilele tribes of the Kasai-Sankuru region are connected with the peoples between the Sankuru and the Lukenie and that they even have ethnic affinities with the peoples whose territory extends much farther north.

T 276 171 In the region of the Banfumu and Bateke, we find two types of tobacco pipes, one with a large bowl for communal smoking, the other smaller, with an earthenware bowl and a wooden tube and mouthpiece, used individually by both the women and the men. Along with these pipes, we also found several specimens

T 276 171 with the bowl and tube made of iron. These pipes are usually very long and cruder than the small clay pipes with wooden tubes. Moreover, it is probable that the latter were copied from imported models. We found them chiefly in villages near the large centers and the government posts. Their shape is strikingly similar to that of imported pipes.

● M T 276 ● 171 We found this same type among the Bayanzi of the right bank of the Kasai and north of Kwamouth. These natives are thus connected with the Bateke-Banfumungu group. Thus a new ethnic zone appears, and the territory we visited may be subdivided in this respect into three ethnic regions.

The first one includes all the territory occupied by the Bateke-Banfumungu, the Bayanzi, and part of the Baboma, and it is characterized:

1) by the use of a calabash pipe, a nkisi fetish, for smoking hemp;

2) by the use of pipes with large clay bowls, for smoking tobacco communally, and the small tobacco pipe, the property of the individual, used by both men and women. [160]

The second one extends from the mouth of the Fimi to the confines of Batitu territory.

The hemp pipe is not nkisi. The tobacco pipe, very primitive, is made from the rib of a banana leaf and very often has a wooden or clay bowl. The woman smokes neither tobacco nor hemp, and the custom of smoking the pipe communally is not much in favor.

The third zone is the one where we found the wooden tobacco pipe with a calabash mouthpiece or a neck of monkey bone. It includes the whole Yaelima-Bankutshu region, taking in the Bashilele and Bakuba and, very probably, the Dengese region.

M 276 As a rule, the natives like to smoke tobacco very much. They prefer doing it when the weather is cold, maintaining that it heightens the body heat.

M 241 Tobacco is not cultivated on a large scale. The crop is always strictly limited to the needs of the person who plants it. When the native wants to smoke tobacco, he plucks a leaf from the plant, dries it at the hearth, crushes it, and reduces it to powder. A pinch of this crudely ground tobacco is placed in the

Take F1 33

M 301
M [779]

on all the fingers of the hand. Those who can afford it even put them on their toes. Around the neck they wear fiber necklaces, from which they hang nkisi bags and horns. These amulet necklaces are associated with a religious idea, with magic power, rather than with ornamentation.

M 301 857

Children are usually overloaded with gaudy ornaments: white feathers stuck in the hair, necklaces and belts of glass beads, and small bells attached to the belt. In our opinion, however, these objects are not primarily intended to adorn the child, but to protect it. There is no doubt that the mother sticks the feathers in her child's hair and attaches small bells to his belt in order to find him more easily if he gets lost in the fields or in the bush. As soon as the child is old enough to find his own way and return to the village alone, bells and feathers are given up permanently. [185]

T [292 301 302]

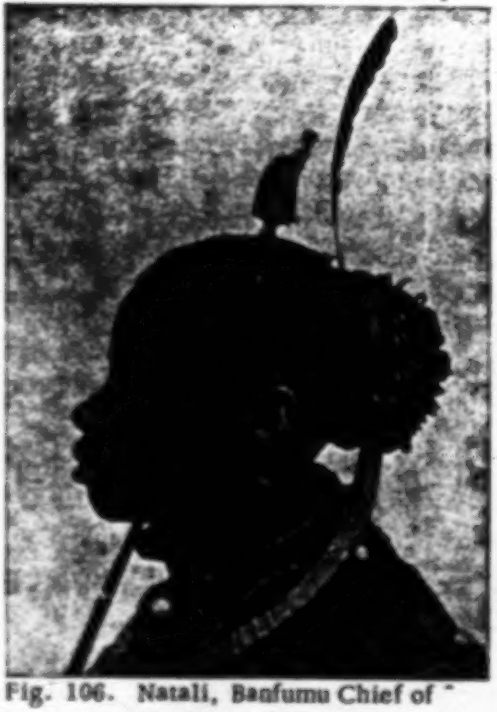

Fig. 106. Natali, Banfumu Chief of Kapanda.

M 301 171

According to their ornaments, the peoples of the Stanley Pool-Kole region are divided into five groups.

The first one includes the Bateke-Banfumu-Baboma, among whom ornaments are relatively rare for the women as well as for the men. 301 171

The second one encompasses all the peoples in the region of Lake Leopold II and the lower Lukenie and is characterized by the solid brass necklace worn by the women and the ornaments trimmed with cowries and the brass plaques worn by the dignitaries and chiefs.

The third one includes the Ipanga and the Batitu, with the belt ornamented with brass beads, rings on the fingers and toes, and solid brass rings worn above the ankles, all of which are peculiar to the women.

Fig. 107. A Group of Batitu Children.

142
516
855

The fourth group is characterized by the sheath of brass rings covering the arm from wrist to elbow and worn as much by the men as by the women of the Bokala-Yaelima.

The fifth group includes the Bena Dibele-Kole region, where imported ornaments have replaced the primitive ones. [186]

In addition to all these adornments used regularly in common, everyday life, the native also has ornaments reserved for show and ceremony. 301

Sakata FO43
Teke F133

M
5
304
171

We have seen earlier that among the Bateke, Banfumungu, and Baboma, the man's characteristic tattoo consists of lines scratched on the face, while that of the woman consists of small dots in relief, juxtaposed in parallel lines, more or less horizontal, covering the body from the pit of the stomach to the lower abdomen. This same design [192] is found among the women of all the riparian peoples of Lake Leopold II and among the tribes of the Lukenie up to the Bumbuli sector. It must be noted, however, that in this last region the relief is less clear and less pronounced.

M
304
171
[142]

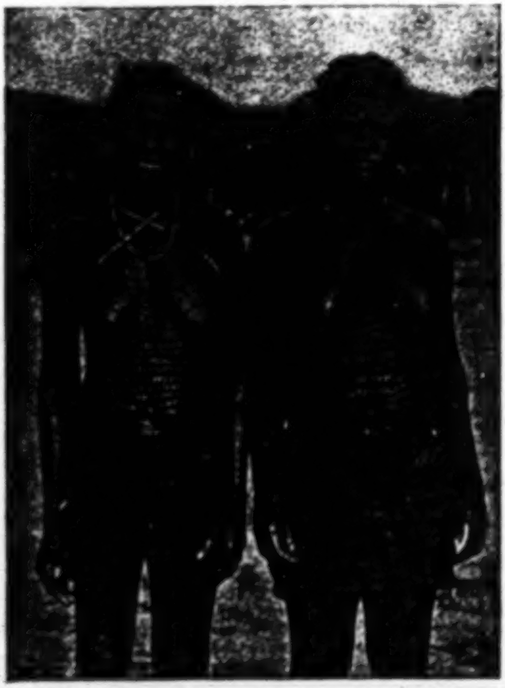

Fig. 116. Tattooing among the Women of Lake Leopold II and the Lower Lukenie.

Moreover, as a general rule, the relief gradually decreases as one goes farther from the lake. In this respect, then, all these peoples seem to belong to the same ethnic group, and it is probable that this characteristic tattooing is one of the traits of the ancestral civilization, retained until the present time by all

Sakata FO43

M 304 171 the branches of the original group despite migrations and displacements. In the same region, the tattoo of the man is a small rosette, consisting of a large central dot and two or three concentric circles in relief, decorating the temples. In the region north of Lake Leopold II, the native usually adds to this a line of small dots all across the forehead.

M S 304 Among the Tumba, Mosengere, Wadia, and Basakata-Bobaie-Balesa, on the other hand, this line is replaced by a series of small incisions in relief which form a little cock's crest in the hollow at the root of the nose.

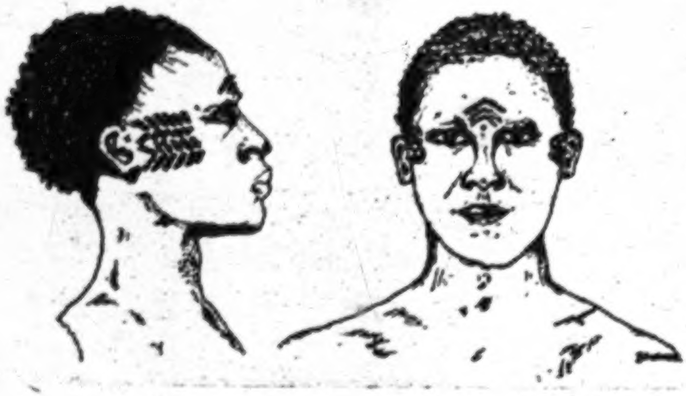

Fig. 117. Batitu-Ipanga Tattoos.

Among all these tribes the woman has also adopted the racial tattoo, although it must be noted that we quite often met women with no tattooing on their faces, while others had the rosette alone, the rosette [193] and the cock's crest, or the line crossing the forehead, and sometimes the three tattoos were combined.

This irregularity in the application of facial tattoos leads us to suppose that this tattooing is more a matter of vanity for the women of these various tribes than a practice imposed by the usages and customs, while for the men this artificial deformation is a true distinguishing mark imposed by local tradition.

M 304 Among the Ipanga and Batitu, tattoos include designs on the face and on the breastbone. The chest tattoo consists of a vertical line of small linear scars, obliquely parallel and slightly

D
M
304 Tattoos on the chest and the upper and lower abdomen are less uniformly worn by the women of this region, but where they do exist the design is always outstandingly symmetrical. It is formed by small juxtaposed dots in strong relief.

M
304 To sum up, we believe that we may divide the racial tattoos of the various populations we visited into four groups.

●171 The first consists of the tattoo of the Bateke-Banfumungu-Baboma, made with a comb.

The second is characterized by the rosette on the temples and the semi-concentric crest at the root of the nose, and this includes all the riparian peoples of Lake Leopold II and the Lukenie, with the exception of the Ipanga-Batitu.

The third group is distinguished by the semi-concentric crest at the root of the nose and the palm-leaf designs at the temples, which we observed among the Ipanga-Batitu and up to the Bokala region.

Lastly, the fourth group is marked by the small, raised dots with which the woman of the Bena Dibele-Kole region adorns her neck and forehead, as well as by the characteristic figure on the upper arm.

We have noted earlier that, thanks to photographs by Mr. Van den Broech, we were able to verify the fact that the peoples of the Dekese sector are related particularly to their western neighbors as far as tattooing is concerned, although they [199] show strong resemblances to the eastern tribes. Their territory, therefore, should be regarded as a mixed zone or an area of transition between the two ethnic groups.

The study of the different figures of ornamental tattooing permits us to subdivide the region we visited into two large provinves.

The first one includes all the peoples who have few ornamental tattoos, and these few are not very elaborate. In this case, there are no true figures involved, for the tattoos invariably consist of small dots aligned horizontally.

This region extends from Leopoldville to Oshwe.

The second one includes the tribes with highly elaborate ornamental tattoos. This province covers the rest of the region we visited, and its major center is the Yaelima region. The study

YAelimA

304 we made of the many figures we saw in this region showed us that
● 171 the variations are so numerous, so diverse, and so closely intertwined that it is totally impossible to use this as a basis for determining ethnic sectors with clearly-defined characteristics.

304 171 833 Finally, if we consider only those tattoo figures to which we attributed, if not a familial origin, at least a familial nature [200] (incitement to sexual relations), we see that throughout the region this type of tattoo is peculiar to women.

[302 142]

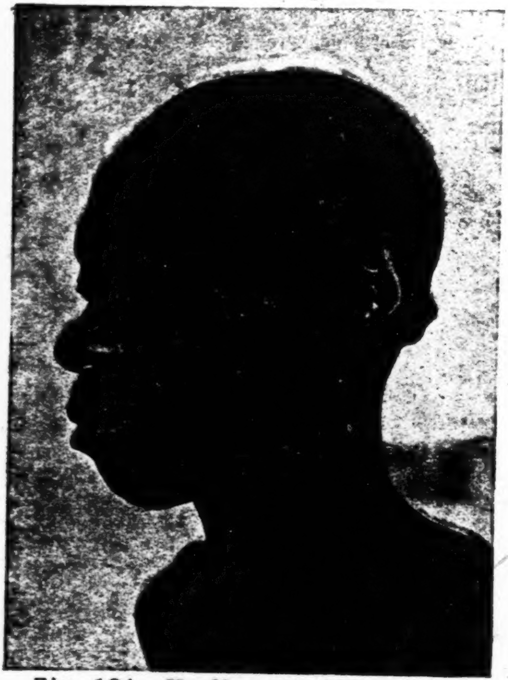

Fig. 124. Yaelima Headdress and Tattooing. Typical Longomo or Dignitary.

From Leopoldville to the confines of Batitu territory and even among some Bokala women, this tattoo consists (where it still exists) of a number of small, aligned dots, just like the ornamental tattoos.

Among the Ipanga-Batitu, these figures sometimes embellish the arms and part of the back, while among the other tribes they are less elaborate.

304
171
833
In the region of the Yaelima, Dengese, and some of the Bokala, this tattoo consists of a series of broken, concentric lines with the pubic region as the main center.

We do not know if this tattoo is also worn by the Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu women, but this seems probable to us. We can, however, assert that among those peoples this tattoo does not extend to the upper thighs, except for one or two lines of small incised dots running parallel to the fold of the groin.

[142]
[302]

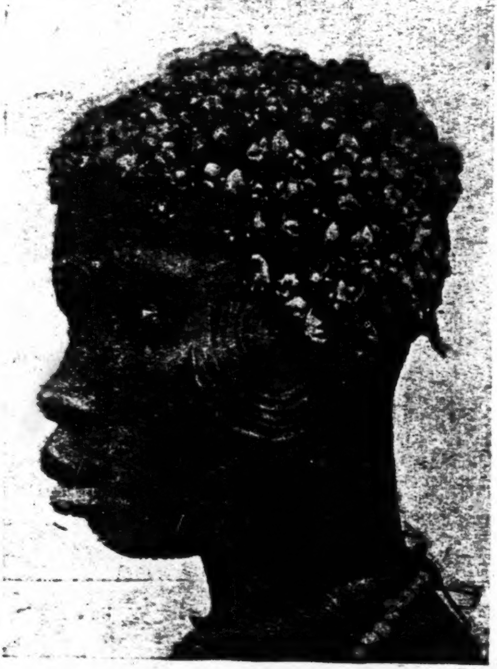

Fig. 125. Yaelima Tattoing and Headdress Adorned with Peanuts Smeared with Ngula.

The incisions for ornamental and sexual tattoos are usually made by women, although a man sometimes takes over this task.

304
The operation is carried out at very irregular intervals and at practically any [201] time of life. Moreover, it requires several sittings, usually spaced from 10 to 15 days apart.

The tattooing knife, which is also used for depilation, consists of a small, broad iron blade with a curved, very sharp cutting edge.

585 836 To say that it makes absolutely no difference to him might be too extreme a statement. But it is certainly not very important to him, since the primary purpose of his marriage is to obtain progeny and to follow his natural instinct in an honest fashion. This does not mean that he likes to marry a woman of loose morals; quite the contrary.

171 585 836 What is the linguistic data on the subject of virginity? In an interesting paper entitled "The Principles of Bantu Marriage" (Africa Vol. 2, No. 3 (1929), p. 255), E. Torday says, "Some of the most competent philologists assure us that in most Bantu languages there is no word for 'virgin'; . . . . The Wachagga, who may be an exception, use the word 'unimpaired,' and it is perhaps in the use of similar expressions, not exclusively applied to physical virginity, that we shall find the explanation of the absence of a specific term."

585 836 192 Thus the Lonkundó have a noun: ekáté. It is derived from the root kát (the verb is -kátema), which means "to be firmly attached, to be tenacious" (e.g., lokátó, "tenacity"). Ekáté designates something which is difficult to open, to separate, to break up, especially fruit with a tough, hard, thick rind. It is applied to the litófé, lisénjá, and the lindongó when it is impossible to break the shell which contains the edible portion even though the fruit is ripe. [79] This term is used in a figurative sense for a woman who resists seduction, who "does not allow herself to be opened." It is not at all specific and in no way the equivalent of our word "virginity," rather it seems to signify "chastity."

Other Nkundó tribes seem to have a specific word, bokotó. I learned this term from natives living between the Ikelemba and the Tshuapa, both east and west of the Julé, as well as from some Baséká Bǒngwalanga from the old Lulonga District. The missionaries of the Apostolic Prefecture of Basankusu use it in their publications to mean "virginity, virgin." I was not able to get an exact idea of its precise meaning, but as far as I was able to make out it is much closer to "virgin chastity" than ekáté. In any case it includes no reference to physical virginity. (1)

000

1. We should not be astonished that "primitive" tribes have no word in their language

595x
554 The name bolɔ́mbɔ́ seems to come from the fact that for an instant during the installation ceremony the woman is naked. In fact in certain dialects the word means "nudity."

[557] Nowadays this name is common among Nkundó women (rarely men), but it does not indicate that they are bolɔ́mbɔ́. The name is borne in memory of ancestresses or relatives who had that position and is transmitted in the family like any other name.

[184] All the tribes under discussion here use the same term, bolɔ́mbɔ́. The Bombomba alone say boálɛ́. (2)

2. Elsewhere, as in the Losanganya region, among the Bosaka, etc., the bolɔ́mbɔ́ is called ekila (interdiction, taboo).

It is clear from everything that has been said that the nkóndé and the bolɔ́mbɔ́ have nothing in common with each other. [353] The two institutions are decidedly different. Nowadays they are beginning to be confused with each other, however. [178] For the installation of a bolɔ́mbɔ́ has become extremely rare, and in some regions it has already disappeared. The colonial government has established districts and appointed chiefs in charge of them. Very frequently, they are not those who in the purely indigenous order would have been the most influential men, the masters, those who would have the biggest say in their society, who would be said to have the joko, the first place.

As far as I have been able to observe, the other tribes on the equator also have the two types of wives with special positions, who bear names which vary with the dialects.

● 171
595x
554 Do the Ntómbá and the Bolénge between the Boloko and the Congo have only the bolɔ́mbɔ́? That is the conclusion one draws from Engels' study of the Wangata (Revue congolaise, Vol. 2, no. 1, p. 33). If that were so, the frequent contacts with this people may have increased the confusion even more. Natives who are strangers to the Bolénge tribe but who have lived many years among them as catechists, have maintained, however, that

● 171 595 534 they distinguish very clearly between the bolɔ́mbɔ́ and the favorite. They even added that the nkɔ́rɔ́ enjoy no privileges in this realm. (1)

> 1. The institution of the nkɔ́rɔ́ is not very widespread among the tribes treated in our study. (See "Les Coutumes funéraires des Nkundó [Funeral customs of the Nkundo]," in Anthropos) (in press).

In the course of a visit I myself made to the western Bolɛ́ngɛ́ (in September, 1933), I learned that a man who had a special position could have two belɔ́mbɔ́; the bomátsa proposed her ebísa as candidate, and the second wife did the same for hers. Thus there was a bolɔ́mbɔ́ w'ǐlóme and a bolɔ́mbɔ́ w'ǐáli (the latter more especially called ekila. I also observed that they made a very clear distinction between bolɔ́mbɔ́ and [354] nkóndɛ́, just like the peoples treated in this study.

As to the function of messenger, which is attributed to the bolɔ́mbɔ́ by Engels (as well as by Father Kaptein, in Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 532), it is not performed more by her than by any other woman in the harem. Any of them, without distinction based on rank or date of marriage, may be charged with a mission. The only custom of this sort which involves such a distinction is found among the Bolɛ́ngɛ́-Ntɔ́mbá living between the Congo and the Boloko. It is as follows: an influential [728] man sometimes sent his belɔ́mbɔ́ (one or two) to stop a quarrel, or even a battle between two villages. When she intervened, the opposing parties made a truce, pending the arrival and the decision of her husband in person.

Article IV. The Ebísa

595 583 An ebísa is a woman taken as wife by the husband of one of her relatives -- a sister, aunt, or older cousin. The relative 765 Incontinence is severely punished by the deceased; she molests the culprit and even drags him or another person who is in mourning to the grave.

[352] The severity of the seclusion is lessened at the time of the ceremony which marks the widower's return to a small bed raised ● [171] above the ground. It is made from tree trunks or branches in the manner of the Batswá. The widower is washed by the deceased's elder sister and then is led to the bed by his elder brother's wife. He receives a knife from his father, and from then on is permitted to perform his usual tasks.

A widower (or widow) must purchase gradual dispensations from prohibitions of foods, in contrast to relatives, who are simply released (Coutumes funéraires [Funeral Customs], Vol. 2, no. 2, E). This distinction shows the fundamental difference that exists between mourning for a spouse and for a relative. In the first instance, it is a strict social obligation from which he can be absolved only by a purchase, a compensation, or commutation of sorts; in the second instance, it is a convention from which a person is freed without any ceremony or compensation. The fact that this regulation is extended to the close relatives of the widower (or widow) does not lessen the validity of this conclusion. On the contrary, it corroborates it. For [421] the persons to whom the rule applies remain clearly in the affinal line; the regulation is never extended to relatives of the deceased.

After the death of a husband, his widows and the wives of his close relatives buy dispensations from the deceased's kinswomen. After a wife's death, the husband and his close relatives buy them from their own wives. The total amount of the purchase made by all the persons involved must be divided. Half goes to the women who have married into the clan; the other half is kept for the family of the deceased.

Like all periods of mourning, that of the widower -- with all the regulations and prohibitions involved -- ends in a great feast. When the family of the deceased have performed their duties, they organize a second feast at their own home, and the widower is

M 101 does not exclude the possibility of a distant kinship, but the present 569 state of our knowledge makes the solution to this question impossible; for very close resemblances may be explained by a common origin as well as by a period of living in close contact, and differences may be due to diverse origins [5] or to a temporary separation at a certain point in history.

P M 101 563 144 A considerable number of Pygmoids or Pygmiforms (1) (Batswá, Jöfe, Balómbe, Bilángi, Boné) are to be found scattered among the Nkundó. They share a community of social and economic interests with their "masters." The Botswá belongs to his master and depends on him, but he is not, strictly speaking, his slave. His master not only has rights over him; he also has obligations to fulfill. Most of the Pygmoids are to be found in the western part of Nkundó territory; in the east they are very rare.

M 101 173 The Nkundó-Móngo came from the north or northeast, while the Mbólé claim to have come from the northwest, and the Bakutu from the west. (2)

M 101 A word should be said about the name of these people. Ordinarily, we call them the Nkundó-Móngo. The first of these names is used in the west and in the south, the second especially in the north and in the east. The Elángá of the Losanganya region are called the Mongo éâ Lolo, or the Upstream Móngo, by the peoples to the west of them. Foreigners call all these peoples, including the Nkundó, the Mbólé, the Bakutu, etc., by the name of Móngo. In literature one sometimes encounters the name of Lolo or Balolo. (3) But, as we have seen, lolo is not a proper noun but simply the word meaning "upstream"

1. This name was proposed by Father Schebesta, op. cit., p. 170.

2. See my study, previously cited, passim.

3. For example, the name of the Protestant mission of the Lulonga is "Congo Balolo Mission."

101
619
[825] recollection of an animal of the leopard family which they call bokonga. Their description of it corresponds to the lion. Some soldiers and other expatriates, who were also young people, shown representations of a lion immediately identified it with their bokonga.

The groups under discussion here lived for a time on the banks of the Luwo (Maringa) and the [11] upper Ikelemba, (1) then under pressure from other Mɔ́ngɔ tribes, they crossed the Tshuapa-Ruki. They evicted the Ekonda and settled in their present location. This exodus must have taken place a fairly long time ago; it is impossible to determine the date and difficult to make any estimates. In any case it must have occurred 150 to 200 years ago.

● [173] 1. It appears that between the Ikelemba and its tributary the Loɛlifa, there is still a bonkom tree called w'ãmɛnga (of bald heads) under which, according to tradition, the ancestors held their councils. Nearby there is a bosɛɛ whose fruits never ripen.

241 These peoples are primarily farmers; they grow chiefly bananas, manioc, yams, colocasia [taro], sweet potatoes, sugar cane, and various vegetables and condiments. The food crops they grow, together with what they gather and the Elaeis palm trees provide them with a continuous and abundant food supply, as long as elephants do
[231] not interfere. Their domestic animals include chickens, goats, and 224 dogs. (2) Hunting is a pleasant change of activity rather than an

[177] 2. Ducks have been introduced fairly recently, but they were known long before colonial times. They came from the south. Sheep have been introduced only in the last few decades, and they are found only in a few villages on the river banks in the lowlands.

7:Brow[illegible]4-5 (ca. 1940) 1944

FO32 Mongo FO32
Ntomba

THE NKUMU OF THE TUMBA

RITUAL CHIEFTAINSHIP ON THE MIDDLE CONGO

H. D. BROWN

101 [133] THE tribes living round Lake Tumba, a lake some thirty-five miles long by twelve wide lying north of Lake Leopold II (approximately 0° 50′ south latitude, and 18° east longitude) and draining into the Congo River at the confluence of the Ubangi, lack cohesion and show a considerable variety of custom and language. But they are known collectively as Tumba, the Government adaptation of the Native term Ntomba. Most of them are found to the east of the lake, the whole group numbering perhaps little more than forty to fifty thousand at the present time, though [147] there is evidence that the last twenty years have seen a great decrease in population. European occupation of this area goes back barely fifty years, Protestant missions having been established for about the same length of time. The first mission post [171] was established at Ikoko on the north-east shore of the lake, one of the villages of a group known as Bonginda. In pursuing this investigation particular attention has been given to the practices of this group, but mention is occasionally made where considerable differences have been found elsewhere.

105 13 The Tumba are agricultural, hunting, and fishing people. Their country is flat and swampy with dense forests, and there are many watercourses flowing into Lake Tumba. There are occasional small, less swampy plains, and one such area, more open, with quite wide stretches of prairie, is a haunt of buffalo. The forests are fairly well supplied with game, and the swamps, streams, and lakes with fish. A heavy rainfall and no distinct dry season make agriculture reasonably easy and famine unknown. Every family has its plantation of manioc, the staple diet, which is supplemented by plantains and bananas. The people make their own tools, formerly smelting their own iron for this purpose, are fairly skilful at making dug-out canoes, engage in weaving raffia and making mats out of split cane, and are efficient at pottery production.

624 101 178 The role of the nkumu in the socio-religious activities of the community is one of the most interesting features of Tumba life. As a result of European contact the ceremonies connected with the nkumu are rapidly disappearing, but it has been possible to collect considerable information from the older men and women among whom the details are still vividly remembered.[1] The following report refers to the period previous to European occupation and control, a time within the memory of a large number of people, but already sufficiently remote to become a matter of hearsay before the lapse of many more years.

585 [173] An understanding of the place of the nkumu among the Tumba requires a glance at the tribal organization. According to the people themselves, they migrated westward, and coming into these parts chose land for themselves. Among the several

---

[1] In My Children of the Forest, New York, 1924, pp. 48-75, Andrew F. Hensey has briefly outlined some of the forms of interest observed among the nkumu of the district adjacent to that of the present study. These more detailed notes are, however, timely if a record is to be preserved that approaches to accuracy.

601 621 614 Bonsonga and etúká are terms used for kinship groups of ranks B, C, and D, but occasionally they may also refer to [192] the groups listed under A and, in addition, to the local groups which in size approximately correspond to the kinship units mentioned above. Etúká is the term used for the oil palm grove and for a certain kind of termite hill; apparently it is used for local groups more frequently than the term bonsonga.

[571] [535] Another term whose meaning varies is ekindá. This word designates, first of all, a dance group, a corps de ballet, and also the social unit which sends such a joint dance troupe to dance festivals.

Esé also has strong local connotations. It is usually identical with what we call a village, but frequently units which are larger or smaller than a village are designated as esé. Very large groups, tribes and even larger units, are called bonanga.

614 As a criterion for placing the individual groups within a certain rank, one or several functions have been chosen in each case. The groups of the individual ranks are described below relative to their functions. On the subject of groups it should be added that in general they do not differ from each other in certain traits. All groups of all ranks are kinship units of patrilineal descent. They consider themselves descendants of one ancestor. No continuous and complete genealogy which can be traced back to the original ancestor is known. The genealogy of the entire group of the Bakonda is shown in Diagram 1.

In Iwangi two of the ancestors of the groups of rank D are brothers, the third is the brother of their father. A D-group (Nsgolé) includes, in addition, the descendants of an illegitimate child of the paternal sister of the ancestor. These offspring form the C-group, Nsambédafé.

There is a gap between this ancient genealogy and the known ancestors from the recent past. In contrast with that of the neighboring Bokóté (Bokote) (see, for example, Boelaert, "Les Bongili"), the genealogical memory of the Ekonda is weak. [171] It does not reach back to the ancestor of the group of rank A. In this connection we must take into account the fact that a group paragraph beginning on page 97 and continued on page 98 is not 080 translated.]

Ntomba

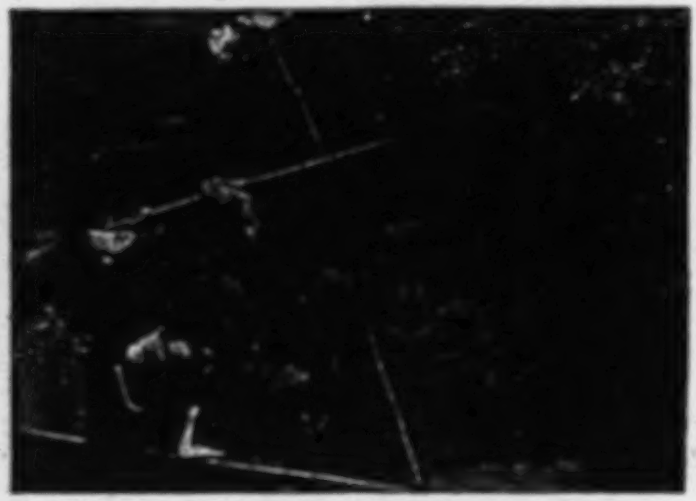
[98] On the whole, we note the following special ethnic characteristics. 241

1) Uniformity in the cultivation of manioc, the staple food of all of these peoples.

2) Undertaking the cultivation of maize under the influence 241/177 of the ephemeral encouragement of Bula Matari [Ed., the European administration] among the peoples of the Congo-Kasai, and rice cultivation under Arab influence in the region of Bena Dibele-Kole. Contrary to what we noted concerning maize, the innovation introduced by the Arabs has become firmly implanted in the life of these natives, and the cultivation of rice will probably eliminate manioc eventually.



[226]

Fig. 58. Weir Fishing at a Dam among the Mosengere.
Closing the Screens and Capturing the Trapped Fish.

3) Formation of a zone of sugar-cane cultivation, the development of which is in inverse proportion to the extent of the palm groves.

4) Complete absence of animal husbandry of any importance. 231

5) Uniformity in the methods of communal hunting and the 224/178 gradual development of attendant religious customs and practices from east to west, corresponding to a decline in hunting by individuals with traditional weapons. This fact leads us to suppose

Ntomba

224 174 that hunting was practiced as a rule in the ancestral society without special recourse to any protective force or spirit and that primitive man relied wholly on his strength, skill, courage, and necessity. The small yield and the accidents involved in this dangerous sport probably impelled the primitives to go in groups, the first step to communal hunting. In the course of these forays, accidents must have occurred, some men being hurt and others spared. For no apparent cause, one hunt was successful and another failed. Not being able to understand the reason for these occurrence, the natives naturally ascribed their origin to spirits, from which arose the desire to gain the favor of these spirits. One can thus explain the magico-religious beliefs and practices, whose intensity, [99] elaboration, and spread are in direct proportion to the disappearance of individual hunting.

228 174 6) The existence among all the peoples of a few common fishing customs, so little developed unquestionably fish could have played only a minor role in the diet of the ancestral community. This community, therefore, must have lived in an environment ill-suited to the development of a fishing industry or too poor in resources of this kind to invite man's efforts in this direction in his struggle for existence.

7) In their migrations and displacement, certain groups settled in more favorable regions, and the families among them who settled in the immediate vicinity of well-stocked rivers and marshes adopted new fishing customs while partially giving up the hunting customs. [Ed., the remainder of the chapter, through page 100, is not translated.]

060 [101] Chapter 4

Food

Making fire. -- Extraction of salt. -- Preparation of food. -- Manioc. -- Maize. -- Bananas. -- Meat. -- Fish. -- Peppers. -- Extraction of palm oil. -- Beverages. -- Water. -- Malafu. -- Masanga. -- Pombe. -- Stimulants. -- Hemp. -- Kola nuts. -- Tobacco.

304 178 tattoos are very much in vogue at the present time. We concede that the custom of tattooing is now at its height in the region we visited.

It is probable that this custom will not long survive our penetration.

304 174 It would be very difficult to determine the approximate time of its introduction into the life of these natives. We believe, however, that we may regard racial tattoos as one of the ethnic characteristics peculiar to the contemporary culture and not as a specific custom of the ancestral civilization, transmitted from generation to generation and preserved or even elaborated by each one. The clearest proof of this fact comes from our observations of the present generation of old men. As a rule they have no racial tattoos. The old women who have no [203] trace of ornamental or ethnic tattooing are rarer. Ornamental incisions are more often lacking than tribal scars, and we encountered only rare cases where the sexual tattoos were lacking.

Fig. 126. Return from the Fields.

304 174 These facts prove that when the elders of the present generation were young, tattooing, if it was customary, was practiced with some regularity only by the women and originally had an essentially familial character in this region.

304 152 A woman bears the pain of the incisions without showing the least sign of suffering, without a complaint or a sigh. She even submits to this custom with some joy, mixed with a bit of pride, knowing that she will be held in higher esteem by the man.

This point, in our opinion, is much more important to the women among primitive peoples than one would generally suppose. It appears to us to be the leitmotiv of the major part of the variations that we observed in the grooming of the native women.

The anxiety to please, the wishes of the man, these lead the woman to seek constantly the means that would enable her to be tattooed as soon and as often as possible. This natural desire and inner necessity are the reasons why the woman stoically bears all the torture, all the suffering. In primitive life the sexual side naturally is dominant. In this way we can explain, and in a way understand, why tattooing in the beginning was the exclusive appanage of the woman in this region and how she came to decorate the sexual organ and its immediate vicinity in order subsequently to display it; covering nearly all the body with decorations came about, perhaps, simply through coquetry.

174
176 C. An attempt to explain the modern changes. The facts themselves as much as a knowledge of human nature, together with the lenient attitude of parents and the lack of sanctions (the last two points are relevant only to relations between adults), are in direct contradiction to the statements of the natives. Should these not therefore be explained as exaggerations, stemming from a desire for national glory and a resentment of the situation created by colonization? The [84] natives whose strange assertions I have cited are elderly and serious; they demonstrate all the qualities of truthful witnesses. But are they not -- perhaps unconsciously -- laudatores temporis acti? I thought so for a long time and never allowed their statements to carry any weight. I have discussed this question over and over again, not with one or two natives, but with dozens of the most serious and sincere people, under various circumstances and in regions far removed from one another. Yet all supported the same argument, and I could never make my point of view prevail. I always received the same reply: "You Whites are not willing to believe us when we tell you what we know better than you, what is the pure truth. You are so involved in your own point of view!" Finally, before so much formal testimony -- uniform, unchanging, repeated ad nauseum in such varied circumstances as to individuals, times, and places -- my attachment to my own idea began, with some regret, to falter.

But how is it possible to resolve the contradiction between a rather broad liberty and the practice of chastity? And above all how can less than fifty years have sufficed to transform any attachment to virginity into licentiousness? The difficulty presents itself for relations between adults, but it is especially great with respect to reprehensible contacts between nonadults, because of the terrible sanction that we have described above.

The first objection may be partially met if we take into account the habit of "the fear of men," which is acquired and maintained through the severe prohibition against sexual relations before physical maturity and the terrible punishment with which the transgressor is threatened. [86]

The second objection on the other hand is much more serious. It is the one which above all has always kept me from accepting the

174 896 [175] thesis of the natives. This is how it is refuted by those who contradict me: "When the first black soldiers and their assistants, archers, and spear carriers were sent by the Whites to conquer us, they committed all sorts of atrocities and permitted themselves all the licentious acts that occurred to them. Among other things they took advantage of young girls, even those who were not nubile. They required immature girls to engage in sexual intercourse. They even went so far as to force people to commit incest, uniting mother and son, father and daughter, pointing a gun at their breasts. (1)

1. The fact that the soldiers required that immature girls be delivered over to them, because they were afraid of venereal diseases, is still notorious.

These accusations are so shocking and repugnant that one refuses to admit their veracity. Yet it is possible that they correspond to reality. For one thing, the informants are entirely reliable. For another, the account is internally consistent. As a matter of fact, scenes of the sort described seemed to have occurred at the beginning of almost all colonizations. Their authors were usually the natives of other regions rather than Whites (in our area Europeans were almost entirely absent from the first contacts between the inhabitants and the new power). By the nature of things anything can be expected at such a time. For occupations are carried out under martial law. And everyone is aware that war unleashes the human beast which -- as even contemporary history abundantly shows -- is capable of worse and more repugnant excesses.

It is possible to object to all this for, if the assertions of the natives are true, the events they describe did not give rise to a practice of incest and, consequently, need not have given rise to the far-reaching changes which we have observed. [87] But the two situations are entirely different. For licentious behavior between single people is more or less consistent with the passionate tendencies of human nature, which were mostly checked by the fear of a sanction -- a terrible sanction, it is true, but it was shown in fact to be nonexistent. Incest, on the other hand, is extremely repugnant by nature, especially for the Nkundó. It is a vice which comes about only as a result of special beliefs or through a fundamental degeneration of sexuality.

177
836

The breaking up of the framework of traditional organization may furnish a partial explanation in this realm as in many others. In the case of sexual relations between single adults, it might even be deemed sufficient. As much may be said about greed, vanity, the desire for ostentation and display. These are very natural sentiments in a woman, and they were greatly stimulated by the dazzling riches imported from Europe. But these facts are not sufficient in themselves to account for everything. They are especially and entirely inadequate in explaining the considerable changes in the relations between immature children, and we are thus forced to accept the explanation given by serious natives.

3. Children born out of wedlock

848
Among the Nkundó, giving birth to a child outside of wedlock has never from time immemorial been considered a grave misdemeanor. It is not considered criminal, as ethnographers say it is among many other African peoples.

Furthermore, this attitude logically follows from the liberty permitted to adolescents, as described above. Neither the woman nor her lover are harassed or punished as a result. On the contrary, the grandparents joyfully receive the child, who adds to the size, power, and wealth of the clan. [88] For an illegitimate child (entombó) (1) does not belong to its natural father. It is incorporated into the mother's family. It is said that he is born without a father. His

593
617

---

1. Such a child is also known as bona óa wané, "child of the sunlight," or bona óa bombamboka, "child of the highway" or "of a girl of the streets." Among the Bombomba the term bokelankólo is also heard.

835 allied district of the Bombomba). The same is true of the Bontole.
614 Elángá and Imomo, together with Eleke (Lokongo), comprise the posterity of the son of Ambá, who was the sister of Iloko, Eángá, and Bokungú, the latter being the ancestor of the Bontole. The three groups do not intermarry. Between the Elángá and the Imomo, lonkâna relations are also not permitted, but they are practiced with the Bontole. Note that the term lonkâna is never applied to relations between truly separate clans, that is, between exogamous entities.

To define the precise limits of this practice we would have to examine each kin group separately, and this would lead us too far afield.

It should also be noted that lonkâna may be limited to an isolated act, or it can become an intermittent concubinage. The name of the practice does not change when it involves a married woman who is visiting her family. Sanctions against adultery are applicable to such a case, however, as to all others. (1) Although the relatives of the woman are more lenient than if the adulterous relations had occurred with a different lover, the husband whose rights have been infringed on makes no such distinction.

835 The custom of lonkâna seems rather strange. After all, if 614 sexual relations between these clans are not reprehensible, why is 174 marriage between them forbidden? This is an apparent contradiction which merits attention. Should not this practice be viewed as a relaxation of the law of exogamy? In past times all sexual relations between members of the clans under discussion would have been forbidden, a very natural phenomenon when the families originated. [99] Later the young people would have succumbed to the temptation, and little by little infractions would even have multiplied. For as the clans became increasingly extended, the temptations became more and more numerous and the rule, now detached from its natural significance because very distant kinship was involved, came to seem more or less arbitrary to the interested parties. It was supported by no sanction or

---

1. See Chapter VI, Article VIII.

835 614 174 fear. (1) Thus the very number of violations would have gradually made the practice customary. Powerless to stop it, the persons in authority, guardians of traditional morality, would have contented themselves with channeling the development and restricting it to a minimum by being lenient on the subject of extramarital relations in order to save the principle of exogamy. This explanatory hypothesis can find a little confirmation in the fact that at the very beginning of colonization when European influence was not felt as yet, there were isolated and very rare cases of marriage in opposition to the law of exogamy between members of groups which were only very distantly related but already practiced lonkâna. The exception then became the rule; and from then on the two groupings in question intermarried regularly and without hindrance, while other families remained under the ancient law. Thus there is the known case of Boyela village (Bakɛala), which includes the Bokambɛ, Bembakɔ, Besɔlɔ, and Bekɔlama (extinct), all descendants of Ngonde and one wife; his union with another spouse gave rise to the Lilekɛ and the Likongo, to whom Bongilɛ, a group related through marriage (likilo), is attached. These two groups of families could not intermarry, but they did engage in lonkâna. Around the time of the first arrival of the Whites, a member of the Bembakɔ [100] family a certain Bonjɔmbɔ was impelled by an excessive love to violate the law of exogamy by taking Bolondɔ of Lilekɛ for his wife. As his love did not cool and the marriage proved stable, it was recognized and accepted as legitimate. Since then the two groups in question have each become exogamous.

> 1. Actually, no sanction is provided against marriages within an exogamous entity; everything lies in the opposition of parents and elders and in a habit which is almost innate.

835 754 2. Between close relatives

Incest between close relatives has no special name of its own. As a matter of fact, it never occurs as an outgrowth of passion. We

584 But if the indicated difference between them were fundamental, this 583 fact would by no means provide a sufficient explanation. On the 178 other hand, if it were only a slight nuance without practical consequences, it would not, it seems to me, adequately explain the existence of the two payments, especially since in the past quite a long time could elapse between them.

● Therefore we can wonder whether the basis of a greater differ-
174 ence might not be found in the hypothesis of its being a primitive 583 custom.

584 For instance, the ikulá could have been the payment accompanying a proposal of marriage comparable to our European engagement. Then, when unresolvable palavers developed out of this situation, a system may have been devised which would not prevent disputes from arising but would make possible their resolution according to proper and just legal regulations. This system would have been the payment of a ndanga.

While this is a possible explanation, it is not a very plausible one. Native law appears in all domains so reasonable, cautious, and wise, and so well adapted to circumstances, that it would hardly have left a way open to so great a source of difficulties in so important a matter. Such a possibility can hardly be admitted by any one who is even slightly familiar with the mentality of the Nkundó. Then, too, the modern blending of the ikulá and the ndanga suggests that one of two is duplicating the function of the other. And the consequence of this development would have been the uniting of the two payments into one, with a single purpose, or more probably, in conformity with the general practice, the transferring of the significance of a pledge, theoretically assigned to the ndanga, to the ikulá. [123] The existence of a single engagement payment would have been much more in accordance with the present hypothesis than the practice of making two distinct payments, which are independent and separated in time. We should add here that the acceptance of a responsibility is always and under all circumstances accompanied by the handing over of a ndanga.

We could conceive of a second hypothesis, which seems more in accordance with reality. The ikulá may originally have been an engagement payment, as in the first hypothesis, only the girl may

174 not have accompanied her husband to his home. She would have re-584 mained with her parents, and her fiancé would probably have had per-583 mission to visit her and to have sexual relations with her; as we have seen in the preceding chapter, native law does not oppose such relations. Since the mutual desire for cohabitation could not be put off for the period of time -- often long -- required before the bride-price payment itself could be arranged, the girl's parents would have given their child permission to follow her heart's inclinations which -- let us repeat -- could provoke only difficulties of a legal, "civil" nature. And before the fiancé could take his future wife home with him, he had first to reassure the parents and free them from their responsibility by taking it upon himself in an official manner, that is, by giving proof of his willingness to accept all the consequences of his action. In Lonkundo such a pledge is called ndanga. Later on, the time of cohabitation may have been begun earlier, by permitting it from the time of the ikulá. Thus in practice the reason for the existence of the ndanga would have been transferred to the ikulá, and the ndanga would have been retained simply as a payment imposed by custom, until the day when the overthrow of ancient customs made the Nkundó perceive the logical consequences of the facts, resulting in the merging of the two payments into one. This hypothesis is also confirmed by the fact that the very name ikulá is tending to disappear, [124] yielding to the use of the single term ndanga. Finally, to align this hypothesis with the facts pertaining to the term bompáka presented in number 4, we must assume that in the past the fiancée moved to the home of her husband only after the ndanga and consequently became bompáka only at that time.

8. The breaking of an engagement

584

The breaking of an engagement does not involve great legal difficulties. Both the man and the woman are free to break it if they find that they are basically incompatible, or that the prospects for happiness are not good, or for any other reason. There are certain practical stipulations, however.

584 is based solely on the nature of this state, which is a direct prepara-583x tion for married life. Therefore, if the union is not completed, the 177 fiancé is enriched at the expense of the parents-in-law.

2) When an engagement is broken, the parents lose the legitimate and normal expectation of a full bride price; they consider this loss lucrum cessans.

The natives' justification is not sufficient to explain the origin 584 of the change, however, for:
583x 1) It seems likely that the Nkundó have simply imitated the ●174 practice of other peoples of the Congo with whom they have become 177 acquainted since colonization, and that their explanation is but an explanation of convenience.

2) The reasons invoked in favor of the change are not new; they were equally valid in the past, and such as they are and in themselves they are therefore insufficient.

3) If we examine the reason concerning the benefit that the fiancé derives from the [126] woman's work, we find that it is based on a fallacious argument. For Nkundó law recognizes, on the one hand, the legitimacy of this gain and, on the other, the right of each party to break the engagement. Simply the breaking of the engagement cannot, therefore, result in the payment of an indemnity, since one cannot possibly be punished for having made use of a right.

4) The above objection is also applicable to the second reason given by the Nkundó: the possibility of the bride price not being paid is inherent in the essence of the engagement, since both parties are free not to go through with the union.

Thus the reasons given as such must be rejected.

Nevertheless, it is possible that modern circumstances have to some extent modified the nature of the problem. Thus:

1) The introduction of European wage labor and trade has given the Blacks a new idea of wealth. Consequently, the benefits reaped from the engagement have become much greater (through the development of trade and the availability of more varied goods and greater riches), and therefore the economic value of a woman has increased in considerable proportions.

Theoretically, these changes might justify some indemnification. In practice, however, economic development has increased the

583* amount of the engagement payment and thus counterbalances the in-584 crease of the profit brought by a woman.

● 174 Indemnification for economic reasons would also have one
177 good result, namely that it would prevent a possible skewing of the system into a form of exploitation which would consist of taking fiancées for a time when they are needed for some special work and sending them back when the work is finished. [127]

But it must be noted that though the precaution may be good in itself, it is not called for under present circumstances, for the Nkundó do not even think of such a corruption of engagement customs.

2. Colonization has considerably reinforced -- or perhaps even introduced -- in native thinking the idea that the favors of a woman deserve a salary. I think that these circumstances have contributed much more to the origin of the new practice than economic changes -- or rather, that the justification for it is primarily based on this idea of venal love. And in that case we have before us a pretium stupri of a sort that could foster prostitution, and which is therefore in opposition to morality and public order.

Just as we must applaud the normal developments of the custom and its adaptation to the possibilities of social and moral elevation that colonization has created, so we must react against its corruption, aberrations, deviations, and a drift toward the exploitation of faults and vices.

Another objection against the innovation may be made on the grounds of its inconsistency within Nkundó law. Since there is no indemnification in the case of divorce, how is it possible to accept it in the case of the breaking of an engagement, which is a much weaker commitment than marriage itself? It is true that a Nkundó engagement is almost a marriage, since it includes cohabitation, etc.; nevertheless, it is not as tight a bond as a permanent union, from which it is clearly distinguished. The new custom leads logically to the conclusion that it is preferable to complete the union and make it definitive by paying the entire bride price and then to break it by means of a real divorce, which does not involve this financial loss.

Finally, although an indemnity based on the increase in the fiancé's profit from the engagement cannot be [128] condemned as

583x unjust in itself, it certainly becomes so if it is considered a penalty 584 inflicted for the rupture. For the indemnity is restricted to the man,
174 whether or not he is in the wrong. Furthermore, to accept an indemnity 177 even when the engagement is broken because of the woman tends to favor frauds and real swindles on the part of the woman and her parents, in short a kind of traffic in women.

It is also evident that the rich (polygamists) suffer much less [585] from the innovation than do monogamous men, especially those who [794] adopt monogamy as a principle and more especially the Christians, who do not condone divorce. Thus I am of the opinion that the desire to defend polygamy against the doctrine of the missionaries is not entirely unrelated to the transformation of this custom.

000 All these considerations show that the question is highly complex and that it would be better if the ancient custom were restored.

If the breaking of the engagement is due to wrongs, the new custom could perhaps be tolerated, though it is not without serious dangers, but the indemnity should be imposed exclusively on the party at fault. Furthermore, the wrongs would have to be serious, and on the other hand, the indemnity would have to be, not in the nature of a forfeit, but of a payment of damages commensurate with the extent of the damage suffered and the seriousness of the wrong. And here those cases should especially be considered where the breaking of the engagement is accompanied by proceedings of a vexatious and insulting nature. And though it is a very delicate task to evaluate all these elements, we must not forget to take them into account.

It seems to me that the ancient law must still be maintained when the engagement is broken simply because of a change of feelings for which neither party is to blame, if such a case occurs. For it is better not to innovate than to innovate too fast. [129]

Article IV. Walo -- Bombuluku

583x The walo or bombuluku is the bulk of the bride price paid for a marriage. Between the payment of the ndanga and that of the walo, 583ˣ 607 The mutuality of the rights of nkɔ́lɔ́ and nkita is well expressed in the saying, ɔ́mbátɛ́ ńkoátɛ́ wɛ̌, "possess me so that I may possess you." It is like do ut des.

583ˣ 607 182 [611] It is possible to judge from the preceding descriptions that the bride price has a considerable influence on family relations. Although the Nkundɔ́ system is clearly and manifestly patriarchal, the custom of the bride price and its logical consequences give it certain features which make one think of a matriarchy. This situation comes about quite naturally. Since the bride price is wealth it represents power in society. Through marriage this power is transferred from the husband's clan to the wife's, which is enriched in goods and persons by the bride price that has been received. In a sense, the husband is the provider of his wife's clan. And the child can truthfully maintain that his clan was enriched thanks to his father. As a matter of fact, for the Nkundɔ́, this consideration above all others is the basis for their demands of whatever rights they possess in the mother's clan. [170] The relationship between a woman and her nkita and between their respective children is founded solely on the bride-price system of marriage and has nothing to do with matriarchy. (1)

> 1. But the above considerations may furnish one source of explanation for the origin of that family system.

Consequently, it is unnecessary to erect complicated theories or engage in tortuous speculations in order to explain the creation of this system or to justify it. It is quite simply the outcome of the payment of a bride price in valuables that are of no use except in connection with a similar purpose.

Nevertheless, although the system of the nkita is a natural and logical consequence of marriage by means of a bride price, it is not a necessary consequence. The bride price exists in all the tribes of the Congo, but it does not seem to have resulted everywhere in the institution of the nkita.

583ˣ • 174 114 607 What has given rise to this institution among the Nkundɔ́? Father Brepoels (loc. cit., p. 339) gives the following explanation:

174 "The sale (sic) of the woman and her loss of liberty must naturally 583x have aroused her indignation. The man probably had a great deal 114 of difficulty in persuading her to resign herself to it. It was neces-
607 sary to arrange for some compensation and that is how the system of the nkita originated. That is how the woman acquired rights over her nkita and how nonexistent prerogatives were attributed to her children: they became the superiors, the "fathers" of the mothers' family . . . . The elders, the wealthy, profited from this system, which released them from any concern for their daughters: the girls could be sold while they were still very young and then if, later, they complained of the injustice that had been done them, the elders consoled them by reminding them of their rights and those of their sons over the nkita and her offspring . . . moreover, this system released the elders from their duty of obtaining wives for their sons and removed any reason for the latter to claim their father's wives."

This explanation for the origin of the nkita system is unthinkable, for it is entirely contrary to everything [171] we know about the nature of Nkundó marriage. But it seems plausible that the fact that the old father benefited from this institution helped it to flower and spread. Native greed also may have played a role.

583x Nevertheless, we must seek beyond the operation of causes 174 which have contributed to the spread and retention of the system in 607 Nkundó society for those that led to its origin.

Need we invent complicated hypotheses for this purpose? It seems to me that we need not; we can be satisfied with the native explanation: the nkóló's rights over the nkita spring naturally from her dominance over the latter, for the nkita's marriage was made possible by the valuables paid for the nkóló; whereas the rights of the nkóló's sons over the nkita's children are derived from the fact that in the Nkundó hierarchy the relationship of the latter to the former is that of "son" to "father."

The secondary causes mentioned above, together with the necessity of reconciling the interests of the various members of the family, subsequently amplified the system.

583x Exceptionally it may happen that a mother becomes her 607 daughter's nkita. Such was the historic case of Bekombe of Belondó (Bonjoku) and her daughter, Mbélá. The daughter's bride price was

[

583x 177 It would be good to counteract that much increase in bride prices. For there is a danger that it will condemn to bachelorhood many young men who could otherwise build a home out of the fruits of their own labor. [182]

589x 586x The second meaning of the term "traffic in bride prices" has a more precise application. After a divorce all the valuables must be returned to the husband. Consequently, the new husband must pay at least as much as the first, and in general he even has to add a supplement for the family who, after all, have incurred expenses for the palaver. And so it continues. Thus the more husbands a woman has in succession, the more her bride price increases. It seems to me that this practice is in no way to be condemned. The increase is reasonable. For it not only constitutes some compensation to the woman's family for their troubles but, in addition it may exercise a good influence on the social condition of the people. If it is to have such an influence, divorce must not become a means of satisfying greed (in general, at the present time, it has not yet become such a means), and the increase must not be excessive.

000 In such cases the increase in the bride price can thus have a wholesome effect on the morality and stability of marriages by making men afraid of marrying a divorcée and, as a result, making women more cautious and less flighty. Here everything depends on caution, restraint, and supervision on the part of responsible authorities. [183]

4. The reason for the existence of the bride price

583x 174 This is a question which should not be asked of the natives; they do not know how to answer it. Nor do the facts provide any certainty. All that can be attempted is the construction of a hypothesis which fits the reality.

The following explanatory theories have been put forward: that it is a compensation to the woman's family for the loss of a member (see, for example, Seitz in Africa, Vol. 3, p. 85, and also Torday in Africa, Vol. 2, p. 275, under "Exchange"); that it is a payment for fecundity; and finally, that it is a guarantee of the 583 stability of the marriage and harmony in the household (see, for 174 example, Torday, loc. cit., pp. 274 ff.).

It is apparent from the description of the payment of the bride price that the Nkundo data tends primarily to support the last of these three theses, though the first is not excluded and perhaps both can be combined in a single explanation.

The bride price includes one portion which is somewhat special, namely the bosongo. Now what is the reason for the existence of this special payment? Although later in the text (Chapter VIII) we will note some relevant facts concerning the refunding of the bride price, which may provide a clearer understanding, we can already indicate here a few explanations that have been put forward. Various colonials have often suggested that the slave is demanded as a replacement for the woman, that the loss sustained by her family with respect to her activities (childbearing, work) (1) had to be compensated for by handing over a human being who could work for the family and give them children (the children of a slave always remained dependents of their father's master). This explanation is clearly an application of the compensation theory to the case of the bosongo. And with reference to this special portion of the bride price, the rules of Nkundó law favor the hypothesis in question. [184] A man who has not made this last payment loses his rights over one of his daughters, whose bride price enriches the mother's clan by providing the means for procuring another wife. The explanations given by the natives, however, give the impression that this rule is a sort of sanction, though in reality it is not, as we have seen.

1. See Chapter VI, Article II.

5. The essential component of the bride price

583x As we have seen, the bride price consists of several payments: the ikulé and the nlanga, both promissory payments; the walo, which is the first part of the actual bride price, and the bosongo, which completes the bride price. The belonge, etc. need not be considered.

432
575
174 If we examine the data on the geographical distribution of this custom in relation to the ethnic nature of the practicing tribes, we are led to assume that it is not of Nkundó origin. The tribes that do not practice it do not approve of it among their neighbors; rather they hold them in contempt because of it, since for them a purchased woman is a slave. Thus they make fun of them saying, "They sell their women like slaves or goats." Could this be evidence that the [illegible]-Bolóngó are not pure Nkundó, or that they have been subjected to foreign influences? Would the same be true of the riverain tribes who practice the purchase of women?

Article VIII. General Conclusions

581 Having analyzed in detail the various forms of marriage and pseudo-marital unions among the Nkundó, we must now make a synthesis.

Certain kinds of unions are considered legitimate marriages by the Nkundó although they differ to some degree from the standard marriage because they are adapted to special circumstances. Among these are a widow's marriage with the heir of the deceased and a marriage by replacement after a divorce. As for ourselves, we can go along with native opinion, for when these unions are concluded in the normal fashion they involve nothing which is contrary to our conception of a valid marriage. (1)

1. This is true of a replacement after divorce only when the dissolution of the previous marriage is legitimate and valid in every respect.

Other types of union, on the other hand, are not considered by the Nkundó [223] to correspond, or only very imperfectly, to their idea of a regular marriage. The union of a widow with a distant relative of the deceased is only a sort of legitimate concubinage. The offer of a wife as security, the exchange or purchase of women, are considered as absolutely inferior forms of union. Therefore it is better to designate these by the term "pseudo-marital unions." For although they are accepted as legitimate by the tribes among 684 592 There is no sanction against the infraction of the law of exogamy. There is only the opposition of the parents and patriarchs, and a quasi-innate habit.

592 614 Note also that members of certain clans frequently marry members of certain others, among whom they prefer to choose their wives. Therefore a good proportion of the women married into any given family will belong to one particular clan. The Wafé (Bokfala), for instance take a great many of their wives from among the Bongale w'Iteme.

178 592 614 We may reasonably assume that the ancestors of related groups, who now marry among themselves, formerly practiced exogamy. If this assumption is correct, it must be admitted that with the progressive growth of families, this rule has been relaxed in certain respects so that the present situation has resulted. Consequently, it would not be surprising if these legal provisions became even less rigorous in the future. Actually, some young people have begun to [178] violate the rules of exogamy and their example has freed the whole family. (2) Thus the Bokfola maintain that their two groupings,

2. See Chapter I, Article VII, 1.

Bompolo and Ilóngó, who now intermarry, formerly comprised a [251] single exogamous entity. Contemporary instances appear here and there, but they remain very rare, even between persons who are very distantly related, and much rarer between close kin. (1) For the

1. A recent case was that of Elímá and Bokfíla, who both belonged to the exogamous group of Bokenyola of the Bonjoku, but one belonged to the Bosfkí Bokóyó family and the other to the Bosfkí Njoli.

Nkundó still feel very strongly about this law. The bulk of the people are entirely opposed to any laxity or violations and the patriarchs and notables act against them with all their power. But the strength of [74] thesis of the natives. This is how it is refuted by those who contradict [86] me: "When the first black soldiers and their assistants, archers, and ● [75] spear carriers were sent by the Whites to conquer us, they committed all sorts of atrocities and permitted themselves all the licentious acts that occurred to them. Among other things they took advantage of young girls, even those who were not nubile. They required immature girls to engage in sexual intercourse. They even went so far as to force people to commit incest, uniting mother and son, father and daughter, pointing a gun at their breasts. (1)

1. The fact that the soldiers required that immature girls be delivered over to them, because they were afraid of venereal diseases, is still notorious.

These accusations are so shocking and repugnant that one refuses to admit their veracity. Yet it is possible that they correspond to reality. For one thing, the informants are entirely reliable. For another, the account is internally consistent. As a matter of fact, scenes of the sort described seemed to have occurred at the beginning of almost all colonizations. Their authors were usually the natives of other regions rather than Whites (in our area Europeans were almost entirely absent from the first contacts between the inhabitants and the new power). By the nature of things anything can be expected at such a time. For occupations are carried out under martial law. And everyone is aware that war unleashes the human beast which -- as even contemporary history abundantly shows -- is capable of worse and more repugnant excesses.

It is possible to object to all this for, if the assertions of the natives are true, the events they describe did not give rise to a practice of incest and, consequently, need not have given rise to the far-reaching changes which we have observed. [87] But the two situations are entirely different. For licentious behavior between single people is more or less consistent with the passionate tendencies of human nature, which were mostly checked by the fear of a sanction -- a terrible sanction, it is true, but it was shown in fact to be nonexistent. Incest,

M 342 with rattan thongs. These walls are very strong and durable. The roof is usually covered with thatch, but it frequently happens that the native also uses panels of [illegible] to cover his hut. [43]

M 361 Among the peoples who live west of the lake, the huts are grouped in clusters of two or three and placed in two parallel lines. The free space between the clusters is very limited, so much so that at first sight all the huts seem to be continuous. The doors always open on the large street.

M 342 ●177 656 We also visited a number of villages where earthen dwellings, built by administrative order, stretched out the whole length of the village. As a rule, however, these huts, which we regard as an improvement from the standpoint of hygiene and comfort, were not favored by the natives. The Negro had carried out the task imposed upon him, but he refused to enjoy it. His primitive hut, which was better adapted to the necessities of his life, retained its appeal and its occupants.

M 361 342 Among the Tumba of the east shore of the lake, we observed that the hut tends to present certain characteristics relating it to the type of hut with an arched roof found among the Boli [(3)] and farther north. The ridge, instead of being straight, extends beyond the ends of the hut and dips down, giving the whole structure the appearance of a bow bent [44] chiefly at the two ends. In certain dwellings the doors are placed in the side wall facing the main thoroughfare, and the huts are built in groups standing more or less close together. In other huts, on the other hand, the door is located in the gable wall and opens on a small veranda formed by the projecting roof front. The huts built this way are placed in a line, but are separated, and although the space between the two lines forms the chief thoroughfare of the village, each hut nevertheless boasts a small individual courtyard in front of the veranda. As to the method of construction, it is identical to those we noted in the region west of the lake.

M S 361 342 Among the peoples of the lower Lukenie, the huts are also built by the same method and with identical materials. The door, however, is nearly always in the gable wall, at the end where the roof projects, slightly curved, to form the veranda. When the huts are separated, one notices again a tendency toward an arc in the the main axis [31] of the village. This door is always placed rather high and closes on an inner slide. Since nse-nse and ndele are lacking in this region, the framework of the huts is made of stakes and pieces of raffia, and the walls and roof are covered with raffia leaves plaited flat in the form of a mat. 342

The huts are built singly, a method which again reminds one of the customs of the Oshwe-Bambuli region. The native does sometimes cover his hut with grass, but this is very rare.

In this region we also observed that in certain villages the huts were arranged in family groupings and that each group had a special area clearly set apart from the rest of the village. The various huts of a single group are inside a fairly solid stake fence from one and three-quarters to two meters high and sometimes covered with mats of raffia leaves. The doors of all the huts within an enclosure open toward the interior of the courtyard. 361 592 591

Fig. 33. Interior of a Lupango and Drying Peanuts, Bena Dibele-Kole Region.

The whole forms the lupango. By counting the number of huts in a lupango one may determine how many wives the chief or head of the place has, since each one has her own home. [32] The lupango are of recent introduction and are derived from Arab influence. One cannot take them into account in establishing relationships of kinship or ethnic affinity between the different peoples. There is no connection whatever between the lupango of the Bena Dibele-Kole region and the familial grouping of huts 592 [177]

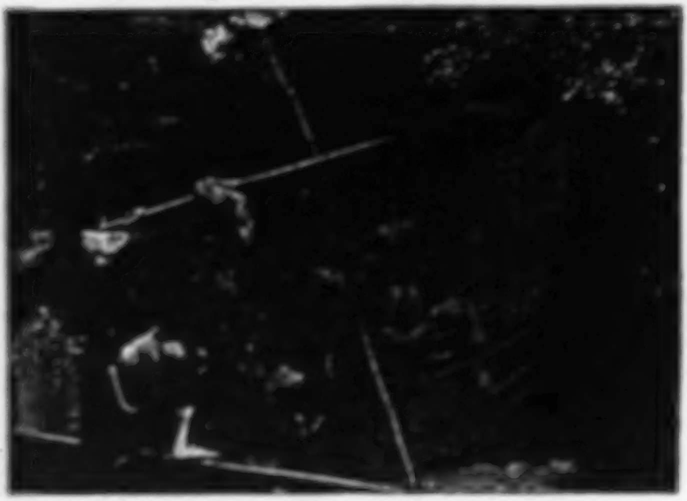
Nkundo

paragraph beginning on page 97 and continued on page 98 is not translated.] 088

[98] On the whole, we note the following special ethnic characteristics. 241

1) Uniformity in the cultivation of manioc, the staple food of all of these peoples.

2) Undertaking the cultivation of maize under the influence of the ephemeral encouragement of Bula Matari [Ed., the European administration] among the peoples of the Congo-Kasai, and rice cultivation under Arab influence in the region of Bena Dibele-Kole. Contrary to what we noted concerning maize, the innovation introduced by the Arabs has become firmly implanted in the life of these natives, and the cultivation of rice will probably eliminate manioc eventually. 241/177



[226]

Fig. 58. Weir Fishing at a Dam among the Mosengere.
Closing the Screens and Capturing the Trapped Fish.

3) Formation of a zone of sugar-cane cultivation, the development of which is in inverse proportion to the extent of the palm groves.

4) Complete absence of animal husbandry of any importance. 231

5) Uniformity in the methods of communal hunting and the gradual development of attendant religious customs and practices from east to west, corresponding to a decline in hunting by individuals with traditional weapons. This fact leads us to suppose 224/776

Making Fire

M
372 The natives of the Kasai-Fimi-Lukenie region make fire in three different ways.

The Bateke and Banfumungu of the river use flint and steel; the Banfumungu of the interior, the Boboma, Mosengere, Tumba,

M
[516]

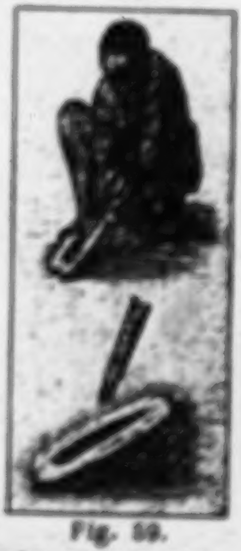


Fig. 59.
Making Fire by Friction.

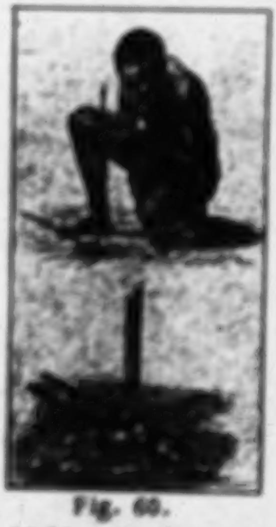

Fig. 60.
Making Fire by Rotation.

Wadia, Basakata, Bobaie, Balesa, Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and some of the Yaelima use the friction method [102] or longitudinal rubbing; and the Yaelima of the east, the Basongo-Meno, and the Bankutshu of the Bena-Dibele-Kole region obtain fire by gyration or rotary rubbing.

M
[177] The native method tends to disappear rapidly everywhere with the introduction of matches, although most of the natives have kept their primitive strike-a-light and always carry it with them on journeys. If there are no matches or if through some circumstance -- the humidity, the crossing of a river or marsh -- the matches will not work, the native takes out his strike-a-light and makes fire by the native method.

T
372 The strike-a-light of the Bateke and Banfumungu of the river consists of an iron or steel blade from three to eight centimeters long and two to three centimeters wide, a flint (a mere 372 Yaelima, the apparatus consists of two small cylindrical rods. [104] One of the rods, cut from relatively soft wood, has one or more notches. The other, rounded at one end, is of hard wood. The notched rod is placed over the tinder; the other one is held perpendicularly, with the round end inserted in the notch. The native gives the latter rod a rapid rotary motion by spinning it between his hands. At the same time he slides his hands from top to bottom in order to increase the pressure as much as possible.

Fig. 61
Rod and Small Board with Notches.

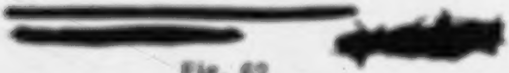

Fig. 62
Two rods, One with Notches.

The special skill consists in producing this motion with as few pauses as possible. This is why several natives usually participate. One holds the notched rod in place, a second one spins the other rod, while a third stands by ready to maintain the gyrating motion as soon as his companion reaches the bottom of the rod. The first spinner will relieve the other in turn. After several rotations, a small incandescent spot appears in the charred wood dust in the notch, and a spark falls on the tinder, which catches fire.

The areas in which these three methods of making fire are found form three distinct ethnic zones in the region visited.

The first one includes only the Batake and part of the Banfumungu and is characterized by use of the iron blade and flint.

The second one with the system of friction or longitudinal rubbing extends from the interior of Banfumungu territory to the center of the region occupied by the Yaelima. [105]

The third, with the system of gyration or rotary rubbing, includes the easternmost part of Yaelima territory and the whole Bena Dibele-Kole region.

372
177

372 This last method has also been noted among the Balesa,
177 and we were able to verify that some of the natives in the region were familiar with it and used it. It is not indigenous to this tribe, however, and must have been introduced into the region by soldiers or laborers from the old Tolo post, who came from regions where this method was known.

It is also possible that the eastern Yaelima borrowed this method from the peoples of the south, although we were unable to obtain any precise information on this point. This hypothesis, however, is justified by the fact that we found the friction and gyration methods in certain Yaelima villages, and the natives preferred to use the latter method in every such instance. It must be noted that the gyration method is not only less tiring but also faster and permits the natives to take turns. It provides a maximum of yield for a minimum of work. There is, therefore, nothing astonishing in the fact that wherever the natives have had an opportunity to observe the advantages of this method, they have made a point of adopting it.

372 In our opinion, the friction or longitudinal rubbing method should be regarded as having been used exclusively in former times by all the tribes, from the Basfamungu to the Yaelima. This method may still be found among the tribes of the Dekese region, but, unfortunately, we were unable to substantiate this.

All these peoples in this respect would belong to the same ethnic group, which is clearly differentiated from the group of tribes in the Bena Dibele-Kole region.

Salt

258 The preparation of salt occupies an important place in the life of certain tribes of the Kasai-Lukenie region. Lacking both salt mines and salt water in their territory, the natives proceeded to obtain this precious condiment, indispensable to the diet, by extracting it from plants. [106]

Wherever the introduction of imported products has not eliminated the native method, the extraction of salt is a veritable national industry. The whole community participates in it.

[177] Among the Bateke, Basfamungu, Baboma, and part of the Wadia, the introduction of salt has completely eliminated the use and preparation of native salt.

M
301

Bracelets and anklets are relatively rare as ornaments among the Mosengere and other riparian tribes of the lake. We found them from time to time among the Bobaie and Balesa.

The elegantly dressed women of the Ipanga-Batitu and Bokala wear heavy brass rings over the ankles, brass rings on the fingers and toes, and leather belts adorned with brass beads, while the necklaces of solid brass gradually disappear as one goes eastward. Among the Yaelima and Bokala they are practically nonexistent, but the men and women like bracelets of brass wire. They wear them like a sheath from the wrist to the elbow. Except for rare exceptions, these people do not wear rings around the ankles. Some dignitaries deck themselves out with imported bead necklaces. The belt decorated with brass beads is rather commonly used. In the Bena-Dibele-Kole region, ornaments of copper and brass seem to be disappearing little by little as imported beads come in. Necklaces of glass beads, incidentally have been introduced throughout the region [184] we visited. They are particularly in vogue among the Ipanga and Batitu women. The men prefer necklaces made of hair from elephants' tails, or a simple brass ring.

Fig. 105. Two Wadia Women and a Child, Wearing Solid Brass Necklaces.

S [301, 854]

M
[177]

Bracelets and rings of brass are worn by men from Stanley Pool to Kole. The Bokala and Yaelima dignitaries wear rings

304 832 [177 291] personal vanity, and to excite the male. At the present time only the latter reason accounts for the practice in the region where our influence has been effective. The introduction of European fabrics, the expansion of the economy and the progress of civilization have led the women to clothe themselves and to hide and screen a large part of the body from indiscreet glances. [189] The small primitive loincloth has given way to a toga of variable length, which hides from the public eye that part [Fig. 112 appears here] of the body which is covered with tattoos. In such cases, the woman can no longer display her tattoos for the sake of vanity. [Figs. 113 and 114 appear here] If, despite this, 304 833 some of them continue to have themselves tattooed just like the old matrons, it is because they hope to attract a man, to please him, and to be able to participate sooner in the pleasures of intimate life. When questioned on this subject, the natives are very definite. The men maintain that the raised tattoos [190] on > recollection of an animal of the leopard family which they call bokonga. Their description of it corresponds to the lion. Some soldiers and other expatriates, who were also young people, shown representations of a lion immediately identified it with their bokonga.

[291 301 304 142]

Fig. 115. Elegant Lady of the Bokala-Yaelima Region. Tattoos, Bracelets, and Necklaces.

101
619
[825]

The groups under discussion here lived for a time on the banks of the Luwo (Maringa) and the [11] upper Ikelemba, (1) then under pressure from other Móngo tribes, they crossed the Tshuapa-Ruki. They evicted the Ekonda and settled in their present location. This exodus must have taken place a fairly long time ago; it is impossible to determine the date and difficult to make any estimates. In any case it must have occurred 150 to 200 years ago.

[173] 1. It appears that between the Ikelemba and its tributary the Losálifa, there is still a bonkom tree called w'āmenga (of bald heads) under which, according to tradition, the ancestors held their councils. Nearby there is a bosáá whose fruits never ripen.

244 These peoples are primarily farmers; they grow chiefly bananas, manioc, yams, colocasia [taro], sweet potatoes, sugar cane, and various vegetables and condiments. The food crops they grow, together with what they gather and the Elaeis palm trees provide them with a continuous and abundant food supply, as long as elephants do [231] not interfere. Their domestic animals include chickens, goats, and 224 dogs. (2) Hunting is a pleasant change of activity rather than an

[171] 2. Ducks have been introduced fairly recently, but they were known long before colonial times. They came from the south. Sheep have been introduced only in the last few decades, and they are found only in a few villages on the river banks in the lowlands.

291 184 The nkɔ́sɔ́ is unknown beyond the Jwalɛ́ and the Luilaka. In that region the women tie a string (or a belt of beads) around themselves and attach a second piece of cloth to it.

291 Thus the male garment is a rudimentary sort of shorts, open on the sides, while female dress is much more open. In general the efufa is an appropriate protection of one's modesty, but it is inadequate in certain positions. (2)

[611] [196] 2. It may be interesting to note that etɔ́o nsamɔ́nyɔ́, or just plain etɔ́o, which is the term for a man's garment, also indicates the male line of descent, while the female line is often designated by the term nkɔ́sɔ́ (sometimes by the word jwɔ̌moto derived from bɔ̌moto, "woman"). Let us add that lonkundɔ́ jwɔ̂ nkɔ́sɔ́ means "pure, flawless Lonkundo, not corrupted by foreign influences." This expression should be compared with the following phrases: langue maternel, moedertaal, "mother tongue," etc.

291 177 At present the nkɔ́sɔ́ is no longer worn except by a few elderly inhabitants of villages far from the main communication lines. Everywhere else the ancient mode of dress has been replaced by materials imported from Europe. The women wear at least a sangatɛ́mbo, a kind of short skirt which falls from their loins at least to the middle of their thighs if not further. Middle-aged men in the interior have simply changed the material of their garment but not its form. The younger ones, on the contrary, have frankly adopted the European mode of dress.

291 591 [834] [831] A married woman is not allowed to enter the village of her relatives by marriage (bakilɔ́) or appear before them [54] without supplementing her usual attire with one or more beleleke (banana leaves cut into fringes). The term bakilɔ́ must be understood as it is meant by the Nkundɔ́; it excludes those with whom the wife may sometimes perform the sexual act and who are called "husbands" broadly speaking.

535 far the most inventive tribe. All the dances have two distinguishable parts: the dance strictly speaking and the finale or ikɔ́eyo. The latter consists of acrobatic exhibitions or a theatrical performance. It varies with each performance and sometimes goes beyond the limits of decency, especially in certain scenes of the women's dances. Here everything depends on the attitude of the actors and spectators.

535 786 [553] The words sung are usually proper. Passages that may be less so occur only exceptionally. The exclamations of some of the male or female dancers, but mostly those of the audience when the intensity of the performance reaches a climax, are somewhat less innocent. Thus this climax [62] is the weak spot morally speaking. This is true especially of the dances performed by the women who, led on by their passion and encouraged by the cheering and applause of the spectators, make provocative movements (bitɛ́kɔ́, bembɔ́njo). A European will see nothing wrong, but the native knows the gestures and their meaning. The spectators then applaud with even greater enthusiasm, either because of sexual feelings or out of aesthetic enjoyment, for to them these movements are beautiful. All the artistic dances for women which are the fashion at the present time contain a similar phase of exaggerated excitement. It is therefore understandable that in the past the elders strictly forbade children and adolescents to attend these dances.

[586] After what has just been said, no one will be astonished to hear that these great dances are often the cause of adultery and divorce. And to a limited extent the same can be said for the men's dances, for masculine beauty is exhibited in an enticing manner.

533 535 The rhythmic motions which sometimes accompany singing during drinking parties cannot really be called dances; nothing shocking is implied by them and the words of the songs are seldom improper. Salacious songs are rarely sung in the course of daily living, but they are never omitted from funeral ceremonies.

535 [illegible] Up to now we have spoken of artistic dances, which are always very popular. They were -- and are -- reserved for certain special occasions. For ordinary circumstances the Nkundɔ́ have a few little entertaining dances which have nothing at all in common with the dance as such. They are more like games. The lyrics of the songs

535 may be ribald, but this occurs rather rarely. However, at the present 177 time, they are often actually obscene -- especially since "European-851 style" dancing has been introduced, and more particularly in the centers, small and large, and among those who have come under [63] its influence. This kind of dancing for amusement is chiefly practiced by young people.

To the credit of morality it should be noted that mixed dancing is unknown to strictly native ways. It occurs in the centers (in the form of the mixed bofenya or the balinga, grotesque imitations of European dances) but is spreading -- and rapidly -- to the villages of the interior. The second variety especially raises havoc, for it has a deleterious influence on morality. It has been the cause of a number of cases of adultery, divorce, palavers, and quarrels, and has been forbidden by certain chiefs and headmen, who would like to be able to severely punish anyone who dances it.

Conclusion

834 The data presented in the foregoing section forces us to conclude that sexual modesty does exist among the Nkundó. The wearing of clothing, the various prohibitions, the attitude of the older and wiser members of the community show that they experience this feeling. It is the same here as elsewhere. In certain areas it is even carried to an extreme. The exceptions should be attributed to individual deviations; and because of the reactions they provoke, they even provide conclusive evidence. The general laxity which may be observed on some special occasions does not provide material for a serious objection against the existence of modesty. Yet it is difficult to determine the reason for such an attitude which seems to contradict the rest of our data. Should it be interpreted as a yielding to human weakness, or seen as a weakening of public morality? Or is it not rather because these special circumstances make an unfavorable interpretation of such actions impossible? An allusion made in public, in a group, [64] does not have the same significance as that same allusion may have between two people, where it implies a suspicious intimacy.

842 684 soon as her family becomes aware of her condition. The accomplice is made officially responsible and is required to accept this responsible and is required to accept this responsibility by publicly pledging his willingness to take all consequences upon himself. This pledge like all pledges is called ndanga. It consists of a knife, a ring of copper or brass, a spear, or similar objects. (2)

2. The same custom is practiced in the case of pregnancy resulting from adultery.

Article V. Sexual Intercourse

833 Although this subject is extremely delicate and therefore difficult to investigate and describe, it does not seem pointless to note here a few details with which I have become acquainted. We will discuss in succession a few circumstances relative to the act, then rape, and finally what are called incomplete acts. [92]

1. Circumstances relative to the act

● [77] The Nkundó have intercourse lying on their sides. Nowadays, natives who have had frequent contacts with Whites are beginning to abandon the old manner for that of the Europeans. The spirit of imitation probably plays some part in the transformation which is beginning, but the gradual spread of the knowledge that the European system makes conception more likely is also a factor.

Even for illicit relations our natives seldom choose the forest or near-by palm or banana groves. Usually they prefer an isolated hut, or they take advantage of the absence of witnesses who might intrude on them. At night they are generally afraid of anything that stirs in the forest.

833 95 68 The Nkundó have sexual relations only during the night. To do so in the daytime would be to risk being striken by a mortal illness called bombiló (derived from mbiló "noon," by extension, "day").

584 A young man who renounces his fiancée places her in the hands of the ndonga, who sends her back to her family.

The woman who does not want to continue their life together leaves her fiancé, perhaps telling him and perhaps not, first goes to the ndonga and then returns to her parents (nowadays she sometimes does not see the ndonga, although not doing so must be considered an infraction of the rule).

In practice she may also go directly to another man. Formerly it was dangerous to do so, since a war could result, and such an action was considered against the law. At the present time the greater freedom resulting from colonization has eliminated the dangers involved. Thus this lack of proper procedure has become more frequent and is even coming to be recognized as normal.

584 585 In any case, even if the woman has neglected to go to the ndonga, the latter is sent by the fiancé to examine the situation and to claim restitution of the payments that have already been made.

Strictly speaking, the breaking of the engagement consists in the restitution of the ikulá-ndanga through the mediation of the ndonga. But, as we will explain more fully in the chapter on divorce, gifts given by the woman's family are deducted. [125] Complete restitution of everything must be made. The woman's family cannot even invoke the work done by their daughter for the husband's benefit.

583 ●177 584 Nowadays, however, the custom of dividing the amount of the bride price in excess of the nkomé (1) is taking hold. The woman's parents demand a certain indemnity because they consider that the husband has lost the right to his valuables; if they do not withhold them altogether, it is because of the respect and embarrassment they feel toward the ndonga, who is related to the fiancé as he is to them.

1. See below, Article VII.

The natives try to explain this change in the ancestral law as follows:

1) An engagement is meant to develop into a regular marriage, and that is its only validity. The fiancé's right to the woman's work

584 is based solely on the nature of this state, which is a direct prepara-583 tion for married life. Therefore, if the union is not completed, the
● 177 fiancé is enriched at the expense of the parents-in-law.

2) When an engagement is broken, the parents lose the legitimate and normal expectation of a full bride price; they consider this loss lucrum cessans.

The natives' justification is not sufficient to explain the origin 584 of the change, however, for:
583
1) It seems likely that the Nkundó have simply imitated the 174 practice of other peoples of the Congo with whom they have become 177 acquainted since colonization, and that their explanation is but an explanation of convenience.

2) The reasons invoked in favor of the change are not new; they were equally valid in the past, and such as they are and in themselves they are therefore insufficient.

3) If we examine the reason concerning the benefit that the fiancé derives from the [126] woman's work, we find that it is based on a fallacious argument. For Nkundó law recognizes, on the one hand, the legitimacy of this gain and, on the other, the right of each party to break the engagement. Simply the breaking of the engagement cannot, therefore, result in the payment of an indemnity, since one cannot possibly be punished for having made use of a right.

4) The above objection is also applicable to the second reason given by the Nkundó: the possibility of the bride price not being paid is inherent in the essence of the engagement, since both parties are free not to go through with the union.

Thus the reasons given as such must be rejected.

Nevertheless, it is possible that modern circumstances have to some extent modified the nature of the problem. Thus:

1) The introduction of European wage labor and trade has given the Blacks a new idea of wealth. Consequently, the benefits reaped from the engagement have become much greater (through the development of trade and the availability of more varied goods and greater riches), and therefore the economic value of a woman has increased in considerable proportions.

Theoretically, these changes might justify some indemnification. In practice, however, economic development has increased the

585 amount of the engagement payment and thus counterbalances the in-
589 crease of the profit brought by a woman.

174 Indemnification for economic reasons would also have one
177 good result, namely that it would prevent a possible skewing of the system into a form of exploitation which would consist of taking fiancées for a time when they are needed for some special work and sending them back when the work is finished. [127]

But it must be noted that though the precaution may be good in itself, it is not called for under present circumstances, for the Nkundó do not even think of such a corruption of engagement customs.

2. Colonization has considerably reinforced -- or perhaps even introduced -- in native thinking the idea that the favors of a woman deserve a salary. I think that these circumstances have contributed much more to the origin of the new practice than economic changes -- or rather, that the justification for it is primarily based on this idea of venal love. And in that case we have before us a pretium stupri of a sort that could foster prostitution, and which is therefore in opposition to morality and public order.

Just as we must applaud the normal developments of the custom and its adaptation to the possibilities of social and moral elevation that colonization has created, so we must react against its corruption, aberrations, deviations, and a drift toward the exploitation of faults and vices.

Another objection against the innovation may be made on the grounds of its inconsistency within Nkundó law. Since there is no indemnification in the case of divorce, how is it possible to accept it in the case of the breaking of an engagement, which is a much weaker commitment than marriage itself? It is true that a Nkundó engagement is almost a marriage, since it includes cohabitation, etc.; nevertheless, it is not as tight a bond as a permanent union, from which it is clearly distinguished. The new custom leads logically to the conclusion that it is preferable to complete the union and make it definitive by paying the entire bride price and then to break it by means of a real divorce, which does not involve this financial loss.

Finally, although an indemnity based on the increase in the fiancé's profit from the engagement cannot be [128] condemned as

585 unjust in itself, it certainly becomes so if it is considered a penalty
584 inflicted for the rupture. For the indemnity is restricted to the man,
178 whether or not he is in the wrong. Furthermore, to accept an indemnity
177 even when the engagement is broken because of the woman tends to favor frauds and real swindles on the part of the woman and her parents, in short a kind of traffic in women.

[595] It is also evident that the rich (polygamists) suffer much less from the innovation than do monogamous men, especially those who [794] adopt monogamy as a principle and more especially the Christians, who do not condone divorce. Thus I am of the opinion that the desire to defend polygamy against the doctrine of the missionaries is not entirely unrelated to the transformation of this custom.

800 All these considerations show that the question is highly complex and that it would be better if the ancient custom were restored.

If the breaking of the engagement is due to wrongs, the new custom could perhaps be tolerated, though it is not without serious dangers, but the indemnity should be imposed exclusively on the party at fault. Furthermore, the wrongs would have to be serious, and on the other hand, the indemnity would have to be, not in the nature of a forfeit, but of a payment of damages commensurate with the extent of the damage suffered and the seriousness of the wrong. And here those cases should especially be considered where the breaking of the engagement is accompanied by proceedings of a vexatious and insulting nature. And though it is a very delicate task to evaluate all these elements, we must not forget to take them into account.

It seems to me that the ancient law must still be maintained when the engagement is broken simply because of a change of feelings for which neither party is to blame, if such a case occurs. For it is better not to innovate than to innovate too fast. (153)

Article IV. Walo -- bonkulaka

583 The walo or bonkulaka is the bulk of the bride price paid for a marriage. Between the payment of the nkonga and that of the walo,

2. The nature of walo valuables

583 * The walo primarily consists of copper and brass rings. Wrought metal objects (bifeko), such as spears, knives, or axes are also added. Nowadays a part may be made up of simple brass or iron (steel) bars. Goats may be given in addition; a she-goat is worth 5 to 6 rings (nowadays 10), and a he-goat, 3 to 4 bakonga (nowadays 6 to 7). One or more eifeŋé bells are greatly prized as gifts.

583 * Payment in iron or copper chains (bengé-nyola), in various kinds of bead necklaces, and in leopard's teeth has almost entirely disappeared. Formerly, certain kinds of beads had great value; the big, round bluish-white ones (lonyóngo, pl. nnyóngo) were worth 1 konga each, the big, oblong blackish ones, cylindrical or rectangular in shape, 2 to 3 centimeters in diameter and 5 to 10 centimeters long (called nkóngé) were worth one slave or, nowadays, 20 to 25 bakonga each.

583 * Copper (konga) and brass (liŋgo) are the most important of all. Thus paying the bride price is often referred to as éŋga la liŋgo la konga.

The statement by R.P. Kaptein (in Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, pp. 432-343) that original valuables were the benkata, the bingetele, and the mitako is based on an error. [132] The first two types of valuables, also called bendéngo by some tribes, were used exclusively by the Ntómbá of Lake Tumba and the adjacent Ekonda (Bosanga, Baliŋgó, Lonyanyanga, etc.). The mitako, known in Lonkundo as ngele, singular lingele, are not native; this monetary unit was introduced by the Independent State.

● [177] The practice of making the payment at least partially in money or in objects of European origin (such as fabrics, blankets, sewing machines, trunks, household utensils, etc.) is gradually being introduced. Before the crisis it was already very popular among "white people."

3. The source of the valuables

A young man obtains the valuables for the bride price in various ways. The most usual way and the one which also conforms best to the Nkundó's familial and social regulations in the use of valuables

583* 431 One must be careful not to confuse this boéngo with byiko byă nyang'éy'ôna, an expression frequently heard. The latter includes any payment to the mother and includes the goat and the nkando as well as the boéngo discussed above and others. The word used in this case is not byikó, singular ikó, "porcupine," but rather byiko, singular wiko, "price, value" and derived from the verb -ika, "to set a price."

3) Lokolé: a brother or a cousin of the wife asks for a konga. He beats the gong (lokolé) in order to make noise and thus force the husband to satisfy him. That is how this boéngo seems to have originated. In practice people simply demand a [147] present. The racket can sometimes last for quite a while. But the elders do not allow the gathering to be disrupted if the husband does not have precisely the gift that would give satisfaction.

4) Bakulé, or botéwé: the woman's brothers stick a piece of the trunk of a banana tree (botéwé) into the ground, so that young relatives of the husband may shoot arrows (bakulé) at it. These are then removed by young members of the wife's family who, at the present time, are sometimes given money -- 5 francs, for instance.

[289] [721] 5) Wambá: prisoner's rope, that is, a rope to which war prisoners were formerly tied, two by two (a system now imitated for prisoners of the colonial law enforcement agencies and administration). In the past the patriarch, or head of the family, demanded a konga or a knife as indemnity against the possibility that he or members of his family might be imprisoned as a result of a war caused by the woman being married. Nowadays the chiefs set up by the administration and given the rights of family heads by the European authority have also claimed rights to this boéngo whose significance, purpose, and even name have completely changed as a result. It is now called bonyoólo w'ònkonji, "the chief's chain." It is clear that this payment has become something which it was not meant to be.

[171] [621]

6) Etéka: a heavy wooden fork, fastened to the neck. This is a present claimed by the mother, by one of the father's other wives, or by a wife of the woman's brother, against the possibility that they may have to undergo torture by means of the fork because of the women whose bride price is being paid. This could happen if she were

583 end in his hand and offers the other to the husband, saying, "Take-it."
594 The husband naturally refuses and extricates himself by means of a knife or a piece of copper. [149]

11) Bofngo w'Eyen, or "weeds." These are demanded by some clans because the husband's clan scoffs at them on account of the number of weeds and chaff they allow to grow in their village instead of keeping it clean. One or two rings are given.

12) Engumbé: known in some groups, such as the Ekafala, where it is the last one demanded. It is a bofngo of authority. (1) claimed by the patriarchs of the families belonging to the grouping from which the woman has come. Formerly, the amount went as high as 3 to 5 bakonga, depending on the number of families, groups of families, or clans related through marriage that were living in the [17] same village. Now the payment is made primarily in European currency, and the amount may be 50 francs, for example. This bofngo is later divided among the various kin groupings related to the wife's family.

[62] 1. An engumbé is a temporary hut in a newly settled village. The family patriarchs are the first who must go and live there in order to urge the others to follow and to exercise all the evil of possible magic spells.

Various male and female relatives of the woman ask for assorted small objects, such as a small knife (ilfeka), a native razor (lotóó), a pin for braiding hair (bosfngé), a needle (tsongé), a necklace of blue beads (bingngéla), etc.

Nowadays many other objects are also demanded: clothing, dishes, etc., Thus, one day on the occasion of a single bride-price payment, I heard demands for the following objects:

For the father, a pair of trousers and a jacket, because when the woman was a young child she soiled his clothing without troubling herself about the matter.

For the mother, a bed, because worries about her daughter often kept her from resting.

589* For an aunt, a basin, because she had washed the child.
431 For a brother, a pair of shoes or slippers, because the girl had worn his shoes during the courtship, etc., etc. [150]

All these befogo are included in the sum total of the bride price. Should the occasion arise, they must be returned with the rest.

In addition to the befogo asked for and received by the woman's relatives, others are demanded by members of the husband's family. As in the case of the former each person voices his claims according to his desires and without any predetermined order but must always do so through the ndonga. The gifts chiefly consist of furs of the [590] enfiɛ otter, the lifika monkey, bonkɔ́ng and ngoi felines; a joint of game (monkey, antelope, etc.), a mat, a pot, a hunting net, a carrying bag (bokómbɛ), a bead necklace, etc. Nowadays there may [591] also be various items introduced by the Europeans: items of clothing, fabrics, saucepans, dishes, etc. This category of befogo is included in the sum total of the nkomɛ (see the following article). If the nkomɛ is given immediately, the parties proceed with this payment. Then the ndonga(s) are remunerated as stated above: each party gives him at least 2 rings.

Finally, the woman's father says to the husband: "In any case, be on your way; we will collect the nkomɛ and bring it to you." Whereupon the husband leaves; if he prefers to wait for his wife he remains, and returns home when the items of the nkomɛ have been collected.

Article VII. Nkomi

Nkomɛ is the name for the objects which the wife's family gives to the husband. The term likomo is also sometimes used. The [592] Injolo say likoma, the Wangata, Bakela, Ioanda, and Bokoté say likomi. All these words are derived from the same verb -koma, "to wrap up, to make a package," (1) for the nkomɛ valuables are

1. The Bolia say likonga from the verb -konga, which has the same meaning as -koma.

[illegible] generally packed in baskets or [151] in [illegible] (or [illegible]), which [illegible] are baskets woven of palm leaves.

Some ethnologists have introduced the expression douaire, "dowry," (1) to designate the goods given by the woman's family to the man's family. Actually, the word dot would be a much better translation, because it corresponds more closely to the nature of these payments. But this would require changing the terminology adopted, and the introduction of another term (such as marriage payment) for what is generally understood by the word dot, whose use is in any case unfortunate. [Translator's note: Hulstaert uses dot, which would literally be translated into English as "dowry," to designate the payments made by the husband and his family to the wife's family. However, I have employed the term "bride price" in accordance with the usage of English-speaking anthropologists.]

Furthermore, the word douaire already has a precise and accepted meaning, so that its use in this context would lead to confusion. That is why I prefer provisionally to use an entirely new term, and to translate [illegible] as contre-dot [literally, counter-dowry]. (2)

[Translator's note: The term "dowry" has been used to designate this payment in the translation.]

The [illegible] consists of hens, ducks (3), salt, mats, pots, goods

---

1. See for example Torday, in Africa, Vol. 2, no. 3, p. 279.

2. This term was suggested to me by Attorney General A. Sohier.

3. Ducks have been introduced fairly recently; the Nkundô maintain that their ancestors did not have any, and that they got them from the Ekonda. In their classification they place them under the category of chickens.

[29]
[77]

583 of our peoples. Its pure and simple abolition would upset their estab-
577 lished order completely. First their mentality has to change, and that end can be accomplished only gradually, since a moral change is involved. And the present state of these peoples is not sufficiently evolved for the abolition of the bride price to be beneficial. Here, if ever, the axiom: nihil leges sine moribus is valid.

(60) But what might perhaps be done in that direction now is to place a limitation on the amount of the bride price. This measure should be strictly enforced to make sure that it is carried out -- although in practice its enforcement would be very difficult, for at the beginning [100], many interested parties would try to circumvent it. If good results are to be obtained, an efficacious repression of adultery and the frequency of divorce should accompany the limitation on the bride price. It would be a first step towards the ideal. Others could follow according to the extent of the natives' evolution toward a higher level of morality.

Apropos of these considerations we should like to say a few words concerning:

585 3. Traffic in bride prices
577

This term may be taken to mean two different things. It may be used to refer to a general increase in the amount of the bride price, which has reached enormous proportions since the European penetration of the area. Or it may refer to the increase in the bride price of a single woman for successive marriages, from which her family profits.

The first meaning of the term refers to a fact, namely that the amount of the bride price has increased considerably. The reason for this development is the increase in material wealth resulting from colonization. Riches are more easily acquired. But we should not exclude the role of the greed of many parents, which has also increased. It is the most important and can reach scandalous proportions in areas where the bride price is paid in European goods (money, fabrics, appliances, utensils). In such regions, as for 77, example among the riverain people of the Lower Congo, it goes up
781 to and easily exceeds 3,000 francs. Think of what this amount [illegible] represents, especially in times of economic depression. (1) 935

---

1. For the sake of comparison, here are some average figures for 1936.

[illegible]

Wages	fr. 20,00 to 25,00
Copal, per kilogram . . .	0,30 to 0,70
Palmettos	0,10 to 0,20
Palm nuts	0,05 to 0,10

Inevitably the action of one man leads another to follow suit for -- need I repeat? -- everything is interdependent.

Another reason may be, and sometimes is, involved. It is the desire [101] of a husband to bind a woman more securely to him by paying a lot for her. This is certainly a praiseworthy feeling, especially considering the women's readiness to resort to divorce. Its practice, however, is full of dangers. If it is limited to an isolated case, that is, to a single monogamist who gives his entire fortune for his only wife, the danger is minimal. Such is the case of one of our catechists who paid an enormous amount, without its having the slightest repercussion on his region. But the danger is very great if a man does this to establish a harem, especially if for that purpose he entices the wives of others. Thus, for instance, a man to whom the administration gave great political powers caused a fantastic increase in the general bride price among the Ekonda of the north. (1)

1. One factor which helped increase the bride price among the Wangata and other tribes in the vicinity of Coquilhatville has been described by Father Kaptein in Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 544. Since his study is written in Dutch, I think it would be useful if I translated the whole text here:

"When the first Europeans arrived at Leopoldville and Brazzaville, fabrics and other European articles soon made their appearance in Coquilhatville. The chiefs Yoma of Boyeka, Iboka of Boyere (Boyela), Yamba of Eala; Nkake of Bokele, etc., went up the Tshuapa and Ikelemba rivers and, by means of these goods, bought slaves, women, and ivory.

583 b
177 "When they returned home, they acquired wives in their region and paid for them with the slaves and women they had purchased cheaply by means of European products. They paid three or four slave women for a wife in their region. The arrival of the Whites and of foreign Blacks taught them the number nkoi (10,000), a word which they thought meant 1,000 and which in the past they had called 10 nkoto or 10 x 100.

"The Europeans soon became involved in native palavers concerning women. This was inevitable in the Black Country. When the [182] Blacks brought their palavers before the Whites they either did not want or did not dare to say:

'I paid for this woman with 3 other women'; they would say, 'I paid for this woman with 3 nkoi of mitako,' that is, 3 x 1,000 mitako. In the meantime, the words nkoto and nkoi acquired their significance of 1,000 and 10,000 respectively. But people continued to say that a woman had been paid for with nkoi through either an error of the Whites, or the greed of polygamists, or both. Later, several women actually were paid for with nkoi, especially when the mitako became the official currency of the Congo. Actually, this development was not surprising, since the polygamists had a monopoly on women, and it was very much in their interest to increase the price.

"Formerly the price of wives was no higher in Wangata than elsewhere. Only 5 bakonga were paid for many wives, for instance, at Bokala near Bamanya, a village under the jurisdiction of Chief Tome of Boyeka."

583* 177 It would be good to counteract that much increase in bride prices. For there is a danger that it will condemn to bachelorhood many young men who could otherwise build a home out of the fruits of their own labor. [182]

589* 586* The second meaning of the term "traffic in bride prices" has a more precise application. After a divorce all the valuables must be returned to the husband. Consequently, the new husband must pay at least as much as the first, and in general he even has to add a supplement for the family who, after all, have incurred expenses for the palaver. And so it continues. Thus the more husbands a woman has in succession, the more her bride price increases. It seems to me that this practice is in no way to be condemned. The increase is reasonable. For it not only constitutes some compensation to the woman's family for their troubles but, in addition it may exercise a good influence on the social condition of the people. If it is to have such an influence, divorce must not become a means of satisfying greed (in general, at the present time, it has not yet become such a means), and the increase must not be excessive.

000 In such cases the increase in the bride price can thus have a wholesome effect on the morality and stability of marriages by making men afraid of marrying a divorcée and, as a result, making women more cautious and less flighty. Here everything depends on caution, restraint, and supervision on the part of responsible authorities. [183]

4. The reason for the existence of the bride price

583* 177 This is a question which should not be asked of the natives; they do not know how to answer it. Nor do the facts provide any certainty. All that can be attempted is the construction of a hypothesis which fits the reality.

The following explanatory theories have been put forward: that it is a compensation to the woman's family for the loss of a member (see, for example, Seitz in Africa, Vol. 3, p. 65, and also Torday in Africa, Vol. 2, p. 275, under "Exchange"); that it is a payment for fecundity; and finally, that it is a guarantee of the

593 men although their first marriage has not been broken and no new 571 marriage agreement has been concluded.
164 The data given above provides no confirmation in the [114] Nkundó tribes under study of the statement made by Engels "Les Wangata [The Wangata]," Revue congolaise, 1910, p. 35) that among the Wangata "her husband can exchange her . . . she can make no protest." (1)

1. The Ekonda apply the term liengé only to an exchange of daughters or sisters. They have a specific term: mpángá. Note, by the way, that certain Mbólé tribes who practice a true wife exchange designate it by the same name: impángá.

Article VII. Purchase

592 The purchase of women is not practiced by the Nkundó tribes 582 under discussion here nor even by the Bombwanja. The practice is to 590 be found only among the Elíngá. What is involved is not a marriage by means of a bride price but a real purchase; that is, a man buys a woman from her husband for a certain sum. He does not go through the woman's parents, as in an ordinary marriage by bride-price payment, but addresses himself directly to the husband.

In general it is the woman who makes the proposal that a man buy her in this manner. Sometimes a man wants to take a woman and [721] first comes to an agreement with her. Before the Europeans arrived such a situation generally led to a war between clans or villages. After an armistice the palaver was settled, and the [213] purchaser paid the husband. Nowadays, since the Nkundó no longer dare to [577] fight because of the legal sanctions that inevitably follow, when a woman abandons her husband for another man who wants to buy her, the parties involved bring the palaver before the judges. As the woman wants only her new husband, and as, on the other hand, war and the punishment of women have been abolished, the first husband has no

837 their sense of the personal injustice involved. But they do not reason 577 out these feelings; they follow them spontaneously, blindly.

There is a greater awareness of the social evil in adultery. But it is based not on the philosophical considerations of this harm in itself, but on the consequences of individual cases for the proper functioning of society -- palavers, financial difficulties, enmities, quarrels, wars.

This it seems to me is the present state of their ideas. It does not preclude the possibility that the law and sanctions against adultery may rest on an ultimate basis of moral ideas. And more particularly it is quite possible that the moral idea [321] operates only in the form of a feeling of the great principles of fundamental natural law which is innate to all human reason.

837
177
5) No one will be astonished if we say that colonization, far from reducing the frequency of adultery, actually contributed to its considerable increase. The abolition of native penalties and punishments together with a great freedom of movement could not help but lead, naturally, to this state of affairs. Every informed colonial who is in close contact with the natives is aware of the situation. "The prohibition of corporal punishments which, according to custom, were the sanctions imposed against a woman's adultery have brought about a license whose extent can be measured by the degree to which a group is subject to our occupation. The forgetfulness if not the contempt for the promises of marriage is nowhere carried so far as in places where the customary disciplines have been completely removed." (Maj. Engels, Bulletin Soc. Belge. Et. Col., cited in Congo, 3rd year, Vol. 1, p. 77, April, 1922). [111] That is why various persons have repeatedly called for sanctions against adultery to replace the ancestral means of repression that have been abolished.

692
177
837
But the decrees hoped for have never passed beyond the stage of mere projects. Fortunately, another step, and a fundamental one, has been taken in the meantime through the establishment of native jurisdiction (1926). Under the guidance and control of European authorities, native courts will turn the helm halfway back to the ancient sanctions, adapting these all the while to the new conditions created by colonization and by the introduction of more humanitarian 177 ideas. Nevertheless, great care must be exercised not to go to ex-681 tremes in introducing these ideas to the point where a society only

671 just beginning to emerge from a pagan barbarism because of the presence of a civilization based on Christianity, is treated as an equal of European communities. Native society must evolve gradually and harmoniously. Rushing is often synonymous with breaking, and it is always a [332] great mistake. And in the matters under discussion, the abolition of sanctions which, in spite of their imperfection and their inadequacy for fulfilling the whole task, have been shown to have a real efficacy, has removed all the coercive power of Nkundo law. A sentimental and excessive humanitarianism must yield before the native society's right to respect for its vital institutions -- unless these are entirely to be condemned -- and therefore before the necessity for severe punishments which it cannot do without for the moment. For our natives are not yet ready for a complete abolition of their customary sanctions, since they still lack a new foundation that would replace their fear of the ancient penalties. Let us therefore take care not to take all means of punishment away from husbands and wives, even if they seem somewhat violent from our viewpoint. Finally, there is no sense in overstressing a respect for members of the weaker sex, who by their very nature sometimes need punishment for the greater good of the whole community. Moreover, as for this respect, our Nkundo do not understand it at all; the way we conceive of it is entirely opposed to their mentality and their laws. Therefore, everything will work out more easily if the native courts are given sufficient latitude to act in the spirit of their ancestral law and if their activity is guided by a constant, informed, and sympathetic control whose sole aim is the healthy evolution of native society.

[illegible] If it is applied within these limits and under these conditions, Nkundo law can redress many wrongs and help to save native society from the abyss into which it is in danger of falling. In spite of its faults and imperfections, it is preferable not only to the system of freedom (or license) which has reigned for many years, but also to 595 from her personally; she attaches herself to her relative and follows her in her marital union."

The name ebísa, as well as the functions involved, may be improperly extended to a relative who is fetched by a woman so that she may become the wife not of her husband, but of one of his relatives. Sometimes she is even intended for a man who belongs to another clan, which is related by marriage, but for whom there is prohibition on marriage with the first clan. For instance, Bolómbó w'Ěfowa of Eleke (Lokongo) came to fetch her sister Engé for Bompata w'Isolema, who belonged to the Befánola clan which, like her husband's clan (Bombóngo), was part of the village of Bosombó.

Article V. Slave Women

595 567 In times past a polygamist could have one or several slaves in his harem whom he treated as wives. They were war prisoners whom he himself had captured, or had bought from others, or received as [316] bonkonga. As a rule no bride price was paid for them, and in leaving, they retained their status of slaves. This fact did not prevent a husband from loving them like real wives. But their rivals respected them less and, especially on the occasion of quarrels and disputes, reminded them of their inferiority.

[567] Since slavery has been abolished by colonization, many former slaves have returned to their respective families. Others, on the contrary, have not wanted to take advantage of the freedom granted them and have preferred to remain faithful. In such cases the husband paid the usual bride price for them with all the appropriate formalities. Only recently (1932) Ilofé, a [583] Bolombé man (Bonjoku) thus paid a bride price of 43 bekonga to his wife Ámbá's family. Ámbá was originally from Bokoké (Bolongo?) but had been abducted at the beginning of the European occupation. Ilofé had inherited her from Bakáfonga of the Bosefólá bólango (Bonkoso) thanks to the intervention of his great-uncle Isenó who had paid 7 rings on his behalf as the customary bompáfogé called ndóngo.

595* (53) And it is not difficult to understand this fact. For indeed polygamy constitutes a legitimate and easy means by which a man may enjoy several women without being bothered by palavers, difficulties, etc. The mentality of many men who care little about moral laws as well as the tendency of a disordered instinct to multiply its objects only confirm this observation. Often one sees men who were monogamists at first begin by taking a second wife out of passion. Then gradually their passion becomes greater rather than appeased, and so a harem is built up progressively.

595* (178) The changes introduced by colonization in the economic life of this people have not resulted in a decrease of polygamy. In the absence of exact figures we must be satisfied with simple visual observations, but in certain regions one has the impression that the harems have become smaller but, on the other hand, that the number of polygamists has increased, and therefore [275] the desire for polygamy, that is, its affective cause, has [651] not diminished. Nor does the extra tax frighten or stop the polygamists. The great means for changing the Nkundǝ attitude in this realm will always be the action of the missions and the penetration of Christian ethics, seconded by a government attitude favoring monogamy. (1)

[illegible] 1. The favorable attitude of the colonial government toward monogamy is expressed chiefly in the permission given to a polygamist's extra wives to abandon their husband in order to contract a monogamous union, preferably in a mission, under the supervision of missionaries.

[177] Another means, undoubtedly secondary but still important, is the example of European couples. The Blacks are imitative, and native women envy the lot of the white woman, so that European households are propaganda for monogamy when they behave well.

Article VI

Magic Practices Pertaining to Divorce

It seems to me not without interest to devote a few lines to the magic practices prevalent among our peoples and used on the occasion of divorce. We are not speaking of love philters; strictly speaking they would not be appropriate here. (1) We will therefore limit ourselves to giving a general idea of the practices used to prevent a wife from leaving her husband, to avenge a divorce, or to make a fugitive return.

As we shall see, these objectives often become intertwined.

1) The trinity [illegible]-[illegible]-[illegible] is considered by the natives as three related practices. We see it more as three forms of a single practice.

All three originated with the Ntómbá of Lake Tumba and [417] were introduced to the Nkundó -- directly or indirectly -- by certain Ekonda tribes living between the two peoples. This introduction took place in modern times. The practices were unknown here before colonization. Even at the present time they have not spread everywhere; they have not yet crossed the Momboyo. The chronological order of their introduction is first [illegible], second [illegible], third [illegible].

The animating spirit of these practices is the leopard. Their primary purpose is to call back an unfaithful wife and, if she obstinately refuses, to kill her or her seducer. Secondarily, they also serve to cause the death of any enemy whatever, especially in reprisal.

The three practices differ with respect to their manufacture and method of use. We cannot go into all the relevant details, for they are outside the framework of this study. [418] It is sufficient to say that the owner of the charm to whose powers he resorts first calls the woman by blowing into an antelope horn,

---

1. See Chapter I, Part 2, Article VIII.

789 787 especially very early in the morning at the crowing of the cock.(1)

1. The natives also use this means to call their children who long ago left for the "lowlands" and whose return they ardently desire.

If the one who is called does not return, the charm will take revenge either on her or on her lover, depending on the desire of the person operating it. Another intervention on his part is then required, however, and it varies according to the form used. Note that according to the native view it is impossible for the wife not to hear the call, no matter how far away she may be. If she does not return, it is because she is being obstinate and deserves to be punished.

The spirit of vengeance alone is involved in:

789 754 671 2) The ngando. This charm comes from the Coquilhatville region or even farther away. The word ngando is the Lolinga form of the Lonkundo word ngondo, which means "gavial." The teeth of this reptile actually play a part in its composition. It is used to punish any thief by death. Therefore it has been declared effective against anyone who tries to seduce the wife of another. It will cause the culprit's feet to swell and to open with pus. Like the above practices, this one has not yet crossed Momboyo.

178 177 Such usages like many others have therefore been recently introduced. Before the arrival of Europeans in these parts, only love philters were known. However, it is easily understandable that the Nkundo gladly and confidently received these new practices which are so useful -- in their opinion -- and operate in a domain of capital importance for which colonization has deprived them of their ancient sanctions and means of prevention. [417]

846 In order to facilitate the flowing out of all the blood, the 755 mother is given hot baths. However, they are not begun before noon, for the Nkundó say that in the morning and evening it is too cold and the blood is not sufficiently fluid. Those who have been [177] in greater contact with the Whites give the mother beer or wine to drink. The hot baths are administered behind the hut in an en[illegible] closure set up for the occasion. They are of two kinds: baths by sprinkling (bompélo wà ntémbe) and steam baths (bompélo w'Ekingo). For the first method [488] very hot water is used, and by using a bunch of palms, the woman's abdomen, loins, and ribs are sprinkled. In the second method a pit is dug and large leaves (or a basin) containing boiling water are placed in it. Three or four strong, wide sticks are placed on top, and the woman is seated on them. She is wrapped in several mats to which, today, one or two blankets are added. She is left thus exposed to the action of the steam for several minutes. According to the natives, it is the ideal system because it makes all the blood come out, or almost all. Some people first give a sprinkle bath, and then follow it with a steam bath; others are satisfied with one or the other, depending on the circumstances. In any case more than one bath is never given in one day. This care may be given for one or two weeks, or it may stop after two or three days. The effect of "civilizing" is more inclined to the latter. But no Nkundó would want to omit the baths, for the woman's life is at stake.

After the bath the woman is carefully rubbed and dried, [302] and then anointed with oil mixed with red paint.

From time to time, usually every second day, she is given a douche.

846 As long as the mother remains weak, a large fire is maintained in her hut to keep her warm, and the doors are closed by means of palms. The husband and his relatives fetch the firewood. But the first log must be cut and brought by the husband who, to use the Nkundó expression, must "remove the violence" (ĩnula lofoso). In the beginning the woman lies down on a bokoge right near the fire. She turns the front of her body toward it. The fire plays a great role in her quick recovery. She is very well cared

845 puberty, by his father. The performance of this rule entails continence (bekila) for the person who undertakes it, even with respect to the spouse. A violation of this rule prevents healing of the wound or at least makes the process very long and difficult. (1)

[755] 1. A similar bekila applies to anyone nursing a large gangrenous ulcer (wãlá).

The foreskin that has been cut off is dried on the bolíkó (tray or shelf). Then no one bothers with it any longer, and it usually remains there, dusty and dirty, for an indefinite period of time if the rats leave it alone.

In the centers the young people are beginning to neglect [177] the native skilled in circumcising and resort instead to European surgeons.

Circumcision is not an occasion for feasts or ceremonies. [554] Sometimes a man who is rich and vain will give a feast, but this is not at all a common practice.

The term "to circumcise" is translated in Lonkundo as otúa lopepé, "to cut off the foreskin." The less vulgar term and one used much more frequently is otúa nsóngé, "to cut off the tip." A much too decent circumlocution is otúa batói, "to cut off the ears."

The reason for this custom has already been given in Chapter I, Part II, Article II, 2.

Article VIII. Education

From an early age a Nkundó child must perform various 866 small services for his parents, especially in the household; he is 867 asked to draw water, fetch firewood, take care of a little brother or sister, etc. The demands for such services are addressed chiefly to girls, but boys are not at all exempt. By the very nature of things, however, the latter are less frequently asked to help.

Quite early a boy may accompany his father on trips, at meetings, legal debates, etc. The father makes a bow and arrows for him and teaches him the art of using them. The great pastime

6) The parent's opposition to reprimands by strangers is even greater as a general rule. They try to cover up and justify the faults of their progeny, whom they will fiercely defend. The children naturally know all this and take advantage of it.

7) The polygamous household, with all its rivalries among co-wives, cannot but accentuate all such [114] adverse effects on the children's education. The conflicts, spiteful comments, palavers, etc., are easily extended to the children. And each wife defends her own.

8) Everything is public; there are no secrets; everything is known, seen, and heard. People do not restrain themselves and the presence of children does not stop the flow of insults and obscenities which anger provokes. The young people see many things it would be better for them not to know. They are present at domestic quarrels and are witnesses to dissensions. All this is increased by life outdoors, in the street, and by the thinness of partitions.

9) Another factor is added nowadays: the facility of communications and the presence of European stations. Boys can always run away and find shelter with the Whites or their native employees. The girls seek out kinswomen who live at such stations, even though they must help a little with the housework, in the hope of later enjoying a greater freedom and living in luxury. Parental influence and authority are naturally weakened as a result.

10) Finally, Nkundo education lacks any solid basis, any religion or religious morality. Everything is based on natural, physical fear: the fear of punishments (physical or based on experience), harmful consequences of bad actions (palavers, difficulties, fines, indemnities, sometimes the shame of being caught -- as in theft). It is especially this lack of religious motivation that makes their moral education bear so little fruit. As the Nkundo are accustomed to this imperfect state, they do not feel the need for such a foundation. That is why it is so difficult to instill any moral conscience into them. The patient and persevering action of the great Christian truths with their institutions for moral formation (uninterrupted preaching, confession, prayer) are needed to endow

591 Although even St. Thomas teaches that the only natural authority is that of the head of the family, European legislation has, through ignorance, completely abolished the rights of the native family head; the wife is freed from all ties and is thus abandoned to licentiousness. Through a legal fiction, clan law has gone over into the hands of the "recognized native courts of justice," which, however, have just as much to do with the clan court as a policeman with a father. The communization of trade, education, and the rearing of the young, as is demonstrated to us by Russia, would revolutionize our society far less than our installation of these so-called native courts of justice has done in the Congo. Education and correction have been replaced by punishment. Politics, which have begun to play such an all-important 602 role in our society, had /155/ almost no importance in Nkundo society.
613 The neighboring clans were all connected with each other through blood relationship, intermarriage, or friendship ties. Only when there was a struggle against a foreign and common enemy did politics have a role to fulfill. And then the same order of rank was observed among the clans as was already indicated for the members of a single clan.

177 Here also, biased or romantic products of our ideas about barbarism
726 have adapted these so-called intertribal wars to the need that we felt, to civilize the natives at any cost. These wars were not to be com-
628 pared with our European wars, in which a mass of people are slaughtered. In the Congo, no sooner had wounded or dead fallen on both sides than the chiefs were already congregated to conclude a peace treaty. Here again, we meant to respect the political organization of the natives by the creation of chieftainships and native chiefs, who were to form the political-administrative link between the native clans and the European higher administration. Such chiefs were totally unknown in native society. Together with the establishment of the native courts, the establishment of chieftainships gave the death blow to the actual social organization of the Nkundo-Mongo. The very fact that these institutions are territorial demonstrates clearly that here no ordinary shifting of power has taken place, but simply an elimination of the traditional power in favor of a new colonial power.

177 Indeed, where formerly the "customary rightful chief" was sought
622 out, even though it was sometimes only a formality, the new formula of the "sector" has relieved the higher administration from this care too. And it is only to be hoped that this new formula will at least do away with the legal fiction that the "chiefs" are actually "something native," so that they may be classified for once and for all in the

577 category of civil servants. In this manner they would fall under the 623 written law and could be obliged to practice monogamy, whereas now nearly all of the "native chiefs" are precisely the maintainers and promoters of polygamy. If this had /138/ been enforced from the start, then polygamy, instead of spreading, would have virtually disappeared from the native society.

5. Splitting of the Clan

613 After all that has been said before, it must be rather apparent how an autonomous clan can split up and, thereby, form two autonomous clans.

When a clan has expanded too far, its borders cross over the boundaries of blood relationship, and offenses against the law of exogamy occur. When such offenses are multiplied, further separation is gradually aimed at to make marriages possible. Such a situation between two parts of the same clan, who are striving for "legal autonomy," is called bokana, a term that signifies that unlawful relations exist between the two. It generally occurs between member groups that have the same male ancestor, but not the same female ancestor—that is, they are issue from different wives of the same founder.

Another cause of splitting is the voluntary or obligatory withdrawal of one of the members. When he establishes himself outside, begets a sizeable progeny, and acquires a patrimony of his own, the relations with his own clan become less frequent; and the separated fraction gradually begins to settle smaller lawsuits, to maintain its own graveyard, to bury the umbilical cords of its children in its own territory, to take on its own name, and to refer to its own founder.

Often also at the source of this estrangement lies the refusal of a certain fraction of the clan to submit to the authority of the clan members.

6. Legal Dependents

613
614 Until now we have spoken only of the ethnic clan, of the members 618 who belong to it through descent. They /139/ are the sole bearers of

10. Conclusion

182 Nkundo society was a fully alive, organic community. All of its organs functioned and were able to adjust continually to the changes in its life. Ethnically, socially-legally, and politically, they were open to every improvement. The organs with which it was built stood nearest to natural law and drew their rights and duties from it, and also the spirit which inspired them.

The facts prove that this society could survive. It arose at the source of the Lomako; in a short time it had extended itself peacefully over the whole central area of the Congo; it pressed eastward across the Lomami and Lualaba, and southward across the Kaisai /Kasai/-Sankuru, to occupy about a fifth of the present Congo at the time of the arrival of the Whites.

183 177 This society was open to all healthy influences and could adapt itself to all reasonable demands of civilization. It was, however, not reconcilable with what precisely is wrong in our European ideas about progress and civilization: elimination of all ethnic intermediary organs, equalization of all individuals, materialization of all life on the basis of economic competition, slave-like submission to the impersonal, unpersonal State, with that terrible pretense of freedom, of being able to do everything that is not forbidden by the State.

177 161 This suddenly attained freedom, which was accompanied by the abolition of all the former joints of society, means the death of the Nkundo /161/ community, not only in its soul, its being, but also in its existence. The gradual depopulation, the dying out in the Middle Congo, has had repercussions now and then, even in government circles. "The Nkundo-Mongo population is melting away like snow before the sun," is the brief comment of the last official report. The Waola, between the Ruki and the Bolombo /rivers/, had in 1939 ninety deaths and three births. The official statistics of 1939 of the territory of Coquilhatville give one hundred adults for every twenty-four children. The official data of the same year for the Vicariate of Coquilhatville, with its 882,726 inhabitants, give a ratio of 415 children to 1,000 adults. According to these data, the whole population will be decreased by more than 50 percent by the following generation, thus dwindled to less than one-half.

Coquilhatville, 1939

463 Division of labor is unknown, and each person works entirely on his own, without the help of a middleman. There are no laborers
● [17] and certainly no artisans unless there happens to be some artisan or other who learned his trade under the government or at one or other of the Mission posts and has returned to his village after having completed his contract.

As a rule, such people do not find sufficient work in their own villages, and, as they are usually in possession of a few boxes, clothes, and pots and pans which they have acquired with the savings of their monthly salary, they play the grand gentleman in their village until their goods and chattels have been used up and worn out.

"Njolemwa Bosala," he says, "I am tired of work." "Njowa l'ompele," "I am dying of the heavy, difficult work."

Several of them there return to one or the other of the centers of the White settlers and again offer themselves as craftsmen.

554 A good craftsman has a high reputation among the natives, and his social position is even a very good one for a Negro. He is able regularly to supply food for his wife and children and also to get himself clothes.

326 Although most Negroes work individually, this is not true of the smith who has to have helpers in order to do his job.

465 Since the Mongo Negro knows nothing of wages, his helpers get part of the income, consisting of mitako [a kind of metal currency]
436 or some part of the work that has been done, either a knife or a lance, or a foot or arm ring.

I. THE SMITH'S TRADE.

326
554 Of the various industrial trades, that of the smith is certainly the first in rank. The smith is one of the leading people [94] in the village and one of the inevitable persons to have a decisive voice in village affairs whether in settling differences or in meetings.

In fact, the smith is the only one of the Mongo Negroes who works regularly and does not rest on his oars. From what he earns he is able to buy quite a number of wives, and he is regarded as one of the village heads whose wishes must be consulted.

352
322 [102] Occasionally one sees a native stool, made as described above, but with a kind of back rest chopped out of one piece.

342 The Negro who wishes to move with the times makes for his
● 177 house a chair out of bamboo in the European style: some sticks stuck in the ground, a mat of split bamboo laid over them, and the gentleman can spend his days in dolce far niente [pleasant idleness].

352 A table made in the same way (otherwise unknown to the Negro) 323 completes the furnishing of his hut.

One does not need to be an expert, either, in order to be able to make a Negro bed. Some straight sticks are chopped out of the mombembo (umbrella tree). These are placed lengthwise and then across, on top of each other, trimmed a bit at the edges so that the whole thing fits more or less, and it is then bound together with some [835] split lianas. In this way the Negro has made a bed; this favorite piece of furniture is finished for a sale price of 5 to 10 mitako.

[837] The making of beds could be classed among the Mongo trades. I once saw, in the interior, ten of these beds, large and small spread out along the side of the road for sale.

I was assured that the owner of the beds was the very best bedmaker of the village. Of course, I raised my hat to such an important personage.

The ekoba, the bed stool, is also indispensable. These ekoba take the place of our pillows and are made of one piece, formed to the shape of the head. It is a somewhat hard pillow, but the Negro head is hard and can put up with it; the fellow sleeps without having to be rocked.

322 To prepare his food he needs some mortars and pestles, and these 252 are made of wood. He uses hardwood for these utensils so that the mortars do not wear away from the constant pounding.

In addition, the Negro makes his oars, his bow and arrows for 322 the hunt, and the lokombi. The lokombi is a flat, oblong, hollowed
534 block of wood over which some pegs are stretched [sic]. He plucks these with his fingers, thus producing a monotonous sound. This so-called musical instrument is the constant companion of the young man and accompanies him on his long treks through the Evenaar forest and on his visits to friends and acquaintances.

[104]

III. WEAVING

286 The craft of the Mongo weaver is an honorable one and one that calls for much labor and attentiveness.

[177] Weaving is no longer as much in vogue as it was in earlier times, because the younger people buy European materials. However, the weaver is still able to earn his daily bread comfortably, because [291] the old people are too pagan to give up their old ingrained habit of wearing a loin cloth.

[462] Weaving is a craft carried on by men only. Some are very skillful in the weaving of materials and command our admiration. Pieces of really beautiful workmanship were offered to us for sale; I had myself seen them being woven.

286 314 The weaver takes his knife, goes into the forest, and cuts the "mpekwa ia lifeke," the fibers of a certain kind of palm tree which he also sometimes plants on the open highway near his hut. As soon as he has sufficient fibers for the weaving he has in mind, he goes home and at his leisure scrapes the fibers with his knife until they are all of the same thickness.

286 After that he leaves them in the sun to dry. When they have dried sufficiently, he puts up in his hut or on the open highway the frame on which the fibers are to be hung.

After he has attached the fibers to the top cross-bar (they are bound between the top and bottom cross-bars), he holds down the bottom cross-bar with his foot and goes to work.

Often he uses fibers of different colors, and this gives a lovely effect to the piece of material.

Bofomi afom'uto, "the weaver is weaving material."

386 314 The weaver has a very simple way of giving the fibers their different colors.

From the forest he fetches a liana (longoli) which contains the red, white, or black coloring agent, cuts it in pieces, puts them in a banana leaf which has been quickly scorched in the fire, adds some water and hangs all this, with the fibers, in a bag of banana leaves above the fire. When the dye has soaked thoroughly into the fibers, he has his colored fibers all ready [105] for the material he is about to weave. This mixture is called "bosaka."

177 We can add to that also a large number of black women who become 583 the famous "housekeepers" of the Europeans. Although payment for these women was usually given to their owners, they were still withdrawn from the family life and the native customs. Finally, the Christian women, who now live in Christian marriage, must also be mentioned.

In addition, the price of wives and the bride price have [544] undergone great changes, primarily in those districts where the natives came into more immediate contact with Europeans. Before the arrival of the Europeans, their main medium of payment was the woman herself; a woman was paid for with a woman. Now it is forbidden to use women as currency. Therefore the natives have raised the price in the payment of bokongo and mitako.

177
583 In some districts close to the European centers, the natives have brought the price for wives and the bride price to a height
436 never before known. For one wife they ask several nkesi.

A nkesi is 10,000 mitako. Such a sum is much too high in relation to their means. In a village there are, for instance, 30 women; for one woman, 40,000 to 50,000 mitako are asked, while at present in the whole village together the sum of 50,000 mitako is no more to be found. Therefore to oblige someone to pay two or three nkesi is usually to make it impossible for him to pay, or rather to make it necessary for him to pay with women, which is nothing else than encouraging women trade, which then occurs.

802 A remark should also be made here about the nomenclature
177 of the numerals. Nkesi is not a word of the Equatorial peoples; it was brought in from elsewhere with the Europeans. Their amounts were as follows:

10 was jum or bonkama;

100 was nkoto; and with the arrival of the Whites and foreign population came

1,000 nkesi.

The present numerical value is: 10, jum; 100, bonkama; 1,000, nkoto; and 10,000, nkesi. Some very old Negroes, however, still say bonkama for 10.

[583] This is the probable origin of the great rise in price of wives, especially in the area of Coquilhatville.

7:Brown M-3 (ca. 1940) 1944

FO32 Mongo FO32
Ntomba

THE NKUMU OF THE TUMBA

RITUAL CHIEFTAINSHIP ON THE MIDDLE CONGO

H. D. BROWN

[1] THE tribes living round Lake Tumba, a lake some thirty-five miles long by twelve wide lying north of Lake Leopold II (approximately 0° 50′ south latitude, [13] and 18° east longitude) and draining into the Congo River at the confluence of the Ubangi, lack cohesion and show a considerable variety of custom and language. But they are known collectively as Tumba, the Government adaptation of the Native term Ntomba. Most of them are found to the east of the lake, the whole group numbering perhaps little more than forty to fifty thousand at the present time, though [14] there is evidence that the last twenty years have seen a great decrease in population. European occupation of this area goes back barely fifty years, Protestant missions having been established for about the same length of time. The first mission post [17] was established at Ikoko on the north-east shore of the lake, one of the villages of a group known as Bongindu. In pursuing this investigation particular attention has been given to the practices of this group, but mention is occasionally made where considerable differences have been found elsewhere.

105 13 The Tumba are agricultural, hunting, and fishing people. Their country is flat and swampy with dense forests, and there are many watercourses flowing into Lake Tumba. There are occasional small, but swampy plains, and one such area, more open, with quite wide stretches of prairie, is a haunt of buffalo. The forests are fairly well supplied with game, and the swamps, streams, and lakes with fish. A heavy rainfall and no distinct dry season make agriculture reasonably easy and famine unknown. Every family has its plantation of manioc, the staple diet, which is supplemented by plantains and bananas. The people make their own tools, formerly smelting their own iron for this purpose, are fairly skilled at making dug-out canoes, engage in weaving raffia and making mats out of split cane, and are efficient at pottery production.

624 101 178 The role of the nkumu in the socio-religious activities of the community is one of the most interesting features of Tumba life. As a result of European contact the ceremonies connected with the nkumu are rapidly disappearing, but it has been possible to collect considerable information from the older men and women among whom the details are still vividly remembered.[1] The following report refers to the period previous to European occupation and control, a time within the memory of a large number of people, but already sufficiently remote to become a matter of hearsay before the lapse of many more years.

[173] An understanding of the place of the nkumu among the Tumba requires a glance at the tribal organization. According to the people themselves, they migrated westward, and coming into these parts chose land for themselves. Among the several

---

[1] In My Children of the Forest, New York, 1924, pp. 48–71, Andrew F. Hensey has briefly outlined some of the forms of honour observed among the nkumu of the district adjacent to that of the present study. These more detailed notes are, however, timely if a record is to be preserved that approximates to accuracy.

Sakata F043
Teke F133

M 304 The patient is seated. The operator draws the designs or motifs on the body with mpemba. He pinches the skin between his left thumb and forefinger and makes the line with a sharp blow of the lancet. The wound is sprinkled with powdered charcoal, mpemba, and a powder made of dried and crushed tree bark. This mixture slows the healing process. The operation is repeated three or four times until the relief of the raised scars is deemed sufficiently pronounced.

T 5 304 Among the Bateke, Banfumungu, and Baboma, facial tattoos are obtained by scratching or scraping the skin with a sort of iron comb with relatively broad, dull teeth. The operation requires only one sitting among these peoples, and the wounds are not powdered. These two procedures are explained by the difference in these tribes between racial tattoos and the scarified ornamental figures worn by the women. The former are ordinary cicatrized wounds; the latter are raised scars.

M 304 The racial tattoos are always made prior to the other figures. In 1913-14 boys and girls were compelled to have them inscribed before they reached marriageable age.

The familial tattoos are usually begun some time before the girl's marriage, and they are quickly elaborated during the last few weeks preceding the union.

As for the coquettish tattoos or ornamental figures, there seems to be no rule regarding the age at which they are applied. Sometimes even an old woman will not hesitate to acquire new incisions.

M 304 ● 178 It is probable that the custom of tattooing will soon disappear among these peoples. The spread of the principles of European civilization will invariably suppress this primitive custom. [202]

We were able, moreover, to observe this trend during our visit to the villages of the houseboys, laborers, and soldiers of Leopoldville, Kinshasa, and other large centers. In these villages, the children and even the young men are no longer tattooed. The young girls are tattooed only slightly, and in general they have incisions only on the lower abdomen. Racial tattoos are totally lacking. On the other hand, in the villages of the interior, less influenced by the principles of civilization,

304
178 tattoos are very much in vogue at the present time. We concede that the custom of tattooing is now at its height in the region we visited.

It is probable that this custom will not long survive our penetration.

304
174 It would be very difficult to determine the approximate time of its introduction into the life of these natives. We believe, however, that we may regard racial tattoos as one of the ethnic characteristics peculiar to the contemporary culture and not as a specific custom of the ancestral civilization, transmitted from generation to generation and preserved or even elaborated by each one. The clearest proof of this fact comes from our observations of the present generation of old men. As a rule they have no racial tattoos. The old women who have no [203] trace of ornamental or ethnic tattooing are rarer. Ornamental incisions are more often lacking than tribal scars, and we encountered only rare cases where the sexual tattoos were lacking.

Fig. 126. Return from the Fields.

Article II. The Bolímbó

562
578
178
In the old days, if an extremely rich man wanted to show his affection for one of his daughters and show off his wealth, he made that daughter bolímbó. Today this custom has almost completely disappeared. (1) It has been almost impossible to maintain the practice because of a greater distribution of wealth and the reduction of leisure due to the work imposed by the white man. This work has been imposed directly in the form of forced labor, labor on roads, economic projects, etc., or indirectly because a sum had to be raised for the payment of taxes. All this has made it more difficult to bring large numbers of people together for ceremonies lasting days and weeks. (2) Nevertheless, the custom must be described here.

> 1. On the left bank of the Luilaka it disappeared a good many years ago. The Injóló still followed it until quite recently.

> 2. One might suppose that the new men of wealth made possible by economic development would have contributed to the disappearance of this custom. Theoretically such might have been the case, but in fact these developments were not involved in the change that has been noted.

562
556
[602]
When a native wanted his favorite daughter to become bolímbó, he had first to obtain the consent and financial support of all his kin. Then enormous preparations were made, for everything had to be special -- beverages, various foods, dances. On the date which had been set and made known through messengers to the entire region, an enormous crowd gathered at his house. Public festivities went on day after day. In an address suited to the occasion, he announced to those assembled his intention to set his daughter up as a bolímbó. Two relatives or two of the father's wives then stripped off the girl's

556
564 According to the natives it was a public assertion of the father's high social position and at the same time the greatest token of affection he could bestow on his daughter; the two things were inseparable. Not every native had the right to make his daughter a [illegible]. On the contrary, he had to hold an especially prominent rank, that is to say, he had to be a wealthy, influential, and powerful head of a family. All the ceremonies, practices, and rules involved in this institution point in that direction. A comparison with the [illegible] wife (1)

1. See Chapter VII, Article III. Unless she is his first wife. See ibid, and Article I.

lends additional plausibility to this explanation.

556
562
178 As we have said, this custom is in the process of disappearing completely. In certain tribes such as the Bolobo, subtribe of the Lifumba, a substitute has actually been introduced. The favored daughter is dressed and adorned as before, except that European materials have replaced the fan. But the public character of the older institution has disappeared. The occasion is not surrounded with so many ceremonies. Finally, the girl is not called [illegible], for a new name has been invented; it is [illegible], "the white man raises (educates) her." [20]

Article III. Friendship

572 Friendship is not unknown to the Nkundó. It is founded on the same basis as in Europe. I have seen more than one instance of true mutual affection between persons who were in no way related. Among the Blacks with whom I have associated there are some whom I personally consider sincere friends and who have shown me real affection, helped me to the full extent of their powers, and shown me complete confidence. There have even been some who have not been afraid to place themselves in serious difficulties and who have gone so far as to incriminate themselves in order to clear me, thereby exposing themselves to troubles and sanctions.

[illegible] [illegible] It goes without saying that the feeling of sexual modesty and its various manifestations among these people are being transformed by two different currents. On the one hand, their moral laxity is increased by their contact with all sorts of other peoples, by a greater freedom, by the partial emancipation of women, and by the attraction of the large centers and their luxury. On the other hand, there is the preaching of Christian morality, although its effects are still very slight and certainly do not counterbalance the influences mentioned above.

Article II. Preparation for Sexual Life

1. The Woman's preparation

831

When a girl wishes to indulge in pleasures of the flesh, she prepares her sexual organs in advance. The preparation itself consists of "opening the way" (lifola mboka). This operation, which is repeated several times, is performed in hiding, preferably in the forest. The girl may or may not have companions with her who share her intentions. Each girl operates on herself. In order to gradually enlarge the organ, a girl uses progressively thicker shoots of the [illegible] bokango or bokaoló plant (Costus afer), making sure first to remove the tip. Later these shoots are replaced by the lombóló fruit of the bosomba plant (Aframomum) or, more infrequently, by a young manioc tuber.

This is the general practice; exceptions are few or nonexistent. It is followed because the girls want the event to which they aspire to occur without difficulty (bálota bálóv'ōkeels).

837 515 In addition to this basic preparation, girls [65] also wash the private parts of their bodies. This is a cleanliness measure which they continue to practice save in exceptional cases for the rest of their lives. According to my informants, the native woman -- as a very general rule -- stresses this cleanliness as much for herself as for the sake of not repelling her husband or lover. When a girl begins to practice this personal hygiene, it is a sign that she wants to begin her sexual life.

304/ 832 and "modern" fashions, as well as some ancient ones, take this into account. In the next paragraph, moreover, we will note analogous phenomenon.

Both of the explanations given can be defended, since each has its value. But it seems to me preferable not to oppose them but rather to bring them together, as they probably are in the thinking of the native.

It should also be noted that a man never performs the operation of making a sexual tattoo on a woman, although a woman may indeed operate on a man. And finally it should be mentioned that the [174] specific terms designating these tattoos are considered as obscenities.

The practice of tattooing is decreasing at the present time. [175] Many boys are already without tattoos. But very few girls lack them; among them the fad has not disappeared. Some even have themselves tattooed without the knowledge of their parents and in spite of their opposition. Among the Blacks, as everywhere in the world, fashion is deeply rooted because it is natural. But the designs of the tattoos are now becoming smaller. It seems to me that this change is due, not to a reaction against tattooing as such, but rather to a modification of the style. For tattooing is a real fashion, and like all fashions it is subject to change and development. Nowadays there is a tendency to imitate the designs of other peoples of the Congo. Elsewhere, as among the Injölö, for example, an internal evolution may be observed, although it is occurring under foreign influence. The evolution is taking place chiefly in the face motifs, while those of the body are beginning to be omitted. But the sexual tattoos do not seem to be disappearing. [49]

6. Bead Belts

291/ 301/ 832 From an early age the Nkundó child is adorned with a belt of trading beads. Before the coming of the Europeans this decoration made its appearance only towards puberty and was restricted to girls. Nowadays, many men also adorn themselves in this manner. And since it is now easier to obtain the beads, women are no longer with a single string but wear several in assorted colors. They add smaller ones below the knee.

548
582
583 The term [illegible] does not mean that the girl will stay single all her life. Her marriage is not permanently excluded; it is only postponed.

As for her behavior, the [illegible] conducts herself like any Nkundó girl. Nothing distinguishes her from her companions. If a good match is proposed to her, she marries like everyone else.

This custom -- if one can use the term -- therefore has no real connection with prostitution. All that can be said is that the girl who stays single longer and until adulthood, is exposed to more libertinism and a life of debauchery.

586 It also happens that parents who are angry because their daughter has dissolved a marriage to a man they consider a good son-in-law prevent her from remarrying in an effort to make her return to her legitimate husband. If the parents and their child each hold to their viewpoint without yielding, such a situation can go on for many months until the wife is -- practically speaking -- no longer under the authority of her husband. And since the opposition of her parents prevents her from being married by another man, she easily comes to give herself to all. It should be added that at present this case is chiefly hypothetical. Parents no longer have the authority [75] to thwart the desires of an adult daughter in this way; if she is stubborn they have to yield out of fear that she will run far away. And that would be to go from the frying pan into the fire. But in the past the kind of situation I have described was not unusual.

548
369 The most fertile places for the breeding and development of prostitution are to be sought in the centers. The following principal causes can be given:

1) Female vanity is overexcited by the sight [76] of all the dazzling riches which have been imported by white men and which are such a temptation to Negro women. It requires a considerable income to satisfy this desire to enhance one's native beauty. Ordinary laborers and artisans do not earn enough money to satisfy their wives or daughters in this respect. Mistresses of Europeans or of foreign black men, the wives of "clerks" and other representatives of Negro high society display a degree of luxury startling and striking to the rest.

837
178 The fact of colonization has greatly changed the situation. The freedom of communication across great distances, the introduction of new and varied goods and especially of money, have had a great influence on the development of prostitution. The economic system of the people remains the same; but when the women are away from their families or their husbands, they spend their money at their own discretion. And, since the objects of adornment available to them have greatly increased, they have a personal incentive to engage in immoral conduct.

The vice has not therefore taken on European forms; modern changes have simply increased -- but in enormous proportions -- the number of occasional streetwalkers. The development of this state of affairs is encouraged by the procuring activities of certain polygamous and even monogamous men living near European centers, which give rise to the attitude of their wives. For though the husband may reap the primary financial benefit, the wife is not deprived of her little gain, and her native cupidity easily pushes her to engage without scruple in commercializing her body.

837
598 The women under discussion are usually married. Often they have a recognized lover among the laborers in the camps, and he usually pays for their faithfulness. Thus we arrive at the married woman with a regular paying lover. [78]

This form of prostitution has developed even outside laborers' camps. It is to be found among the people on the river banks, who are more in contact with the Whites and their people and in the neighboring villages. It is especially prevalent among the Boloko, fairly near Coquilhatville, where it is spreading even among wives of monogamists. This perversion takes root all the more rapidly because it has a certain resemblance to the ancestral custom of a recognized concubinage (see Chapter VI, Article VIII, 2) and like the latter, it often does not take the form of prostitution. That is to say, the illicit relationship is not engaged in for the sake of gain. Furthermore, an arrangement is often made with the husband.

[839] As to the other forms of prostitution listed, they are still unknown in the native villages and in the small centers located in the territory studied. Some of them, however, may develop in the fairly near future.

156
864

prohibition under any circumstances. I have heard these same terms used also by the natives in the vicinity of Coquilhatville.

The body becomes flabby and without strength, and this weakness ends in a fatal paralysis ([illegible] [illegible] or [illegible]). In addition, the girls feared that their sexual organs, not yet fully formed, would be torn. They were also imbued with a very intense fear: [illegible] [illegible], "the fear of males," [illegible] [illegible], "the fear of females." They also feared death -- [illegible] [illegible]. The parents added that sexual acts were free from danger only between persons of the requisite age.

[illegible] This does not mean that children did not commit indecent acts. The game of [illegible], in which little girls try to cook (and which is always one of their favorite games (3) as it probably is throughout the world), often gave rise to it. Small boys joined in the game in order to taste the meal. And quite naturally they began to play at "husband and wife," more or less. Often this game involved only innocent imitations, but other times touching and exhibitions occurred between children of the same sex or of opposite sexes. This game is far more dangerous nowadays, [61] because of a change in the attitude of young people toward sexual matters.

3. Some boys imitate this game in order to acquire the habit of preparing their own meals. Later they benefit from it on more than one occasion.

The game of [illegible], in which boys, imitating monkeys, chase each other through the trees and creepers can -- and does - result in reprehensible scenes.

[illegible] In former times most girls were married before puberty. But their husbands did not touch them until they had completed their normal development.

[illegible] Among some individuals the fear of sexual relations was so deeply rooted that it persisted even beyond the age limit and was [illegible] conquered only by repeated assaults of passion. Thus it is generally known among the natives that young women used to seek refuge in their mother's house when the husband wanted to begin making use of his rights as a husband. The mother would try to persuade her daughter to submit to the law of life. But sometimes, if her child seemed too resistant, the mother made excuses for her and asked the husband to consider her daughter's youth. The man usually wanted to remain on good terms with his mother-in-law so he did not insist and resigned himself to waiting till nature influenced the spirit and heart of his wife.

Since young people were brought up in deep fear of dangerous relations, it should not surprise us that this feeling became a real habit and did not disappear spontaneously the moment a certain degree of liberty was permitted. As a matter of fact, could we not make similar observations in Europe?

This is the natural explanation for the praiseworthy degree of morality among adolescents in the past.

[illegible] Nowadays all that has changed. The young people follow where their passions lead them. Not the slightest check is placed on their impulses. Parents pay only slight attention to the conduct of their children. (82) It is better not to inquire into the morality of modern youth. Husbands no longer respect the bodies of their adolescent brides, who are themselves quite used to a sexual life and eagerly look forward to it, and no longer know the feeling of "the fear of man." Should we then be astonished at the frightening decrease in the birth rate (1) and the ever increasing spread of venereal diseases, which seem to have been unknown in the past?

The reasons for this change will be investigated further on, under the letter C.

[illegible] B. Between adults. Here the Nkundó are very lenient. There is a difference, however, between the socio-legal and moral viewpoints, although as we shall see the latter is influenced by the former.

[illegible] A woman is entirely free, legally speaking, as long as the first payment on her bride price has not been made. No man has

---

1. The natives say that in the past young wives quickly became pregnant. And now ...

836 they succumb to any favorable opportunity. The validity of this generalization is not affected by extremely rare exceptions which may be encountered and which are due either to a constitutional abnormality or to an extraordinarily firm Christian conviction. How should 576 these observations be reconciled with the statement so often heard
178 from natives that the situation was entirely different before the coming of the white men? It was not unusual to see young women not only abstaining from sexual relations but having such a "fear of men" that they drove away seducers and defended their chastity by hitting them with a stick.

When the woman did not accept the young man's proposition, she considered it a grave insult. The initiator was entitled to no indemnity "for blows and wounds." The woman replied only in violent terms, in word or act. [84] Often she went and insulted the mother of the guilty party. When the latter was told the reason for this behavior, she could only turn on her misbehaving son and usually gave him a good talking to; if he was young enough she gave him a good beating. Thus the girl had every right to defend herself.

If the provocation gave rise to no complications in family or society, the parents paid a lot less attention. But they tried to teach [864] their children discretion in these dangerous matters, though their instruction primarily took the form of a lesson after an error was committed, or sometimes apropos of an incident that had befallen someone else. Some parents were very severe. These attitudes were based on a vague sense of morality which was not deduced from philosophical reasoning or religious or superstitious ideas but which was innate and instinctive so to speak. In addition, the fear of excesses and eventual social consequences no doubt also played a considerable [577] role. Excesses were feared above all, and an isolated occurrence was regarded more or less as a momentary weakness.

To form an accurate picture of the situation that existed in the past, we must not lose sight of the fact that, because of very early marriages, the number of young single women was necessarily limited.

562 The attitude toward single men was more lenient than toward 836 girls, unless their behavior had any consequences and apart from the danger of their actions becoming habitual, leading inevitably to palavers.

594 has precedence over them and can become head of the family after his grandfather and uncles. In his natural father's clan, on the other hand, he has nothing to say.

568 596 If a man pays the bride price for a girl who has had a child by him, he asks his father-in-law to let him have his illegitimate child. This wish is almost always granted. The father-in-law well understands his son-in-law's fatherly sentiment of love and considers it quite legitimate and proper that a father should himself possess the 595 fruit of his own flesh. The only condition laid down is that because of the child the son-in-law must increase the amount of the bride price valuables by an extra slave or his equivalent. (1)

1. This transaction may even take place after the mother's death.

The father is not in a position to invoke any rights strictly speaking. The child is not considered as his because of his physical paternity, but only because of his father-in-law's kindness. If the latter were to refuse the father's request, he would not be acting in violation of justice. But his behavior would be considered as inhumane toward his daughter's husband and his grandson, and it would be criticized.

When a child is adopted by his natural father in this fashion, no one despises him for his illegitimate birth (90). This procedure may therefore be considered to establish his legitimacy.

591 171 Nowadays, among the Boloko and their Elinga, the practice of "buying" the child has sprung up. That is, if a man does not marry a woman who has had a child by him, he pays her parents a certain amount in order to obtain the child. There does not seem to be much opposition to the introduction of this custom, which springs from an honorable feeling for paternity and its duties. Its only disadvantage is that in such a case the child may never claim any rights in his mother's clan. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Article IV.

598 614 583 If a stranger marries an unwed mother, he is never given the child, which remains in the mother's family. This situation is clearly distinguished from those mentioned above.

Article II. The Ndonga

584 The ndonga is the guardian-keeper of the marriage; he is chosen by the parties involved and his participation as intermediary, witness, conciliator, or arbiter is required at every stage of the union. He is an official in the sense that his authority is derived from the very law which governs marriage in Nkundɔ́ society.

First of all, the ndonga is the indispensible intermediary for the payment of the bride price. Without him there is no legitimate marriage: Nkɔ́ ndonga ɔ́bɔ́ka baámba ɔ̂ lontubá, bɔ̌na ale ɔ̂ bonto, "Without a ndonga you are throwing your valuables away at a total loss, and your daughter is but a slave," that is, she is not a wife. Legally, only the ndonga is qualified to act as witness.

The importance attached by the natives to the ndonga's participation is apparent in every moment of daily life. Thus if a woman has been beaten by her husband, her family can be heard to say: "Our daughter (sister) is no slave; she was paid for through the agency of a ndonga," bɔ̌n'ɔ̌kisɔ́ áfa bokwála, bowɛ́ngákɛ ɛ́ la ndonga. Or she herself will retort in this manner, mutatis mutandis, to her husband or his family when in her opinion she is not being treated properly.

The absolute necessity for the participation of a qualified ndonga is very rarely mentioned by Europeans in the colonial administration. One would say that they are unaware of its importance though it is crucial.

584
178
602 In order to serve as ndonga for a particular marriage, a person must be related at the same time to both the future husband and wife or, as they say in Lonkundo, to be mbɔ́tswá. Nowadays, because of the migrations of the natives, the ndonga who meet this qualification are rare in the centers and often cannot be found at all. Therefore, it has been necessary to adapt the traditional law to the situation. Hence a practice has developed [108] under such critical circumstances which consists in taking as one's ndonga a man whose integrity is generally recognized and who has every reason to be impartial and interested in the stability of the marriage. Thus it often happens that chief catechists assume the functions and responsibilities of this role.

584 Formerly, and even today in the interior, when two young people love each other but cannot find anyone qualified to perform the 584 power to settle disputes. They claim their share of the remuneration from the ndonga. According to the saying -- in archaic language -- botɛ́ wǎ ndonga nd'â dombɛ́, "the power (literally, "the medicine") of the ndonga resides in the judges." Not that the judges themselves have the right or the power to intervene in matrimonial palavers. But they are that many additional witnesses. If the day comes when there is a dispute on the subject of the bride price, especially at the time of a divorce, the ndonga can call on them to help him refresh his memory and thus avoid difficulties. For it can easily happen that after several years the official witness has only a vague and approximate recollection of what was paid. If the judges do not receive anything at the time of payment, they will refuse to give their assistance at the critical moment. It is therefore an intelligent policy to acquiesce to their desires even though strictly speaking they can invoke no real prerogatives.

● 178 584 622 At the present time the colonial government, having established districts and named chiefs, the latter have had attributed to them the right to officially act as ndonga in matrimonial matters, or at least they have taken advantage of the powers given them and done so. In general [111] they summon the judges of the district at the same time, and the matter is entered after a fashion in the register of settlements. The chief's presence as a witness may have some value, since he can provide additional testimony and writes down the amount of the bride price. But his presence, on the other hand, has the disadvantage of involving him in matters which all in all are none of his business. We are not speaking here of cases in which he or some relatives of his are interested parties in the palaver. If he would be content to be a passive witness and enter the transactions that take place, the situation would be perfect.

192 184 It is probable that etymologically the word ndonga is derived from the verb root long, intransitive longam, "to be in order, arranged," transitive longy, "to arrange, make as it should be." In addition to the word ndonga, which is used west of the Luilaka, we find the word bokɔ́lo used among the Boɔ́ngɛ and the Boɔ́yɛ́ (as well as the Elɔ́ngɛ́), and ntombi among the Injɔ́lɔ́. The latter term could be the same word as its homonym which means "spy" and is derived from the verb

584 cares too much for his wife, so he acquiesces to their desires without 583x a murmur.

What is the purpose and the significance of the ndanga? The natives reply: the ndanga is given so that the daughter would not burn herself at the fire, bɔ̃n'ɔ̌kɛ̃ɔ́ ɛ́fɔ́y' ɔ́longola tsɛ̌. This is a sign that the man takes responsibility for any accident (represented by the general term "burn") which might befall his fiancée. In the hands of the woman and her family, it constitutes public and official evidence against the husband. (1) Consequently, it is also a guarantee to the parents that the husband will take care of their child and treat her properly.

But what then is the ikulɛ's reason for being? The Nkundɔ́ reply: "The ikulɛ is evidence, a sign that the woman belongs to a particular man."

In practice, then, there is hardly any difference between the purposes of the two payments. Actually they have identical consequences, both with respect to the duties and rights of the engaged couple and to the indemnity to be paid under certain circumstances.

Thus if a woman runs away with her lover and he has not given the ikulɛ, and some accident befalls her, her family can make no claim as they have no evidence against him. In former times this would have been a purely hypothetical situation; nowadays it does occur, but it is quite unusual in the native areas.

Nevertheless, a slight difference may be noted between the explanations for the two payments given by the natives. [122] The ikulɛ is simply proof of the engagement; the ndanga, on the other hand, is the recognition of responsibilities and their acceptance. The fiancé beats his breast, as they say (ɛyakɛ́ndela ntɔ́lɔ́).

178 We have said that the ikulɛ and the ndanga are in the process 583 of merging. This development is probably due to the fact that both 584 payments are made nowadays in the form of brass or copper rings.

---

1. Hence, probably, the origin of the word ndanga. The root is langa, "to love," "to desire," therefore "to accept." In Lokonda, see lolanga.

584 But if the indicated difference between them were fundamental, this 583 fact would by no means provide a sufficient explanation. On the 178 other hand, if it were only a slight nuance without practical consequences, it would not, it seems to me, adequately explain the existence of the two payments, especially since in the past quite a long time could elapse between them.

Therefore we can wonder whether the basis of a greater differ-
174 ence might not be found in the hypothesis of its being a primitive 583 custom.

584 For instance, the ikulɛ could have been the payment accompanying a proposal of marriage comparable to our European engagement. Then, when unresolvable palavers developed out of this situation, a system may have been devised which would not prevent disputes from arising but would make possible their resolution according to proper and just legal regulations. This system would have been the payment of a ndanga.

While this is a possible explanation, it is not a very plausible one. Native law appears in all domains so reasonable, cautious, and wise, and so well adapted to circumstances, that it would hardly have left a way open to so great a source of difficulties in so important a matter. Such a possibility can hardly be admitted by any one who is even slightly familiar with the mentality of the Nkundó. Then, too, the modern blending of the ikulɛ and the ndanga suggests that one of two is duplicating the function of the other. And the consequence of this development would have been the uniting of the two payments into one, with a single purpose, or more probably, in conformity with the general practice, the transferring of the significance of a pledge, theoretically assigned to the ndanga, to the ikulɛ. [123] The existence of a single engagement payment would have been much more in accordance with the present hypothesis than the practice of making two distinct payments, which are independent and separated in time. We should add here that the acceptance of a responsibility is always and under all circumstances accompanied by the handing over of a ndanga.

We could conceive of a second hypothesis, which seems more in accordance with reality. The ikulɛ may originally have been an engagement payment, as in the first hypothesis, only the girl may 583ˣ months, even years, may elapse. In the past there was no hurry at all. Only if the father of the woman needed the bride price to obtain a wife for himself, for a son, or a cousin, etc., was the period [178] shortened. Nowadays, however, those who are entitled to the bride price urge the shortening of the interval before the walo payment because of the overexcitation of their desire for riches, on the one hand, and also because it gives the young people a possibility of leaving their tribes and regions and going into the centers to find the means of earning more money, dressing more luxuriously, satisfying their vanity and their desire for freedom, not to mention libertinism or even worse. Nor has the one reason present in the past disappeared -- on the contrary. And as a result of all that, as soon as the interval becomes a little long to the girl's father's taste, he readily brings the situation to the attention of the chiefs established by the administration, who are always ready to deal with matrimonial cases as much for the financial gain involved as for the increase in their prestige resulting from their involvement in this most important realm, in which according to ancestral law they have no right whatsoever to intervene, for the simple reason that this law knows no chiefs or headmen in the European sense.

1. Terminology

589ˣ
192 The term walo is used by the Bonkoso, the Bongáli, the Bombwanja, and the Ionda; bombuluku, on the other hand, is used by the Wǎngatá, the Bakáala, the Lifumba, the Injóló, and the Boángi (as well as the Elángá and the Losanganya). The Bombomba use the term elámbela in imitation of their neighbors, the Ekonda.

This last term may be related to -lámba, [130] "to prepare food." This derivation should be compared with what we have said in Article II about the remuneration of the ndonga. I have been unable to discover the etymology of bombuluku. Let us try our luck with walo.

In accordance with the rules of Nkundó etymology, this word could be related to the root -al, or to -alol, which is an intensifier derived from the former. No example of the simple root exists at present, as far as I know. But there are derivative forms: alej and alol, or -aol which results from the elimination of the first "l."

583x Although given by the father-in-law to his son-in-law and therefore 431 part of the nkomɛ, yet these valuables have neither their significance 556 nor their purpose. They are disbursed at the time of the payment of the ikulɛ́. This practice was customary only among men who were unusually wealthy and influential, that is, family heads who occupied prominent positions in native society. It was never omitted for a bolɔ́mbɔ́ (see Chapter I, Part 2, Article II). The woman's father gave these valuables to his son-in-law, saying: "I am giving you my daughter in marriage. She has always occupied a high position; she is of a very good family. I want her to retain her prominent rank. Therefore here is a bride price; go and get yourself a second wife with these rings, so that my daughter will have her nkita [154] from the very first day. Then come back and pay me the bride price for her."

The woman who was honored by such preferential treatment was called yɛ̌ngaende. This word is composed of the roots ɛ́ng, "to acquire by means of a bride price," and ende, "a man (vir)." The name comes from the fact that she herself paid the price for her husband, so to speak, and did so even before he paid the bride price for her.

The Nkundɔ́ have given up this manner of ostentatiously dis-●[178] playing their wealth, so that the custom we have just described now belongs to the past. Nevertheless there are still women who bear the [551] name Yɛ̌ngaende, in memory of some ancestor who had been the object of this honor which put her in a privileged position, a royal position, so to speak.

583x From all the foregoing it will be apparent that marriage payments are not unilateral in Nkundɔ́ law and practice. Rather, there is a mutual handing over of goods. Although the goods given by each party differ clearly from one another, they all have an economic and financial value. Therefore we can speak of a real reciprocity in these payments. And although the husband has to furnish the largest and highest amount, it would be wrong to say that he alone must "pay for his spouse," for though he does actually "pay for his wife," she must to a certain extent "pay for her husband." That is what the 583x 563 obtaining wives for the boys. Therefore he can turn a Botswá girl belonging to him over to his father-in-law. The father-in-law never takes this woman as his wife or as a wife for one of his relatives; but he gives her in marriage to one of his own Batswá or to a stranger of that race who pays him a bride price for her. Socially and financially the result is exactly the same as if the son-in-law had made his payment in the form of a slave.

Thus the bride price paid by Lokonda jw'ĭsano y'ănkanja of Ngombe (Bongíli) for Bakutu of the Basɛ́ká Elongama (Besombó, Bombwanja) and used by the latter's cousin, Bofɛ́nda of Ekúkola (Bongíli) to obtain for wife, Iloa of Ndongó (Bongíli), consisted of 60 rings and the woman Ómâmenga (Antonia) of the Mbálanga clan of Botswá. Ómâmenga was later married to Wanja (Pius), a Botswá belonging to her new masters.

[567] There may be two or more slaves, for the same reasons that determine the size of the walo. The Bombwanja are only exceptionally satisfied with a single one. But all the slaves always comprise a single bosóngo.

583x The bosóngo is not part of the jěngí. The natives say bosóngo ěmí ník'omóngó, "the bosóngo is entirely separate." Their statements on this subject are markedly categorical.

A characteristic expression which designates the entire bride price is baúmbá la bonto, "rings and a man" (slave). The rings are the jěngí; they are valuables of a purely material nature. The bosóngo is, on the contrary, a human being.

There is no term in Lonkundo which covers both kinds of payments. The whole cannot be expressed precisely in a single word.

583x 178 In the vicinity of Flandria, however, the young people [160] are beginning to confuse the two words jěngi and bosóngo and to use one in place of the other. (1) [Editor's note: The confusion today is

---

1. The young people from Injóló who are about twenty years of age and whom I have known at Flandria Mission and in their own settlements, do not confuse these terms but distinguish clearly between them.

583x 178 probably due to the penetration of the Lombwanja dialect and its rather strong influence, even in relation to other words, on the dialect of the Bongili and Bonkoso, as well as in central Flandria.] Among the Bombwanja, -sɔ́ng and bosɔ́ngo are synonyms of the Lokɔ́tɛ́ -ɛ́ng, jɛ́ngi. For the payment of a slave they use only the word ilengɛ́ and the expression -lekya ilengɛ́, "to give a slave." But the old people loudly protest against this confusion and consider it an error, a mix-up, a corruption of the language.

583x The bosɔ́ngo used to be paid at the same time as the walo or shortly thereafter. Nowadays years may pass between the two payments. If the husband is too slow in meeting his obligation, the wife's family complains. Often when their daughter visits her parents, they prevent her from returning to her husband as a means of coercing him into making the payment. As in the case of the jɛ̌ngí, it is up to the husband to bring the payment; the wife's family is not expected to fetch it.

We have said that copper rings may be substituted for the slave. No other objects -- such as knives, for example -- come under consideration. If the rings are to be counted as bosɔ́ngo, they must be explicitly designated as such by the husband or by the ndonga. If the intention is not verbally expressed they will be considered jɛ̌ngí, since they are the kind of valuables used for the latter payments.

589x 431 The bosɔ́ngo is the final and definitive bride-price payment. This does not mean that the husband does not thereafter have to pay in certain circumstances. On the contrary, financial transactions are terminated only by death. But [161] subsequent payments spring from other obligations which follow the final completion of the marriage agreement though they result from it. Such are, for instance, the belonga (gifts brought when visiting), valuables given at the time of a death, the nkunjí (funeral payment), and assistance to members of the wife's damily (for example, in the settlement of a bride price). Or perhaps the wife's mother comes to help her daughter at childbirth; when she goes back home her son-in-law gives her a farewell present (bolingako), such as 4 bakonga. The statement of natives that the jɛ̌ngi never ends -- jɛ̌ngi lifosíle elakɛ́ ńk'iwɛ́ -- should be interpreted in the light of these practices.

583 The bosőngo must be handed over under any circumstances, even if divorce or death precede it. If a husband refuses to pay he loses his rights over one of the daughters in his wife's family, whose bride price would compensate with interest for the economic and social loss suffered by the woman's clan. (1)

1. See Chapter VIII, Article IV, and Chapter IX, Article IX, 2.

2. The value and consequences of the bosőngo

How important is the bosőngo today? In answering this question a distinction must be made between two aspects of the problem: the financial aspect and the legal aspect.

1) Financially, the bosőngo, first of all, completes the payment of the bride price and thus produces the highest degree of theoretical stability possible in a Nkundő marriage. That is the meaning of the following expressions: bǒlő wǎ liǎla ńk'onto, "the strength of the marriage (its stability) is to be found in the slave,"; l'osőngo bǒmo to ǎkőlongwa wǎlí, "by means of the bosőngo the woman completely becomes the wife"; or wǎlí ǎkőlongwa ǒkě, "the wife becomes completely yours." Since, as I have explained, the bosőngo terminates the payment of the bride price [162], the woman's parents no longer have any excuse for taking her away from her husband, and they become even more desirous of maintaining this union in which such great interests are at stake.

589
178
567 Apart from the value of wealth per se, there is also its social influence. In this respect we must make a distinction between the past and the present:

a) At the time when the bosőngo was necessarily a flesh and blood slave rather than a slave in rings, it was naturally valued more than the walo. Twenty-five bakonga (for the walo) and two slaves were preferable to 50 bakonga and one slave even though, if the payments were reduced to the monetary unit in copper, the latter was greater. This fact is easily explained. "In the past," say the old people, "we had very little copper, and the smelting of iron was a 583x 567 178 hard and lengthy task. The walo paid for our mothers was greatly inferior to what we see nowadays. In the majority of cases our fathers paid no more than 15 or 20 rings and iron objects. But they gave a greater number of slaves. It was not unusual to hand over five or even ten slaves for a wife. Consequently, the bosóngo was a good deal more important than the walo. At the present time the white men have introduced a great deal of copper and brass; and the abundance of these metals is the cause of the increase in the price of the walo. On the other hand, it has become more difficult, and finally altogether impossible, to obtain slaves; that is why the bosóngo has been lowered. Finally, we have had to substitute rings for persons."

583x 178 b) Nowadays, though the idea of the importance of the bosóngo to the family is still alive, because it is the last payment and therefore a permanent settlement of the financial question, its monetary importance and therefore, in a certain perspective, its social importance for the receiving clan, has greatly diminished. This has happened because [163], like the payments that precede it, it has become a payment of copper rings. In places where the bride price is paid in money and in valuables introduced by the Europeans, the importance of the bosóngo quite naturally decreases even more rapidly.

583x 2) From the legal standpoint the question is entirely different. The bosóngo results in no new relationship between the spouses. The woman's name does not change; she is called wǎlí, as before. The idea that she becomes a wife completely at this time is based, as we have said, only on the fact that the marriage theoretically becomes completely stable. This supposed stability is derived from the handing over of the last payment, which leaves the parents no excuse for taking their daughter away from her husband. It does not come from any new legal act.

That this is so is clearly demonstrated in the following fact: if the woman dies before the bosóngo, there is no palaver, as there is if she dies before the walo is paid. Her husband is not required to pay an indemnity (mbǎlaka). But he is required to complete the

Article I. Girls

According to Nkundó custom it is acceptable for an expected 584 child, not yet born or still very young, to be promised in marriage to X or Y. This practice was formerly very common and is still quite prevalent today. It is called banda bǒna or bǒmoto, literally, "to count a child" or "to count a woman." The ikulá is paid at the time of the promise. Later the matter is carried out in the usual fashion; the other parts of the bride price are paid either while the fiancée is young or, preferably, at the time when she goes to her husband.

584 Until that time, if one of the girl's relatives is already a 855 wife of a polygamist husband-to-be or of one of his relatives, the child is brought up in her husband's family from a fairly early age, depending on the circumstances. She lives with her relative. She may be barely seven or eight years old, for example. If no one in her husband's clan can take care of her, [232] she spends only one or two weeks there to become acquainted, little by little, with people and places; she repeats the visit from time to time. Her mother accompanies her, for being so young she could not get used to being there alone, without support, without her parents. Therefore it is necessary to wait till she is old enough to be somewhat independent and able to manage by herself. That time usually comes around the [145] beginning of puberty, thus sometime between the ages of twelve and fifteen.

Like an adult woman, she is already called bompáka or wǎlí, 584 depending on the portion of the bride price that has been paid. She 833 has all the duties and privileges of a wife: sexual relations, food preparation, care of the household, etc. There is no set date or age for the beginning of cohabitation. This matter is settled between the husband and his parents-in-law. The latter do not have the right to [606] delay the time, even if their daughter is still too young, but they can make use of their great influence over their son-in-law. The modern [178] generation is not shocked by sexual relations between an adulterer [sic] [571] and a girl who has not reached puberty. Besides, all is in order from the legal standpoint; since the man has paid the bride price, he is the 584

572 When an engagement is arranged for an expected child, the events may betray the hopes of the parents; and the child for whom the ikulá has been paid may turn out to be a boy. This mischance is dealt with in the following manner: either the suitor waits for the birth of a girl, or an alliance of friendship and mutual assistance (boseka, see Chapter I, Part 1, Article III) is established between him and the newborn child. Such an alliance is called liála jǎ jwende, "the marriage of men," (matrimonium viri). In no case is restitution made for the ikulá that has been paid. If the friendship between the two men remains unbroken later, it results in the marriage of the daughter of the man for whom the ikulá was paid before his birth, to the man who paid it or to his son or grandson. No new ikulá is paid for such a marriage; the payment of the bride price simply has to be completed in the usual fashion.

584 A man may acquire a young child for himself, or for a son, a younger brother, etc. In the past the former was more frequently the case, for the old men kept the women for themselves and wanted [234] to benefit from having them before leaving them to the youths as inheritance. But the latter situation also arose.

The purpose [of obtaining a young child as wife for a relative] was to prevent inexperienced youths who were not able to defend themselves from being deprived of the means of obtaining a wife should the father die prematurely and the heirs monopolize the harem and bride-price valuables to their own profit, which theoretically they have a right to do. This practice is thus a means of favoring a son or other relative by furnishing him with a wife earlier than is customary. Nowadays this is even a stronger reason [178] than in the past, because boys marry earlier than formerly.

Other reasons for obtaining a child as a wife are involved in the two above-mentioned instances. There is a greater certainty of getting one's money's worth; valuables can disappear for various reasons during long unproductive years.

584
855 But the most fundamental reason, in my opinion, is the one very often invoked by the Nkundó, namely the opportunity of personally attending to the future wife's education. There is no 584 safeguard freedom, and the impression should not be given that childhood unions are encouraged -- as it sometimes is -- by the exemption of immature wives of polygamists from a supplementary tax.

There is no law requiring an elder sister to be married before a younger one, but such is the common practice. Exceptions are made only under certain circumstances, and particularly if the younger girl finds a suitor earlier than the older one, a reason which includes and sums up all the others (such as disadvantageous physical and psychological tendencies of the older sister).

● 178 This practice of marrying daughters off before maturity is 584 beginning to change because of the increase in freedom which has been introduced by colonization. Nevertheless, as this change is not especially advantageous [236] its manifestations are still very slight. The Christian education of parents must of necessity delay the time of the daughter's marriage and will do so ipso facto as soon as Christian influence becomes sufficiently strong in the region.

Article II. Boys

Except in the rare instances of an engagement of two young 582 children, it was formerly the common and normal practice for men to remain bachelors for many years after puberty. The old men tended first to their own wants, and the youths had to wait their turn, like their elders. This was considered entirely natural. Later on they could establish a home and "profit" from life. Meanwhile they found a little compensation with the wives of certain relatives or of others, if the opportunity arose.

582 To explain this state of affairs we can invoke the political 561 organization of Nkundɔ́ society, which is based on age. It is therefore natural that those possessing authority should have its external [556] signs, and one of the foremost of these is the wealth manifested in the possession of wives. But, as we will point out later, the present situation greatly weakens this explanation.

It is more natural to consider the delay in the marriage of 582 young men a logical consequence of the marriage of girls at an 583x early age. Suppose that a boy is fifteen years old while his sister, 582 We have spoken of the unproductivity of the bride price.

583x This is a Nkundô notion, and it is accurate only because the old men want to satisfy themselves before their sons. Actually, they could very easily reconcile their desire that the bride price should be productive with the aspirations of the youths, at least in many instances. All they would need to do would be to use the valuables they have received for their sons' benefit by acquiring girls of the same age for them. The productivity of the valuables would not diminish [238] in the least, of course, since the goods would remain in the family. On the contrary, it would be increased because a greater number of progeny would probably be born. But our natives [842] knowledge of physiology does not seem to be sufficiently developed [181] for them to come to this conclusion. And even more probably their egoism has greatly clouded their intelligence and silenced the voice of good sense and fatherly love to make it possible for them to multiply the number of their wives and thus increase the easy satisfaction of their sensuality, augment their wealth, and reinforce their social position. It will be their sons' turn after their death.

561 This situation is aggravated by the fact that, except for the 428 bosôlo, the brothers, not the sons, of the deceased inherited the 595x widows, who thus remained in the hands of the old men.

582 Because of their attitudes the old men monopolized most of the women. They established large harems for themselves, so that it was very difficult for the young men to find a woman to marry;
they had to consider themselves lucky if their father provided them with a child.

582 Thus it was unheard of that a young man between twenty and
● 178 thirty years old should marry, except for a few instances where a man acquired a child who was to become his wife after a number of years. Men were usually forty years old or older before they married.

Nowadays the situation has changed entirely; the attitude of the old men favors the young much more and has become almost normal.
The great majority of fathers, if they have the means, procure a wife for their sons as soon as the latter are old enough to express a desire for one. This improvement is due to the fact that it has become 582 much easier to get married. A great number of young men who 178 would still be bachelors had they lived under the old regime now have wives. The young people leave home to go and work for the Whites, and the parents feel sorry for their sons and do not want to see them leave without a wife [239] to take care of them and prepare their food. This feeling has dealt the old custom a severe blow. And even for the young men who stay at home, it is no longer so difficult to obtain a wife. Paternal love has here triumphed over egoism.

Furthermore, the elders have been forced to take a more humanitarian attitude because, since the European occupation has given the young women a new freedom, they have abandoned their husbands and fled to the centers where, under the protection of the Whites, they have joined lovers who are as young as they. Therefore, it was much more intelligent to obtain a wife for their sons in an honest fashion rather than to expose themselves to loud palavers by the abandoned husband.

From all the preceding description it is clear that the man was considerably older than his wife. But because of the inheritance of widows it also happened -- and still happens -- that a man acquired wives who were older than he. When young men marry at the present time, many wives are definitely younger than their husbands; many adolescents have received prepubescent little girls for wives.

As a general rule a Nkundó woman does not like her husband to be much older than she, and she likes it even less if he is younger. Nowadays unions between persons of the same age increase continually. This increase is due more to the remarriage of divorcées, who prefer husbands of their own generation to the old men who first paid for them, than to first marriages between equals. The influence of Christian couples is called upon to play a great educational role in normalizing the situation of the girls.

581/
582 The boys must marry in turn, according to age, because of the seniority rule which regulates social relations. That is the rule, but it may be mitigated by the application of another rule, namely the one pertaining to the direct or indirect rights to a sister's bride

684 582 There is no sanction against the infraction of the law of exogamy. There is only the opposition of the parents and patriarchs, and a quasi-innate habit.

582 614 Note also that members of certain clans frequently marry members of certain others, among whom they prefer to choose their wives. Therefore a good proportion of the women married into any given family will belong to one particular clan. The Wafé (Bakáala), for instance take a great many of their wives from among the Bongale w'ôtóló.

[174] 582 614 We may reasonably assume that the ancestors of related groups, who now marry among themselves, formerly practiced exogamy. If this assumption is correct, it must be admitted that with the progressive growth of families, this rule has been relaxed in certain respects so that the present situation has resulted. Consequently, it would not be surprising if these legal provisions became even less rigorous in the future. Actually, some young people have begun to ●[178] violate the rules of exogamy and their example has freed the whole family. (2) Thus the Bokátola maintain that their two groupings, Bompela and Ilóngé, who now intermarry, formerly comprised a [251] single exogamous entity. Contemporary instances appear here and there, but they remain very rare, even between persons who are very distantly related, and much rarer between close kin. (1) For the Nkundó still feel very strongly about this law. The bulk of the people are entirely opposed to any laxity or violations and the patriarchs and notables act against them with all their power. But the strength of

2. See Chapter I, Article VII, 1.

1. A recent case was that of Elímá and Bolúfe, who both belonged to the exogamous group of Bokenyola of the Bonjoku, but one belonged to the Baséká Bokóyó family and the other to the Baséká Njoli.

593x 758 Efala of Longa married to Ìfolí of Bokɛnyola (Bonjoku); Basɔsɛ of Mbelɛ married to Nkengo of Litɔli.

If the woman went to her family in good health and contracted an infirmity there, her parents are responsible for it. They are obliged to nurse her and to assume all the expenses due to her treatment. After she is cured they send her back with a quantity of nkomɛ for her husband. Usually the matter ends there. If relations between the two families are not very good, however, the husband will claim an indemnity, which varies with the situation and to which he is entitled even if he does not claim it.

This stipulation of the law holds even if the woman has gone to see her mother, father, etc., at the time of an illness or for any other reason.

It does not hold, on the other hand, if the wife has been ordered to go to her parents by her husband, or if she has fled the home shared with her husband because of ill treatment or of serious failings on his part; this point will be explained below in number 3. In such cases the husband is legally responsible for the illness.

Certain situations may arise which are intermediate to the ones discussed. Thus, for example, a wife may make a visit on her own initiative [269] but for her husband's good. Theoretically, he should win the case. Note, finally, that a stay of only twenty-four hours is not considered sufficient to make responsibility for an illness fall on the wife's family.

178 595x 758 672 797 Colonization has produced an entirely new situation. Colonial law has given the extra wives of polygamists the freedom to go to a mission in order to be instructed in the Christian religion and to contract a monogamous marriage (provided the customary rules governing the dissolution of marriages are observed). Such a woman may fall ill at the mission. If her illness has no troublesome consequences, it does not result in a dispute. But if the illness becomes chronic and in some way detrimental to the abandoned spouse, it may do so.

The polygamists declare that they are free of any responsibility, which they place on the woman's family. But the family has 178 595x 758 672 797 nothing to do with it; it is unjust to bring them into the matter. Since this legislation is intended to combat polygamy, it is natural that the polygamous husband be the one who suffers from it.

The following is a recent example of this situation: Mbɔ̃yɔ̃ Julienne, sister of Botúna Jean of Balondɔ̃, married to a polygamist by the name of Insílo of Bokenyola (Bonjoku), went to Bokuma Mission, where she contracted an incurable illness. (1) Because of her illness she found it impossible to remarry. She therefore left the mission but was no longer accepted by the husband she had lived with so that she had to live in her brother's home. Insílo insisted that her brother reimburse him for the bride price, maintaining that in going to the mission, the woman had divorced him; his real reason, however, [270] was that she had become unfit to fulfill the duties of a wife. Since Mbɔ̃yɔ̃ did not fall ill in his home, he held her family responsible.

593x 586x 3. Abandonment of the home shared by the couple

In the case of serious failings on the part of a husband, a woman's usual weapon is to leave their common home and return to her father's house. If the reason for her flight is serious, it is up to the husband to go and bring her back. She will not return on her own initiative. If he refuses to make the first step, he will be accused as much by public opinion as by his parents-in-law of not loving his wife, and a rupture will become inevitable. It is therefore his duty to go to his wife's parents. They will ask him to explain the situation. The wife, too, will say what she thinks. The parents will settle their difference. Whether or not the ndonga is present will depend on the

1. It was a sort of illness with nervous symptoms. From a scientific viewpoint, it is more than likely that she had this illness before her arrival at the mission, although it was only manifested there. But the natives do not make this distinction, so it is not relevant to our topic.

> 593^x of a few fashionable expressions: *vulva
> 578 matris tuae, comede matrem in clitoride,
> 195 coi cum matre*. The same expressions, mutatis mutandis, are used with reference to a person's father, brother, or sister. The expressions used for "disinterring" are okundola ilongo, isé, nyangô, etc., that is, "exhume your family, father, mother, etc., or bejwô běkě, "your corpses," that is, your deceased parents (this last expression especially excites a strong reaction).

578 the effect does not vary greatly. [275] The only difference is in 593^x the intensity of rage and of the reactions, which depends on the individual temperaments of the interested parties.

578 A Nkundô is greatly outraged by obscenities hurled at him by 593^x his wife, especially if she attacks him in public. His reaction is al-
627 ways violent. Usually it comes to blows, a thrashing, and sometimes the knife. But if the husband wants to remain within the limits of the law, he cannot injure or, more especially, kill his wife on his own authority. Before going any further, he must bring his case before the ndonga. His family is invited to the meeting and, if possible, so is the wife's father. The outraged husband presents his case and warns the persons assembled that one day his exasperation will lead him to take up the knife. Having taken his case before qualified persons, the husband can from then on go ahead and avenge himself for the disgraces his wife may inflict on him; it is lawful for him to do so. If the guilty woman starts again, no one can accuse her husband of wronging her, for she herself is at fault and he has warned her in accordance with all the rules of the law.

593^x Modern young people do not always follow this procedure.
578 But their revolutionary spirit often brings them reprimands and often gets them into great difficulties. The elders jealously guard their
● [178] authority, and no one may reproach them for doing so. Therefore in a palaver of this sort, a father will sometimes foresake his son.

M
593x recourse to the assistance of a third party who -- for remuneration, 578 of course -- undertook to carry out his project. This task was usually
P [679] confided to Batswa, who did not disdain this type of work, which was quite suited to their taste.

The fact that the law gives the husband the right to punish his wife [277] for the type of oratory under discussion meant that a wife had to exercise some discretion in her choice of expressions. Fearing violent reactions, she often spoke the more serious insults softly.

M
Since the European penetration women are more daring. For 776 their husbands fear European justice, which follows principles entirely 578 different from their ancestral law. Thus they complain bitterly of 593' the insolence of their wives: "We have become slaves; the women 562 are now all-powerful. They may do as they please, for we can no longer do anything to them." But as soon as native courts are sufficiently educated and are freed from what an eminent colonial jurist has called "the jurisdiction of palavers" (1), they will no doubt effect a salutary change in this situation.

M
The emancipation of women is one of the factors that have 562 increased the frequency of divorce. For a man who cannot avenge
586 continuous outrages remains dominated by shame, and the presence of the one who is the cause of it must become unbearable in the long run; whence the indifference, antipathy, hate, and the inevitable results of that permanent confusion in the household.

M
Men among whom the feeling of modesty was highly developed 593x hanged themselves out of shame instead of attacking the guilty wife.
762 That is what many natives have maintained in talking with me.
577 Nevertheless, I have no knowledge of a present-day example. When [683] this happened, the wife's family no longer took action against their daughter. Nor were they obliged to pay an indemnity, although their child had brought about the death. They simply had to acquit

---

1. See A. Sohier, Bulletin des Séances de l'Institut Royal Colonial Belge, Vol. 6, 1935, 1, p. 60 and passim.

602 brings forth reprimands on the part of the husband and his parents which obviously can easily degenerate into quarrels. If the omissions are so frequent and of such a nature that they can no longer be explained as simply forgetting, a whim, or a fit of peevishness, but [299] are taken to indicate spitefulness or vulgarity, the matter is [627] brought before the ndonga (who is often assisted by the family tribunal) or brought before the authority constituted by the woman's kin. If in spite of everything the expected improvement does not take place, the break-up is inevitable.

606 The husband's father and mother extend the same affection to their son's wife as they feel toward him. They consider her their own child, and it is not unusual to find that their love for the wife equals their feeling for their own son. She is only a relative by marriage, but out of affection for her they call her their child. She, for [601] her part, does not use toward them the term bakanga (or bakiló) but out of filial respect calls them "father" and "mother." Exceptions to this practice may be found, however.

606 224 If the father (and those who fall in the same category such as uncles, elder brothers, etc.) kills a large game animal, he is expected to give his son's (or brother's, etc.) wife a piece of meat, whose size depends on the number of daughters-in-law he has and which consists of one or several chops (bokalako) (1) and the piece at the nape of the neck (botómbyá).

606 835 Illicit relations between the husband's father and his daughter-in-law would be an unheard of crime. The same would be true with respect to any of the "superior" relatives. (2) The laws regulating

---

1. Called lièto among the Bolèngé and the tribes of the Losanganya.

● [178] [184] 2. Only the Boangi -- like the Elángá of the Losanganya - allow relations between a brother and the wife of his junior; and they are already beginning to find imitators among their neighbors to the southeast, the Injóló.

604 An uncle (see D above) is not entirely free to cure his nephew's 837 (F) passion unless he is the nkóló of his sister (E), that is, unless the 578 mother (C) of his sister (E) is the nkita of his aunt (B), [307] who is the 575 sister of his father (A). Indeed in that case his sister may not complain, for she owes him respect and submission; her subordination to her brother and master is greater than the gratitude he owes her for any riches he may have obtained through her or on her account.

D. In the case of the relationship of a grandson (bonkáná) to 603 his grandfather's wives, his freedom is, in practice, complete.
837 Actually, among the Nkundó the affection of a grandfather (nkóko) for his own grandson often exceeds his love for his own son and completely degenerates into weakness. (1) The grandfather puts up with all his grandson's carryings-on, his whims, all his teasing, his insults, etc.

After illicit relations the grandson sometimes carries his insolence so far as to spontaneously send his grandfather a "mock" indemnity in the form of a basket filled with stones in the place of copper rings.

626 Although the grandfather treats his grandson with good humor,
603 public opinion does not favor the latter's conduct, though it is more
837 lenient than in the cases described above. The public reaction, as well as the sending of the "mock" fine, shows that in principle these relations are censurable and condemned. Because of present circum-
● [178] stances, particularly marriage at an earlier age than in the past, the age difference between a grandson and his grandfather's wives has increased considerably in the constantly growing number of cases, and their relations have proportionately decreased. (2) [308]

---

1. As happens very often also in Europe.
See Chapter I, Part 1, Article I, 3.

[184] 2. We have seen above that other Nkundó tribes are even less strict in these matters. On the other hand, the Ekonda, a Nkundó group living on Lake Leopold II, have a

684 duties is also unsatisfactory, may sometimes resort to divorce or to 593* selling her into slavery, but rarely to killing.

Colonization has abolished torture, slavery, killing, and the 684 legitimacy of assassination. A husband has no other sanction against 578 an unfaithful wife than to insult and beat her. And even there European law forces him to restrain himself lest he commit excesses which [319] involve him in a trial before the white man's court. Fortunately for marital fidelity, a reaction in favor of the repression of adultery has recently begun, following the official establishment of native jurisdiction. In the not too distant future, this reaction will culminate in a return to ancestral law in a form adapted to present circumstances.

B. Against the accomplice, the injured husband has the right
684 to make use of two sanctions: violence and the payment of an 596 "indemnity."

1) If the husband catches the accomplice in the act, he always has the right to wound him, or even to kill him, or reduce him to slavery. The last two forms of vengeance were not practiced unless the respective villages of the husband and the culprit were fairly distant from each other and not bound to each other by any special ties (friendship, mutual assistance, or affinity). This reservation existed because of consideration for the offender's relatives, the desire not to bring them excessive sorrow. Another cause for caution and calm is the economic or military inferiority of the husband's clan, or the fearlessness, the valor in battle, in a word, the strength of the culprit's family. A special case which makes all other considerations disappear is adultery with a favorite, whose husband's love for her is especially passionate and jealous.

If the offender's adultery was not limited to a few isolated acts but was becoming a real habit, or if he had already seduced many women, resulting in many palavers for his family, the husband could be bolder. For the rake's close kin would finally be exasperated with his incorrigible and disastrous misconduct and would rather be rid of him. (1) [320]

1. See also Chapter VIII, Article II, 2, A.

595ˣ 554 The name bolɔ́mbɔ́ seems to come from the fact that for an instant during the installation ceremony the woman is naked. In fact in certain dialects the word means "nudity."

[551] Nowadays this name is common among Nkundó women (rarely men), but it does not indicate that they are bolɔ́mbɔ́. The name is borne in memory of ancestresses or relatives who had that position and is transmitted in the family like any other name.

[184] All the tribes under discussion here use the same term, bolɔ́mbɔ́. The Bombomba alone say bosálɛ́. (2)

> 2. Elsewhere, as in the Losanganya region, among the Bosaka, etc., the bolɔ́mbɔ́ is called ekila (interdiction, taboo).

It is clear from everything that has been said that the nkɔ́ndɛ́ and the bolɔ́mbɔ́ have nothing in common with each other. [353] The two institutions are decidedly different. Nowadays they are beginning to be confused with each other, however. ● [178] For the installation of a bolɔ́mbɔ́ has become extremely rare, and in some regions it has already disappeared. The colonial government has established districts and appointed chiefs in charge of them. Very frequently, they are not those who in the purely indigenous order would have been the most influential men, the masters, those who would have the biggest say in their society, who would be said to have the joko, the first place.

As far as I have been able to observe, the other tribes on the equator also have the two types of wives with special positions, who bear names which vary with the dialects.

171 595ˣ 554 Do the Ntɔ́mbá and the Bolɛ́ngɛ́ between the Boloko and the Congo have only the bolɔ́mbɔ́? That is the conclusion one draws from Engels' study of the Wangata (Revue congolaise, Vol. 2, no. 1, p. 33). If that were so, the frequent contacts with this people may have increased the confusion even more. Natives who are strangers to the Bolɛ́ngɛ́ tribe but who have lived many years among them as catechists, have maintained, however, that 595ˣ 831) And it is not difficult to understand this fact. For indeed polygamy constitutes a legitimate and easy means by which a man may enjoy several women without being bothered by palavers, difficulties, etc. The mentality of many men who care little about moral laws as well as the tendency of a disordered instinct to multiply its objects only confirm this observation. Often one sees men who were monogamists at first begin by taking a second wife out of passion. Then gradually their passion becomes greater rather than appeased, and so a harem is built up progressively.

595ˣ 178 The changes introduced by colonization in the economic life of this people have not resulted in a decrease of polygamy. In the absence of exact figures we must be satisfied with simple visual observations, but in certain regions one has the impression that the harems have become smaller but, on the other hand, that the number of polygamists has increased, and therefore [375] the desire for polygamy, that is, its affective cause, has [651] not diminished. Nor does the extra tax frighten or stop the polygamists. The great means for changing the Nkundő attitude in this realm will always be the action of the missions and the penetration of Christian ethics, seconded by a government attitude favoring monogamy. (1)

[648] 1. The favorable attitude of the colonial government toward monogamy is expressed chiefly in the permission given to a polygamist's extra wives to abandon their husband in order to contract a monogamous union, preferably in a mission, under the supervision of missionaries.

[177] Another means, undoubtedly secondary but still important, is the example of European couples. The Blacks are imitative, and native women envy the lot of the white woman, so that European households are propaganda for monogamy when they behave well.

586ˣ if they do not break themselves of this fault and, then, are detested. The result is endless palavers and quarrels, which inevitably lead to divorce. For this failing is considered very shameful. Note that laziness or heedlessness in a spouse may also lead to divorce.

Divorce is frequent among the Nkundő. These people do not try to correct their failings by the imposition of any restraints. As initial love gradually becomes less passionate, continual daily contact makes the less agreeable sides of a person's temperament more apparent. And when it is not tolerated or gives rise to serious wrongs, the marriage inevitably breaks up. There are more divorces in marriages by inheritance and substitution than in marriages through a direct payment of the bride price.

The preceding data show that although the legitimacy of divorce is accepted in Nkundő law, its acceptance exists only because it is necessary, so to speak. As a matter of fact, before a situation reaches that point, the difficulties have been obvious for a long time, and the parents and especially the ndonga will have had to intervene more than once in order to re-establish the troubled peace and strengthen the tottering union. They only give in when there is no possibility of settlement. [380]

Article II

Ways of Dissolving a Marriage

586ˣ
178 The simplest and ideal manner of dissolving a marriage, so to speak, is a separation with the consent of the families involved and especially of the ndonga. At the present time it is the only procedure -- except for running far away -- that is permitted. Since the reorganization of districts, however, the chiefs and the courts have more and more monopolized, or had assigned to them, the function of official witnesses. (1)

---

1. It is not my intention to deny the right of the chief and the courts to intervene in matrimonial litigation, > for this right was recognized by the written laws which have assigned the functions formerly exercised by the "fathers" of families to them. But they are required to act in conformity with the common law, and therefore to listen to the ndonga and report to him.

586x
178

Before colonization the Nkundő often used other means.

586x Before exploring the question of bride-price reimbursement, we will examine these various actions. For greater clarity we will distinguish between the customs of the pre-European regime and actual practice. Two specific cases will be described at the end.

1. In the past

Let us again make a distinction between two situations:

A. First hypothesis: a wife left her husband. She ran away to her family, first informing the ndonga. If she did not go to him but went straight home instead, the ndonga felt that he had been disregarded, and serious consequences followed, for he inevitably found her in the wrong. That is why this situation very seldom arose. [381] The woman explained her conduct to the ndonga. It was his duty to reconcile her and her husband. A divorce never took place without many interventions on the part of the ndonga.

[721] 1) If in spite of all attempts the woman was absolutely unwilling to stay with her husband and definitely left him, the result in most cases was war, unless, of course, the husband also did not care to continue the unhappy union. In such a case he was satisfied with claiming a reimbursement of the bride price. The war, like all others, ended in peace and indemnification; nothing further was discussed. The war was fought against the woman's clan if restitution of the bride price was delayed or not made. However, if the woman went to another man without first going to her family, the abandoned husband declared war on his rival and left his parents-in-law in peace.

586x
682 2) Sometimes the abandoned husband took revenge on his rival by assassinating him. If the possibility was open to him --

586ˣ that there were no further means for a reconciliation, returned her 584 to her parents. No violence was used against her, nor could the husband demand an immediate and direct reimbursement of the bride price. The husband had to wait until the wife he had repudiated found a new husband and the latter had paid a bride price for her. If the parents-in-law showed ill will toward him, however, [721] they could expect a war.

The conclusion that can be drawn from the preceding data 586ˣ is that although Nkundő law is very severe against the wife who does not acquit herself of her marital obligations, it does not leave the husband entirely free to do as he pleases. Ancestral law demanded grave reasons as the basis for any measures he took against her, [386] and the application of this law was well regulated. The differences between the various situations are an eloquent demonstration of this fact.

As we have seen above, the term bokőfo is not applied to repudiation by either party. In the case of the husband the Nkundő say that he atóna, "no longer wants her"; the noun is lotóno. This term does not apply specifically to this situation; it refers to any person or thing one does not want. The special manner in which the wife is sent back by being handed over to the ndonga is also called by a generic term émola, "to cause to start moving, to make go away"; the noun is njémő.

2. At the present time

586ˣ Considerable changes have been introduced as a result of
● 178 colonization. Wars, torture, human sacrifice, and slavery have been abolished. The possibilities are now reduced to the woman's flight, with or without notification of the ndonga, or a repudiation pure and simple. The intervention of the ndonga is only rarely omitted; it is still considered important. As a matter of fact, it would be against his financial interests to make an enemy of him. A woman who leaves her husband returns home, goes directly to another man, or lives a debauched life in some center, large or small. There is nothing left but to proceed with the refunding of the bride price. Thus everything is reduced to its simplest form.

A Nkundő woman is held back only by the fear of punishment and other consequences of her action, or by her love for her husband.

586 178 In the past, when that love began to cool or became less passionate, fear caused her to make an effort and frequently everything was put in order again. Modern freedom, on the contrary, invites her to break all fetters. As a result, a temporary annoyance which in the past would have been taken care of, or some domestic difficulty that would have been smoothed out under the old regime, nowadays is enough to break up the marriage permanently. [387]

Thus it is understandable that the substitution of the present state of affairs for the ancient customs has caused divorces to increase in scandalous proportions.

The arrival of Negro soldiers (strangers or men from the Congo) dealt the first blow to Nkundó family organization, and the blow was almost fatal. Native authority, which was familial and patriarchal, was abolished from the outset. The chiefs who were subsequently set up by the European power had more to worry about than the preservation of marital morality, even when they did not tend (as was unfortunately too often the case) to favor easy divorces in order to appropriate the women themselves and thus build a harem. The colonial administration found itself faced with the unknown. It took them time to learn about the past and present situations. Furthermore, the administration was occupied with other problems: the pacification of tribes, the stabilization of the occupation, assistance to the colonization that was just beginning, to trade, and to missions, as well as the various organizations, roads to be opened and maintained, etc. In addition the work involved in the establishment and development of centers, the police, the various forms of transportation, the establishment of industry, and the religious missions drew away from their usual surroundings a large number of young people who needed companions, real or substitute wives to satisfy their passion. All this caused great ravages in native society. Morality suffered greatly, and consequently so did the birth rate.

In the course of recent years, however, things have become more normal and stabilized, and the colonial administration has begun to repair the wrongs it caused. This complete change must be whole-heartedly applauded. The efforts that have been made to check the chaos of family affairs and put it in order can have nothing less than full approval.

586ˣ 692 ● 178 In spite of the opposition of several old-fashioned chiefs, [388] the native courts that were recognized or established by the decree of 1926 have begun to make use of the powers the government has assigned to them. They are called upon to play a great role in setting matters right, especially if their work is closely supervised and regularly checked. To accomplish this end, these courts must continue to act in the spirit of the ancient laws, taking into account only the change in circumstances (1).

1. See Chapter VI, Article VII, 7.

586ˣ 178 The chief measure for the restoration of order advocated by the natives is the imprisonment of the wife who attempts a divorce. This practice would be a continuation of the custom of applying the etáka and an adaptation of it to present circumstances. Like the former practice, it would have a double effect: it would restrain flightiness and license, on the one hand, and, on the other, it would ensure the reimbursement of the bride price in cases where no reconciliation is possible. But its execution would be taken out of the husband's hands and handed over to the chief. Europeans who are in contact with the natives and concerned about the social order also favor this evolution of the common law.

Another way of combating such a situation would be the use of pressure against the guilty woman's parents, chiefly through the imprisonment of her mother. This measure has no basis in ancient law, except for war -- which did not touch the mother and actually was only moderately useful -- and the system of compensation (lowáála) -- which depended on the availability of opportunities and was used through the husband's own initiative. This practice therefore cannot be approved as such, but it might be acceptable in cases where the parents are really at fault. For instance, they may have in one way or another incited their daughter to break her marriage although she had no acceptable reason for doing so, or, although a legitimate declaration [389] of divorce has been made, they might refuse to make restitution of the bride price. (1) And

1. A drastic and indiscreet application > of this rule, however, could trouble the religious feelings of native Christians and thus produce an effect that is the reverse of the one desired. A religious marriage is in fact indissoluble, and in such cases the obligation to make restitution would be equivalent to a recognition that a religious union could be dissolved. And not only would the native consider this an opposition between the public authorities and Christian morality, but in addition the stability of marriages in general would greatly suffer.

586x
● 178

here it must be noted that certain parents use hypocritical circumventions rather than openly showing their refusal. This is how they go about it: if the woman has really abandoned her husband and he, for good reasons such as those given above, no longer cares for his wife with whom he can no longer live (especially if he is monogamous), the question of reimbursement arises. The woman, in connivance with her parents, who do not want to make restitution of the bride price, publicly and officially declares that she is not leaving her husband and wishes to return to the conjugal household, whereas her only intention is to help her parents avoid paying the bride-price valuables. In time she will manage to get out of it one way or another.

3. Special cases

586x There are some rather special cases in the dissolution of marriage. The first has occurred more frequently since colonization, while the last has practically disappeared.

586x
837
587
1) Njangő. This word is the noun form of the verb angola, "to seduce or lead astray" (another's wife, his laborer, his slave, etc.). Therefore, it is a generic term, but it is primarily applied to the seduction of a married woman in order to make her leave her husband. It therefore denotes a man's act. Of the woman it is

586 simply said that she has left her husband (aôkófa) and has been taken 837 in marriage by X (aôkúmbwa éka Sóngólò). Having fallen in love 587 with another man's wife [390] and desiring to marry her, a man tries to win her favor. If she consents he collects the valuables necessary for the bride price. He then asks the woman to come to him and pays the bride price as for any marriage.

Instead of going directly to her seducer, the woman may also first go to her parents, especially if they are in favor of her plan. If they are not she would not succeed, because they would prevent her from carrying it out.

Cases of njangó were formerly rare because they were risky.
[721] As a matter of fact, they constituted a casus belli. Anyone who undertook such a venture had to be in a position to take the consequences of his act, especially with respect to the payment of an in-
● [178] demnity. Nowadays, on the other hand, these occurrences are much more frequent, even when the new husband does not have the means to pay the bride price at once. Nevertheless, the reversal in government policy is beginning to produce good results. The woman, or her mother, is often imprisoned; rarely the seducer. This penalty is often sufficient to restore order. But to keep from being exposed to further difficulties caused by the woman who no longer loves him, the abandoned husband sometimes refuses to take back his unfaithful wife.

The rarity of cases in former times as well as the fact that [671] they constituted a legitimate reason for war shows that the njangó did not have the approval of Nkundó law but that it was more or less considered an infraction.

2) Taking refuge. Because of the change in circumstances, 586 the practice of taking refuge is no longer common today. It used 577 to be done as follows: A woman who absolutely wanted to leave her husband and had no means of doing so, since no man had asked for her in marriage and her parents were powerless to help her, went secretly to a rich and influential man whom she would have liked as a husband. She arrived unexpectedly, stood before him, or even threw herself at him, crying, [391] Bejwó běkě! ónjéngé, 586* continuous state of enmity existed between his clan and the husband's,

577 or if the husband owed him a substantial debt, one that clearly equaled the woman's bride price. In the first case a new war followed almost inevitably. Later on the woman's family contacted the new son-in-law. The gifts they brought were considered the dowry, and he began to pay the bride price. But there was no question of reimbursing the bride price to the first husband; relations between him and the woman's clan were completely broken. The difference between this situation and the standard procedure described above lies precisely in the fact that there is no restitution. In the case of a debt there was no restitution either. The woman's flight constituted a compensation (lowáála) and was therefore so designated (N. aôkenda ndá lowáála). If the husband lodged a complaint, the judges sent him a piece of bofofó (1) to let him know that they did not want to concern themselves with his case, which he himself knew to have very poor grounds. Even the members of his own clan prevented him from making war; they knew perfectly well that the wrong was entirely on their relative's side.

The practice of taking refuge that we have just described was simply known as bejwó, bǒmoto áótswá bejwó, because that word was the principal one in the ultimatum.

178 As we have said above, the custom here described disappeared
586* with colonization. Even though the scope of this study does not extend to the Nkundó who are settled north of the Tshuapa, it [393]
577 may be of interest to note that an evolution of this custom is taking shape in the Losanganya region. If a woman is condemned for leaving the conjugal household and imprisoned, she asks someone to marry her -- if the opportunity presents itself. If the man accepts

[202]
[628]
1. The bofofó is a piece of dried banana leaf which has been rolled up and tied with two knots (or more, as the case required). To indicate the end of a palaver, the bofofó is cut in two (or more) pieces, with a knot in each piece. One piece is sent to each interested party.

178 her proposal, he collects the bride price and produces it before the 586x chief. With the consent of this authority, he pays it to the woman's 577 parents, who make restitution to the husband. (1)

1. See also Chapter III, Article VI.

x 3) War. The last of the special ways in which a marriage 586 may be broken is the following: If a woman were captured in a war 727 and not freed, thus becoming a slave, by that very fact her marriage was broken. Under the circumstances it could not have been otherwise, since each group was concerned only with its own interests. As we have seen in the preceding chapter, the slave was incorporated into the harem of one of the members of the clan who took her prisoner, or she was sold to some man for this purpose. If her real husband did not have the means to free her -- and we are speaking under that assumption, for if he did the union would not be dissolved -- he was unable to oppose what was done. Nevertheless, he was entitled to indemnification by the member of the clan who was responsible for the war, and he could use force to support his claim. If the woman were freed by her family, and her owner then paid them a bride price in order to contract a regular marriage, the former husband had a right to a return of the bride price paid by him. (See Chapter VII, Article V).

x In concluding this account, we should note that a woman who 586 has left her husband to go to another man may return to the first one [394] after a fairly long time has elapsed. There may be two reasons for such a return:

Either the woman does not find what she was looking for with her new husband and finds her hopes deceived, or in comparing her present situation with the life she had previously led she regrets her action. Knowing the love her former husband always bore her, she risks returning to him, and usually she is not rejected.

Or the new husband finds that after having paid part of the bride price he is unable to fulfill the rest of his obligation. Since a woman does not wish to be a wife without bride price -- outside [illegible] modern exceptions -- she turns back.

586x husband's knowledge, or taking refuge) and did so, her remarriage was illegal. Before the law the new husband was simply a thief, since he held a person near him over whom he had no rights. For this reason the husband could declare war on him, which he was not permitted to do in the other case, the question of his marriage being a matter between him and his wife's family.

Another consequence of that legal ruling is the following: If the woman who has left her legitimate husband wishes to return to him, she can advise him of her intention by a secret message. She asks him to come and get her at the moment when her lover is to pay the bride price (ndanga or walo, depending on the instance). She urges the latter to meet his financial obligations. On the day set the legitimate husband, accompanied by his ndonga, goes and hides near the place where the payment is to be made. At an opportune moment he comes out of his hiding place [684] and seizes the valuables that have been set out, saying to his rival: "I have caught you in adultery with my wife; these valuables belong to me as indemnity." [396] The woman's family takes his side, and the husband who has seduced her finds himself at a disadvantage and is sent away empty handed, for he is clearly entirely in the wrong.

If the legitimate husband belonged to an influential family he might risk the assassination of his rival if he saw a possibility. But then the situation was complicated by a war.

Furthermore, if the fugitive becomes pregnant as a result of her relations with her lover before the procedure of bride-price payment and reimbursement has been carried out, the child belongs, not to the natural father, but to the abandoned husband, who remains its legal father.

● 178 586x Nowadays everything has changed. A woman who leaves her husband cannot legitimately cohabit with another man. But during the past years no sanction remained. The imprisonment of the divorcing woman (mentioned above) could revive the ancient law while adapting it to circumstances. Furthermore, since the marriage is not dissolved, the alleged second husband could be condemned by the native courts for complicity in adultery.

586x unproductive. Nowadays, they occur somewhat more frequently.
[592] A feeling of generosity has developed toward sons and younger brothers, and the valuables are often set aside for their use.

If the bride price has already been transferred, the solution [400] is less clear cut. Under the old regime the matter was fairly clear, which is no longer true at present. But let us proceed by stages.

In the past the question was as follows: Theoretically it was assumed that the woman's family was not in a position to make restitution. In practice, however, they managed to do so, either by substituting another woman, or by borrowing the needed valuables, or by giving the husband a bride price received by one of the divorcée's relatives. The husband had certain means of forcing his father-in-law to pay (see above). Other times the notables of the clan were moved by a threat of war. They unceasingly urged restitution, and unless the debtor himself was the most influential member of the group and of an unyielding nature, he gave in to their entreaties. If, on the other hand, the husband did not have recourse to the means mentioned, he simply had to wait until his father-in-law received a new bride price.

● 178 Nowadays the ancient customs have been abolished, and x the whole question has changed as a result. Nevertheless, in 586 spite of the external changes, the colonial administration wishes to act in the spirit of ancient native laws.

By establishing regular native courts and giving them the right to judge in accordance with the laws of the tribes themselves, adapted to changed circumstances, the decree of April 15, 1926 has armed these courts with the means of working for this adaptation. But in practice it has not yet been accomplished. This fact must be attributed to the difficulties of finding a solution which would, on the one hand, perpetuate the spirit of the ancient system and, on the other, satisfy legitimate aspirations toward better regulations, aspirations which as a matter of fact are favored by the colonizing power. In this connection one must think especially of the gradual abandonment of polygamy.

The European authorities do not seem to have come to a clear decision as yet with respect to what method of restitution

178 should be adopted under present circumstances [401], and this 586x question is actually within the jurisdiction of the native courts. (1)

1. As to the imprisonment of the woman seeking a divorce -- an adaptation of the etáka, this practice was first condemned but its legality has been recognized recently (in April, 1935).

Among the natives, opinion is divided. Two plans for a solution are discernible.

A. A strong tendency is developing to maintain the distinction mentioned above between the breakup of a marriage caused by the wife and the husband's repudiation of her. In itself this distinction is good, but it is subject to a serious drawback, namely, the danger of exaggerating the importance of the latter situation. For, as we have seen, if a husband repudiates his wife, it is usually her own fault.

This tendency results in the following difference in the procedure recommended for the respective situations:

1) If it is the wife who runs away, her family should make restitution by means of its own wealth. If they try to avoid doing so or delay too long, the woman seeking divorce or her mother should be imprisoned. The latter can usually be gotten hold of more easily than the former, and even if catching the daughter presents no special difficulties, the fact remains that the imprisonment of the mother is usually more efficacious.

The criticisms that must be made against this system are as follows:

a) It advocates sanctions against the mother, who should not be implicated unless it is proved that she is at fault. (2)

2. See above, Article II, 2, last paragraph.

178 The traditional laws permitted sanctions against the wife herself.
586x As to war, it caused both sides to suffer but had little effect on the divorcing woman's mother. Furthermore, compensation through seizure of the divorcée's mother or of one of the father-in-law's wives was only a haphazard method and could be applied only under favorable circumstances. It was not decided upon by the authorities [402] but was a capture by surprise, on the purely personal initiative of the abandoned husband. Consequently, in my opinion, it should not be tolerated, unless the mother's responsibility in the breakup is proved.

b) Although the imprisonment of the wife can have two purposes and its practice have two effects -- the reduction of the frequency of divorce through punishment of the culprit, and a hastening of the restitution of the bride price -- it is important to distinguish between them in theoretical discussion. Imprisonment as a punishment has already been considered. Here we will deal with it solely as a means of obtaining restitution of the bride price or shortening the delay. Considered in this light, it is bodily constraint. It cannot be applied to the wife, who has no obligation, but to the father if he fails in the fulfillment of duties imposed on him by law -- that is, if he refuses to proceed with the reimbursement which the law requires him to make, or if he fails to take steps which will enable him to make it (or even if he is convicted of negligence in his duty to intervene in order to make his daughter respect her promises). In practice the father would really have to be in the wrong and his ill will be established. The imprisonment of the divorcing woman would avoid the prosecution of her father for a situation which he himself is powerless to prevent.

c) The tendency cited could prevent polygamists' wives from contracting monogamous marriages and, as a result, could oppose the spirit of the law. It would not be difficult to eliminate this drawback, however.

Since the written law favors monogamy, a regular and serious control of the activity of native courts would actually be sufficient.

2) If the breaking up of the marriage is caused by the 178 586 husband, the proponents of this system require a restitution of the bride price [403] only when a new bride price has been paid, or rather as soon as the woman has a new husband. Some go even further and claim to impose only a partial restitution; a portion of the bride price would be kept by the wife's family as a punishment for the husband's offense.

We must raise the following points against this rule:

a) Far from having a basis in common law, it is in flagrant opposition to it (see above and further on).

b) It also has the disadvantage of setting up a certain impediment to the development of stable monogamous marriages. Not for monogamous marriages per se, for in the case of a pagan or a Protestant there is no difficulty, and the rule does not harm them. If their marriage is not successful, they can always resort to divorce so that this rule does not apply to them. They can continue to cohabit with their wives until the latter leave them. For a Catholic the situation is entirely different. He knows that his religious marriage is indissoluble. But before contracting a marriage, the local ecclesiastic discipline at the present time requires him to pay a bride price and, consequently, to become involved in a common-law union and submit to its laws even though in his conscience he cannot consider such a union as marriage. The same thing applies -- mutatis mutandis -- to a catechumen who is to be baptized and thus to elevate his common-law and legal marriage to the level of a sacrament. Suppose that his wife wants to remain with him -- sincerely or in order to save her parents from the expense of reimbursement -- but that her temperament turns out to be unsuitable to married life or that her conduct is not at all in accordance with Catholic morality. Should this situation arise, the husband would be exposed to extremely grave consequences. For whatever the case, [404] their life together will be unbearable in the long run, and one day the wife will leave her husband, who will find himself in a very painful dilemma as a result: either he will have to remain a bachelor or find himself in flagrant opposition to his conscience. It is therefore wise for this woman to leave him while there is still a way to straighten out the situation. The solution described here presents difficulties that would dishearten many men. And this would be to the detriment of an evolution toward a higher moral level

177, 586 and a better social order, although the normal functioning of native courts could in part prevent this difficulty by requiring the woman's father to hasten the repayment of the bride price

B. The serious disadvantages inherent in the system we have just described have caused another part of the population to seek a solution that would avoid them. The Christians in particular are the ones who advocate it. But since they have as yet very little influence in the political domain, the chances are slim that their point of view will carry. In their opinion the reimbursement of the bride price should be required in all cases, and immediate restitution would be required only if, at the time of the breakup, the bride price had not yet been spent. They also accept imprisonment as a sanction against the divorcing woman.

This system, too, is open to criticism: it is hardly in accordance with the spirit of traditional native law, which allowed the husband to use means of his own to obtain immediate reimbursement.

It is my opinion that we must take the present state of affairs into consideration, with the sole idea of protecting the social order through the stabilization of marriages on the one hand, and on the other, the evolution toward a better order by favoring [405] monogamous unions in accordance with colonial legislation and administrative practice. (1)

1. See also Chapter VI, Article VII, 7, and the article on "The Native Reaction Against Divorce," Congo, 1936, Vol. 1, p. 11.

It should be noted that natives in various localities maintain that the first system described is favored by the Europeans. That is their answer to the objection -- which I have made more than once -- that their solution does not conform to their traditional law. Actually at the present time, the administration does not seem to support their system. But it is difficult for me to believe that it is simply an explanation to their advantages, for I have heard it

178 from more than one native who was clearly and truly wronged
586 by the system. For these reasons, it would not seem impossible that before the native courts were organized, some government agent had spoken and acted in approval of the system in question

This digression on the subject of the practice to be adopted with reference to the reimbursement of the bride price has become long. But special emphasis is necessary because of the crucial importance of this question in the future development of native society.

3. The formalities of restitution

586 The only formality involved in the restitution of the bride 584 price is the obligation to carry it out through the intervention of the ndonga(s). Since he is the official witness, he is the one who is qualified to say what has been paid. There is no recognized obligation to make restitution of any payment or gift that has not passed through his hands or that he has not seen. Sometimes certain payments actually have been made without his participation, and restitution for them cannot be demanded. The official witness has had no knowledge of them, and he is consequently [406] under no obligation to take them into account. But the possibility of friendly transactions always remains.

Should the ndonga all have died in the interim, the procedure would not be adversely affected, for Nkundó law recognizing the inheritance of that office. The brother, son, or other relative of the deceased can act in his name, and sometimes long before his death he will have given the latter all the necessary and useful explanations. The testimony of the successor is recognized as legal and valid.

Moreover, the ndonga may be assisted by other upright and influential men who were present when the payments were made and who can corroborate or even correct his testimony. It is clear that this practice was established by common law for the sake of obtaining the best possible results in the exercise of justice.

586x 848 178 Finally, note that in the "lowlands" of the region [413] under discussion, payment for a natural child is beginning to be made regardless of whether the beginning of the bride price has been paid, or whether no payment at all has been made. In the past there was no question of such a practice, for the child would have been considered a slave in his father's clan and in the neighboring villages. And actually in the villages of the interior and in practically all of the region under consideration, that attitude has not changed. It is in the European centers, under the influence of Christian ideas, that these new ideas develop. In practice, cases do not occur except when the individuals in question are natives of very distant villages and are established permanently (to the extent that this term can be used) in their extra-customary residence.

Article V

The Position of Former Spouses and Their Children

586x Once the palaver concerning the reimbursement of valuables is settled, the former spouses become strangers to each other.

Their families sometimes continue relations with each other, however. In fact we have seen that a divorced woman may be replaced by a relative in her conjugal role. In such a case relations by marriage result from the continuation of the marriage agreement. (1)

1. See Chapter III, Article IX.

Except in cases where a substitution occurs, all ties between the former spouses and their clans are thus broken.

The divorced wife can no longer claim the slightest right to the fields she has established on the land cleared by her husband. In general, all the fruits of her various activities remain the property of the husband; she herself [414] has no further right to them. In our time, however, it is not unusual for a man and wife who are

768 Therefore there is a very great difference between the 583x consequences of divorce and of death. In divorce the bride price must be considered more or less like a deposit. In case of death, on the contrary, it remains permanently in the hands of those who have acquired it. This difference weakens the theory that maintains that the bride price is only a guarantee; rather, it tends to favor the theory that it is a compensation for the loss experienced by a clan when it gives one of its members in marriage. In case of divorce the clan's loss [443] is nullified, since the woman returns to her family or -- as is the usual outcome -- remarries and becomes the object of a new bride-price payment. The death of a woman, on the other hand, makes the clan's loss permanent rather than bringing an end to it. This does not mean that the bride price does not constitute a guarantee; in reality it is one. But this guarantee is an effect of the bride price, not the reason for its existence -- which is something altogether different.

2. Inheritance from the husband

768 Since we are not dealing with Nkundó property laws, the 428 question of inheritance is not, strictly speaking, within the realm
● 178 of our study. Nevertheless, we cannot refrain from saying a word about it, since the study of marriage must naturally contain a chapter on children. Thus we shall examine the question from that particular angle. What interests us here is knowing what rights children have over their father's inheritance. We have already dealt with the position of the widow in the preceding article.

The inheritance from the deceased includes three parts:

1) The bride-price valuables, that is, everything that is used chiefly to obtain a wife: copper and brass rings, iron objects, widows and daughters insofar as they represent bride-price valuables.

2) Domestic animals: goats, dogs, hens, ducks.

3) Real property: fruit trees, fields and crops, hunting enclosures, fishing places; and personal property: nets, hunting snares, bows and arrows, shields.

The bride-price valuables become the common property of the close relatives. Each one receives his share of the inheritance.

768 The widows are awarded to the brothers, uncles, and nephews 428 (bǎnankáná) of the deceased, in accordance with their position in •178 the group hierarchy and their respective rights, [444] which may derive from financial assistance lent to the deceased so that he could obtain one of his wives, or from the application of the nkita system. Rings (bakonga) and iron objects (bifeko) are distributed in the same manner. Similarly, unmarried daughters are assigned to various relatives -- that is, the "fathers" who preside at the division of the inheritance discuss and specify which persons have the right to receive the bride prices that will later be paid for them. Of the sons only the eldest receives a wife or a certain amount of bride-price valuables as bosólo. (1)

1. Chapter III, Article III.

That is the traditional rule. Nowadays a far-reaching change has already taken place. The sons of the deceased are no longer excluded from the distribution. They are given either a wife, or a sufficient quantity of rings, or the right to the bride price of a sister or a cousin, if it is possible. For the rest see Chapter II, Article IV, 3 and Article XI, 3, 13, and Chapter IV, Article II.

The domestic animals go to the biúnanyí, who take them home to their husbands and they are thus included in the amount of the dowry. A few goats, however, might be given to one of the men in the kin group who needs them to complete the payment of a bride price.

As to the other property (real or personal), they pass directly to the sons. The first born receives the lion's share and the most precious items, but the younger sons are not excluded in the distribution.

It should be noted that a will may affect this distribution by assigning a specific object to a given son, or by excluding one of the heirs with whom the deceased has had a serious quarrel. Such a will is always executed, because the Nkundó fear the vengeance of the deceased, who causes anyone guilty of an 768 infraction to follow him in death. It is obeyed even if [445] it is 429 manifestly unfair. They fear reprisal by the deceased, such as that 178 which is thought to have happened after the death of Iloko is Ɛfekele of Lofelɛ. He had killed his own brother, Mpɛ́nda ɛ́â nkotonkale, [682] because the latter had tasted freshly brewed beer instead of leaving that honor to him -- an action which constituted an extremely serious offense. But since the punishment was out of all proportion to the act, the whole family united against the murderer, who was obliged to flee. At his death he disinherited all his brothers in favor of his sons. This will, considered unreasonable and unfair, was not respected; Iloko's only brother, Bondɛ́lɛ́ wǎ Wǐlima, took Bonyengú, the favorite, for himself. But he soon died, and his death was attributed to Iloko's vengeance. Several years ago the family met to finally settle the matter of the inheritance. The largest portion was set aside for Iloko's sons, but one part was awarded to other relatives who were not named in the excluding clause, which referred only to the Basɛ́ká Banângâ, that is, to Iloko's own brothers.

Sons are never disinherited. If one of them behaves very badly toward his father, when the latter dies he refuses him his benediction (bokako w'ɔ̂lɔ́tsi) and curses him bokako wǎ tu yo).

3. Inheritance from the wife

78 As we have seen in Chapter VI, Article II, a wife has no 428 rights of ownership over the fruits of her own labors or of the couple's joint efforts. Consequently, her family can make no claims as regards inheritance; there is nothing to inherit.

Although all the fruits of the wife's activities belong to the husband, most men do not require that their rights be rigidly respected. They leave a part, or the whole, to the family of the [446] deceased, as is done in the case of a widow. (1) After the feast at the end of mourning, the two clans make an inventory of the property in question. Usually whatever products of her work the woman has left are divided equally between the two clans. Some

---

1. See the previous article.

768 fastened her to a fork (etɔ́ka) until he was reimbursed. Sometimes 672 the ndonga intervened to free her, but by doing so he took upon 593x himself the responsibility of making restitution of the bride price. In this last [465] instance, if the wife died in the home of her family, the husband was entitled to reimbursement just as he would be in case of a divorce. Thus we come back to the situation described under 2) and 3), the forms varying according to whether or not the widower wanted to continue the affinal relationship.

● [178] Nowadays the situation has changed entirely. The colonial administration no longer permits the use of the etɔ́ka. Consequently, a man who wants to get rid of his incorrigible wife acts in such a way that she will leave him of her own free will. And the situation is again that described in 2).

If the husband has sent his wife away himself by placing her in the hands of the ndonga, his parents-in-law will refuse him an indemnity or any restitution of the bride price and often will not even accept the nkunjí. They answer his demands by telling him that he should not have repudiated the wife whom he freely chose for himself. Thus most men resort to the procedure described in the next paragraph. There are circumstances, however, under which this mode of action is more difficult; this is so especially in the case of monogamists, since its execution requires several weeks, sometimes several months. In the interim the wife does as she pleases and neglects her husband, so that the latter practically finds himself a bachelor.

797 Evangelization has added a second difficulty. Catholic 768 marriage is indissoluble. Catechumens and Christians who wish to 672 marry must therefore be careful. Before admitting them to re-
593x ligious marriage, we require that at least the walo be paid. But the young men know the temperament and value of their fiancées only through experience. In almost every case therefore they have this experience at home before the walo, in accordance with their ancestral custom. Then, if one of the two parties is pagan (which happens very often), the disciplinary rules of the Catholic missions in the Congo require that they spend a minimum of six months

768
672
178 Colonization has given rise to a new legal situation which is not provided for in Nkundó traditional law. If a woman takes advantage of the freedom permitted her by colonial legislation and goes to a mission to obtain instruction and make a monogamous marriage, and then contracts an illness from which she dies (at the mission, in the hospital, or even in the home of her family -- a question of place which has no legal importance), we find ourselves confronted by an entirely new situation. The husband no longer considers the woman his wife since she has left him, even though theoretically she continues to retain that status. On the other hand, she has not gone back to her family or gone to live with another man.

Polygamous husbands want to throw the "responsibility" back upon the woman's parents. But actually they have no part in the events, and it is unfair to involve them in the situation.

[797] They do not bring the mission into the matter. As a matter of fact, the mission performs a service to the woman and to society as a whole in trying to elevate it morally and culturally.

What should one think of this situation? In the preceding article we have seen that the husband assumes all risks in relation to the wife. Certain exceptions to this rule [460], which we have explained, have been formulated in Nkundó law; but outside of them, the law retains its dominion, since the exceptions are narrowly defined. Thus it applies to the situation with which we are dealing, and consequently the damages must remain on the husband's account.

Moreover, this interpretation is to be encouraged for the following reason:

The purpose of the legislation involved is to protect freedom in this matter of capital importance and to favor monogamy and the gradual abandonment of polygamy. Polygamists -- as a group -- must perforce suffer from it in one way or another. It is inconceivable that a struggle against an abuse would not affect the persons guilty of it.

Such cases are still very rare, but their frequency may increase with the progress of evangelization.

768
672
692 In terminating this duscussion we must make one point that is related to both of the last two articles. The cause of death has no

842 differences can be found here, although they are less apparent to 855 a European observer since we usually approach the natives as a 152 group and our contact with them is often too impersonal.

2. Abortion

847 A great enemy of maternal love is the practice of abortion, which has always been known to the Nkundó. Here we cannot describe all the prescriptions used for that purpose. It will be sufficient to enumerate the reasons for which they have recourse to this practice. They are as follows:

1) A woman's lasciviousness: the procreation and subsequent care of a child to some extent prevent the indulging in carnal pleasures. Formerly this cause of abortion was nonexistent or very [178] rare. Needless to say, it has become more common, especially in the centers where it is constantly on the increase and where, in addition, occasional or regular "housekeepers" learn new means of sterilization and abortion.

2) A woman's antipathy or persistent anger toward her husband may encourage her to prevent conception or destroy its effect.

3) An excessive weakening of the mother's organism caused by a large number of conceptions and childbirths at too short intervals.

4) The encumberance and the difficulty of watching, carrying, and taking care of many small children -- bálota bọkẹkẹsano [467] [535] wǎ bǎna nsátélá nsátélá. This reason is especially important for well-known dancers.

It goes without saying that several of these motives may be combined in the same person. For instance, I knew of a woman who aborted at the time of her eighth child. Her recurrent pregnancies, together with continuous work, had greatly reduced her strength. A palaver with her husband was the last straw; she decided to get rid of the fruit she carried in her body.

Outside of these exceptions the natives of this country ardently desire their own continuation through a large number of progeny. (1)

[184]

1. The same is not true elsewhere. Examples to that effect are cited from regions that are 843 a woman's mother proceeded with the ceremony in the absence of the husband and his family. The latter were furious. They revealed the matter so that if anything should happen later to the mother or the child the law would be on their side. In that way the husband could evade responsibility and place the blame on his wife and her family so that they would have to pay an indemnity.

The pregnant woman does not remove the paint for three or [302] four weeks after the ceremony. Nowadays the use of paint having ● [178] disappeared except for certain occasions and among older persons, it is left on for only one night. In addition the surface smeared has been reduced to a line in the middle of the head or even one single spot.

[783] During this ceremony the Bombwanja have a public confession [837] (etato) of the lovers. But since the Bokótɛ́ wait until after delivery, we will deal with it later on.

On the night following the ceremony described, the couple [833] [476] "fasten the fetus" through their carnal union. Were they to omit this act, the child would die before birth.

For subsequent pregnancies the fastening of the fetus is no longer preceded by the same formalities.

The couple continue to have relations during the entire [833] period of pregnancy "in order to open an easy passage for the child."
843 On the other hand, they must strictly observe marital fidelity.
837 Nevertheless, a polygamist may have relations with his other wives.

In addition to this essential art, the interdict also includes a secondary part; the couple may not even commit acts even very remotely related to procreation. Thus they may not:

1) Touch in any way whatsoever -- even to shaking their hands -- persons with whom they have had adulterous relations; such persons must therefore be avoided.

2) Sit next to such persons.

3) Look at them.

4) Enter a house or apartment where they are.

5) Eat "from the same pot."

6) Lie in another couple's bed.

7) Other persons may no longer sleep in the bed of the couple bound by the bokeka.

10. Conclusion

182 Nkundo society was a fully alive, organic community. All of its organs functioned and were able to adjust continually to the changes in its life. Ethnically, socially-legally, and politically, they were open to every improvement. The organs with which it was built stood nearest to natural law and drew their rights and duties from it, and also the spirit which inspired them.

The facts prove that this society could survive. It arose at the source of the Lomako; in a short time it had extended itself peacefully over the whole central area of the Congo; it pressed eastward across the Lomami and Lualaba, and southward across the Kaisai /Kasai/-Sankuru, to occupy about a fifth of the present Congo at the time of the arrival of the Whites.

182 This society was open to all healthy influences and could adapt itself
177 to all reasonable demands of civilization. It was, however, not reconcilable with what precisely is wrong in our European ideas about progress and civilization: elimination of all ethnic intermediary organs, equalization of all individuals, materialization of all life on the basis of economic competition, slave-like submission to the impersonal, unpaternal State, with that terrible pretense of freedom, of being able to do everything that is not forbidden by the State.

● 178 This suddenly attained freedom, which was accompanied by the 161 abolition of all the former joints of society, means the death of the Nkundo /161/ community, not only in its soul, its being, but also in its existence. The gradual depopulation, the dying out in the Middle Congo, has had repercussions now and then, even in government circles. "The Nkundo-Mongo population is melting away like snow before the sun," is the brief content of the last official report. The Waola, between the Ruki and the Ikelemba /rivers/, had in 1939 ninety deaths and three births. The official statistics of 1939 of the territory of Coquilhatville give one hundred adults for every twenty-four children. The official data of the same year for the Vicariate of Coquilhatville, with its 382, 736 inhabitants, give a ratio of 415 children to 1, 000 adults. According to these data, the whole population will be decreased by more than 50 percent by the following generation, thus dwindled to less than one-half.

Coquilhatville, 1939

837 When a wife of a polygynist had illicit relations with another 586 man of the same village, this was called Bonsamba. When she had such relations with a man of another village, this was called Isoke. As we have observed, the ordinary wives of the harem often had such relations. When the woman eloped with her bonsamba or isoke, or with whomever it was, she was pursued by her husband or owner, who tried to get her back. If the wife refused, negotiations over the bride price began.

If an agreement was reached or if a pledge was given as guarantee for the payment, the first bond was considered broken, and the woman was considered bound to this second man, even though he had been her bonsamba or isoke.

It might also happen that the first husband was so jealous that he did not want to make any agreement; then he attempted to kill either the guilty wife or her second husband. If the woman became 593 ill at the home of her husband, he went to tell her family and had to 758 give a security to the family.

583 Often the family came to get the wife, in order to be able to care for her better. If, in such a case, the wife [538] died at the home of her family, there were no further difficulties about the bride price, according to their customs. If, however, the bride price had still not been completely paid, the family asked their son-in-law to pay the remainder.

583 178 In recent times, now that the heathen customs have been undermined by the European occupation, we see that the husbands whose wives have gone to their family when sick and have died there, demand the return of the bride price from the family, but this is completely contrary to their old customs. In one case the husband could demand the return of the bride price, namely, if the wife had left while healthy to go to her family and had died there.

562 439 Buying or Trading of Women. The woman was also in many cases an acknowledged object of trade. The great village chiefs, among others Ibuka and Yoma, of whom we shall speak further, carried on a sort of woman trade. With European articles and also native currency, they went to other districts of the Equator [Province] to buy women with them, just like someone who goes to market, even though no public markets where women were sold actually existed.

436 1. Benkata: this was thin iron or copper wire rolled into small rings; the thickness of the wire was about 3 millimeters; the length, 20 to 25 centimeters.

2. Bingetele: iron or copper bars about 8 millimeters thick and 15 centimeters long; these are still in use in Bikoro.

436 301 3. Bekata: copper wire; thickness about 7 or 8 millimeters, and 1 meter or 1.50 meters long; spiral shaped; the women wore these rolled around their legs as copper leggings.

[543] 4. Bakonga: copper rings which served as arm bands and foot bands and also as collars. The size differed for small or large persons; the weight is from one half kilo to 5 kilos.

436 5. Mitako: copper wire about 4 millimeters thick and 25 centimeters long, usually bent like a hairpin. The mitako served as a uniform currency, from which the other values and prices were reckoned, like the franc with us. The value of the mitako was formerly reckoned at five centimes.

583 435 Formerly the bride price, which was paid for a wife in almost all of Equatorial Africa, was from 5 to 20 bakonga. (The value of the bakonga differed greatly according to the weight. The average value, however, is estimated at 2.50 francs.) This payment was further supplemented with slaves or wives. This manner of payment and the bride price still exist in the districts where the natives have not yet, or practically not, come in contact with Europeans. Also, [567] it was sometimes paid with only slaves or women. The price for one female slave was relatively much less than for another woman.

178 583 Through the occupation of the Congo by Europeans, the family life of the natives has necessarily undergone great changes, and their customs and habits as well.

In the first place the natives have found themselves deprived of their wives by the sentinels of the Independent Congo State. [661] These black sentinels, appointed in the villages by the State to supervise the reaping of caoutchouc, assumed an unlimited power. They took as many wives of the natives as they chose and did not pay for a single one.

Next many black soldiers, servant boys, and workmen of the Europeans also took wives everywhere in the beginning, without bothering about the native customs, that is, without paying for those wives; and this often happened under the protective power of their Whites.

178 583 We can add to that also a large number of black women who became the famous "housekeepers" of the Europeans. Although payment for these women was usually given to their owners, they were still withdrawn from the family life and the native customs. Finally, the Christian women, who now live in Christian marriage, must also be mentioned.

In addition, the price of wives and the bride price have [544] undergone great changes, primarily in those districts where the natives came into more immediate contact with Europeans. Before the arrival of the Europeans, their main medium of payment was the woman herself; a woman was paid for with a woman. Now it is forbidden to use women as currency. Therefore the natives have raised the price in the payment of bakonga and mitako.

178 583 435 In some districts close to the European centers, the natives have brought the price for wives and the bride price to a height never before known. For one wife they ask several nkesi.

A nkesi is 10,000 mitako. Such a sum is much too high in relation to their means. In a village there are, for instance, 50 women; for one woman, 40,000 to 50,000 mitako are asked, while at present in the whole village together the sum of 50,000 mitako is no more to be found. Therefore to oblige someone to pay two or three nkesi is usually to make it impossible for him to pay, or rather to make it necessary for him to pay with women, which is nothing else than encouraging woman trade, which then occurs.

802 177 A remark should also be made here about the nomenclature of the numerals. Nkesi is not a word of the Equatorial peoples; it was brought in from elsewhere with the Europeans. Their amounts were as follows:

10 was jum or bonkama;

100 was nkoto; and with the arrival of the Whites and foreign population came

1,000 nkesi.

The present numerical value is: 10, jum; 100, bonkama; 1,000, nkoto; and 10,000, nkesi. Some very old Negroes, however, still say bonkama for 10.

[583] This is the probable origin of the great rise in price of wives, especially in the area of Coquilhatville.

178 When the first Europeans arrived at Leopoldville and 439 Brazzaville, it was not long before European materials and other articles also came to Coquilhatville to the hands of the great vil-583 lage chiefs who carried on trade on the rivers, primarily in slaves and ivory. The village chiefs, Yoma from the village of Boyeka, Ibuka of Boyere, Yamba of [545] Eala, Nkake of Bokele, etc., carried these European articles up the Tshuapa and Ikelemba rivers, and they bought slaves and wives with them.

Returning home again, they bought wives from their own district and paid for them with the slaves and women whom they themselves had bought cheaply with the European articles. For one woman of their district they paid three or four women. The arrival [802] of the Whites and foreign Blacks acquainted them with the number nkesi which, however, in their definition was only 1,000 and which they formerly called 10 nkoto or 10 times 100.

178 It was not long before the Europeans had to concern themselves with hearing disputes over the wives. In the Black land such a thing 583 is unavoidable. Whenever the Blacks came to the Whites with their disputes, they dared not or would not say, "I paid for this woman with three women, but they said, "I paid for this woman with three nkesi," that is, 3 times 1,000 mitako. Meanwhile, the nkoto and nkesi acquired their value of 1,000 and 10,000. The statement, however, that a woman was paid for with nkesi was retained, through the error of the Whites or through the greed of the polygynists or both.
Indeed, later some women were paid for with nkesi, namely, when the prevalent currency in the Congo was the mitako. It was also no wonder, for the polygynists had a monopoly on the wives, and it was to their advantage to raise the price.

Therefore, if the native of Coquilhatville says now that his father or his uncle paid for that woman with three or four nkesi, this generally means that the wife was paid for with three or four women.
The price of the women in Wangata, near Coquilhatville, was formerly no higher than in the other areas. Many women were paid for with only five bakonga, for instance, in Bokala, near Bamania, a village which belonged to the village chief Yoma of Boyeka.

178 It should also be noted that the nkesi which have been paid 583 in recent years in Wangata have been paid not in mitako or in 435

178 currency, but in articles on which the natives fix a conventional 583 price, usually much higher than the actual value. Thus, for in-435 stance, a pataki, or piston rifle, was always reckoned at 3,000 mitako; it did not matter that it was only worth 1,500. There are, [546] therefore, only very few women who are paid for with nkesi in real currency or mitako.

691 The tragic result of this exaggerated rise in prices is that the 583 mutual debts and difficulties among the natives have been increased, 178 so that they are almost impossible to solve. In the attempt to settle a dispute, five other disputes come into it, all equally complicated, for the simple reason that the money, the mitako, to be paid does not exist, and it is forbidden to pay with women. To settle a dispute, several months are sometimes necessary, or a whole year. Other disputes never end, but pass on from father to son and are brought by each one in turn before each new District Administrator. In the districts where the bride price has not been raised, the difficulties and disputes are not nearly as numerous and are easy to solve. In the districts where the purchase price and the bride price of the women have become excessively high, the natives themselves admit that their disputes could formerly be solved easily, but that this is at present almost impossible.

It is unnecessary to say that this situation is harmful to the task of civilizing [the country] and to the mutual good relations of the natives. The natives are constantly coming to the District Administrator of the area to lay before him their disputes over women who have not been paid for. These disputes take up a great deal of the costly time of the administrator. He must hear and settle these usually very complicated disputes, for often the general peace of a village or district depends on it.

Also the natives themselves spend whole days and weeks doing nothing besides holding meetings to discuss the unpayable debts of bride price and the purchase price of wives, simply because the prices are excessive. For lack of currency, they pay each other with each other's debts, which usually complicates the business even more.

To improve this condition, the price of women and the bride price should be lowered, greatly lowered. We have seen that this was possible and practical when once a District Administrator who knew the native customs very well in the area of Coquilhatville really began to do it.

THE NKUMU OF THE TUMBA

RITUAL CHIEFTAINSHIP ON THE MIDDLE CONGO

H. D. BROWN

101 THE tribes living round Lake Tumba, a lake some thirty-five miles long by [133] twelve wide lying north of Lake Leopold II (approximately 0° 30′ south latitude, and 18° east longitude) and draining into the Congo River at the confluence of the Ubangi, lack cohesion and show a considerable variety of custom and language.
But they are known collectively as Tumba, the Government adaptation of the Native term Ntomba. Most of them are found to the east of the lake, the whole group numbering perhaps little more than forty to fifty thousand at the present time, though [797] there is evidence that the last twenty years have seen a great decrease in population.
European occupation of this area goes back barely fifty years, Protestant missions having been established for about the same length of time. The first mission post [177] was established at Ikoko on the north-east shore of the lake, one of the villages of a group known as Bonginda. In pursuing this investigation particular attention has been given to the practices of this group, but mention is occasionally made where considerable differences have been found elsewhere.

105 The Tumba are agricultural, hunting, and fishing people. Their country is flat and swampy with dense forests, and there are many watercourses flowing into Lake 13 Tumba. There are occasional small, less swampy plains, and one such area, more open, with quite wide stretches of prairie, is a haunt of buffalo. The forests are fairly well supplied with game, and the swamps, streams, and lakes with fish. A heavy rainfall and no distinct dry season make agriculture reasonably easy and famine unknown. Every family has its plantation of manioc, the staple diet, which is supplemented by plantains and bananas. The people make their own tools, formerly smelting their own iron for this purpose, are fairly skilful at making dug-out canoes, engage in weaving raffia and making mats out of split cane, and are efficient at pottery production.

624 The role of the nkumu in the socio-religious activities of the community is one of the most interesting features of Tumba life. As a result of European contact the 101 ceremonies connected with the nkumu are rapidly disappearing, but it has been
● 178 possible to collect considerable information from the older men and women among whom the details are still vividly remembered.[1] The following report refers to the period previous to European occupation and control, a time within the memory of a large number of people, but already sufficiently remote to become a matter of hearsay before the lapse of many more years.

596 An understanding of the place of the nkumu among the Tumba requires a glance
[173] at the tribal organization. According to the people themselves, they migrated westward, and coming into these parts chose land for themselves. Among the several

---

[1] In My Children of the Forest, New York, 1924, pp. 48–51, Andrew F. Hensey has briefly outlined some of the items of interest observed among the nkumu of the district adjacent to that of the present study. These more detailed notes are, however, timely if a record is to be preserved that approximates to accuracy.

766 crypt would then be barred by mats in order to leave it as a hollow chamber, and 782 the hole leading down to it filled in with earth.

For a month or two after the burial the festivities and orgies continued. Women 766 would be hanged to create some diversion, but those hanged were not eaten. Decapi-782 tations would continue. According to the informants only slaves brought in from a distance would have to be tied to prevent their escape. The slave members of the 567 household of the dead nkumu would await their turn stoically, content to die that [152] they might accompany their master in his journey to the land of spirits. This may be true but scarcely seems possible. Still another diversion in the funeral orgies was killing in the manner known as esumbu. If some man who had a slave did not wish him to be hanged or beheaded, he might give him for this other method. As the weeks slipped by, such a one, his life having apparently been spared, would suppose that all was safe and that there was little chance of his being taken, and, thus emboldened, would, instead of keeping at a safe distance, join the crowd to watch a beheading. His death would be prearranged. At the moment of beheading a victim, someone would drive a spear into the unsuspecting man, the whole crowd then using spears and knives to stab and slash until he fell. Some might be tortured to death by being buried up to the neck and left thus exposed to the hot sun without food or water until death intervened, but this was not a common practice at such funerals.

768 The termination of the dead nkumu's affairs took place when the division of the inheritance was made, a long and complicated process.

● 178 Such were the old days before European penetration. The advent of the white man half a century ago was the beginning of the end. The ceremonies had to be 624 given up, though reluctantly. Occasionally now goats are beheaded in place of human victims, and many of the younger generation find that, even so, the sight is more than they can endure, and they seek refuge elsewhere. Nkumu are not anxious for the honours. They find little or no respect paid to them by the government officials and this is a distinct obstacle to their obtaining honour from their own people. When the nkumu resident in the village adjacent to the mission station died, one of the Natives was asked who would be next. The reply was that probably no one would appear as a successor. Asked why, he answered, 'There are too many trousers.' He meant that too many were adopting the ways of the white man to [693] make the inauguration of another nkumu a success. In his one useful function, that of judge, the paramount chief now takes his place, cases tried must be recorded by a clerk of the court, and fines paid into the treasury of the chieftaincy. With such a state of affairs the old ways drop into desuetude, and the younger generation grow up knowing less of the ways of their fathers as the years pass.

614 kinship subgroup [Untersippe] for groups of rank C;
kinship group [Sippe] for groups of rank D (the exogamous units);
large kinship group [Grosssippe] for groups of rank E.

Local Organization

361 The second diagram[1] shows the settlement pattern of the 621 Isangi group in its old settlement area up to 1949. At this time 178 Isangi was relocated near the highway. Only two of the nuclear kinship groups of Isangi can lay claim to territory reaching far enough toward the east as to extend beyond the new highway. Thus, the resettlement process has led to a complete change of the settlement pattern. However, the functions of the settlement communities have not yet been adapted to the new settlement. At present the inhabitants are still so engaged in speculation about the possibility of a return to their own old territory that they have not yet reformed their village organization.

621 We observe that the village is divided into six settlement
614 communities (30), each of which consists only of the members of one of the two kinship groups of Isangi. [200] We find that only the group of the father, which formerly was a kinship group in its own right, is attached to one settlement community of the kinship group Ngelé. Incidentally, we might point out that the names of the two kinship groups, Ngelé and Nkoto, mean "down the river" and "up the river." The older group is called "down the river" since in ngelé the river is large and wide. We come across this honorary term for the older group in some other villages although there is not always an "up-river" group. No corresponding settlement pattern can be found.

30. See Diagram 3.

614 The degree of cohesion among the constituent kinship 621 groups in settlement community I is so strong that the entire 202 community has a communal bokendi, a communal messenger.
624

[1] [page 7, category 116.—Analyst]

614 each other to employ their own messengers. When the messenger
621 of settlement II arrives here, he first calls on the messenger of 624 the nuclear kinship group Bosóbɛ́ (No. 19) and then to Impínga 202 (No. 26). The messenger from Bosóbɛ́ calls on his relatives in settlement VI, who are the nuclear kinship group Mbelo-Mmuna (No. 22), while the messenger from Impínga-Ndongó formerly had to call on the group Bommambo which is now extinct.

Settlement V consisted of three different groups. Bolíma, the group of the father, had its own messenger; however, he only received the messages without having to pass them on, which is also the case with all these last groups of the village. Both neighbors had their own messenger. The messenger from settlement I called on the nuclear kinship group Bolesangi, his relatives; the messenger from settlement III went to his relatives of the nuclear kinship group Ituli.

There were also two messengers in the last hamlet, but reports on this subject are insufficient since the nuclear kinship group Bommambo has been extinct for a long time.

178 All the settlements just mentioned have a common
614 characteristic: formerly, at important dance festivals, their 621 young men performed together in one joint corps de ballet. The 595 population was decimated as a result of the rigors of [201] the occupation period and also as a result of the population move-[161] ment into the cities. Consequently, there are not enough young people any more, and I with II, III with IV, and V with VI act together. Thus, in each case we find Ngelɛ́ and Nkoto united in one ballet. Although these groups have also been scattered [361] as a result of the new settlement pattern (next to the highway), the old organizational structure has been preserved, and the young people do not hesitate to walk the long distance to the practice field every day so they can dance in the old groupings.

621 All of Isangi, all three kinship groups, have one common
624 village chief, the Nkúmú, with an iyolo nsáka who gets the meet-622 ings started, and a village court with its judges. There are other groups which correspond to Isangi (31), but have more than one

---

31. See Müller, Fürstentum, pp. 73 ff., 76 ff., 133 f.

614 Each hamlet includes one or several message districts.
621 Even at the time of the old settlement pattern the messenger
624 system was determined by the hierarchical structure and not [202] at all by considerations of what was most practical (for example, the shortest route). Consequently this conservative institution of the conservative old men has not been affected at all by the relocation.

The villages are the communities of jurisdiction and of political life. Usually a nkúmú, presides over the meetings. If a village has several nkúmú, one of whom may be the judge or all may preside together, I have used the term "part of a village" [Dorfteil] for the district from which each nkúmú originates.

Those areas which have a special meeting place are here
361 referred to as a "province" [Gau]. The meeting place lies 621 within the territory of the oldest or second-oldest kinship group.
178 The practical importance of this institution for the entire province is minimal, but the two meeting places [202] which we discovered still constituted, until a short time ago, important social centers for the duplicate villages forming the administrative centers of the respective provinces. As a result of the relocation, the meeting places have now lost their function completely.

000 I hope that this paper has added new material to the discussion on the subject of ethno-sociological terminology, and that it will stimulate criticism and a new discussion of this important subject.

593 necessity be derived from a logical conclusion based on a great many particular instances. Yet these might have explanations other than those we give them. Thus we could attribute the presence of true love or its absence to the effects of causes of which we are unaware. Nevertheless, we cannot keep from presenting below a few facts which will enable us to draw a conclusion that is adequately in accordance with reality.

There is no question that the love found here lacks the purity which it has among certain groups of Europeans or certain other peoples, ● [181] especially good Christians. No one is astonished that pagan peoples, practicing their atavistic and degrading customs, have not achieved the general delicacy of sentiment or more especially the moral height of so noble a virtue as has been nourished and developed by centuries of Christian influence.

In addition, the instability of marriage, the possibility of its dissolution, and the presence of polygamy by no means tend to develop the purity of love; on the contrary, they tend to debase it. Finally, [38] the liveliness and sincerity of family affections, which we have described in Article I, naturally result in a reduction of conjugal love -- all the more so since, because of the patriarchal structure of native society, the Nkundó needs his kin more than he needs his wife.

Thus there is much selfishness, which is one of the characteristic signs of moral decadence and little devotion. A wife will seldom remain with a husband who suffers from an incurable illness, is impotent, or has become too poor for her taste. The Nkundó consider this the natural state of affairs and are not at all ashamed to admit it, even in front of a missionary.

593 586 The same is true of a husband's relationship to his wife. If she has become incapable of fulfilling at least one of the purposes for which he married her, why should he keep her? If she has given him sons, they will want to keep their mother, and their entreaties combined, perhaps, with a feeling of compassion for one he has loved, might persuade him to keep her. Her sons will provide for her subsistence to which their father will make a contribution from time to time, and her daughters will take care of her and prepare her food. But some men will insist on getting rid of this burden in spite of

2: Hulstaert--220 M-5 (ca. 1930) 1938 FO32 Mongo FO32
Nkundu

582 We have spoken of the unproductivity of the bride price.
583x This is a Nkumdɔ́ notion, and it is accurate only because the old men want to satisfy themselves before their sons. Actually, they could very easily reconcile their desire that the bride price should be productive with the aspirations of the youths, at least in many instances. All they would need to do would be to use the valuables they have received for their sons' benefit by acquiring girls of the same age for them. The productivity of the valuables would not diminish [238] in the least, of course, since the goods would remain in the family. On the contrary, it would be increased because a [842] greater number of progeny would probably be born. But our natives knowledge of physiology does not seem to be sufficiently developed ● [181] for them to come to this conclusion. And even more probably their egoism has greatly clouded their intelligence and silenced the voice of good sense and fatherly love to make it possible for them to multiply the number of their wives and thus increase the easy satisfaction of their sensuality, augment their wealth, and reinforce their social position. It will be their sons' turn after their death.

561 This situation is aggravated by the fact that, except for the 428 bosɔ́lo, the brothers, not the sons, of the deceased inherited the 595x widows, who thus remained in the hands of the old men.

582• Because of their attitudes the old men monopolized most of the women. They established large harems for themselves, so that it was very difficult for the young men to find a woman to marry;
they had to consider themselves lucky if their father provided them with a child.

Thus it was unheard of that a young man between twenty and 582 thirty years old should marry, except for a few instances where a 178 man acquired a child who was to become his wife after a number of years. Men were usually forty years old or older before they married.

Nowadays the situation has changed entirely; the attitude of the old men favors the young much more and has become almost normal. The great majority of fathers, if they have the means, procure a wife for their sons as soon as the latter are old enough to express a desire for one. This improvement is due to the fact that it has become 602 within a group of close kin, seeing that, from a certain standpoint, 837 property belongs to all the members, each sooner or later receiving 684 or inheriting from the other. But in cases where other sanctions can be imposed, they are considered legitimate. [309]

b) Except in the case of relations between brother and sister-626 in-law -- within the limits described above -- public opinion is 837 severe in its judgment, even more severe than for ordinary cases of 602 adultery, although because of the more tangible nature of the sanctions imposed against the latter, these seem on the surface to be considered more serious; many natives even have that impression. Or at least that is the first impression that spontaneously comes from their explanations; currently, they stress the indemnity, and in their accounts of ancient proceedings and violent sanctions, they forget the other aspect. Others do not distinguish between the two sides of the problem, or distinguish between them only very poorly. Only in going to the bottom of things do they -- like ourselves -- become aware of the two aspects and the importance of not confusing them.

The leniency we observe in certain cases on the part of the interested parties who have been wronged, and sometimes on the part of public opinion, does not seem to us to have been explained as a leniency based on principle nor as a legitimation of these relations (except in the case of brothers within the limits indicated). They seem rather to spring from the affection they have for the culprit, their sympathy for his condition as a bachelor, a certain community of interests, and finally from an evaluation of certain other elements that may be involved (such as a fundamental jealousy in the case of brothers).

602 The great distinction made by the Nkundó in this realm as 181 in others between inferior and superior relatives is based on their
● conception of authority, which is patriarchal, therefore paternal. What is involved is not so much a fear of power as a reverent awe -- although the first should not be excluded. In their eyes an inferior does not exist for the benefit and advantage of the superior, but the reverse; authority exists for the good of the inferior, who to preserve hierarchy and order must submit to the [310] superior. The superior's duty to help his inferior (in his difficulties, his palavers, his poverty),

602 ● 141 to be liberal and generous toward him and therefore to make goods available to him, to be lenient in matters concerning justice and property and obliging in conjugal matters -- as long as the principle of authority remains secure is based on the same idea. The exploitation of an inferior by his superior is entirely contrary to the basic nature of Nkundɔ́ authority, while the reverse is entirely in conformity with it. (1)

> 1. This attitude may account -- at least to some extent -- for the liberties that the natives readily take with the European, their superior or master, such as domestic thefts, inappropriate requests, the kind of begging and lack of respect for authority that we are accustomed to seeing, etc.

Article VII. Adultery

837 For the Nkundɔ́, adultery is an illicit union between a man and a married woman. From the moment the ikulɛ́ is paid for a woman, any relations with her by a man other than the husband-to-be are considered adulterous.

1. Terminology

There is no exclusive or specific term in Lonkundo by which our word "adultery" may be translated. There are a number of words in the language which are only partially equivalent to it.

1) First of all, the Nkundɔ́ speak of bongombe, a term denoting steady and continuous relations with a woman who is a complete stranger, that is, who is not related in any way. The word designates the relationship as well as the persons involved. This type of adultery is also called a wɛ̌samaka or linɛ́mba jɛ́ njɛ́sɛ́mɛ́ (from the verb ɛ́sama) -- that is, a secret, as against a true linɛ́mbɛ́ (which will be

586* make it possible for him to recover his claim, he had recourse to the second means:

586* b) Reducing his wife to slavery (bonvamó, from the verb
587 nyamola). The husband had the right to use this means immediately, without having first tried the étaka. But such action was not approved of and was undertaken only if the woman's family were themselves exasperated by the endless suits and the continual shame that their unworthy daughter caused them.

[721] The reduction of a woman to slavery usually caused a war, for her clan would not put up with such an insult. In some instances they did not seek revenge, however, either out of fear, because they did not feel in a position to resist, or because they recognized that the husband had good reasons for what he did. [384]

The woman's relatives could subsequently buy her back. (1)

●[181] 1. If the Nkundó sold an Elinga woman into slavery, her people never troubled them with a war. For they did not know how to attack, were not good at marching, were strangers to the forest, and were inferior in military valor. Therefore they were satisfied with buying back their kinswoman.

In some instances, not wanting to be exposed to further palavers or further shame caused by their daughter's continued misconduct after having bought her back, they left her to her fate. Their love for their child and their desire to preserve their honor and good reputation were in conflict, and which of the two sentiments triumphed depended on circumstances of men and things. In such a situation, as with respect to theft and other habits that brought dishonor, it was not rare (nor is it even today) to find that the desire to preserve honor triumphed over affection or financial interests.

[584] Before reducing a wife to slavery, even more than before confining her to the etáka, a man was required to communicate his intentions to the ndonga. Otherwise, the latter would declare war

[92] THE ECONOMIC LIFE OF THE MONGO NEGRO

INDUSTRY

241 One might say that nature throws into the lap of the Mongo
461 Negro everything he needs in order to exist so that he does not have 181 to exert himself in the slightest to get it. Generally speaking, he has only to look for his food in the forest, to pick it up from the ground as it were, with the exception of his bananas, manioc roots, and moma (a yam that, if it is prepared well, reminds one of potatoes) which are cultivated by his women. Hence, it is quite natural that one finds little industry among the Mongo, and that the Mongo Negro is not prepared to put the least effort into developing or perfecting in any way that centuries-old industry which already exists.

461 He can eat, and that is the main thing as far as he is concerned.

181 A lazy, inert people, effeminate to the core, each one merely living on the efforts of his many wives and female slaves, cannot have a highly developed industry.

In general, except for hunting which is undertaken primarily by the young men of the village, the Mongo Negro does not bother about anything. Eating, sleeping, looking for and listening to quarrels, carousing at gatherings with sugar-cane beer until they are picked up in a drunken state by their wives (a spectacle one also sees in civilized Europe), this is the dreary, monotonous, drowsy life of the Mongo Negro, one of the least culturally developed but at the same time one of the most highly interesting tribes of the Evenaar district if not of the whole Congo.

He loathes and despises work and is indolence personified.

461 Notwithstanding the extreme idleness of the Mongo [93] people,
462 they do have some of the industry that is necessary for their existence. However, it is on a low level and not widespread. In general, the existing industries are carried on by either the men or the women, and a man will never undertake a job belonging to the women, and vice versa. The work is got done in groups or in family units; where a branch of an industry exists, it is the concern of a single person unless more workers are necessary in order to carry out the work.

583x The mutuality of the rights of nkóló and nkita is well ex-607 pressed in the saying, ómbâtɛ́ ñkoâtɛ́ wɛ̂, "possess me so that I may possess you." It is like do ut des.

583x
607
182 It is possible to judge from the preceding descriptions that the bride price has a considerable influence on family relations. Al-
[611] though the Nkundó system is clearly and manifestly patriarchal, the custom of the bride price and its logical consequences give it certain features which make one think of a matriarchy. This situation comes about quite naturally. Since the bride price is wealth it represents power in society. Through marriage this power is transferred from the husband's clan to the wife's, which is enriched in goods and persons by the bride price that has been received. In a sense, the husband is the provider of his wife's clan. And the child can truthfully maintain that his clan was enriched thanks to his father. As a matter of fact, for the Nkundó, this consideration above all others is the basis for their demands of whatever rights they possess in the mother's clan. [170] The relationship between a woman and her nkita and between their respective children is founded solely on the bride-price system of marriage and has nothing to do with matriarchy. (1)

1. But the above considerations may furnish one source of explanation for the origin of that family system.

Consequently, it is unnecessary to erect complicated theories or engage in tortuous speculations in order to explain the creation of this system or to justify it. It is quite simply the outcome of the payment of a bride price in valuables that are of no use except in connection with a similar purpose.

Nevertheless, although the system of the nkita is a natural and logical consequence of marriage by means of a bride price, it is not a necessary consequence. The bride price exists in all the tribes of the Congo, but it does not seem to have resulted everywhere
583x in the institution of the nkita.

174
114
607 What has given rise to this institution among the Nkundó? Father Brepoels (loc. cit., p. 339) gives the following explanation:

589 of a bride price was not at all a purchase. (2) [179]
648

> 2. One reason why Europeans were so slow in getting a realistic picture of the nature of the bride price was undoubtedly their lack of linguistic knowledge. The natives did not know the Lobangi language spoken to them first nor the Lingala used later, and so perforce in these languages they used (and still use) terms whose meaning is vague and broad. Thus they said -- and still often say -- the word sɔ́mba, "to buy," for "marriage," although their own language contains terms which are very precise.

Having gradually become informed as to the true nature of the bride price, a number of Europeans began to favor a return to the old system. Some took a radical and intransigent stand on the matters; others approached the question in a more reasonable manner, taking into account the changes that had resulted from colonization. It was perceived that the natives were not yet ready for the abolition of their ancestral laws and that marriages without a bride price rarely lasted, in part because the old sanctions had not been replaced with new measures adapted to the circumstances. Finally the government as well as the missions more or less strictly required that the matter of the bride price be settled before a "civil" or a "religious" marriage ceremony.

589x Many Europeans wish for the abolition of the bride-price sys-
●182 tem because it seems inferior to them. And actually in the present circumstances of time and place, it does constitute an obstacle to the evolution of the natives toward a better social and moral condition. (1)

> 1. This is especially true of the consequences of the nkita system.

But such an abolition is neither practicable nor expedient. This system penetrates and molds, so to speak, the whole familial and social life 583x 182 of our peoples. Its pure and simple abolition would upset their established order completely. First their mentality has to change, and that end can be accomplished only gradually, since a moral change is involved. And the present state of these peoples is not sufficiently evolved for the abolition of the bride price to be beneficial. Here, if ever, the axiom: nihil leges sine moribus is valid.

000 But what might perhaps be done in that direction now is to place a limitation on the amount of the bride price. This measure should be strictly enforced to make sure that it is carried out -- although in practice its enforcement would be very difficult, for at the beginning [180], many interested parties would try to circumvent it. If good results are to be obtained, an efficacious repression of adultery and the frequency of divorce should accompany the limitation on the bride price. It would be a first step towards the ideal. Others could follow according to the extent of the natives' evolution toward a higher level of morality.

Apropos of these considerations we should like to say a few words concerning:

583x 177 3. Traffic in bride prices

This term may be taken to mean two different things. It may be used to refer to a general increase in the amount of the bride price, which has reached enormous proportions since the European penetration of the area. Or it may refer to the increase in the bride price of a single woman for successive marriages, from which her family profits.

The first meaning of the term refers to a fact, namely that the amount of the bride price has increased considerably. The reason for this development is the increase in material wealth resulting from colonization. Riches are more easily acquired. But we should not exclude the role of the greed of many parents, which has also increased. It is the most important and can reach scandalous proportions in areas where the bride price is paid in European goods (money, fabrics, appliances, utensils); in such regions, as for
177, example among the riverain people of the Lower Congo, it goes up
583 to and easily exceeds 2,000 francs. Think of what this amount 465 represents, especially in times of economic depression. (1)
435

1. For the sake of comparison, here are some average figures for 1934:

Nkundu

10. Conclusion

182 Nkundo society was a fully alive, organic community. All of its organs functioned and were able to adjust continually to the changes in its life. Ethnically, socially-legally, and politically, they were open to every improvement. The organs with which it was built stood nearest to natural law and drew their rights and duties from it, and also the spirit which inspired them.

The facts prove that this society could survive. It arose at the source of the Lomako; in a short time it had extended itself peacefully over the whole central area of the Congo; it pressed eastward across the Lomami and Lualaba, and southward across the Kaisai /Kasai/-Sankuru, to occupy about a fifth of the present Congo at the time of the arrival of the Whites.

182 171 This society was open to all healthy influences and could adapt itself to all reasonable demands of civilization. It was, however, not reconcilable with what precisely is wrong in our European ideas about progress and civilization: elimination of all ethnic intermediary organs, equalization of all individuals, materialization of all life on the basis of economic competition, slave-like submission to the impersonal, unpaternal State, with that terrible pretense of freedom, of being able to do everything that is not forbidden by the State.

178 161 This suddenly attained freedom, which was accompanied by the abolition of all the former joints of society, means the death of the Nkundo /161/ community, not only in its soul, its being, but also in its existence. The gradual depopulation, the dying out in the Middle Congo, has had repercussions now and then, even in government circles. "The Nkundo-Mongo population is melting away like snow before the sun," is the brief content of the last official report. The Waola, between the Ruki and the Ikelemba /rivers/, had in 1939 ninety deaths and three births. The official statistics of 1939 of the territory of Coquilhatville give one hundred adults for every twenty-four children. The official data of the same year for the Vicariate of Coquilhatville, with its 382, 736 inhabitants, give a ratio of 415 children to 1,000 adults. According to these data, the whole population will be decreased by more than 50 pecent by the following generation, thus dwindled to less than one-half.

Coquilhatville, 1939

121 all fulfilled in one person. But such individuals do exist, if in the 69 person of the investigator they find sympathy, broad ideas, a lack of all European racism, understanding, a knowledge of their language, and a benevolent devotion to their interests, individually and as a group.

Even if one has the good fortune to find a native who, after 121 much experience, reaches the point where he will say spontaneously:
124 "This is done often, but it is against the law; the law says thus and so; this decision of the tribunal was partial for such or such reason," -- an infinitely valuable situation, but one which arises very rarely -- one is not thereby absolved of the need to check his statements. But the further one goes, the more it is possible to be aware of the reality
and to appraise the informant's value in this sphere and the usefulness of his statements.

These considerations are particularly valuable in making the 121 distinction between obligations and social decorum or good manners,
● 183 between legal obligations and obligations of kinship and mutual 671 assistance. In current practice the Nkundó make no clear lines of demarcation between these categories, since they have never codified their law or attempted to set up a clear and precise classification.
They feel no more need for this than, for instance, they or even we "civilized" people bother about setting up a grammar for our native tongue, which we speak correctly and without the slightest difficulty, purely out of habit.

An investigation in the legal domain is made [18] very [124] difficult by the patriarchal and feudal character of these peoples, added to the lack of writing. Not only is there an adaptation to circumstances -- the felicitous flexibility of native laws -- in which jurisprudence plays a great role, but the Nkundó, while knowing well what is lawful and what is not, generally does not clearly understand the nature of an obligation, and above all he does not know its source.

One's chances of obtaining good results in the inquiry are 121 greatly increased by the use of hypothetical cases, presented to the 124 individuals one knows best and whom one knows to be in no way involved. It is always worthwhile to use this method as a means of completing and perhaps correcting conclusions based on the examination

M
593x recourse to the assistance of a third party who -- for remuneration, 578 of course -- undertook to carry out his project. This task was usually
P
[674] confided to Batswa, who did not disdain this type of work, which was quite suited to their taste.

The fact that the law gives the husband the right to punish his wife [277] for the type of oratory under discussion meant that a wife had to exercise some discretion in her choice of expressions. Fearing violent reactions, she often spoke the more serious insults softly.

M
Since the European penetration women are more daring. For 178 their husbands fear European justice, which follows principles entirely 578 different from their ancestral law. Thus they complain bitterly of 593x the insolence of their wives: "We have become slaves; the women 562 are now all-powerful. They may do as they please, for we can no longer do anything to them." But as soon as native courts are sufficiently educated and are freed from what an eminent colonial jurist has called "the jurisdiction of palavers" (1), they will no doubt effect a salutary change in this situation.

M
The emancipation of women is one of the factors that have 562 increased the frequency of divorce. For a man who cannot avenge 586x continuous outrages remains dominated by shame, and the presence of the one who is the cause of it must become unbearable in the long run; whence the indifference, antipathy, hate, and the inevitable results of that permanent confusion in the household.

M
Men among whom the feeling of modesty was highly developed 593x hanged themselves out of shame instead of attacking the guilty wife.
762 That is what many natives have maintained in talking with me.
577 Nevertheless, I have no knowledge of a present-day example. When ●[183] this happened, the wife's family no longer took action against their daughter. Nor were they obliged to pay an indemnity, although their child had brought about the death. They simply had to acquit

---

1. See A. Sohier, Bulletin des Séances de l'Institut Royal Colonial Belge, Vol. 6, 1935, 1, p. 60 and passim.

Yaelima

226 [87] After the drive through the dammed-off area, there are usually several fish remaining that succeeded in slipping through the chain. The women then take baskets and bail the pool dry, throwing the water over the dam.

Very often the women dam up part of a marsh or stream and bail out the water with baskets without setting traps or waiting for the water level to go down.

In all three cases we find: 1) setting the trap in front of the drain channel; 2) the drive in the dammed-up area; and 3) bailing out this section. The catch is divided equally among the women who participated in the work. [88]

These three methods of fishing prevail among all the riparian peoples of the Congo, Kasai, Fimi, Lake Leopold II, and the lower Lukenie.

On the upper Lukenie, starting with the Oshwe sector, no traps are made. At most the women occasionally dam up a section of the rivers and streams of the interior and bail them out with baskets to catch the fish.

226 The Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and Yaelima do not fish at all.
●184 They are people of the forest and not of the water. Hunting is their chief occupation, and fishing is unknown to them.

In this connection, these tribes are wholly distinct from their neighbors to the west. It must be noted, however, that even among the latter all the clans do not engage in fishing. The groups of the interior do not fish any more than their brothers of the sector of Oshwe and Bumbuli. The traps and other contrivances which we shall discuss below are unknown to both groups. In this respect, all these peoples have a common characteristic, recalling their common origin. In the lower Lukenie and farther west, however, part of the population, the Bandzali, "people of the water," have adapted themselves to the new conditions of their environment. The river became for them a source of wealth and well-being, and a part of their social activity was oriented toward the exploitation of this precious resource.

226 At the present time fishing and the preparation of salt are 258 practically the only means of subsistence and unquestionably the principal occupations of all the riparian groups in the region of Leopoldville, Kwamouth, Lake Leopold II, and the lower Lukenie.

304 184 The tattoos of Ipanga and Batitu women differ considerably from those of the men, except for the facial designs. The lines of small dots that we observed and described for the women among the western peoples are quite widespread throughout the region. On certain women these scars are not only found on the abdomen and upper thighs, but they decorate the whole body and sometimes even the arms.

In the region of the Oshwe sector, especially near the eastern limits of the territory occupied by the Batitu, we encountered, moreover, several women whose tattoos were notably different from those of their sisters to the west. The palm-leaf designs on the temples are replaced by a series of concentric circles around a small dot in strong relief. This dot is placed half-way between the eye and the ear. These women were probably not natives of the region. In our opinion, they had come in through trade or even through abduction. They probably belonged to the Bokala or Yaelima tribe, although we were unable to get confirmation of this from the natives. Among these [195] latter tribes, tattooing is very much in fashion. The women in particular seem to be very fond of this type of ornamentation.

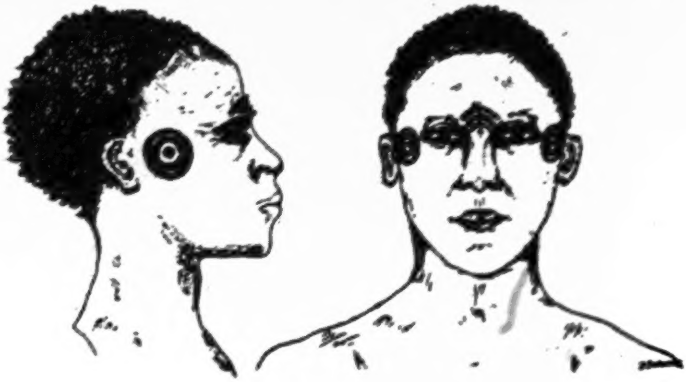

Fig. 119. Tattoos of the Lake Leopold II Tribes.

304 The designs are so many and varied that we could not attempt to provide a detailed description of them. We believe that we may divide them, on the whole, into three main classes or categories.

1) The racial or tribal tattoo.

101 classifies the Bakela (or Boyéla), who are unquestionably pure Móngo, among the Wakutshu [Wakusu] or Batetela is highly significant.

161 It is impossible to give an exact figure for the size of the population we have just defined. In any case one can estimate that it is more than a million.

● 184 Throughout the huge territory occupied by this people, only insignificant differences in institutions or language can be observed. Greater divergences appear in the material manifestations of culture.

101 563 In my opinion it is likely that certain groups which belong among the Nkundo-Móngo as far as culture and speech are concerned, may be distinguished from them in genealogy and history. Among these are the true Elína or riverain people (the Bolóki, the Eleku, the Elíngá of the upper Lomela and the upper Tshuapa), (2) the Ngombe tribes of the Lomela, the Mbólé, the Bakutu of the Lomela-Tshuapa (with whom one should probably include the Ntómbá and the Nkóle), (3) and perhaps also the Mpámá and the Losakanyi. (4). This likelihood

---

2. We exclude a few Libinja and Basokó clans living near Coquilhatville, since they are clearly of alien origin. The native name for the Tshuapa [River] is Jwafa or Jafa and, higher up, Lwafa. Among the Bongandó and the Bahamba it is called the Laha.

3. See my article in Congo, 1931, Vol.1, pp. 21 ff.

4. The latter are erroneously called Losakanja by Father Schebesta in Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, p. 199. They seem to have lived formerly on the lower Momboyo River (Luilaka); the land on which Flandria Mission has been established still bears their name.

562 clothing and dressed her in valuable furs, especially in part of the 556 pelt of a striped antelope called mpangɛ́. In some villages she was permitted to wear leopardskin in front as well as in back.

Then the father would decree (-bɛ́kya) that since his daughter [582] had become bolímbó she would always wear furs and would stop working, and that she would be given in marriage only to a very rich and influential man, not to the first comer. Therefore, a synonym for bolímbó is bɔ̃na óâ boɛ́ko, "child of the decree, a child set apart, forbidden."

This ceremony may be held regardless of the child's age, at any time between three years and adolescence.

When the ceremony is ended the girl withdraws (-ulama, transitive -uja) into a hut specially prepared for this occasion, which is called ileke. Her seclusion lasts only a few months. When certain natural needs oblige her to leave the house, she goes out the back way through the banana grove and hides as much of herself as possible under a mat. She does not walk on the bare ground; her feet must not [285] touch the earth. That is why mats are spread everywhere she steps. She does no work; her food is prepared by her mother, sister, aunt, etc., or by a slave. When it comes to her toilette, she washes her hands not in water, but in palm oil. [32] All these practices are marks of respect and honor.

When the period of seclusion is ended, the girl's father gives a second feast, with dances, drinks, etc., and the bolímbó comes out walking on mats. But there is no further ceremony. From then on the girl is no different from other girls. But she retains the sign of her distinction, the wearing of furs, and she does no housework.

The marriage of a bolímbó always occurred very late, since a [582] man who wanted to take her for his wife had to collect a good deal of [558] wealth before he could take the risk of asking for her hand. Should his attempt prove fruitless, he was exposed to ridicule in the whole region.

184 Among the tribes living on the left bank of the Luilaka any 556 man who was rich and of good family could ask for the hand of a 562 bolímbó in marriage. Among the Injóló, on the other hand, the re-582 quirements were more complicated. The suitor had to belong to another tribe or group. For instance, a girl who belonged to the 184 Engónjó group would be given only to a man from the West, the 556 Ngombe, or a neighboring tribe, but never to an Engónjó. All the 562 Engónjó considered the boldmbd their sister. Thus when the future hus-582 band went to the family of the boldmbd to ask for her hand, every village barred his way by means of a fence. All the bride price valuables which he carried with him were taken from him, and an equivalent amount in various kinds of goods, such as hens, ducks, dogs, mats, etc., was substituted for it. That is, he exchanged bride price valuables for nkomi valuables [dowry]. (1) The suitor could pass only when the village that barred his way had nothing left with which to continue the exchange. If he found his riches exhausted, he had to go back home to replenish the supply. Everything he gave in this [sic] fashion was counted as bride price, bengé (1) and everything he re-

1. See Chapter II, Article VII.

1. See Chapter II, Article VIII.

ceived was part of the nkomi [dowry]. (2)

2. See Chapter II, Article VII.

556 It is understandable that under these conditions asking to 562 marry a bolómbd was a luxury that the common man could not afford.
582 The suitor had to belong to a rich and influential family all of whose members would assist him.

When the suitor finally succeeded in clearing a passage to the father of the chosen one with sufficient treasures, the latter put no further obstacles in his way. As for the girl, she felt exceedingly honored and delighted that a man loved her so much that he would go to so much trouble and spend such a vast amount out of affection for her.

As for the rest of the proceedings, the bride price payment was made in the same way as for any other marriage. But when the

1. Clothing. Nudity.

291
855 Until he has reached the age of discretion and even a little later, the Nkundó child wears nothing more around his loins than a belt of beads or a plain string usually adorned with some amulet. Nobody is shocked by this rudimentary attire. Parents take great interest in the adornment of their children; from a very early age [301] they are seen wearing belts of trading beads, bracelets, rings around the ankles made of iron, copper, or brass, and in addition, at the present time, glass beads above the knees.

291 As the child grows older the clothing increases. From the outset there are differences on the basis of sex.

The boy acquires a thin strip of cloth which is attached to his string or belt simply by folding back the two ends. The cloth falls between his legs without being tight, allowing for great freedom of movement and the circulation of air; this is an excellent precaution against perspiration due to extreme heat, but it is not very effective protection against indiscreet looks, at least in certain positions. The fabric made of raffia may be decorated to a greater or a lesser extent. In former times there existed different kinds, which we need not describe here. The length of the hanging borders is dictated by vanity. The string was often replaced by a raffia belt or -- among prominent men -- by a leather thong.

The woman's garment consists of a broad raffia belt whose two ends are gradually narrowed, ending in cords which are tied on the [53] stomach. In the center of this belt (nkɛ́sɛ́ (1) a ball of raffia fibers is attached (bonkoko). A piece of cloth (efufa or lofufa) whose width may vary from 3 centimeters to 20 centimeters or more, depending on the age and the wearer's intensity of the feeling of modesty, is attached to the cords and falls more or less low on the body. For a [292] feast or display the efufa is replaced with a more valuable and longer [illegible] piece of cloth (lotɔ́lɔ́ or, among the Elingɛ of Losanganya, ifika).

---

1. Or bokangɛ, bokangɛ wǎ nkɛ́sɛ́.
Among the Bombwanja it is called likóngɛ̂.

29/ 184 The nkásá is unknown beyond the Jwalé and the Lulaka. In that region the women tie a string (or a belt of beads) around themselves and attach a second piece of cloth to it.

291 Thus the male garment is a rudimentary sort of shorts, open on the sides, while female dress is much more open. In general the efufa is an appropriate protection of one's modesty, but it is inadequate in certain positions. (2)

[611] [196] 2. It may be interesting to note that etóo mamónyé, or just plain etóo, which is the term for a man's garment, also indicates the male line of descent, while the female line is often designated by the term nkásá (sometimes by the word jwómoto derived from bómoto, "women"). Let us add that lonkundó jwâ nkásá means "pure, flawless Lonkundo, not corrupted by foreign influences." This expression should be compared with the following phrases: langue maternel, moedertaal, "mother tongue," etc.

291 [17] At present the nkásá is no longer worn except by a few elderly inhabitants of villages far from the main communication lines. Everywhere else the ancient mode of dress has been replaced by materials imported from Europe. The women wear at least a sangatómbo, a kind of short skirt which falls from their loins at least to the middle of their thighs if not further. Middle-aged men in the interior have simply changed the material of their garment but not its form. The younger ones, on the contrary, have frankly adopted the European mode of dress.

291 581 [126] [131] A married woman is not allowed to enter the village of her relatives by marriage (bakiló) or appear before them [54] without supplementing her usual attire with one or more belelele (banana leaves cut into fringes). The term bakiló must be understood as it is meant by the Nkundó; it excludes those with whom the wife may sometimes perform the sexual act and who are called "husbands" broadly speaking.

599ˣ
834 arises but rarely. Furthermore, if a daughter is required to perform similar duties for her father, she will undertake this obligation only [539] with the lament: njôy'ɔ́ɛna ěkɔ́ 'm wímɛ́kɛ, "I have come to see where I had my origin." Any woman who has been in that position will later know no oath more sacred than this one: la botakɛ wǐ fafɛ bǒkɔ́ 'm wɛ̌nákɛ la mpaka, "by my father's nakedness which I saw when he was old."

834
291 Thus we can draw the conclusion that the Nkundó are offended by nakedness and as a rule do not tolerate it. The exceptions do not invalidate this generalization; on the contrary, they tend to support it.

2. Speech. Obscenities and propriety.

521
831 In general the Nkundó see nothing wrong with using obscene expressions. They only describe them as "bad" if they become indecent.

195 If a conversation touches on matters of sex, they may wonder whether a particular topic is necessary, interesting, or entertaining; they will not ask themselves whether it is moral. For it will be apparent throughout this study they have no concept of morality strictly speaking.

The Nkundó possesses a varied and extensive list of obscene words -- nor is he alone in this respect. [58] We are not compiling a dictionary, and therefore we will not list them. What interests us are the circumstances that make these words indecent and under which a proper use of them impossible. The circumstances provide us with a criterion of the degree of obscenity of a word or expression. Let us say at once that we include in this category not only terms applied to organs and phenomena which are of a sexual nature strictly speaking, but also words pertaining to certain anatomical parts or physiological functions such as, for example, excretion, hair and tattooing found on private parts, and the female garment called efufa. We [184] should also point out that some tribes will consider expressions obscene which do not shock others at all.

835 754 encounter it only in connection with magical practices and sorcery (botɛ́, plural betɛ́), for which it is the nsimbo, that is, the condition without which the betɛ́ would lack efficacy. If the nsimbo is not observed, the botɛ́ turns against its owner and, by a reversal of its effect (bosesengano), brings death to the latter. Therefore the interested parties submit to these degrading requirements despite their natural repugnance. Depending on the case, incest with the mother, the daughter, or the sister is required. The first of these eventualities is the most repugnant to our natives. Though it goes altogether against the grain to do so, the mother submits to this ignominy to save the life of her foolhardy and greedy son.

● [184] The nsimbo of incest does not exist in all botɛ́. It even seems to have been absent from the betɛ́ which are ancient and purely Nkundó. It is found primarily in the big modern betɛ́, which have been imported from other peoples or invented on the spot since colonization. (1)

---

1. See Kaptein, in Congo, 1922, Vol. 1, p. 534.

Article VIII. Love Philters

832 The Nkundó are familiar with two love philters, the efóndé and the bontálá. Other modern betɛ́ may produce the same effect in part or secondarily. Here [101] we will only deal with the first two, which are "pure" and ancient love philters.

The love philters (botɛ́ w'ělangyɛ́) serve to gain the heart of a young girl as much as to entice a married woman away from her husband.

1. Efóndé

Efónde (1) is a common charm. Anyone can procure it from the maker in consideration of the appropriate payment, of course. Various kinds of efóndé exist, differing as to the ingredients used, the manner

---

1. Efónde is often used as a synonym of elangyɛ́ in its sexual meaning.

584 power to settle disputes. They claim their share of the remuneration from the ndonga. According to the saying -- in archaic language -- bonɛ wǎ ndonga nd'â dombɛ, "the power (literally, "the medicine") of the ndonga resides in the judges." Not that the judges themselves have the right or the power to intervene in matrimonial palavers. But they are that many additional witnesses. If the day comes when there is a dispute on the subject of the bride price, especially at the time of a divorce, the ndonga can call on them to help him refresh his memory and thus avoid difficulties. For it can easily happen that after several years the official witness has only a vague and approximate recollection of what was paid. If the judges do not receive anything at the time of payment, they will refuse to give their assistance at the critical moment. It is therefore an intelligent policy to acquiesce to their desires even though strictly speaking they can invoke no real prerogatives.

178
584
622 At the present time the colonial government, having established districts and named chiefs, the latter have had attributed to them the right to officially act as ndonga in matrimonial matters, or at least they have taken advantage of the powers given them and done so. In general [111] they summon the judges of the district at the same time, and the matter is entered after a fashion in the register of settlements. The chief's presence as a witness may have some value, since he can provide additional testimony and writes down the amount of the bride price. But his presence, on the other hand, has the disadvantage of involving him in matters which all in all are none of his business. We are not speaking here of cases in which he or some relatives of his are interested parties in the palaver. If he would be content to be a passive witness and enter the transactions that take place, the situation would be perfect.

192
194 It is probable that etymologically the word ndonga is derived from the verb root long, intransitive longam, "to be in order, arranged," transitive longy, "to arrange, make as it should be." In addition to the word ndonga, which is used west of the Luilaka, we find the word bokɔ́lo used among the Boɔ́ngɛ and the Boɔ́yɛ (as well as the Elɔ́ngɛ), and ntɔmbi among the Injɔ́lɔ. The latter term could be the same word as its homonym which means "spy" and is derived from the verb

192 tomba, "to spy"; the former may be an extension of the meaning of
● 184 the word bokɛ́lo, "promise." (1)

[572] 1. Note in passing that a ndonga is also necessary for the boseka, or contract of friendship and mutual assistance. (See Chapter I, Part 1, Article III.)

Article III. The Engagement

584 585 1. The payment of the ilulɛ

The engagement begins with the first bride-price payment, which in former times was an arrow and for that reason is called likulɛ [556] or ilulɛ. If the suitor was very rich, he sometimes gave an ingɔndɛ knife or even an empɔ́ng. A poorer one would merely give the shaft of an arrow. Nowadays 1 or 2 copper rings are given. But the original name of this payment has been retained.

Arriving at the home of the father of his intended, [112] the suitor, his father (or a substitute for him), the ndonga(s) and often other relatives as well, sit down on one side of the loɔ́njɛ (the court in front of a dwelling), after an exchange of the usual courtesies. The girl and the representatives of her family sit down on the opposite side. As in all matters that a Nkundó has to settle, the host begins by inquiring into the reason for the visit. The young man's father answers: "We have come to ask for your daughter for our son." "How do you ask for her?" "We ask for her in marriage." These preliminary negotiations are called simply ɛ́wana nsango, "to ask each other for news."

Then the girl's father asks: "Who will bring the linkɔ (banana) or the bonyɛ́ku (partially ripe banana), that is, the gifts?" Through this figurative expression he asks who has been proposed as ndonga. The young man's father replies: so-and-so, and so-and-so. When they have been accepted, the fiancée's father has bananas, smoked fish, and sometimes hens brought in, and the witness passes them over to the future husband's group.

4. The amount of the walo

583* Formerly the amount of the walo averaged 20 to 30 bakonga, or their equivalent. The value of any object included in the bride [416] price could be calculated in copper, so that the konga was, so to speak, the monetary unit of the Nkundó.

At the present time in the districts near Flandria, the minimum is from 55 to 60 rings. Among the Boángɛ and the Injɔlɔ́ the rings [434] are noticeably bigger and their weight in copper or brass is greater; there the minimum can be 30 rings. Elsewhere the figure is a good deal higher.

The price of the walo generally exceeds the minimum, which is found rather rarely. The average is about 60 to 80 rings. The number of 200 is reached only in extremely rare cases and it is exceeded even less frequently (see cases given below).

Differences in the amount of the walo are due primarily to the relative wealth of the contracting parties, the husband's valuation of his wife, the greed of the latter's parents, and the size of the bride price demanded for the woman they want to obtain with their daughter's (sister's) bride price. The cases of women who have left their previous husbands also must not be forgotten, for the new bride price must serve to reimburse him.

The amount of the walo may also be increased to satisfy the [556] vanity of the woman, who wants to appear superior to her companions, or of the husband, who wants to be recognized as very wealthy. (1)

1. The man who pays a great deal for his wife is given the honorific epithet etókobwo, "wells and mushrooms." All can find as much water as they want at wells, and there the mushrooms multiply. Thus many can benefit from the riches brought by the son-in-law.

[578] It is not unusual to hear of a woman boasting in the course of a dispute: "I am not a slave; my husband paid so-and-so much for me. [130] But you -- your husband doesn't love you, or else he is poor, for he paid only so much."

585 431 to leave her husband and he, in revenge, were to lay hands on her mother or on one of the other wives of the clan. (1) [148]

1. See Chapter VI, Article VII, 4, (1), and Chapter VIII, Article II, 1.

7) Lombɛ: a wide shoulder strap made of fur or braided
[824] bokombe reeds (Calamus sp.), though valuables of equal worth (one knife or a konga) may be given. Nowadays this boɛ́ngo consists of 2 or 3 rings; it goes to the mother in compensation for the wearying burden of carrying and nursing her daughter. (1)

1. Note that when a mother-in-law brings a child into the world, her son-in-law sends her a shoulder strap of liengɛ́ otterskin or a konga of equivalent value. He does not repeat this gift at each birth, however.

[854] 8) Betɔ́towɛ byɔ̂ nkwɛ: leaves of the bonkongɛ́ bush used to remove, wipe off, and carry away (tɔ́ta) a child's excrement. This boɛ́ngo consists of a ring and goes to the mother as compensation for her performance of these tasks. In the absence of the mother, it is claimed by another of the father's wives or by a female relative of the mother.

[224] 9) The bojɛ́ngɛ, "hunting net," is demanded in many villages for no special reason. Certain clans, however, scoffed at by others because they have few members, officially ask a man belonging to one of the latter and wishing to marry one of their daughters to bring a net, saying: "You make fun of us because we have no people; bring us a hunting net to surround and enclose us, since we are not many." Thus the village of Boyela of the Bakɛala, never gives one of its members in marriage without this boɛ́ngo.

● [illegible] 10) Wɛ̌ngɛ w'ɛ́kɛ́: a boɛ́ngo which is not known everywhere but which is customary in certain groups, for example among the Bakɛala. One of the woman's relatives takes a piece of a young thorny trunk of the wɛ̌ngɛ tree. Having scraped one end of it, he holds this 583x payment of the bride price with the bosóngo as he was committed to do through the payment of the ikulɛ and the ndanga. If he does not, the bond between him and his father-in-law is automatically broken, and consequently he is unable to obtain another wife to replace the deceased, and he loses the rights over one of his own daughters. Actually, we will have to come back to this question in Chapter IX, Article IX, 2.

These rules show how great a difference exists between the walo and the bosóngo: in the one case, upon the death of the woman prior to the payment, an indemnity is imposed for a transgression in the eyes of the law; in the other, there is a transaction to stabilize the financial rights of the clans involved.

From all the above considerations we may conclude that because of the special nature of the payment, the bosóngo is very important for the stability of the marriage and the social position of the woman's clan. But from a legal point of view it is far less important than the walo, through which a woman becomes truly [164] a wife; for the payment creates no new social relationship either between the spouses or between the husband and his in-laws.

Article X. Purpose of the Bride Price

583x
607 Theoretically, the bride price is meant to procure a wife for one of the members of the family that has received it.

The woman who is married thanks to the bride price paid for another is called the latter's nkita. It seems to me that this word is etymologically related to nkitó, "profit, benefit" (the verb is -kitola). In the final analysis, both words may be derived from the root -kit, "to become."

[184] A synonym of nkita is bongíli (bongíji); it is used primarily by the Injóló but it is also known, though seldom employed, by the other tribes.

[595] The woman whose bride price has served to procure the nkita is the latter's nkóló (literally, "mistress"). The Injóló as well as the Bofongɛ also call her by the more tactful name, nyangóngíji, "mother

426
585'
675 Similarly, Mpumo received Lifomɛ, daughter of Ikɔ́lɛ as a boɔ́ndo. Her brother, Ndyɔntíkala, ancestor of the Mbɛ́ngɛ (Liɔ́ko, Ekonda), offered her to Mpumo in asking for peace. Mpumo married her in the regular manner. In his fight against the Ekonda this same Mpumo in the same manner obtained Boɔ́ngɔ́, the sister of Bangɔ́ndɔ́ of Mpɔ́njwɛ (Wɛ̃yɛ).

Since the victor in war usually wanted to marry the woman in the proper fashion by paying a bride price, the handing over of a relative as boɔ́ndo may be compared to the practice common in Europe in the Middle Ages, when a prince would marry his daughter or sister off to a competitor or an adversary to seal the peace between them. In both cases, therefore, a kind of political marriage is involved.

Article VI. Exchange.

583x
●181 When they speak of the exchange of women (yenjɛ, from the verb enja, "to exchange" in general), the tribes under discussion do not all refer to the same thing. According to the situation, several types of exchange may be distinguished.

1) The pure Nkundó have a practice of exchanging daughters, sisters, relatives. This exchange is always carried out through the payment of bride price and the agency of a ndonga. Thus two regular marriages by nkumbó are involved, and the term "exchange" is only very inappropriately applied to them. The two men who give each other their sisters in marriage are each contracting an ordinary marriage according to the usual norms.

2) Sometimes the term "exchange" is applied to the practice of ikɛkelo, which is better explained through an example than by a long discussion. Suppose that Eale marries the woman Åmbɛ. Lokio, Eale's sister, [215] is married to Isia. Åmbɛ leaves her husband for one of Isia's relatives. At the first opportunity Eale detains his sister Lokio at his home, thus taking her from her husband, and since his wife Åmbɛ does not return to him, he hands his sister Lokio over to another man in marriage. Or suppose that Eale has married one of Isia's relatives, and Isia has married a relative of Eale. If one of the wives leaves her

575 /176 husband, he takes his own relative back and gives her away in marriage elsewhere, using his right of ikɛtɛlo. (1)

> 1. This noun is derived from the verb kɛtɛla, "to guarantee," meaning in this case "to guarantee possession of one's bride-price valuables, one's capital."

As these descriptions show, the custom involves an exchange which is forced rather than voluntary and spontaneous. Nevertheless, it is sometimes called an exchange because it does not involve a divorce strictly speaking; there is no restitution of bride price by either party.

The two situations above therefore correspond only very inaccurately to the idea of an exchange of women. In the first instance, one cannot even speak of an exchange of wives.

3) Among the Bombwanja there is a practice which comes closer to the idea. The following is a historical example: Ikɛtɛ loves Eanga, a widow of Ekofo's father. Ekofo in turn loves Ilonga, widow of Ikɛtɛ's father. They exchange these two women, who are their wives by right of inheritance. It may even happen that Ikɛtɛ, who is very fond of Eanga, gives Ekofo a woman from his own harem who loves this man. These exchanges are made without the payment of a bride price, but through the agency of the ndonga who previously participated at the first nkumbɔ.

This is a real exchange of women. As we have seen, it may be made in two ways -- an exchange of widows or the exchange of a widow for a real wife. From the standpoint of law and justice the two situations are identical; the women exchanged belong to the men exchanging them, who are legally [216] their husbands. But only in the second instance is there an exchange of a woman who is a wife not only legally but actually, with all the rights and duties of a wife. But such a wife is given only by one of the parties. This is still not the exchange of wife for wife strictly and properly speaking.

The distinction we have made between a wife by law and a wife by fact is of some importance. Actual conjugal life introduces 585x 184 a new element from the legal standpoint. This is clearly apparent in the repugnance with which these same Bombwanja who practice the form of exchange just described regard an exchange pure and simple, which will be described below.

The exchange of widows is also practiced by the Elíngɛ. Like the Bombwanja, they also have the two forms of quasi-exchange described at the beginning of this article.

4) On the other hand, a true exchange of wives exists among the riverain peoples known as the Bodyɛ and the Longa (1): in their dialect it is called iengyɛ. Two men exchange wives. If the bride price of one is greater than that of the other, the difference is refunded. Such an exchange is carried out with the consent of the women involved.

583x 194 152 [837] Let us see how such an exchange usually comes about. Imagine two men, Bokulɔ and Mpolɛ, with their respective wives, Mbindo and Bafaɛ. Suppose that Bokulɔ falls in love with Bafaɛ, the wife of Mpolɛ, and the pair become involved in an adulterous relationship. There is a cooling of Bafaɛ's love for her husband Mpolɛ; she performs fewer and fewer services for him, etc. The same thing happens to Bokulɔ's relationship with his wife Mbindo. The latter is jealous; her patience is soon at an end. She discusses the matter with Mpolɛ, her rival's husband. "See how your wife deceives you; she no longer loves you. My husband is forsaking me [217] for her; he no longer loves me. This is a challenge to you as well as to me. If you are a man (1), pick up the challenge."

1. They live near the mouth of the Salonga (in the villages of Bonsela, Pompatɔ, Nkɔɔe, Bombomba, Isakɛ, etc.)

1. "Man" in the sense of vir (jwende): the meaning is: "If you have any courage, show that you are not a coward."

583x According to the native view, a man must take this woman
●164 home for the sake of his honor. If he did not do so, he would be-
152 come the butt of malicious comments and scorn on the part of all, both men and women. He would be considered a coward, just as in European "cultured" society a man is considered a coward if he does not pick up the glove thrown down by his adversary.

The rejected woman's hatred for her husband is transformed into a love for the man who has been similarly hurt by her rival. The joint misfortune of the pair creates a mutual feeling of affection. The woman is accepted as wife and is thus saved from dishonor. The man, on his part, feels affection for the woman who offers him her heart and preserves his good name. Harmony is at last established among all four of them, the two men arrange the matter of bride price in the way we have described, and then they live in peace without any enmity toward one another.

589x This way of handling the situation is very strange to us, be-
581 cause it is indefensible from the point of view of a sound philosophy
184 and of Catholic morality. But it seems normal to the natives. The pagan conscience has no trouble coming to terms with it, since no pagan law explicitly prohibits such behavior. Everyone comes to an agreement in the end, and that is all their conscience requires. Everything considered, there is no infraction of the rights of any individual, and since the native mentality is not concerned with morality as we conceive of it, this solution seems altogether natural to them.

Nevertheless, the ethnic groups who do not practice this true exchange in no way approve of it. Not that they fail to understand the psychology underlying this practice; on the contrary, if the situation arises they accept it. But they condemn [218] the legal procedure. They require that the two marriages be broken in the regular fashion and that two new marriages be contracted. That is, they demand the restitution and payment of the bride prices through the _ndonga_ and through the respective parents of the women. For them therefore an exchange is not a true marriage, but a sort of sale and purchase. Also, from their point of view, the women who have been exchanged are slaves and not wives, because they live with their

583x men although their first marriage has not been broken and no new 581 marriage agreement has been concluded.

●184 [114] The data given above provides no confirmation in the Nkundó tribes under study of the statement made by Engels "Les Wangata [The Wangata]," Revue congolaise, 1910, p. 35) that among the Wangata "her husband can exchange her . . . she can make no protest." (1)

1. The Ekonda apply the term lienjá only to an exchange of daughters or sisters. They have a specific term: mpéngó. Note, by the way, that certain Mbólé tribes who practice a true wife exchange designate it by the same name: impéngó.

Article VII. Purchase

432
562 The purchase of women is not practiced by the Nkundó tribes under discussion here nor even by the Bombwanja. The practice is to 588 be found only among the Elingá. What is involved is not a marriage by means of a bride price but a real purchase; that is, a man buys a woman from her husband for a certain sum. He does not go through the woman's parents, as in an ordinary marriage by bride-price payment, but addresses himself directly to the husband.

[121] In general it is the woman who makes the proposal that a man buy her in this manner. Sometimes a man wants to take a woman and first comes to an agreement with her. Before the Europeans arrived such a situation generally led to a war between clans or villages. After an armistice the palaver was settled, and the [219] purchaser paid the husband. [177] Nowadays, since the Nkundó no longer dare to fight because of the legal sanctions that inevitably follow, when a woman abandons her husband for another man who wants to buy her, the parties involved bring the palaver before the judges. As the woman wants only her new husband, and as, on the other hand, war and the punishment of women have been abolished, the first husband has no

432 583x carried out by the ordinary means of the payment and restitution of a bride price.

At the present time cases of purchase are becoming increasingly 432 rare. This change is probably due to a wider distribution of wealth 589x which has produced a second change, namely that the man makes the 626 initial proposal rather than the woman, who did so according to the ancient custom.

The woman's invitation is public. The man must reply for the sake of his honor. As in the case of an exchange among the Boóyá, he can only escape mockery by following through. If he did not, he would be considered a coward. He would be treated as a pariah; his wife (wives) would leave him, and he would no longer be included in the company of his fellows or at their meals.

Although strictly speaking the matter is outside the limits of this study, it seems to me that it is not irrelevant to mention, for the sake of comparison, that wife purchase is also practiced among the Ntómbá (Waňgatá, Ikengo) and the Boléngé (or Bofíji) between the Congo and the Boloko. They call it by the same name -- isómba, "purchase," and the man who buys in bosómbi, "purchaser." The woman always invites the man by sending him a piece of the ribs of a banana leaf, called a bonengé. She does this publicly; she hands the bonengé to a relative or friend and says to him out loud and in front of everyone, "Take this bonengé to so-and-so for me, so that he will come and buy me."

The same custom still exists in certain Ekonda settlements
● [184] under the jurisdiction of the Bikoro station, such as the Lonyanyanga, Bosango, Balíngo, Babonja, etc., but not in the others, which are within the territory of the Kiri (Buli) station. It is called ehómbaka or esómbaka (the root and [222] the meaning are the same as those of lisómbí and isómba). Since these peoples are neighbors of the above-mentioned Ntómbá and of other Ntómbá living near the lake which bears their name (in a distorted form) and since, on the other hand, the rest of the Ekonda do not know this custom, we may assume that it was introduced to them by their neighbors to the north and to the west.

M 614 582 untangle all the threads. Thus it happens that young people form relationships with the intention of marrying without knowing that they are related; they are warned only by the opposition and ensuing explanations of the elders.

We may conclude that marriage among descendants of a common ancestor is generally prohibited if they live in the same village. It is frequently permitted on the other hand, if they belong to different villages, provided that they are not, at the same time, related to one of the ancestresses.

M 582 835 Clearly, it is difficult to say what precise degree of kinship formed the basis for the prohibition of or permission for a marriage between descendants of a common ancestor, or what are the boundaries of an exogamous grouping.

It is also apparent from the preceding observations -- as M [611] from the examination of affinity as an obstacle to marriage -- that the descent from a common mother is a more important factor than descent from the father. This does not give proof of a form of matriarchy, though it could be the remains or the beginning of one, or could provide a partial explanation for one. It stems quite simply M [842] from the Nkundó notions concerning procreation, in which they attribute the major role to the mother. There is also the fact that M [602] greater shame is attached to being united with a person descended from the same woman, and finally the fact that they feel a stronger M [593] affection for the mother than for the father (a sentiment [250] which is accentuated by polygamy). The three causes are closely related.

Finally, it should be noted that there is a group among the ● M 184 582 Nkundó we are discussing which is less strict than the others in this matter. The relatives among whom marriage is prohibited is definitely more limited; that is, their exogamous groupings are more limited. The people in question are the Bongale (see Introduction), and the same phenomenon may be observed among the Elíngá. (1)

P [582]

1. The Batswá are still more liberal, and in this respect their practices differ very little from ancient European laws and customs.

582
604
Example 8 (continued)

or Boáté (M)
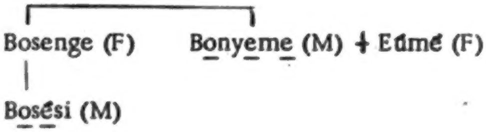
Bolefó
Wanga
Lofeka

Example 9



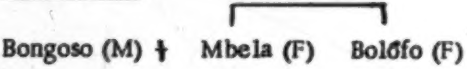
Bosenge (F)
Bonyeme (M)
Eúmé (F)
Bosési (M)

Bosési may marry Eúmé.

The same rules apply equally to great-uncles and great-aunts, and to cousins who are not equals (related as "father" and "son"; see the table of kinship relations and terminology in the appendix).

582
607
C. Equals in the collateral line: The degree of relationship is of no importance, for example, marriage with an older sister (or cousin) of the spouse is forbidden; marriage with a younger sister is permitted. The same rule applies to women, but after the husband's death an exception is sometimes made in the elder brother's favor in order to facilitate inheritance arrangements. Only the Boángé -- like ●[184] the Elángá of Losanganya -- make no distinction between elder and younger siblings and always permit the marriage. They are even beginning to be imitated by the Injóló.

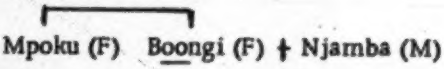
Example 10



Bongoso (M)
Mbela (F)
Bolófo (F)

Bongoso may marry Bolófo.

Example 11



Mpoku (F)
Boongi (F)
Njamba (M)

Njamba may not marry Mpoku.

602 brings forth reprimands on the part of the husband and his parents which obviously can easily degenerate into quarrels. If the omissions are so frequent and of such a nature that they can no longer be explained as simply forgetting, a whim, or a fit of peevishness, but [299] are taken to indicate spitefulness or vulgarity, the matter is [627] brought before the ndonga (who is often assisted by the family tribunal) or brought before the authority constituted by the woman's kin. If in spite of everything the expected improvement does not take place, the break-up is inevitable.

The husband's father and mother extend the same affection to 606 their son's wife as they feel toward him. They consider her their own child, and it is not unusual to find that their love for the wife equals their feeling for their own son. She is only a relative by marriage, but out of affection for her they call her their child. She, for [601] her part, does not use toward them the term bakanga (or bakiló) but out of filial respect calls them "father" and "mother." Exceptions to this practice may be found, however.

606 If the father (and those who fall in the same category such as 224 uncles, elder brothers, etc.) kills a large game animal, he is expected to give his son's (or brother's, etc.) wife a piece of meat, whose size depends on the number of daughters-in-law he has and which consists of one or several chops (bokálako) (1) and the piece at the nape of the neck (botómbyá).

606 Illicit relations between the husband's father and h[illegible] daughter-835 in-law would be an unheard of crime. The same would be true with respect to any of the "superior" relatives. (2) The laws regulating

---

1. Called lièto among the Bolengé and the tribes of the Losanganya.

[178]
[184] 2. Only the Boangi -- like the Elángá of the Losanganya - allow relations between a brother and the wife of his junior; and they are already beginning to find imitators among their neighbors to the southeast, the Injóló.

604 An uncle (see D above) is not entirely free to cure his nephew's 837 (F) passion unless he is the nkólő of his sister (E), that is, unless the 578 mother (C) of his sister (E) is the nkita of his aunt (B), [307] who is the 579 sister of his father (A). Indeed in that case his sister may not complain, for she owes him respect and submission; her subordination to her brother and master is greater than the gratitude he owes her for any riches he may have obtained through her or on her account.

D. In the case of the relationship of a grandson (bonkána) to 603 his grandfather's wives, his freedom is, in practice, complete. Actu-
837 ally, among the Nkundó the affection of a grandfather (nkóko) for his own grandson often exceeds his love for his own son and completely degenerates into weakness. (1) The grandfather puts up with all his grandson's carryings-on, his whims, all his teasing, his insults, etc.

After illicit relations the grandson sometimes carries his insolence so far as to spontaneously send his grandfather a "mock" indemnity in the form of a basket filled with stones in the place of copper rings.

626 Although the grandfather treats his grandson with good humor,
603 public opinion does not favor the latter's conduct, though it is more
837 lenient than in the cases described above. The public reaction, as well as the sending of the "mock" fine, shows that in principle these relations are censurable and condemned. Because of present circum-
[178] stances, particularly marriage at an earlier age than in the past, the age difference between a grandson and his grandfather's wives has increased considerably in the constantly growing number of cases, and their relations have proportionately decreased. (2) [308]

---

1. As happens very often also in Europe.
See Chapter I, Part 1, Article I, 3.

[184] 2. We have seen above that other Nkundó tribes are even less strict in these matters. On the other hand, the Ekonda, a Nkundó group living on Lake Leopold II, have a > higher morality -- in our terms. Among them the question of relations between a woman and her husband's son, younger brother, etc., does not even arise. Have they been influenced by some neighboring tribe? Or must we attribute the inferior morality of some of the tribes in this respect to decadence.

603 837 626 184

837 602 The following conclusions emerge from this long description:

1) Relations between a man and the wife of his son, younger brother, etc., in short of anyone inferior to him in the family hierarchy, are always strictly prohibited and never occur.

2) They do occur on the other hand between an inferior and the wife of his senior and superior. The degree of kinship between the husband and the culprit plays a considerable role in determining the seriousness or triviality of an infraction, the sanctions applied, and the various consequences. Some relations are accepted, others are censured with varying degrees of leniency, still others are pitilessly criticized.

3) In these matters a distinction may be made between two aspects:

a) the husband's reaction and the repression of the illicit relations;

b) the judgment of public opinion;

or:

a) the financial aspect;

b) the moral aspect -- to use that term for want of a better one.

Sometimes a third element comes into play, namely the intervention of the family on the side of the culprit against the injured husband who, for one reason or another, is in the wrong himself.

602 837 684 a) The usual sanction for adultery is, for the man, an indemnity to pay. But such a payment cannot be made since no financial transaction -- strictly speaking at least -- may be made

684 movement and therefore serves as the Nkundó prison. But in addition, if it is applied for a long time, it becomes a real torture; the skin becomes painful and comes off, inflammations readily appear, and bugs sometimes lodge there.

As soon as the woman's family hears (through the ndonga) that she is being so tortured, they often come and beg her husband to [516] free her. To pacify and propitiate him, they offer him an ad hoc payment, that is, a bóndo of a few copper rings. Generally, he yields to their entreaties. A good relationship and his respect toward them require that he not remain indifferent to their supplications, especially as he needs them for the stability of the marriage and the good functioning of the household.

2) Byéngetanyi, or handcuffs, which consist of sticks attached either to the wrists or to the ankles (to prevent walking), or to both arms and feet. Two sticks were used, one above and one below, with the limb placed in between, and they were tied with ropes that were attached and fastened in notches made at [317] each end of the sticks. In rare instances the wrists were bound. To increase the pain and immobility, the ropes were shrunk and hardened by pouring water on them. These handcuffs were generally added to the etóka and were never applied alone.

3) Exposure to the bites of nkongótó ants. In the region under [194] discussion, I have never heard the people speak of exposure to bafumba (Dorylus), or even to the venomous benkónkóme. This fact contrasts with the practice of other Móngo tribes and with the content of certain legends (evolution?).

4) The pouring of water containing pepper into the vagina. Sometimes the genital organs were rubbed with crushed pepper.

5) Exposure of the sex organs to fire. A burning log was held near them.

The last two types of torture were the most dreadful.

We can add one last form of punishment which is derived from the same legal rules, although it is not a torture:

[634] 6) Nudity. The husband tears off the guilty woman's garments and thus exposes her to public shame. Even if she resorts to using leaves, no one mistakes the situation, and her shame is only partly reduced.

2: Hulstaert--331 M-5 (ca. 1930) 1938 FO32 Mongo FO32
Nkundo

595 554 The name bolémbé seems to come from the fact that for an instant during the installation ceremony the woman is naked. In fact in certain dialects the word means "nudity."

[591] Nowadays this name is common among Nkundó women (rarely men), but it does not indicate that they are bolémbé. The name is borne in memory of ancestresses or relatives who had that position and is transmitted in the family like any other name.

● [554] All the tribes under discussion here use the same term, bolémbé. The Bombomba alone say bofié. (2)

2. Elsewhere, as in the Losanganya region, among the Bosaka, etc., the bolémbé is called ekila (interdiction, taboo).

It is clear from everything that has been said that the nkóndé and the bolémbé have nothing in common with each other. [353] The two institutions are decidedly different. Nowadays they are beginning to be confused with each other, however. [171] For the installation of a bolémbé has become extremely rare, and in some regions it has already disappeared. The colonial government has established districts and appointed chiefs in charge of them. Very frequently, they are not those who in the purely indigenous order would have been the most influential men, the masters, those who would have the biggest say in their society, who would be said to have the loko, the first place.

As far as I have been able to observe, the other tribes on the equator also have the two types of wives with special positions, who bear names which vary with the dialects.

171 595 554 Do the Ntómbá and the Bolóngé between the Boloko and the Congo have only the bolémbé? That is the conclusion one draws from Engels' study of the Wangata (Revue congolaise, Vol. 2, no. 1, p. 33). If that were so, the frequent contacts with this people may have increased the confusion even more. Natives who are strangers to the Bolóngé tribe but who have lived many years among them as catechists, have maintained, however, that 595 [58] is the one who brings her to her husband and is, at the same time, ndonga for the payment of the bride price, which is made as for any woman. The expression is: X abúmela bakɛ́nɛ Y ebísa, "X repeats her sister Y ebísa."

In case of the elder's absence or upon her death, the ebísa replaces her or inherits all her rights in the household.

The elder relative cares a great deal about having her ebísa, because as a result she rises in her husband's estimation and she herself has an assistant in her work and a confidante in her troubles. The ebísa herself has the advantage of not being alone or abandoned at the beginning of her marriage, but of being able to count on a protector and guide, and if her elder occupies a privileged rank in the harem, she has the certainty of sharing her prerogatives and the likelihood of one day succeeding her. [358]

The term ebísa is used by the Nkundɔ between the Jwalɛ and the Boloko, and by the londa. The Bombwanja designate such a woman by the name loambwɛ or loambyɛ. The Bosíngɛ and the Injɔlɔ also call her loambyɛ. (1)

[illegible] 1. The Bonyanga say mbambwɛ or loambwɛ. Out of respect they sometimes call her bongíli and the woman who has brought her nyangongíli. (See also Chapter II, Article X, and Chapter VI, Article VI.) The Ekonda call her bombɛ́ha or bomɛ́ha (mbɛ́ha, "last").

[illegible] Ebísa may be related to the root bís, from which is derived the verb bísingana, "to be united." Loambwɛ or loambyɛ are derived from bamb, which means: 1) "to be united" and 2) "to follow" (in order, in rank).

These names indicate the nature of this marriage that does not arise from direct relations between husband and wife but is established through the medium of another,preceding marriage. Or to express the situation in Lonkundɔ: Ɛla lifála j'ɛ́ndɛ mɔ́ngɔ́, ɛ́tamana l'ɛdɔ mbambɔ́nɛ, "this is not a marriage which comes 842 855 152 differences can be found here, although they are less apparent to a European observer since we usually approach the natives as a group and our contact with them is often too impersonal.

2. Abortion

847 A great enemy of maternal love is the practice of abortion, which has always been known to the Nkundó. Here we cannot describe all the prescriptions used for that purpose; It will be sufficient to enumerate the reasons for which they have recourse to this practice. They are as follows:

1) A woman's lasciviousness; the procreation and subsequent care of a child to some extent prevent the indulging in carnal pleasures. Formerly this cause of abortion was nonexistent or very [178] rare. Needless to say, it has become more common, especially in the centers where it is constantly on the increase and where, in addition, occasional or regular "housekeepers" learn new means of sterilization and abortion.

2) A woman's antipathy or persistent anger toward her husband may encourage her to prevent conception or destroy its effect.

3) An excessive weakening of the mother's organism caused by a large number of conceptions and childbirths at too short intervals.

4) The encumberance and the difficulty of watching, carrying, and taking care of many small children -- bálota bokekesano [467] [535] wǎ bána ndátélá ndátélá. This reason is especially important for well-known dancers.

It goes without saying that several of these motives may be combined in the same person. For instance, I knew of a woman who aborted at the time of her eighth child. Her recurrent pregnancies, together with continuous work, had greatly reduced her strength. A palaver with her husband was the last straw; she decided to get rid of the fruit she carried in her body.

Outside of these exceptions the natives of this country ardently desire their own continuation through a large number of progeny. (1)

● [184]

1. The same is not true elsewhere. Examples to that effect are cited from regions that are

847
[84] already more "civilized," such as the neighborhood of Coquilhatville and the Losanganya region.

847
848 Attention should be drawn to the danger of an increase in abortions for a new reason, namely the shame of giving birth outside of wedlock. As we have seen in Chapter I, Part II, Article IV, 3, premarital pregnancies have existed since time immemorial without resulting either in remorse or in palavers. Through the teaching of Christian morality, the feeling of shame must sooner or later be extended to this phenomenon. In explaining the evil of fornication, care should therefore be taken to insist on the fact that transgressing the Fifth Commandment by abortion is a far greater evil.

847
845 Voluntary abortion is not considered a moral error by the Nkundó. (2) In their eyes an imperfectly formed fetus, not viable,

2. An attitude which also exists in Europe at the present time, according to Haenecour in Kultuurleven, Vol. 6, no. 1, p. 21 (1935), and the brochure by Prof. D. Schockaert quoted there.

847
[764]
[776] is not yet a man. It is only a human being in the process of formation, in potentia. Hence the custom of burying the aborted child in the [468] hut or quite near it. Thus the spirit responsible for the pregnancy will see that it is respected and repeat its benevolent action. (1)

1. Others explain this custom by saying that the fetus already has a soul which remains near the tiny body and will take the first opportunity to re-enter the mother's body.

But if it is voluntary an abortion is always a wrong against family and society, for it deprives the family of a member on whom 851 birth of a child involves a few prohibitions which affect the whole village and apply to the Batswá as well as the Baotó. They do not affect inhabitants of a portion of the village which is separated by a swamp from the group where the happy event has occurred. Those bound by the prohibitions may no longer go to "work" -- that is, to work in the fields, fetch food or firewood, build a hunting enclosure or a fishing weir, or work at the building or repair of a house. An infraction of this rule would result in the destruction of the fruit of all their labor: the fields would no longer produce, and no beast or fish would be caught. This deadly influence would [494] extend to all crops, etc. no matter whom they belong to. Nevertheless, there is nothing wrong in fetching firewood from the forest, harvesting manioc from a ripe field, or cutting the fruit of the palm.

Strictly speaking, these prohibitions touch only persons who have seen the newborn child. But since no one fails to go and admire it, all are subject to them. The prohibitions remain in effect until the umbilical cord is detached. [844] Some tribes, however, have the more convenient custom of limiting its duration to the day of the child's birth.

2. The hygiene of mother and child

[844] The umbilical cord (lokóki) is cut near the middle. An incision is made near the infant's navel. 846 Each day a concoction of herbs is poured on the part of the cord that is still attached and white sand is put on it to make it dry more rapidly. When the end falls off, a powder made of scorched banana is applied to the wound.

In order to prevent the weakening of a woman's abdomen, it is bound with a belt made of bands of the dried bark of the banana tree (ekutá).

The assistants wash the mother and child. On the mother they place dried leaves or bark of the banana tree which have been carefully crumpled. They are put on like panties to catch the blood and are replaced by new ones whenever necessary. Nowadays pieces of cloth are often used; they are put on like a man's garment.

M 846 for and fed so that she may regain her strength rapidly. [486]

3. Seclusion

After childbirth the mother remains secluded (-ulama) in her hut for several weeks -- two, three, or more, depending on circumstances and especially on her husband's social position. Her seclusion is called julé. The hut bears the same name, or else it is called jànga, "palm leaf." Sometimes the term ekelé is also applied to it, denoting the period of seclusion with all the special regulations it involves. These are as follows:

M [846] 1) Meals. In some tribes the woman may already eat on the day of the delivery. But among others she is only permitted to drink. The reason for this fast is given in the form of a legend. One day P [186] long ago a Bɔtwa asked his master for a little manioc, but the master refused to give it to him. The master's wife had just given birth. Annoyed by the refusal, the Bɔtwa cursed his master, saying: "From now on your women will have to fast the day they give birth." (1) Another explanation is that at sometime in the past someone refused food to a slave who was about to be sacrificed at a feast of the lifting of mourning. Tribes and villages that do not give any reason of this sort permit a woman to eat in the evening, if the delivery takes place in the morning.

M [879] A mother's first meal is prepared by a woman who has performed the carnal act the preceding night. She goes to draw water, and on her return she fastens or attaches over the door of the seclusion hut a piece of palm (jànga) or, among the Bombwanja, a piece of dried banana leaf; in this way she informs everyone that it is a house of ekelé. M [264] Then she prepares the food, which consists of bananas with fish or a hen in palm-oil sauce. It is eaten by the mother and her husband as well as the cook. Their very young children may also delight in it, but [487] the older ones, approaching puberty, may not. The newborn child is given a tiny bit of the sauce to taste.

1. Batwa women never fast under such circumstances.

853 757 the sap, which she then mixes with water. The resulting liquid is oily and foams like soap. She places a few drops on a piece of banana leaf and makes a sachet of it. She holds this against the breast for a certain time until the boil, similar to a blood clot or a piece of liver, leaves the breast and enters the sachet. She then shows it to those present. From then on the mother can nurse her child without fear; her milk has become healthy and normal.

2) The mother's public confession must include the names 837 of all the men with whom she has had carnal relations since the 853 child's conception. Other groups, such as the Injôlô, extend this 684 obligation even to instances preceding that moment but which 783 have not been declared at a previous occasion. The confession is public. The masseuse related to the husband begins to crush the leaves to be used in rubbing the breast; as she moves the pestle and says to the mother, "Name a man." The mother replies by giving a name. The masseuse says nyongo, "indemnity." Then all those present say yengô, yengô, yengô, "absolved." Then it is the other masseuse's turn, and she interrogates the mother in the same way. The process continues till all the names have been cited. If [486] the mother cites the name of a man who is a close relative of her husband and who therefore does not need to pay an indemnity, the masseuse does not reply nyongo. Instead a member of the husband's clan makes the gesture signifying [20] exemption: he holds the kernel of a palm nut (bolikô) in his left hand and throws it by means of a small board which he holds in his right. Among the Injôlô the man takes two kernels and strikes them against each other and then throws them away. Were the woman to suppress a name the child would die. If she has no admission to make, she replies, "No one besides my husband."

The indemnity that must be paid by those who are obligated to do so consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas (or their cash value) which are to be given to the masseuses, who will then divide them. Were the accused to refuse, the husband would demand a regular indemnity from him after the end of the seclusion.

The Bombwanja have this confession at the time of the ● [21] fattening of the fetus. A few old women married into the clan carry out the interrogation. The kernel of the fruit of the palm is thrown by means of a knife.

602 member is, as it were, identified with that member, so that, for in-
601 stance, all younger sisters and female cousins of one spouse become "wives" of all the younger brothers and male cousins of the other spouse. One must really have the legal sense and the patience and the capacity for palaver and unravelling of an old Nkundo to make sense out all of these relationships. They themselves compare them, in fact, with the inextricable clew of the intestines of a sort of dwarf crocodile: beanlo bya lokekele.

9. Exogamy

613
582 The term, "exogamic clan," often heard or encountered in writings, is also, at least in the Nkundo-Mongo society, very misleading. The group of persons with whom marriage is forbidden does not constitute any common entity; it differs from person to person. Two half brothers can have the same paternal clan but differ in maternal clan; they can have the same maternal clan and different paternal clans. Marriages are forbidden for older brothers and sisters that are permitted for the younger ones. The rules differ from one blood relation to another, from blood relation with relative-by-marriage to blood relation with relative-by-marriage, from relative-by-marriage with relative-by-marriage to relative-by-marriage with relative-by-marriage.

If one still wishes to put the law of exogamy into European terms, then one might say: 1) blood relationship forbids marriage insofar as the blood relationship is recognized. This recognition varies from clan group to clan group. Sometimes in the same legal but extended clan, an exception is made to this recognition; mostly, however, the different autonomous clans which descend from the same distant ancestor are still bound by the law of exogamy. Generally, groups which have the same father but a different mother /160/ separate most quickly. 2) Relationship (other than blood) forbids marriage—insofar as the relationship is recognized between the parents of spouses; it sometimes permits marriage between children of spouses.

613
582
114 Here it should be observed once again, however, that the customs differ from region to region as regards this recognition; that, for instance, the stepson in many regions may marry his stepmother in a regular marriage; and that the violations are less severely judged and punished in proportion to the degree to which the forbidden relationships diverge.

000 What is one to do if even in such cases it is taught, "One must respect" the native customs?

587 The inheriting of wives existed everywhere; it was, in fact,
428 the only wealth left behind by the native. The details of the distribution ● [184] differed according to district or tribe. Thus, for instance, in some districts it was the eldest son who alone inherited all of the wives of his father. This was in order to preserve the rank and the class of the family. Prestige and power actually depended only on the number of wives that one possessed. In this case, however, this eldest son had, in place of his father, to provide a wife for his younger brothers and the sons of his sisters. As far as impediments [582] to marriage were concerned, generally they strictly observed the impediment of blood relationship; two blood relatives, even in a distant degree, should never enter into marriage, [541] with the exception of the irregularities mentioned above. As for relatives by marriage, these do not exist for them in any degree. There is, nevertheless, one case that somewhat resembles relationship by marriage, namely, the Nkita might never be in the home of a man together with the woman whose Nkita she was. Thus, the son-in-law or the brother-in-law might never take the Nkita of his wife into his home. If, however, the wife had left or died, there was no further impediment.

587 When, like the inheritance above, the family had returned 428 the bride price and had then married the woman to another man, this second husband also had to give a gift to the one who, according to 431 the law of inheritance, had the right to the wife. This gift was called a bempanga.

587 If the wife who was freed by the family had children, only a part of the bride price had to be returned. Sometimes the wife was 428 freed completely through her children. The children then remained with the family of the deceased husband, and they then represented the value of the bride price of their mother. If, however, such a woman was married again by her family, they demanded a second bride price for that.

587 Sometimes a single woman was the Nkita of several other 428 women. In the inheritance several people then had a right over
583 her, and everyone demanded his share. For instance, a young man

7:Brown M-5 (ca. 1940) 1944 FO32 Mongo FO32
Ntomba

no compulsion. If one of the contracting parties fails to fulfil its pledges in this matter 224
of giving part of the kill, or in anything else, the aggrieved party may call the council 624 together. This consists not only of members of the [illegible] and [illegible], but of all 596 elders of the village or villages connected with this particular one. The party judged in the wrong, whether [illegible] or [illegible], will be fined, the injured party receiving its 621 share, and both parties will be charged to live together harmoniously and observe their contracts.

The power of the nkumu was apparently limited, and did not supersede that of 624
the [illegible]. When trials came up, the aggrieved party might go either to the 695 [illegible] or to the nkumu. If it was necessary to call the village elders together about it, both these authorities were present at the hearing. First the young men of the group were allowed to give their verdict, then the old men, after that [illegible] (or the [illegible]), and finally the nkumu was given the privilege of the last word. He would comment on the opinions of each of the judges, criticizing one young man, commending another, and then giving his own verdict, at which the group would assent by saying, 'Even so, grandfather'. The whole group of judges would then fix the fines, a double portion of which went to the nkumu.

The actual manual labour which an nkumu may do excludes anything endangering 624 life or limb, or requiring agility and speed. He may clear the bush for his gardens: this is a man's work. He may take part in the building of his houses, but may do no high work, and, among the inland groups, it is the work of the Batwa to put the [563]
roof on for him. The nkumu may also prepare pitfalls for catching game, but cannot engage in any other type of hunting or do any fishing. Digging a grave is prohibited, for, as we shall see, everything pertaining to death must be ignored by the nkumu.

Other rules affecting the daily life of the nkumu may be roughly divided into three: those affecting his person, those having to do with his food, and social regulations.

One of the great points of observance in the first class of regulations is the impor- 624
tance of the [illegible]. The nkumu must on no account be seen during daylight hours 292 with an uncovered head. If he wishes relief from the cumbersome [illegible] he may take it off in the darkness of his house and put on an ordinary hat made of skins, and when night falls he may walk where he will bareheaded if he so desires. The skin hat, known as [illegible], may be made from two animals only, in the case of an [824] nkumu, one being the [illegible], a species of antelope with light-coloured hair, and the other the [illegible], an animal resembling a beaver. The skin of the [illegible] may be used by anyone, but the [illegible] is reserved for the nkumu only with one exception. The skin of the [illegible] may also be used for the carrying strap for infants known as [illegible], [959] which is worn over one shoulder in bandolier fashion. For the nkumu the skin of the [illegible] is limited to the informal hat, [illegible], and for making into the [illegible], a pouch used for carrying small objects and worn like a sporran. As a corollary to the importance of the [illegible] may be noted the importance attached to the head of the nkumu, which must never be seen uncovered in daylight.

The Bonginda nkumu never wash in the daytime, but may wash at night with hot 624 water. The inland nkumu never wash. Even the Bonginda nkumu never wash their 515 hands, and no nkumu ever cuts his hair. If the nkumu becomes too greatly incumbered, one of his wives may delouse his head, but only within the privacy of the [191] house, by the light that enters the rear opening.

grasping the knife with his left hand, with his free right hand he drains a gourd of palm wine to gain courage, hits the nearest victim on the head with the empty gourd, then transfers the knife to his right hand. He is now ready for his work which he proceeds to do methodically, sustained by the heady wine and the rhythm of the drum. When he had finished one of the lines, a pause would be made to bring out the body for burial. Just before this is done an armed band rushes down the path, returns, goes up in the other direction, then returns; this is said by some to ward off any spirits which might be about. The nkumu is now brought out by the Batwa slaves.[1] His grave, a circular hole with a crypt in one side of it, its entrance facing west, had been previously prepared. Few people in the Bongindo villages knew or had seen the actual burying place of an nkumu. While the corpse was carried to the grave followed by a crowd, the executioner finished his work. Those who stayed behind took the bodies of the decapitated men and women and divided them among all the participants of the funeral who would subsequently devour everything. 762 766 [266]

Accompanying the funeral procession to the grave were the edil, one or more men or women who were destined to accompany the nkumu to his grave and to the other world beyond. At the burial of an nkumu witnessed in 1930 at which the semblances of some of the old rites were carried out, a party of armed men contested the right of the procession to approach the grave, there was a mock battle for a few minutes between two bands of the funeral party, and then the procession gained right of way. At the grave-side the legs and sometimes the arms of one edil were broken by heavy clubs to prevent him from escaping. Then seated on the ground the body of the nkumu would be placed on the knees of this one, whose arms would be placed round the nkumu and securely fastened by driving a peg right through both wrists. Sometimes two edil were thus used. If the number of victims was sufficient, others would be buried alive too, being placed in the grave in the recumbent supine position, with the corpse on top of them, its weight being sufficient, with the earth filling in the grave, to prevent escape. [314] The nkumu was now ready for burial and was placed in the crypt, facing west.[2] The relatives of the nkumu approach, they pluck the leaves and stem of a juicy bush known as ntolale and chewing it, expectorate ceremonially on the body while they address it in language somewhat as follows: [829] 'You are going to leave us now, we are mourning, for you were a good and wise man, your discernment in matters of justice was without parallel, &c. . . . we wish that you may be happy where you go, have many wives, beget many children, lack not for meat. But don't take with you our power to beget children, leave us also some of this wisdom of yours, for what you were, we would be.' This prayer over, the nsambi would be slipped off the head of the corpse and replaced by the informal hat, all done so dexterously that the bare head was not seen. The entrance to the [164]

---

[1] The body was supposed to have remained in state for seven to nine days, but actually it was buried privately soon after death, a dummy being set up with the nsambi on its head, and the succeeding ceremonies being conducted with only the dummy in the place of the actual body. The inland villages however did allow the body to remain unburied for the long period, the wives being forced to keep watch in the same house. The Bongindo buried their nkumu generally in their houses or the spot where they had been accustomed to sit, burying the dummy at some other spot farther off.

[2] All burials have particular regard to this west position, those buried in the recumbent position having the feet to the west. The native explanation is that this allows the spirit of the departed to follow the path of the sinking sun. [773]

585 586 To say that it makes absolutely no difference to him might be too extreme a statement. But it is certainly not very important to him, since the primary purpose of his marriage is to obtain progeny and to follow his natural instinct in an honest fashion. This does not mean that he likes to marry a woman of loose morals; quite the contrary.

171 585 586 What is the linguistic data on the subject of virginity? In an interesting paper entitled "The Principles of Bantu Marriage" (Africa Vol. 2, No. 3 (1929), p. 256), E. Torday says, "Some of the most competent philologists assure us that in most Bantu languages there is no word for 'virgin'; .... The Wachagga, who may be an exception, use the word 'unimpaired,' and it is perhaps in the use of similar expressions, not exclusively applied to physical virginity, that we shall find the explanation of the absence of a specific term."

585 586 172 Thus the Lonkundɔ have a noun: ekɔtɛ. It is derived from the root kɔt (the verb is -kɔtama), which means "to be firmly attached, to be tenacious" (e.g., lokɔtɔ, "tenacity"). Ekɔtɛ designates something which is difficult to open, to separate, to break up, especially fruit with a tough, hard, thick rind. It is applied to the litófé, lisánjá, and the lingongo when it is impossible to break the shell which contains the edible portion even though the fruit is ripe. [79] This term is used in a figurative sense for a woman who resists seduction, who "does not allow herself to be opened." It is not at all specific and in no way the equivalent of our word "virginity," rather it seems to signify "chastity."

Other Nkundɔ tribes seem to have a specific word, bokotɔ. I learned this term from natives living between the Ikelemba and the Tshuapa, both east and west of the Juɔ, as well as from some Basɛkɛ Bongwalanga from the old Lulonga District. The missionaries of the Apostolic Prefecture of Basankusu use it in their publications to mean "virginity, virgin." I was not able to get an exact idea of its precise meaning, but as far as I was able to make out it is much closer to "virgin chastity" than ekɔtɛ. In any case it includes no reference to physical virginity. (1)

800

1. We should not be astonished that "primitive" tribes have no word in their language

584 power to settle disputes. They claim their share of the remuneration from the ndonga. According to the saying -- in archaic language -- botɛ wǎ ndonga nd'â dombɛ, "the power (literally, "the medicine") of the ndonga resides in the judges." Not that the judges themselves have the right or the power to intervene in matrimonial palavers. But they are that many additional witnesses. If the day comes when there is a dispute on the subject of the bride price, especially at the time of a divorce, the ndonga can call on them to help him refresh his memory and thus avoid difficulties. For it can easily happen that after several years the official witness has only a vague and approximate recollection of what was paid. If the judges do not receive anything at the time of payment, they will refuse to give their assistance at the critical moment. It is therefore an intelligent policy to acquiesce to their desires even though strictly speaking they can invoke no real prerogatives.

At the present time the colonial government, having estab-
178 lished districts and named chiefs, the latter have had attributed to 584 them the right to officially act as ndonga in matrimonial matters, 622 or at least they have taken advantage of the powers given them and done so. In general [111] they summon the judges of the district at the same time, and the matter is entered after a fashion in the register of settlements. The chief's presence as a witness may have some value, since he can provide additional testimony and writes down the amount of the bride price. But his presence, on the other hand, has the disadvantage of involving him in matters which all in all are none of his business. We are not speaking here of cases in which he or some relatives of his are interested parties in the palaver. If he would be content to be a passive witness and enter the transactions that take place, the situation would be perfect.

It is probable that etymologically the word ndonga is derived 192 from the verb root long, intransitive longam, "to be in order, arranged," 184 transitive longy, "to arrange, make as it should be." In addition to the word ndonga, which is used west of the Luilaka, we find the word bokɔ́lo used among the Boɔ́ngɛ and the Boɔ́yɛ (as well as the Elɔ́ngɔ), and ntɔmbi among the Injɔ́lɔ́. The latter term could be the same word as its homonym which means "spy" and is derived from the verb

192 tomba, "to spy"; the former may be an extension of the meaning of 184 the word bokɔlo, "promise." (1)

[572] 1. Note in passing that a ndonga is also necessary for the boseka, or contract of friendship and mutual assistance. (See Chapter I, Part 1, Article III.).

Article III. The Engagement

584 589 1. The payment of the ikulɛ

The engagement begins with the first bride-price payment, which in former times was an arrow and for that reason is called likulɛ or ilulɛ. [556] If the suitor was very rich, he sometimes gave an ingɔndɛ knife or even an empɔte. A poorer one would merely give the shaft of an arrow. Nowadays 1 or 2 copper rings are given. But the original name of this payment has been retained.

Arriving at the home of the father of his intended, [112] the suitor, his father (or a substitute for him), the ndonga(s) and often other relatives as well, sit down on one side of the loɛnjɛ (the court in front of a dwelling), after an exchange of the usual courtesies. The girl and the representatives of her family sit down on the opposite side. As in all matters that a Nkundɔ has to settle, the host begins by inquiring into the reason for the visit. The young man's father answers: "We have come to ask for your daughter for our son." "How do you ask for her?" "We ask for her in marriage." These preliminary negotiations are called simply ɛwana nsango, "to ask each other for news."

Then the girl's father asks: "Who will bring the linko (banana) or the bonyɛku (partially ripe banana), that is, the gifts?" Through this figurative expression he asks who has been proposed as ndonga. The young man's father replies: so-and-so, and so-and-so. When they have been accepted, the fiancée's father has bananas, smoked fish, and sometimes hens brought in, and the witness passes them over to the future husband's group.

583x months, even years, may elapse. In the past there was no hurry at all. Only if the father of the woman needed the bride price to obtain a wife for himself, for a son, or a cousin, etc., was the period [178] shortened. Nowadays, however, those who are entitled to the bride price urge the shortening of the interval before the walo payment because of the overexcitation of their desire for riches, on the one hand, and also because it gives the young people a possibility of leaving their tribes and regions and going into the centers to find the means of earning more money, dressing more luxuriously, satisfying their vanity and their desire for freedom, not to mention libertinism or even worse. Nor has the one reason present in the past disappeared -- on the contrary. And as a result of all that, as soon as the interval becomes a little long to the girl's father's taste, he readily brings the situation to the attention of the chiefs established by the administration, who are always ready to deal with matrimonial cases as much for the financial gain involved as for the increase in their prestige resulting from their involvement in this most important realm, in which according to ancestral law they have no right whatsoever to intervene, for the simple reason that this law knows no chiefs or headmen in the European sense.

1. Terminology

589x The term walo is used by the Bonkoso, the Bongñi, the Bombwanja,
● 192 and the Ionda; bombuluku, on the other hand, is used by the Wǎngatá, the Bakáala, the Lifumba, the Injóló, and the Boángi (as well as the Elángá and the Losanganya). The Bombomba use the term elámbela in imitation of their neighbors, the Ekonda.

This last term may be related to -lámba, [130] "to prepare food." This derivation should be compared with what we have said in Article II about the remuneration of the ndonga. I have been unable to discover the etymology of bombuluku. Let us try our luck with walo.

In accordance with the rules of Nkundó etymology, this word could be related to the root -al, or to -alol, which is an intensifier derived from the former. No example of the simple root exists at present, as far as I know. But there are derivative forms: alej and alol, or -aol which results from the elimination of the first "l."

583x
● 192 -Alej means "to place in layers," as for example one would place eggs in a basket, bricks in an oven. The noun derived from this word is jwalo, "layer" and, by analogy, "shelf." By extension it is used to signify whatever is placed between layers to protect them, and also the lining of a garment. It is difficult to find a relationship with the word walo here.

-Aol may be used as an intensifier and also to reverse the meaning or a word. The latter use results in a noun ending in a final "o" as in jwaló of aola bangánju, "to pour out the vegetables." Thus it must be excluded.

In its other meanings this verb occurs in combination with several nouns. It occurs first of all with walo when this word is used to signify the beating for small game. (1) In addition it is used to mean "to collect and gather weeds, chaff, sweepings, ashes." The action is called jwalo.

The most natural conclusion is certainly that the noun under discussion should be placed together with -aol in the meaning given last. The word would then refer to the relatively large amount of valuables deposited. As a matter of fact, the act of gathering chaff, etc., is practically and physically identical with the act of picking up rings, etc. A difficulty stands in the way of this explanation, however; [131] the expression is not -aola walo, but eola walo, or eola baǔmbɛ not only for this particular payment but also, mutatis mutandis, for the various payments and presents connected with marriage, such as funeral payments and gifts given at the time of death. (1)

In any case the term walo has not the slightest etymological connection with the word walí, "spouse," nor with the root -bal, "to marry."

1. The expression tumba walo is also used.

1. The verb -eola indicates rather the quantity of objects picked up and is used in many other combinations. A noun njeló means "a large number of objects" (especially fish).

583x a palaver concerning the bride price without giving at least this 431 pledge. He will then fulfill this obligation as quickly as possible, because most mothers-in-law are so eager for this payment that if the son-in-law is too slow in giving them satisfaction, they do everything to break up the marriage. And often they succeed. They will win their case before the tribunal, unless they have been too short of patience.

Article VI. Presents, or Beɛ́ngo

After the bulk of the bride price has been paid to the wife's mother and father, her parents as well as various other members of the family demand various small payments and presents called beɛ́ngo (sing. boɛ́ngo) from the husband. The noun is derived from the verb -bɛ́nga which is only used with it. An analogous reciprocal form, ●[192] -bɛ́ngana means "to touch one another, to collide." Was the original meaning of -bɛ́nga "to attract to oneself?" Or are the two verbs totally unconnected etymologically? Whatever the case, these terms are also used to denote the remuneration received by judges for settling a dispute. [145]

There are many varieties of beɛ́ngo; some are used by particular groups and unknown elsewhere. The various relatives claim them without following any predetermined order. But in any case it is necessary to go through the ndonga. Each relative therefore tells him what he wishes in a voice loud enough for everyone present to hear; and it is the ndonga who passes the request on to the husband. "Give this or that boɛ́ngo to so-and-so," he will say. Note also that the payment of these beɛ́ngo is not absolutely essential. Often requests are only partially fulfilled; others may be refused with some excuse, "In-law, I cannot satisfy you; I do not possess such an object." Thus the marriage arrangement is neither hindered nor delayed because everybody cannot be satisfied. The principal boɛ́ngo for the father (1) and sometimes that of the mother (2) are exceptions.

Let us go into some of the particulars concerning the various beɛ́ngo thus requested:

1) Ifakɛ́ l'akongɛ́ b'is'eyɔ́na, "knife and spears for the girl's father." This consists of a knife and five spears (or more, depending 583* For an aunt, a basin, because she had washed the child.

431 For a brother, a pair of shoes or slippers, because the girl had worn his shoes during the courtship, etc., etc. [150]

All these beɛ́ngo are included in the sum total of the bride price. Should the occasion arise, they must be returned with the rest.

In addition to the beɛ́ngo asked for and received by the woman's relatives, others are demanded by members of the husband's family. As in the case of the former each person voices his claims according to his desires and without any predetermined order but must always do so through the ndonga. The gifts chiefly consist of furs of the [281] esɔ́fe otter, the liɔ́ka monkey, bonkɔ́ngo and yenvi felines; a joint of game (money, antelope, etc.), a mat, a pot, a hunting net, a carrying bag (bokúmbɛ́), a bead necklace, etc. Nowadays there may [117] also be various items introduced by the Europeans: items of clothing, fabrics, saucepans, dishes, etc. This category of beɛ́ngo is included in the sum total of the nkomɛ (see the following article). If the nkomɛ is given immediately, the parties proceed with this payment. Then the ndonga(s) are remunerated as stated above: each party gives him at least 2 rings.

Finally, the woman's father says to the husband: "In any case, be on your way; we will collect the nkomɛ and bring it to you." Whereupon the husband leaves; if he prefers to wait for his wife he remains, and returns home when the items of the nkomɛ have been collected.

Article VII. Nkomi

Nkomɛ is the name for the objects which the wife's family gives to the husband. The term likomo is also sometimes used. The [192] Injɔ́lɔ́ say likoma, the Wángatɛ, Bakɛ́ala, Ioanda, and Boɛ́ngɛ say likomi. All these words are derived from the same verb -koma, "to wrap up, to make a package," (1) for the nkomɛ valuables are

1. The Bɔ́ɔ́vɛ say lilonga from the verb -longa, which has the same meaning as -koma.

583x female relative thanks to whom he was able to obtain this wife (see 431 below, Article X). He keeps a small part for himself and, in agree-425 ment with his wife, uses it according to his needs. When husband and wife are on good terms, he consults her before giving away or selling any of it. And if she wishes to dispose of any of it, she asks his permission. Thus they work the matter out aimiably. But legally it all belongs to the husband. Should he want to use it for gifts or for any payment of his own, his wife can make no claim; she will not win her case before the law. But from a practical point of view, it is much wiser to come to an agreement in advance and thus avoid any annoyance 583x or quarrel.

431 The size of the nkɔmɛ depends on the wealth of the woman's [596] parents. Not only is a large one a point [152] of honor and esteem;
[595] it is also a means of increasing the stability of the marriage and securing harmony. The bigger the nkɔmɛ the more obliged the husband is to treat his wife well and see that she is content with him, out of fear of having to return the entire fortune if the marriage should ever be broken.

The nkɔmɛ may be very large, even as great or greater than the bride price; in these extreme cases the girl is spoken of as
● [192] lifaya-njoku, for like an elephant (njoku) she goes to live elsewhere (lifaya) because of all the riches she carries with her. The term njokwobwo is also used; literally, it refers to a kind of mushroom which grows in abundance all over the bondɛlɛ tree. (1)

---

1. The use of these terms is not specifically confined to the situation described above. They are also applied to any stranger who settles in, or simply passes through, the village, bringing many riches -- to the white men, for example.

596 With reference to this subject an old custom should be men-583x tioned. Because of his love for his daughter and a desire for renown, 431 a father might give his son-in-law a quantity of bakonga, in varying amounts but enough to pay for the acquisition of a wife, hence bride-price valuables, so to speak.

583x The expression for being the object of a bride-price payment is kwɛ bafɛmbɛ, literally, "to make valuables fall." Hence the name Ókwáfɛmbɛ, "one who is the object of a payment of valuables."

As we have said, it is possible to make all the payments described at the same time. This is done only in the case of remarriage. All the valuables are handed over at the same time, and there is no longer any distinction between the three payments.

Article IX. The Bosongo

1. The nature of the bosongo and the relevant terminology

The bosongo is the last portion of the bride price. It consists of the payment of a slave or the equivalent value in currency. Hence the very common term bonto, which strictly speaking means "man" but is used to mean "slave" ("He is only a man," they say; that is to say, a slave; nɔ́ɔ́ta la bonto, la limo, "I possess him as a slave"). The word which actually means "slave," bokwɛla, or bontambe among the Elingɛ and the Bodyɛ, (1) is never used in relation to the bride price.

1. Elsewhere the terms bofombo or bɔ́mbo are also used.

The Ekonda, however, do use the term ilongɛ, which is a synonym of bokwɛla and means "slave" in the strict sense of the word. The neighboring Nkundó tribes also use it, probably as a result of their influence. The Bombwanja, the Bongili, the Bokuno, and the Bombomba likewise do so. (2)

[564]

2. The Batswɛ never make this payment.

[153] The noun bosongo (ilongɛ among the various Elingɛ groups) is derived from sóng, "to pay this part of the bride price." Thus a man will say to his son-in-law, ośɔ́ lóngaa bɔ́ɔ' ɛ̂nánɛ, yɛ́kánɛ yósongɛ, "You have already paid the jéngi for my daughter; now come [154] and pay the bosongo." The definition given by Ruskin (Dictionary of the Lomongo Language, p. 67: "bosongo: the passing over of a 589* daughter or ward in marriage without reference to her wishes, money paid for a slave wife," and p. 314, [illegible]: the same) therefore does not correspond to the sense in which these terms are used by the Nkundó tribes under discussion.

Another term for this payment is tsinola bonto ([illegible]). I know of no other use of the verb tsinola.

An expression which brings out the idea of its being a last payment is kumbola bonto ([illegible]). The verb kumbola means to strike the last blow in felling a tree. (1) [172]

1. Note that kumbola also means "to take in marriage."

[567] [435] Formerly, the payment of a real slave, that is, of a human being, was absolutely obligatory. Nowadays, since slavery has been abolished, the worth of a slave in bokonga has been substituted; it consists of 25 rings, or of 15 to 20 if they are especially beautiful. (2)

2. In the past, the price of a slave was from 10 to 15 rings.

To distinguish between these forms of the [illegible], the Nkundó say [illegible] ([illegible]), "a slave with hair," therefore a human being, or [illegible] ([illegible]), "slave in copper rings."

587* 565 Batswá, instead of slaves, could be given as [illegible]. They were not reduced to slavery, however, but remained in the same position as before, except that they changed masters.

Sometimes a master who wanted to be rid of an incorrigible Batswá gave him away as a real slave in a [illegible]. In that case it was as if a slave in the strict sense of the word had been given.

In other instances the master acted with the more or less explicit consent of the Batswá. Those who were thus handed over as a bride-price payment were usually women. [158] Since in matrimonial matters of the Batswá, the Baotó master fulfills the role of "Father," he is entitled to the girls' bride price and has the duty of 837 discussed in the next article). The Bombwanja, the Ionda, and the Injɔlɔ call it lóngɔla, "(any) act performed in hiding" (from the verb ŋgola). The Ionda also use [311] the term ekundé (from the verb kunda, "to bury), which refers to "something that is buried or hidden under a heap."

Nowadays there is a tendency to apply the term lisɛ́mbɔ́, without any qualification, to adultery of this sort, at least if it is not limited to a single act. The woman and her lover are both called bosɛ́mbɔ́ (pl. basɛ́mbɔ́).

2) If only an isolated act takes place, it is called yɛ́tsí (from the verb ɛ́ta, "to call"). But this term may also be applied to unmarried persons. Strictly speaking, it denotes a single union and not continuous relations. Certain tribes (the Injɔlɔ, the Elíngá) also have the word efongo (for instance in the expression nyong'ɛ́'efongo, "indemnity for a single instance").

3) The term lonkɛ̂na (bonkaká among the Bombwanja) designates adultery between persons belonging to a single exogamous entity and, by extension, between persons belonging to different families but comprising a single settlement.

As the word itself indicates, the relations involved take place between "cousins" in the broadest sense of the term.

837
192 The natives gave me an account of the etymology of the terms bongomba and lonkɛ̂na, which it may be useful to repeat here. They are believed to have been invented by fickle wives and their lovers in order to hide their illicit love affairs. Even of old there were relations between the Nkundó and the Ngombe. A Ngombe who appeared in a Nkundó village was the object of the curiosity of all the young people. A man going to his paramour (or vice versa) or coming back at a very late hour could reply, if suspicions were aroused, that he had been to see the Ngombe. The same trick could be used in a case of lonkɛ̂na. I am passing on this explanation for whatever it's worth -- (for lonkɛ̂na, for instance, the etymology I cited at the beginning seems a good deal more natural). [312] it may be of interest at some time to have it noted and preserved in writing.

684 certainly happen that a husband who was too jealous or impetuous
585 would wound, kill, or sell his rival. But this was an exception and was always condemned since it was absolutely lacking in chivalry. In any case there can never be any question of demanding an indemnity; such an act would be absolutely shameful.

The culprit is notified of the demand for an indemnity by 684 the ndonga, who in difficult cases is accompanied by various 584 notables. If the husband foresees strong opposition on the debtor's part, he gives the ndonga a special present of a bunch of bananas and two fish (or a hen) "so that he would not be forced to eat the rival's food."

A persistent and categorical refusal to pay the indemnity is 684 unusual. For it can have serious consequences: the taking in custody followed by enslavement because of debts, or [the taking of] compensation in the person of his wife or of a relative, or the retention [by her relatives] of a relative of the creditor who is married into the debtor's clan (ikɛkelo). Since these practices of taking hostages and of bodily constraint have been abolished, there remains the intervention of the courts, seconded by the police.

What is the Nkundɔ idea of this payment which we have called an indemnity in order to facilitate its description? The question is difficult to answer. Here are the linguistic facts which may provide elements of the solution:

The payment for adultery is called nyongo, and the word is 684 used together with the verb ka, "to give." The expression is equiva-
172 lent to the verb lingala fɔta (from which the noun bofɔto is derived). It signifies "payment" in the broadest sense and thus also covers our words "pay," "salary," "remuneration." In addition to its application in the case of adultery, it is also used in many other situations, such as remuneration for work, payment for a service, etc. Nyongo does not mean "compensation," which is called lowɛɛla, nor "a payment making amends [322] and apologizing for an offense," which is bosodo, nor "indemnification" (mbɛlaka). What the expression has in common with the last term is the concept of a

684 [682] a payment rightly owed, and in the absence of an adequate translation, "indemnity" is still the least inaccurate. (1)

[525] 1. The words used for "reward" are bolúndo, which is a reward for an unusual service, like the capture of a leopard or another "royal" animal (nyam'ĕ'ekulo, such as a python, an eagle, etc.) or a beautiful dance, and mbutaji, which is a reward for small services.

One point remains to be noted. The two forms of punishment, violence and indemnity, may not be combined, and this principle is applied in all situations (2). Should this prohibition be construed as an implicit condemnation of violent measures? Or have we here the use of a system of settlement? It is difficult to settle this question, and actually the two explanations overlap at least in part.

2. For example, see also Chapter VIII, Article III, 1.

684 582 It is not without interest to note that, in order to justify sanctions against the accomplice, the Nkundó invoke his frequently dominant role in adultery. Actually they reason that a woman is weak by nature; her emotions predominate, she is easily led and resists enticement only with difficulty. A man on the other hand is more reasonable, better able to control himself. Sanctions enacted and applied against the wife alone would not only leave out the punishment of one of the two culprits,but they would also be inadequate for the preservation of social order, since the woman remains exposed to succumbing out of weakness in spite of the penalties. The severity of Nkundó law with regard to the corporal punishment of the wife, which exists in spite of these considerations, are explained in terms of the woman's sensitive nature and of the power her husband has over her which he lacks in relation to her accomplice.

684 591 562 that she becomes accustomed to her husband's relations with various other women. Consequently, the reaction of the women in general [323] against adultery is much weaker than that of the men. Moreover, because of this same system, a woman is much more exposed to weakness, and stronger sanctions are therefore necessary to insure her fidelity.

Finally, there is one last reason for considering a woman's misconduct as more serious. It is the danger of conception through adultery, with all the attendant consequences: risks for the pregnant woman, forced continence for the husband, etc. (1)

1. See no. 6 below as well as Chapter I, Part 2, Article IV, 3, and Chapter X, Article II, 3.

From the description of sanctions it is apparent that in spite 562 684 of the woman's inferior position, Nkundó law does not leave husbands the full and complete freedom which, according to certain writers, they are accorded among other peoples. Even if the means of repression available to the wife do not incontestably prove that the husband has an obligation of conjugal fidelity -- and the wife's legal status explains a great deal -- the fact remains that the nkonga as well as public opinion approve of even her violent reaction, proving that she is right and the husband wrong.

5. Public opinion

626 627 Public opinion is fairly lenient in relation to isolated instances (yěsi, elonga). It clearly recognizes the error involved in infringing on the conjugal rights of another, but the error is attributed to human weakness. In the case of habit the situation is different; it is criticized frequently and severely. Habitual sinners [592] are called efêfêlê (from the verb felaka, literally "to flutter" and figuratively "to flirt"), ehêngê or ehêhêngê (from the verb hêngo) or ehêhêlê (from hêlea) "to flutter, to be flighty and fickle." These epithets are applied primarily to women, who are more subject to this failing than men.

575A Thus a favorite is in every way the object of her husband's preference. He divides with her all presents he receives, while the other wives are not included in this expression of generosity. But in the matter of sexual relations, apart from his trips, he has obligations to all of them. The most he can do is to add one night to the usual number (see below).

The co-wives adapt fairly well to this preferential system. Nevertheless, there is a good deal of backbiting on account of it. It may also happen that one or another of the wives is jealous to the point of being unable to bear it. [347] The signs of her rancor multiply, and a divorce results in the end.

The nkɛ́ndɛ́ does not have to go into mourning for anyone other than her husband. Even then she does not remove her clothing. But she does not have to abide by mourning regulations either for her parents or her own children.

Like the other wives, the favorite is passed on through inheritance. But she cannot be taken as a bosílá by anyone except an elder brother of the deceased.

575A Nkɛ́ndɛ́ is the specific term by which a favorite is designated. Its etymology is unknown to me. The word is used everywhere, although the Injɔ́lɔ́ often say lokílo (whose etymology is equally obscure). Another less common (older?) term known to the Boolomo, Bongili, Wángata, and Bakáala is bongílí or bongílɛ́ (1). In addition to the term ilonjaka, already cited, there is also the word elɛ́mbɛ́, a generic term meaning "preference, predilection" or, when applied to a child or a slave, "an object one does not want to dispose of." The favorite is also called ekílakílá, "untouchable," because other men may not have relations with her.

1. The Ekonda call the favorite lokéfo. The Elanga of Losanganya say bafíɛ, a name borne by certain women among the Nkundó between Juale and Bolobo. Might this also be an old name?

595* 592 Qualifying expressions are sometimes added to the name nkónde: ea bokonga, referring to the bokonga on which the favorite is seated during the ceremony in which her position is established, and ea bonjo, "true." The two terms are used as opposed to a nkónde ea wɔji, whose position is established without any special ceremony, in imitation of a true, officially recognized favorite.

The expression for "making a nkónde" is ëja nkónde, "to make a nkónde come out," because she is proclaimed as such before the public gathering. Nowadays one often hears the expression tôna nkónde, a term which is very probably transferred from the bolfumbé. (See the next article.) [348]

Article III. The bolfumbé

595* 593 The polygamist who by birth or influence is recognized as the primus inter pares of a group of clans and who, to use the Nkundo term, is jabo l'ôsé (1) has the exclusive right to make one of his wives a bolfumbé. Therefore, doing so was not, as with a favorite, a matter of wealth and preference, but rather a mark of influence and authority.

In relation to this subject, here is a historical incident showing how an attack on this law resulted in a mysterious punishment, interpreted by the natives as an intervention from beyond the grave for the protection of the ancestral order. The events occurred at Bosumbé (Bombwanja), in the Bongili family. Bonkoma w'Ikenza had married Eyoko of Bokâma and by her had his eldest son [349] 1. Nowadays one would call him the chief. But actually he was not a chief; he was simply the most respected and influential member of the oligarchy of clan patriarchs. This oligarchy constituted the political administration of the Nkundo, and from time to time an eminent personality gained recognition within it.

[illegible] is the one who brings her to her husband and is, at the same [illegible] time, ndonga for the payment of the bride price, which is made as for any woman. The expression is: X afikanela bokilɔ́ Y ebísa, "X repeats her sister Y ebísa."

In case of the elder's absence or upon her death, the ebísa replaces her or inherits all her rights in the household.

The elder relative cares a great deal about having her ebísa, because as a result she rises in her husband's estimation and she herself has an assistant in her work and a confidante in her troubles. The ebísa herself has the advantage of not being alone or abandoned at the beginning of her marriage, but of being able to count on a protector and guide, and if her elder occupies a privileged rank in the harem, she has the certainty of sharing her prerogatives and the likelihood of one day succeeding her. [253]

The term ebísa is used by the Nkundó between the Jwafɛ and the Bolobo, and by the Ionda. The Bombwanja designate such a woman by the name loambwɛ or loambyɛ. The Bofiŋgɛ and the Injɔlɔ also call her loambyɛ. (1)

[illegible] 1. The Bonyanga say mbambwɛ or loambwɛ. Out of respect they sometimes call her bongíli and the woman who has brought her nyangɔngíli. (See also Chapter II, Article X, and Chapter VI, Article VI.) The Ekonda call her bomáfɛa or bomáfɛa (mbɛ́fɛa, "last").

Ebísa may be related to the root bís, from which is de- [illegible] rived the verb bisingana, "to be united." Loambwɛ or loambyɛ are derived from lamb, which means: 1) "to be united" and 2) "to follow" (in order, in rank).

These names indicate the nature of this marriage that does not arise from direct relations between husband and wife but is established through the medium of another, preceding marriage. Or to express the situation in Lonkundó: ɛ́fa bála j'ɔ́ndɛ ndɔngɛ, ɛ́amana l'ɔ́ma mbambɛ́ɛ, "this is not a marriage which comes

~~Th~~ k other." (1)
[672]

1. Except, of course, if the new husband puts himself in the wrong by taking the woman home with him before the divorce is completed (see above).

● [97] The term for making restitution of the bride price is ändoja (baäimbá, ángí, etc.); [300] its intransitive form is ändola ("to recover the cost of the bride price," and the passive is änjwa, "to be restituted." The noun is njändó or wändó ("restitution," "reimbursement").

2. Methods of making restitution

The woman's father can pay back the bride price in two ways:

1) By means of valuables received from the new husband. In this case the more the latter hastens his payment, the sooner the new union will be made final.

2) By means of his own wealth, lontomé or bokakata (nkakata), an intensitive derived from likata, "hand." This method of payment settles the matter more quickly and avoids complaints lodged by the former husband. Sometimes restitution is made in this manner to show wealth and generosity.

In such a case the father acts spontaneously of his own free will. But can he be required to thus make restitution with his own wealth?

Yes. If the bride price is still in the hands of the woman's family, it must be returned immediately. This rule is easily understood, for under these circumstances no practical difficulty stands in the way of reimbursement.

Although as a rule the bride-price valuables will already have been spent for the acquisition of another wife (the nkita), this is not always the case. For example, only a very short time may have elapsed between the conclusion of the marriage and the divorce. But such a case was and is rare. Instances where the bride price was still in the family's possession were even rarer in the past, for people did not want bride-price wealth to remain 857 783 853 Note, finally, that the confession is restricted to married women. It is never expected of a young unmarried mother. Therefore it would seem to be a practice connected with marriage (a social institution) and not with childbirth (a physiological phenomenon).

This confession is called esato or lotato, from the verb ● [192] -tata, "to confess," (for which the generic term, sanga, "to say," is sometimes substituted).

I was unable to find any reason for this practice other than that of avoiding the death of the child. It is evident, however, that this explanation does not exhaust the question, although it is entirely possible that the original and deeper meaning has been lost without leaving any trace in the minds of the present generation. [496]

3) During the entire duration of nursing, the mother must 853 not be separated from her child. For the usual circumstances of 833 daily life, this rule is broadly interpreted; but during sexual relations it is strict, and no exceptions or excuses are permitted. Negligence under these circumstances would inevitably bring about the death of the child by edima as soon as the mother took it back. This rule holds for legitimate relations as much as for illicit ones. Therefore the mother must always keep her child at her breast.

4) If at some point during nursing, the milk no longer flows 853 in sufficient quantity, the mother is given a potion consisting of [757] the extract of the bark of the bolóngé tree (which has a fruit con- [278] taining a very sweet milky sap). Then she eats vegetables called lonfid. (1)

1. The leaves of this plant are also ordinarily eaten as vegetables, but they are consumed especially by those who possess the modern magical practice known as boyaliti.

5) An accident to which the Nkundó attach great importance [762] is the rejection or vomiting of milk into the mouth of an adult, even if the person affected is the infant's mother. Such a person

101 (In other dialects translated as ntoma).

The people are called Nkundó or Mɔ́ngo, never Bankundó or 101 Bamɔ́ngo. The prefix ba is often heard, as it may be used in front
113 of all proper nouns, similarly to the French usage in les Molière, les Rubens, etc. [or the English usage: the Browns, the French, the Nkundó]. The singular prefix bo is also used, but only rarely. [4] I have heard it only in the expression: ale ô bonkundó mongo, "He is a real Nkundo." This statement was made only in speaking of a foreigner who had successfully assimilated the Nkundó language and culture. It is possible, however, that it has a broader meaning.

Is it possible to discover an etymology for these names?
101 Mɔ́ngo is a common noun signifying something excellent, especially a person. People say mɔ́ng'ɔ́y'ɔ́na, "a fine child," mɔ́ng'ɔ́y'ómoto, a superb woman." (The name should be compared also with the term bɔmɔ́ngo, which denotes the state of being of a person who is well thought of, prosperous, rich, etc.) The form of the word does not change in the plural. The name Nkundó is more difficult to explain, if an explanation is at all possible. (1) If the name is to be related to some other word, the only possibility is the verb kundola, "to unearth what has been buried." But to unearth what? The corpses of one's enemies, in order to prove one's daring by eating them? Or copper rings, which would mean their wealth? The possibility is there, but we have no direct evidence. According to Fathers Bittremieux and Lemaeghe (on p. 195 of the article mentioned), some maintain that Nkundó means nkolo, "master." But what is the basis for this explanation? (2)

1. The word is Nkundó not Nkundo or Kundo. The assertion that the initial n is not part of the word, but is simply a nasal sound which must precede a consonant in the native sound system, shows a real lack of linguistic knowledge.

2. In contrast to the Batswá, the Nkundó and other groups are Baotó (sing. Bootó), meaning non-Batswá.

593^h
834 arises but rarely. Furthermore, if a daughter is required to perform similar duties for her father, she will undertake this obligation only
[578] with the lament: njôy'ôôna ěkɛ́ 'm wimɛ́kɛ́, "I have come to see where I had my origin." Any woman who has been in that position will later know no oath more sacred than this one: la botákɛ́ wǎ fafɛ́ bôkɛ́ 'm wǎnɛ́kɛ́ la mpaka, "by my father's nakedness which I saw when he was old."

834
291 Thus we can draw the conclusion that the Nkundô are offended by nakedness and as a rule do not tolerate it. The exceptions do not invalidate this generalization; on the contrary, they tend to support it.

2. Speech. Obscenities and propriety.

521
831 In general the Nkundô see nothing wrong with using obscene expressions. They only describe them as "bad" if they become indecent.
195 If a conversation touches on matters of sex, they may wonder whether a particular topic is necessary, interesting, or entertaining; they will not ask themselves whether it is moral. For it will be apparent throughout this study they have no concept of morality strictly speaking.

The Nkundô possesses a varied and extensive list of obscene words -- nor is he alone in this respect. [34] We are not compiling a dictionary, and therefore we will not list them. What interests us are the circumstances that make these words indecent and under which a proper use of them impossible. The circumstances provide us with a criterion of the degree of obscenity of a word or expression. Let us say at once that we include in this category not only terms applied to organs and phenomena which are of a sexual nature strictly speaking, but also words pertaining to certain anatomical parts or physiological functions such as, for example, excretion, hair and tattooing found on private parts, and the female garment called efofa. We [184] should also point out that some tribes will consider expressions obscene which do not shock others at all.

521 831 195 which do not shock others at all. (1)

1. These comments are applicable also to peoples in other parts of the world.

[554] The general rule of decorum among the Nkundó permits the use of such terms only among equals. Their use when speaking to inferiors is tolerated but not approved of. The use of obscenities when speaking to any strangers meets with definite disapproval. Among persons of different sexes the prohibition is particularly strict.

Nevertheless, the use of these expressions is judged less severely if they are uttered in a moment of anger or as a reprimand, even in the presence of a member of the opposite sex.

Exclamations of anger, vexation, and sorrow are often nothing but obscenities (2). No one is shocked by them in such situations.

2. See "Les Coutumes Funéraires" [Funeral Customs], No. 1, to be published in Anthropos.

Some elderly or more modest persons do not make use of them, however; if the habit of using a particular expression is thoroughly ingrained, they may make a slight change in its pronounciation (as is common for some of our "swear words").

195 83 51 52 51 To circumvent the difficulties caused by the need to use certain words frequently, [50] euphemisms are coined to take their place. Thus the Nkundó say: ńtswɛ́ lokako w'ǎkuna, "I am going behind the house," to indicate that they are going to urinate, and ńtswɛ́ ḭsaŋgá, "I am going for small pieces of firewood," or njôtswɛ́ ôsɛa lokásá, "I am going to pick a leaf," meaning that they are going to the toilet. On the way they say: ńgasa bólé, "I am leaving the path" or "I am going to the forest." A husband is permitted to use accurate terminology when speaking to his wife, but it is considered very improper for her to do so in speaking to him.

524 516 When someone is satisfying a natural need, others keep a distance away from him; they will not even speak to him. Moreover, the person would not reply even if he were called. A woman will not

578 shame of obscenities. They say: biekɛ nsɔ́nvi ɛ̂à bitɔ́li ñ'bómoto, 684 Bómoto ndɛ́ ndota (irɛ́lɛ́) "A woman is a ndota snake. Just as that 834 reptile twists through the grass and rolls up as soon as it sees a man approaching, so a woman finds it difficult to endure any obscenity."

The ideal way to be sure whether an expression is actually considered indecent is to check whether it may be used in the presence of a close relative, for a Nkundɔ never utters an obscenity in front of such a person.

● 195 578 696 Among the Nkundɔ, as in Europe, certain indelicate exclamations are so deeply rooted that they seem to have lost their original meaning, that is, most of the population no longer thinks of it at all. That a few more serious and modest individuals are still aware of it is apparent from the way they change the pronunciation of the terms in question.

Licentious expressions are never considered indecent and shock no one when they are uttered in a group or during group activities.
[571] Such activities include communal fishing and hunting expeditions, [61] drinking parties, dances, funerals, and -- at the present time -- communal work on a road, a resthouse, etc.

Thus we see that in these matters there is a remarkable discretion side by side with a certain degree of tolerance, which may be carried quite far. Licentious remarks are not condemned in themselves, but only because of fortuitous circumstances, so we see that the Nkundɔ do not consider them from a moral point of view, as we do, but from a social one. But the fact that these are precisely the words which can become indecent and socially bad shows that the native sees in their content something shocking, shameful, some quality likely to give offense. The freedom exercised in certain cases does not alter this general conclusion but simply gives evidence of he inclinations of a passionate nature.

3. Dances

535 Nkundɔ dances change periodically, as is the fashion in Europe. Old dances are given up after a time and are replaced by others which are newly invented or recently introduced. The dances fashionable at the present time came from the Bosangi, who are by 592 husband will change to revulsion, and she will leave him to be with her charmer.

Part 3

The Search for a Wife

584 When a young man old enough to marry believes he has the means to do so, he goes out to seek a wife. Naturally, he knows a number of girls, and as a rule he has no trouble finding one who suits him. The courtship is quite simple. As everywhere there are meet- [931] ings, visits, chats, and jokes; but there is no romanticism or sentimentality, for they are absolutely unknown to these peoples. Since they are in a hurry [102] to reach the objective of their relationship, namely conjugal life, -- and their progress toward this goal is facilitated by usages and customs -- there remains little time for poetry.

There is no specific term for courtship itself. The Nkundó simply speak of "talking with a woman," sanja bómoto, "looking for a woman," asa bómoto. The girl who is its object is referred to as bosimbóyɔ (or bosambó among the Injɔlɔ).

First, the young man addresses his proposals to the girl: "[illegible] (ŏkotumbɛla) la wăli", "I want to take you for wife." She shows her agreement by saying, "ŏkolanga wɛ̌ ng'ɔ́ndɔ́", "I love you also," or more frequently, "olakɔ ŏ wɛ̌, "as you wish," jfá ŏ ilɔ́, "It's up to you," or something of this sort. (1)

[95]
[576]

1. Note that for the Nkundó these expressions have quite a different significance than would appear from the words. They express a real agreement and an explicit and personal consent. In fact it is considered improper for a woman to use a more direct expression.

584
93/ The lovers exchange gifts. The girl gives food which her mother has provided, or which she has been able to procure herself.

571 with a few vulgarities. If the woman goes beyond that, her husband 593* gives her a good slap, but he cannot allow himself to exercise his 684 muscles further upon her.

If a woman's tongue is too voluble and she permits herself to deliver gross insults without a suitable reason, her lack of respect is considered punishable. It is not considered proper to right this wrong by means of blows, however, although in practice impetuous young men do not always restrain themselves. The sanction preached by tribal wisdom is the man's abstention from food prepared by the guilty wife, and his refusal to perform the conjugal act. A Nkundó woman is very sensitive to such measures. If she is really recognized to be in the wrong and peace is not promptly re-established, the wife's [576] family will beg the husband to calm down and offer him a [illegible], which may be as great as the value of a dog.

593* 578 In the course of a quarrel a Nkundó woman may resort to a roundabout way of expressing her feelings; instead of cursing her husband directly she will address herself to a domestic animal which passes in front of her. The man is naturally not deceived, and the effect is identical.

What we have said applies to ordinary insults such as to wish a person's death, which may be expressed in the following ways: owá "drop dead," nkoi ékokomólé, "may a leopard get you"; [illegible], "may a snake bite you"; ótówé ó? "aren't you dying?"; ókono, "why don't you get sick"; [illegible], "may you be carried to the cemetery"; bákokundé, "may you be buried." Invectives based on physical defects or designed to humiliate a man fall in the same category. For instance a woman may call her husband [illegible] or [illegible], "a nobody," or [illegible], "idiot," or boyanyama, "brute," etc.

If, on the other hand, the woman in her volubility attacks her husband's parents, the matter becomes more serious. The Nkundó react very badly to verbal excesses directed toward them. Whether he is subject to teasing on their account or to insults such as "eat your mother (or father)," or to obscenities in relation to them, or whether the speaker "dishonors" deceased parents in evoking their memory. (1)

[illegible] 1. For the sake of documentation on Nkundó psychology and morals, here is the Latin text > 573 578 195 of a few fashionable expressions: vulva matris tuae, comede matrem in clitoride, coi cum matre. The same expressions, mutatis mutandis, are used with reference to a person's father, brother, or sister. The expressions used for "disinterring" are oiondola ilongo, isé, nyangó, etc., that is, "exhume your family, father, mother, etc., or bejwó báné, "your corpses," that is, your deceased parents (this last expression especially excites a strong reaction).

578 573 the effect does not vary greatly. [275] The only difference is in the intensity of rage and of the reactions, which depends on the individual temperaments of the interested parties.

578 593 622 A Nkundó is greatly outraged by obscenities hurled at him by his wife, especially if she attacks him in public. His reaction is always violent. Usually it comes to blows, a thrashing, and sometimes the knife. But if the husband wants to remain within the limits of the law, he cannot injure or, more especially, kill his wife on his own authority. Before going any further, he must bring his case before the ndonga. His family is invited to the meeting and, if possible, so is the wife's father. The outraged husband presents his case and warns the persons assembled that one day his exasperation will lead him to take up the knife. Having taken his case before qualified persons, the husband can from then on go ahead and avenge himself for the disgraces his wife may inflict on him; it is lawful for him to do so. If the guilty woman starts again, no one can accuse her husband of wronging her, for she herself is at fault and he has warned her in accordance with all the rules of the law.

573 578 [178] Modern young people do not always follow this procedure. But their revolutionary spirit often brings them reprimands and often gets them into great difficulties. The elders jealously guard their authority, and no one may reproach them for doing so. Therefore in a palaver of this sort, a father will sometimes forsake his son.

29/ The nkɔ́tɔ́ is unknown beyond the Jwafé and the Lalíaka. In that re-18? gion the women tie a string (or a belt of beads) around themselves and attach a second piece of cloth to it.

291 Thus the male garment is a rudimentary sort of shorts, open on the sides, while female dress is much more open. In general the efefe is an appropriate protection of one's modesty, but it is inadequate in certain positions. (2)

[611]
[594]

2. It may be interesting to note that efe nsombáyá, or just plain efe, which is the term for a man's garment, also indicates the male line of descent, while the female line is often designated by the term nkɔ́tɔ́ (sometimes by the word jefómoto derived from bómoto, "woman"). Let us add that lonkundó jwá nkɔ́tɔ́ means "pure, flawless Lonkundo, not corrupted by foreign influences." This expression should be compared with the following phrases: langue maternel, moedertaal, "mother tongue," etc.

291
[7] At present the nkɔ́tɔ́ is no longer worn except by a few elderly inhabitants of villages far from the main communication lines. Everywhere else the ancient mode of dress has been replaced by materials imported from Europe. The women wear at least a sengetófimbo, a kind of short skirt which falls from their loins at least to the middle of their thighs if not farther. Middle-aged men in the interior have simply changed the material of their garment but not its form. The younger ones, on the contrary, have frankly adopted the European mode of dress.

291
591
[584]
[571] A married woman is not allowed to enter the village of her relatives by marriage (bokílo) or appear before them [34] without supplementing her usual attire with one or more bekɔlɔkɔ (banana leaves cut into fringes). The term bokílo must be understood as it is meant by the Nkundó; it excludes those with whom the wife may sometimes perform the sexual act and who are called "husbands" loosely speaking.

[837] [196] 4) To indicate a tendency toward adultery (especially on the part of women) the Nkundó use the verb [illegible] which literally denotes clothing that is too big and that flies in the wind. The noun [illegible] or [illegible] is also used.

The verb used for discovering a case of adultery is [illegible], the noun is [illegible].

Occasional or permanent adultery has always been very common. This fact is undoubtedly due to the relative ease with which it is possible to escape discovery and consequent sanctions. A woman [578] going to visit her family cannot possibly be followed or watched by her husband; the distances make such surveillance difficult and, furthermore, it would have disastrous consequences for the stability of the marriage, since neither the woman nor her family would put up with it. Other partial causes are lasciviousness, polygamy, etc., as we will see later in the text.

2. Gifts

[837] [431] An adulterous man and woman send each other presents. His consist of meat, arrows, etc., hers of food and various small objects. A woman's gifts to her lover are called [illegible] (the noun [562] used with the verb [illegible], "to make bars" (1). Very young relatives generally serve as intermediaries. Note that a woman rarely sends her son, for she has reason to fear that the gift would not reach its destination; the boy would give himself a treat with it. She can have more confidence in a daughter.

A man's gift is called by the generic term [illegible], "a gift that is sent, a dispatch." [313]

In isolated cases ([illegible]) a man sends an arrow, some small object, beads, meat, etc. Nowadays money or cloth have been

---

1. Note that the noun and the verb are not etymologically related. Perhaps [illegible] might be related to [illegible], "to show, to designate." The Ekonda call this gift [illegible]. See Chapter II, Article I.

771 In matters of religion the Nkundó recognize the existence of a Supreme Being: Njakomba or Mbombiándá, creator and ruler of all that exists. They do not worship him in any way, however; all their religious practices are addressed to guardian and ancestral spirits. (2)

2. On the subject of the religious conceptions of the Nkundó, see a detailed study by Father Boelaert, M.S.C., in Hooger Leven, 1934, pp. 1612 and 1636, and 1935, pp. 12 and 60.

197 The language of the Nkundó is beautiful, harmonious, flexible, and rich. It has all the qualities needed to become a literary language and is admirably suited to the requirements of teaching. Furthermore, its various dialects are spoken over a considerably large territory, in fact over one of the largest language areas [13] of the Congo. 797 214 In addition to the religious and devotional books of the Catholic missions, a fairly large collection of various academic textbooks is available in this language, thanks primarily to the zeal of the Protestant missionaries. The latter have also published a complete translation of the Bible. Several vocabularies and small grammars have been compiled, and in recent years a large dictionary and an expanded grammar have been added to these, both compiled by A. and L. Ruskin of the Bongandanga Mission. For several years the Protestant mission at Bolenge has been publishing a native magazine, and the Catholic mission is pushing ahead with preparations to publish one also.

114 Father Shebesta's book, Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, includes a chapter on the Nkundó in which the author gives a good general description of this people. Nevertheless, some of the details given must be accepted with reservations.

121 The general information given above is enough to give the reader a superficial knowledge of the Nkundó.

The purpose of this work is to give a more extensive account of their institutions pertaining to marriage.

As we have previously stated, we are considering only a portion of this people. All our statements cover only the fraction we have delimited. The family institutions of other Nkundó groups are not accounted for, as they are less known to us and we do not want 382 so-and-so has died. Hours before his actual death, people everywhere know that a certain person is on his deathbed and that his death is imminent.

[100] If the witch doctor is up to his tricks of duping the silly Negro, people everywhere around know just what nonsense he is performing at what moment.

The White announces his morning and midday orders by means of the lokole and tells his workers when they may cease work for the day by the same means.

In the mornings and evenings and in the case of wet weather, the lokole carries especially far, but in the full sun it is not so effective.

282
534 The lokole is a large block of wood which is split down the middle for almost the whole of its length, and the inside part is carefully hollowed out. The lokole has the shape of an extra long, open mussel shell although, in general, the outside edges are flattened out.

322 The making of lokole is the trade of a certain person, and some Negroes are well-known for the lokole they have made.

Only four kinds of wood are suitable for the making of a lokole.
[illegible] These are (1) Bokungu; (2) Likomo; (3) Bolondo; and (4) Isi. The last is the most excellent kind of wood and the one used by the Mongo [illegible] Negro to manufacture his "ngula" (red dye) with which he smears his body for even the least important event that occurs in his village. The Isi is probably a species of redwood. The Mongo Negro makes 322 five different lokole: (1) logonga, small in shape; (2) lokole ja losali, 534 medium size; (3) bongungu, large lokole. These three are all like the one described above. They are struck with sticks (bosolo) from the "momambo" tree (umbrella tree). (4) Bonkuka is the large, high lokole that is struck with two sticks to the ends of which are attached several balls of caoutchouc. The sound of these lokole carries for the greatest distance. (5) Ngomo is the large, oblong, upright dance lokole. This lokole is simply a large, oblong piece of wood, completely hollowed out, decorated a little, about 1.25 meters high, and covered at the top with a piece of dried antelope or leopard skin. It is struck with the fingers and the palm of the hand. This lokole is the well-known tom-tom, still used by the Negroes on the steamboats to announce their arrival in the villages along the river.

202 And now something about lokole language.

198 The beat of the lokole varies, and it is by this means that the Negroes [101] understand the different words. The tempo varies also,

203
178
The White hears only the difference in tempo, nothing more. The Negro miles away understands what is being telephoned.

The lokole language consists chiefly of metaphors and is thus not intelligible to any White in the whole of the Congo. The Negroes are proud of their invention and also pleased that the White, who otherwise can do everything, is not able to understand their lokole.

Every man has his own name (nkombo) on the lokole with which he makes himself known. Because such a name often covers several lines of script, chiefly expressed in metaphors giving facts of the public life of the Negro concerned, it would be a physical impossibility for a White to master the lokole language in the way a Negro does. Actually, not even all Negroes understand the art of beating the lokole.

[562] The women have a general name; beating the lokole is only for the men; and no woman understands the art. The women understand what is being broadcast when the lokole is beaten, but they cannot beat it themselves. Moreover, they would be ashamed to attempt it; this is no task for a woman, and they would be laughed at. The lokole name, or nkombo, of the woman is as follows:

Bali la tolombo bosalaki lisala, bosalaki tombolako, tond' ol' nana, bofamba oka lisala.

"Women in numbers, worked the garden, prepared much to eat, consisting of bananas, to eat out of the garden."

A White, personally, has no nkombo of his own on the lokole, but to announce the arrival of a White in a village, the following is spread around far and wide:

Lolema jo lifeka feka, esongo etenaka nhola.

"The bat flies about everywhere, the pin wounds the nails of the feet."

With "the bat flies about everywhere" is to be understood the government agent who goes from village to village collecting the taxes. "The pin wounds the nails of the feet" means that, just as [724] the Negroes go on the warpath with sharp pointed sticks dipped in poison to wound the enemies' feet, the government agent is always on his rounds with his rifle, ready for the fray.

The nkombo of the Catholic missionary is as follows: [102]

(1) Bamele mele ba nkanga; (2) bofala boki ndaki lisako nde lokombo; (3) etafe bolo; (4) benanga belendaka la mpera.

197
797 Bosecio osele lo elonga. "The one always screaming who is followed into the high grass, the strong branch, the districts go along with the priest (Father).

1. The missionary is seen here as a witch doctor (bosecio osele lo elonga is a general lokole name for the Negro witch doctor), who, like the Negro doctor, is looked upon as a doctor and a priest.

2. Bofala boki ofeki lisako ole lokombe [sic]. The priest, because he is always seeking converts everywhere, is here compared with an antelope which, when it is followed, runs around and around in the high grass.

3. Etafe bolo. The missionary is here compared with a strong branch. He is strong because he is influential and highly regarded by the Negroes.

4. Besanga bekendaka la mpere. The districts all go along with the Father (priest). They all follow his instructions.

The nkombo of the Protestant Anglican missionary is as follows: Bofonge wonkola besanga bene nkenda l'Inglese.

"The fishing net is spread out; the country goes along with the Englishman."

In the same way as the fishing net cordons off a part of the river and everything is caught in it, so all the people go along with the Englishman. The Protestant Anglican missionary was in this district [797] before the arrival of the Catholic missionary, so this nkombo refers, of course, to this period. Since the arrival of the Catholic missionary, the situation has changed completely in this district.

These few examples give an indication of the difficulty in understanding the lokole language.

352
323 In addition, the Negro makes a few chairs, the most important of which is the lyelo la mpaka, the chair for the elder, a three-legged affair with two props under it, topped with a piece out of the umbrella tree; into this the elder can throw himself as lazily as he wishes.

Then there is the so-called ebonga, a little stool chopped out of a block of wood with the native axe. This is finished off attractively with an enumwa, a small paring chisel, and the seat is decorated around the edge with studs which have been bought in some factory or other.

572 [201] Friends seldom or never give signs of their affection, apart from gifts and mutual assistance. Men are seldom seen embracing, although women do so frequently.

The Nkundó are familiar with friendship pacts (called boseka or, among the Bombwanja, likandeko) (1). Two persons of the same sex are bound to one another in friendship (bota boseka or likandeko) [573] in the presence of a witness (ndonga), whose duty it is to deliver the gifts that are exchanged.

The conclusion of a friendship agreement is actually a custom of the women; men -- usually the husbands -- create friendship bonds only secondarily, in imitation of their wives. This pact is not automatically hereditary; the children may continue it -- through the same ndonga as their fathers -- but they are free to let it lapse. (2)

Two elements may be distinguished in the friendship pact: congeniality or affection and mutual assistance. The latter is in itself a sign of friendship, but it is not infrequently the sole reason for the pact among men who seek reciprocal support by this means. [36] As for the women, it may be said, on the contrary, that gifts are considered purely as tokens of affection and their bonds are based exclusively on affection. Often women who are very fond of each other do not bind themselves in a friendship pact but are content to show their affection in all simplicity. Men also may be very good friends without having recourse to a pact. But the conclusion of an agreement makes their relationship public and thus protects it against deleterious influences such as misunderstandings, disagreements, outbursts of anger, etc. One might say that the pact represents the addition of the element of reason to the element of emotion.

---

1. Bofili among the Ekonda, mbale among the Batswa.

2. See also a special reason for friendship pacts in Chapter IV, Article I.

764 for it was necessary first to celebrate the farewell feast, and the widower's family had to gather to discuss the matter and collect the valuables needed for the funeral payment (see the article which follows). Only after all that did the young men belonging to the [482] husband's family take the mortal remains upon their shoulders -- wrapped in a mat or enclosed in a coffin, depending on the case.

If possible all the husband's relatives take part in the procession. The pallbearers walk at the head. The men are armed with bows and arrows, knives and sticks, seldom with spears. The women accompany them [423], wailing. The husband and, if necessary, a few relatives carry with them the various objects they will need for the payments. Some men have a londósi (an [534] ocarina) (1) or an antelope horn on which they play intermittently. (2)

1. See my "Note sur les Instruments de Musique à l'Equateur (Note on Musical Instruments at the Equator)" in Congo, 1935, Vol. 2, July, p. 187, figs. 1 and 2 (p. 189).

2. Sometimes there is also an accompaniment of drums.

● [201] At the time the corpse is lifted and while passing through villages between their own and their destination, the lokolé is struck with regular and equal blows (-kómya) to announce the arrival of the funeral procession.

584 764 The chief personage among those who follow the corpse is not the husband, but the ndonga. He may never be absent at that time. Even if the husband is deceased and the procession is that of a widow who has not remarried, the ndonga must always be in the party. The duty of bringing the corpse of a married woman is above all his.

The ndonga may go ahead of the procession to inform the family of the deceased of her death, and if there is a great distance between the wife's village and the husband's, he may not be able [illegible] the sap, which she then mixes with water. The resulting liquid is oily and foams like soap. She places a few drops on a piece of banana leaf and makes a sachet of it. She holds this against the breast for a certain time until the boil, similar to a blood clot or a piece of liver, leaves the breast and enters the sachet. She then shows it to those present. From then on the mother can nurse her child without fear; her milk has become healthy and normal.

2) The mother's public confession must include the names of all the men with whom she has had carnal relations since the child's conception. Other groups, such as the Injɔlɔ, extend this obligation even to instances preceding that moment but which have not been declared at a previous occasion. The confession is public. The mamamas related to the husband begins to crush the leaves to be used in rubbing the breast; as she moves the pestle and says to the mother, "Name a man." The mother replies by giving a name. The mamamas says nyango, "indemnity." Then all those present say yangé, yangé, yangé, "Absolved." Then it is the other mamamas's turn, and she interrogates the mother in the same way. The process continues till all the names have been cited. If [486] the mother cites the name of a man who is a close relative of her husband and who therefore does not need to pay an indemnity, the mamamas does not reply nyango. Instead a member of the husband's clan makes the gesture signifying exemption: he holds the kernel of a palm nut (loliko) in his left hand and throws it by means of a small board which he holds in his right. Among the Injɔlɔ the man takes two kernels and strikes them against each other and then throws them away. Were the woman to suppress a name the child would die. If she has no admission to make, she replies, "No one besides my husband."

The indemnity that must be paid by those who are obligated to do so consists of a hen and a bunch of bananas (or their cash value) which are to be given to the mamamas, who will then divide them. Were the accused to refuse, the husband would demand a regular indemnity from him after the end of the seclusion.

The Bombwanja have this confession at the time of the [84] fastening of the fetus. A few old women married into the clan carry out the interrogation. The kernel of the fruit of the palm is thrown by means of a knife.

586 577 continuous state of enmity existed between his clan and the husband's, or if the husband owed him a substantial debt, one that clearly equaled the woman's bride price. In the first case a new war followed almost inevitably. Later on the woman's family contacted the new son-in-law. The gifts they brought were considered the dowry, and he began to pay the bride price. But there was no question of reimbursing the bride price to the first husband; relations between him and the woman's clan were completely broken. The difference between this situation and the standard procedure described above lies precisely in the fact that there is no restitution. In the case of a debt there was no restitution either. The woman's flight constituted a compensation (lowáfa) and was therefore so designated (N. ekongola ndá lowáfa). If the husband lodged a complaint, the judges sent him a piece of bofoló (1) to let him know that they did not want to concern themselves with his case, which he himself knew to have very poor grounds. Even the members of his own clan prevented him from making war; they knew perfectly well that the wrong was entirely on their relative's side.

The practice of taking refuge that we have just described was simply known as bejwó, bómoto ákowá bejwó, because that word was the principal one in the ultimatum.

178 586 577 As we have said above, the custom here described disappeared with colonization. Even though the scope of this study does not extend to the Nkundó who are settled north of the Tshuapa, it [303] may be of interest to note that an evolution of this custom is taking shape in the Losanganya region. If a woman is condemned for leaving the conjugal household and imprisoned, she asks someone to marry her -- if the opportunity presents itself. If the man accepts

---

[203] [628] 1. The bofoló is a piece of dried banana leaf which has been rolled up and tied with two knots (or more, as the case required). To indicate the end of a palaver, the bofoló is cut in two (or more) pieces, with a knot in each piece. One piece is sent to each interested party.

845 The event is announced by the usual signal, but the signal [203] is doubled or, if the children are of different sexes, the signal for each sex is given once. It is followed by the dance beat: two [538] or three long and two short.

The next day the father's relatives go outside the village, 845 preferably to a crossroads. On each side they plant a stalk of 778 [illegible]. All around the stalk they spread a little heap of small branches and various leaves called [illegible]. It is a sign and a place of benediction and good fortune. Each passer-by stops, picks two leaves, places one on each pile, spits on it, and says [illegible].(2) Then they clap hands and twice sing out, yelí yéyé. Such behavior brings the benediction of the twins upon a person's journey, his undertakings, his marriage. The umbilical cord as well as the placenta and membrane are buried under the heap.

2. Onomatopoeia for "spit."

845 Every morning the mother and father draw two stripes with 362 kaolin on the middle of their foreheads and on their arms, above [784] and below the elbow. They do the same to the twins. (3) They

3. Sometimes a double stripe is added at the temples The kaolin may be used pure or mixed with the red paint called ngóla.

continue doing so until the child is weaned. If after that time one of the children falls ill, they begin again treating him in this manner until he is cured, taking care not to omit his brother, lest he too fall ill. For while these designs are signs of joy, they are [751] above all a prophylactic measure against children's fever ([illegible]), [802] called wásanyi when it occurs in twins or in a child following them, and manifests itself chiefly by tumors of the head and face.

845 Twins are invariably called Mbóyó and Bokétu, names
551 given to the first born and the second respectively, whatever their sex. The Bombwanja (like the Ekonda) use the names Mbóó and Mpia, respectively. The mother takes the name of Ǎmbá.

396 the owner, and everyone who has helped gets his share according to
476 the amount of work he has done. [93] Frequently a big sugar-cane
[273] beer spree is started, where disgusting scenes often take place until finally the drunken men are taken home by their wives. In civilized Europe it is sometimes not much better.

502 Boats are made just large enough for two men, as well as others sufficient for a hundred or even a hundred and fifty men. The big war canoes of the great chief Evolisko of Waka and of the former chief of Bandaka, a certain Iseompoko, are known throughout the region. The war canoe of the latter was said to hold a hundred and fifty men, and the edge of this canoe to reach up to the shoulders of a fairly tall Negro. The ordinary canoe in which Whites travel is, as a rule, sufficiently large for twenty to thirty oarsmen.

435 The prices of canoes vary, according to size and strength, from 200 to 10,000 mitako.

The Lokole

203 The lokole plays a very large part in the life of the Negro. Without the lokole, the life of the Negro would be inconceivable.

The lokole can be best described as the public telephone with which the Negro makes his thoughts known publicly from village to village.

The lokole is to the Negro what the trumpet signal is to the soldier.

The lokole calls the men to meetings, to war, and to the hunt; the lokole calls all the people, great and small, to the dance. During the dance it is the loyal accompanist until deep in the night; its monotonous sound brings the enthusiasm of the dancers almost to the point of frenzy.

The Negro telephones his friends at great distances and explains what he wants. If two Negroes from the same village or from different villages have a quarrel, they abuse each other over the lokole, and the whole world is kept fully up-to-date on the details of the dispute. Each one tries to blacken the reputation of the other in the eyes of the other villagers. If someone dies in the village, it is proclaimed everywhere the whole night through, by means of the lokole, that 382 so-and-so has died. Hours before his actual death, people everywhere know that a certain person is on his deathbed and that his death is imminent.

[100] If the witch doctor is up to his tricks of duping the silly Negro, people everywhere around know just what nonsense he is performing at what moment.

The White announces his morning and midday orders by means of the lokole and tells his workers when they may cease work for the day by the same means.

In the mornings and evenings and in the case of wet weather, the lokole carries especially far, but in the full sun it is not so effective.

382
534 The lokole is a large block of wood which is split down the middle for almost the whole of its length, and the inside part is carefully hollowed out. The lokole has the shape of an extra long, open mussel shell although, in general, the outside edges are flattened out.

323 The making of lokole is the trade of a certain person, and some Negroes are well-known for the lokole they have made.

Only four kinds of wood are suitable for the making of a lokole. These are (1) Bokungu; (2) Likome; (3) Bolondo; and (4) Bol. The last is the most excellent kind of wood and the one used by the Mongo Negro to manufacture his "ngola" (red dye) with which he smears his body for even the least important event that occurs in his village. The bol is probably a species of redwood. The Mongo Negro makes 332
534 five different lokole: (1) Ingongo, small in shape; (2) lokole jo losali, medium size; (3) bongungu, large lokole. These three are all like the one described above. They are struck with sticks (bosolo) from the "momambo" tree (umbrella tree). (4) Bonkoko is the large, high lokole that is struck with two sticks to the ends of which are attached several balls of caoutchouc. The sound of these lokole carries for the greatest distance. (5) Ngomo is the large, oblong, upright dance lokole. This lokole is simply a large, oblong piece of wood, completely hollowed out, decorated a little, about 1.25 meters high, and covered at the top with a piece of dried antelope or leopard skin. It is struck with the fingers and the palm of the hand. This lokole is the well-known tom-tom, still used by the Negroes on the steamboats to announce their arrival in the villages along the river.

202 And now something about lokole language.

198 The beat of the lokole varies, and it is by this means that the Negroes [101] understand the different words. The tempo varies also,

[illegible] The White hears only the difference in tempo, nothing more. The Negro miles away understands what is being telephoned.

The lokole language consists chiefly of metaphors and is thus not intelligible to any White in the whole of the Congo. The Negroes are proud of their invention and also pleased that the White, who otherwise can do everything, is not able to understand their lokole.

Every man has his own name (nkombo) on the lokole with which he makes himself known. Because such a name often covers several lines of script, chiefly expressed in metaphors giving facts of the public life of the Negro concerned, it would be a physical impossibility for a White to master the lokole language in the way a Negro does. Actually, not even all Negroes understand the art of beating the lokole.

[illegible] The women have a general name; beating the lokole is only for the men, and no woman understands the art. The women understand what is being broadcast when the lokole is beaten, but they cannot beat it themselves. Moreover, they would be ashamed to attempt it; this is no task for a woman, and they would be laughed at. The lokole name, or nkombo, of the women is as follows:

Bali la nkombo basaleki lisala, basaleki tombolaloko, nand' el' mma, bafombe aka lisala.

"Women in numbers, worked the garden, prepared much to eat, consisting of bananas, to eat out of the garden."

A White, personally, has no nkombo of his own on the lokole, but to announce the arrival of a White in a village, the following is spread around far and wide:

Lolema je lileko faka, esongo esenaka nkola.

"The bat flies about everywhere, the pin wounds the nails of the feet."

With "the bat flies about everywhere" is to be understood the government agent who goes from village to village collecting the taxes. "The pin wounds the nails of the feet" means that, just as [illegible] the Negroes go on the warpath with sharp pointed sticks dipped in poison to wound the enemies' feet, the government agent is always on his rounds with his rifle, ready for the fray.

The nkombo of the Catholic missionary is as follows: [102]

(1) Bosasele nsele ba nkanga; (2) bofala boki ndaki lisako nda lokombo; (3) etafe bolo; (4) benanga bolendaka la mpeta.

[illegible] Bansola nsola ba ebanga. "The one always screaming who is followed into the high grass, the strong branch, the districts go along with the priest (Father).

1. The missionary is seen here as a witch doctor (bansola nsola ba ebanga is a general lokole name for the Negro witch doctor), who, like the Negro doctor, is looked upon as a doctor and a priest.

2. Bofala bobi ndeko lisako nda lokundu [sic]. The priest, because he is always seeking converts everywhere, is here compared with an antelope which, when it is followed, runs around and around in the high grass.

3. Etafe bola. The missionary is here compared with a strong branch. He is strong because he is influential and highly regarded by the Negroes.

4. Bosongo bokondako la nsanu. The districts all go along with the Father (priest). They all follow his instructions.

The okombo of the Protestant Anglican missionary is as follows: Bolango wonfala bosongo bomo okondo l'Ingliza.

"The fishing net is spread out, the country goes along with the Englishman."

In the same way as the fishing net cordons off a part of the river and everything is caught in it, so all the people go along with the Englishman. The Protestant Anglican missionary was in this district before the arrival of the Catholic missionary, so this okombo refers, of course, to this period. Since the arrival of the Catholic missionary, the situation has changed completely in this district.

[M]

These few examples give an indication of the difficulty in understanding the lokole language.

352
322 In addition, the Negro makes a few chairs, the most important of which is the lyeko la mpaka, the chair for the elder, a three-legged affair with two props under it, topped with a piece out of the umbrella tree; into this the elder can throw himself as lazily as he wishes.

Then there is the so-called ebonga, a little stool chopped out of a block of wood with the native axe. This is finished off attractively with an esumwa, a small paring chisel, and the seat is decorated around the edge with studs which have been bought in some factory or other.

575 594 896 consists of a beautifully fashioned native knife, or a lance, or mitako [copper wire used as currency]. In some areas, it was the polygynist who attended the mother at the birth of the daughter. He had the wood gathered, water brought, and food prepared. If, then, the expected child was a boy, the security was usually returned, and the contract declared null and void. If, however, the one who had given the security was a village chief or a man of importance, then the father of the child tried to give him another daughter. The father had, for instance, at an earlier time given a daughter to another man of much less importance. In the above-mentioned case, he would give back the bride price received, take his daughter back, and give her to the polygynist from whom he expected a larger bride price.

675 Sometimes too the boy was taken by the polygynist and remained in his family until the father could trade a daughter for him.

575 941 While very young and still a child, the little daughter was installed in the harem of the polygynist. She was brought up there, together with other children of her age and status; or rather, she grew up there in the midst of these heathen customs without any upbringing.

595 The composition of the harem of a polygamist:

The first wife was called the Bomatsa; she preceded all the other wives in rank, and in the absence of the polygynist, she was the mistress of the harem.

The second wife was called Ekila; she was the most loved and preceded all the remaining wives. She was also called Nkonda.

The third wife was called Bolumbu. At the appointment of the Bolumbu, a certain ceremony took place, and the wife was clothed with an animal skin. The Nku, a sort of patriarch and magician, sometimes had three or four Bolumbu who served as messengers to other villages. In this capacity they had special privileges. For instance, to attack a Bolumbu was a reason for declaring war. [302] [121]

[823] The remaining women were simply women of the harem, without distinction.

595 In the area of Monjoku, among the Bolee [Bole], the first wife was called Nkisa, with the same rank as Bomatsa. The second

764

765 literally that the deceased has hanged the heart, the former is used of a tree which leans over and falls from a great cut at its base.

764 On the announcement of the death, an expert drummer drums out the news. 766 There will be at least four drums of the type known as lokole, and a ngoma.* The four 534 drums are called by the names, Epanda, having the "biggest voice", that is a deep 202 bass note, Mongo, having a higher note, Mongonda, a high pitched note, and Nsekoa, having a very high penetrating note. To these four drums others are added; if the nkumu himself did not possess sufficient, they would be borrowed from the surrounding villages, and their notes matched with those of the first three drums, being beaten with them in their turn. Nsekoa is beaten simultaneously with Epanda, giving a rhythmic tattoo. When the news of the death has been sent out on Epanda, the funeral drumming commences, as follows:

539

Mongonda.	Botsangano w'Amba bekolo,
Mongo.	Nsala ilota, otongomoko,
Epanda.	Tokundi' ilenge nakumi' a nyama,
	Ondoloklaka nsenge,
	Lokenge lelondo nkomba,
	Bikoko lelondo lokolo.
Nsego.	Tokilako nkoi okonge,
	Tokilako nkoi okonge, &c.

The English and the interpretation are as follows:

Mongonda. A scattering of Amba, the snail. (The mother of twins, always called Amba, here gives her name to the snail because of her prolific progeny, which, upon being introduced to the world, scatter, while the mother dies. So the death of the nkumu will cause a scattering of his many wives and children.)

Mongo. Feathers fall; pick them up. (That is to say, for your arrow shafts, for if you don't, and come back later, the wind will have scattered them and you won't find them. So while the nkumu was alive it was the time for his children to learn his teachings so that when palavers came after his death they would be well acquainted with his wisdom and know how to settle them.)

Epanda. We are burying the ilenge, husband of animals, You have just eaten nsenge, The chin looks up at the ridge pole, The jaw bones look up at the sky. [225] (The ilenge is an animal much prized for its fat meat; the nkumu always gets his share when it is killed, and the skin is made into carrying straps for infants, and into belts. [563] Batwa are prohibited the use of it for any purpose. It is therefore fitting to liken the nkumu to the ilenge. Nsenge (sing. lolenge) is the equivalent of a snack. When a woman brings her cassava from the swamp where it has been soaking for several [264] days, her husband may be too hungry to wait the long hours required to cook it, [252] so to appease his hunger his wife takes a piece or two of the unprepared root, splits it in two, places salt between, wraps it in a lokasa leaf and roasts it in the hot ashes, where it is quickly cooked. So the nkumu just had time to eat a few nsenge; he didn't wait for the big cooking; his life was suddenly cut off.)

Nsego. Don't pull out the leopard's eyelashes. (That is, while he is alive; now he is dead one can disregard his power.)

---

* A lokole is a slit gong made from a hollowed log. The two notes are produced by striking the two lips of the slit. A ngoma is a hollowed log, open at one end, across which is stretched a rawhide.

614 kinship subgroup [Untersippe] for groups of rank C;
kinship group [Sippe] for groups of rank D (the exogamous units);
large kinship group [Grosssippe] for groups of rank E.

Local Organization

361 621 178 The second diagram[1] shows the settlement pattern of the Isangi group in its old settlement area up to 1949. At this time Isangi was relocated near the highway. Only two of the nuclear kinship groups of Isangi can lay claim to territory reaching far enough toward the east as to extend beyond the new highway. Thus, the resettlement process has led to a complete change of the settlement pattern. However, the functions of the settlement communities have not yet been adapted to the new settlement. At present the inhabitants are still so engaged in speculation about the possibility of a return to their own old territory that they have not yet reformed their village organization.

621 614 We observe that the village is divided into six settlement communities (30), each of which consists only of the members of one of the two kinship groups of Isangi. [200] We find that only the group of the father, which formerly was a kinship group in its own right, is attached to one settlement community of the kinship group Ngelé. Incidentally, we might point out that the names of the two kinship groups, Ngelé and Nkoto, mean "down the river" and "up the river." The older group is called "down the river" since in ngelé the river is large and wide. We come across this honorary term for the older group in some other villages although there is not always an "up-river" group. No corresponding settlement pattern can be found.

614 621 202 624 The degree of cohesion among the constituent kinship groups in settlement community I is so strong that the entire community has a communal bokendi, a communal messenger.

---

30. See Diagram 3.

[1] [page 7, category 116.—Analyst]

614 It is the task of the messengers to transmit all important mes-
621 sages to the other groups in accordance with a precise plan;
●202 this is particularly true regarding the invitations to the meetings
624 of the village council with the nkúmú. At the same time they inform the other groups as to the program of the meeting. The first messenger calls on the messenger of the other community; the old men are gathered at the latter's house in order to receive and to discuss the message. The messenger of this community, in turn, departs for the next in line. As a result of this practice the messenger and his home became one of the centers of social life.

621 The same uniformity is found in community II. Here
614 we can also see the engangala, the meeting place of the village
361 Isangi and of its branch villages. The meeting place is an open 623 space in which stands a short tree with a broad crown. The representatives of the several villages gather in the shade of this tree since one of the open men's houses could not accommodate all of them. The senior of the nuclear kinship groups Mpia (No. 14), Nsambi (No. 15), and Liengo (No. 16) has his house on this spot which is situated on the border of the territory belonging to these three groups. The elder of Mpia, however, is the messenger for the hamlet of Boyeke; he may of course be identical with the "elder on the engangala."

614 Cohesion within the third settlement community was also 621 so strong that it employs only one messenger. The kinship subgroup Nsambásálá which is concentrated in this hamlet is said to consist of the descendants of an illegitimate child of the daughter of the village founder (see Diagram 1). As is the case in many [782] other villages, it is therefore entrusted with the office of the [624] botóni, who carries out the sacrifice of human beings and animals on the proper occasions.

614 The three communities just described are relatively
621 homogeneous groups; the three following ones are quite hetero-
624 geneous. The two groups of hamlet IV belong to the kinship sub-202 groups Iyolo and Mbo. In contrast to the kinship subgroups Lovendo and Besilo, they regard themselves as sufficiently different from

614 each other to employ their own messengers. When the messenger
621 of settlement II arrives here, he first calls on the messenger of 624 the nuclear kinship group Bosɔ́bɛ́ (No. 19) and then to Impɛnga 202 (No. 26). The messenger from Bosɔ́bɛ́ calls on his relatives in
● settlement VI, who are the nuclear kinship group Mbelo-Mmuna
(No. 22), while the messenger from Impɛnga-Ndongɔ́ formerly had to call on the group Bommambo which is now extinct.

Settlement V consisted of three different groups. Bolíma, the group of the father, had its own messenger; however, he only received the messages without having to pass them on, which is also the case with all these last groups of the village. Both neighbors had their own messenger. The messenger from settlement I called on the nuclear kinship group Bolesangi, his relatives; the messenger from settlement III went to his relatives of the nuclear kinship group Ituli.

There were also two messengers in the last hamlet, but reports on this subject are insufficient since the nuclear kinship group Bommambo has been extinct for a long time.

178 All the settlements just mentioned have a common
614 characteristic: formerly, at important dance festivals, their 621 young men performed together in one joint corps de ballet. The 595 population was decimated as a result of the rigors of [201] the occupation period and also as a result of the population move-[161] ment into the cities. Consequently, there are not enough young people any more, and I with II, III with IV, and V with VI act together. Thus, in each case we find Ngelɛ́ and Nkoto united in one ballet. Although these groups have also been scattered [361] as a result of the new settlement pattern (next to the highway), the old organizational structure has been preserved, and the young people do not hesitate to walk the long distance to the practice field every day so they can dance in the old groupings.

621 All of Isangi, all three kinship groups, have one common
624 village chief, the Nkúmú, with an iyolo nsɛ́ka who gets the meet-622 ings started, and a village court with its judges. There are other groups which correspond to Isangi (31), but have more than one

---

31. See Müller, Fürstentum, pp. 73 ff., 76 ff., 133 f.

614 Each hamlet includes one or several message districts.
621 Even at the time of the old settlement pattern the messenger
624 system was determined by the hierarchical structure and not
● [202] at all by considerations of what was most practical (for example, the shortest route). Consequently this conservative institution of the conservative old men has not been affected at all by the relocation.

The villages are the communities of jurisdiction and of political life. Usually a nkúmú, presides over the meetings. If a village has several nkúmú, one of whom may be the judge or all may preside together, I have used the term "part of a village" [Dorfteil] for the district from which each nkúmú originates.

Those areas which have a special meeting place are here
361 referred to as a "province" [Gau]. The meeting place lies
621 within the territory of the oldest or second-oldest kinship group.
178 The practical importance of this institution for the entire province is minimal, but the two meeting places [202] which we discovered still constituted, until a short time ago, important social centers for the duplicate villages forming the administrative centers of the respective provinces. As a result of the relocation, the meeting places have now lost their function completely.

000 I hope that this paper has added new material to the discussion on the subject of ethno-sociological terminology, and that it will stimulate criticism and a new discussion of this important subject.

771 In matters of religion the Nkundó recognize the existence of a Supreme Being: Njakomba or Mbombiɛ́ndɛ́, creator and ruler of all that exists. They do not worship him in any way, however; all their religious practices are addressed to guardian and ancestral spirits. (2)

> 2. On the subject of the religious conceptions of the Nkundó, see a detailed study by Father Boelaert, M.S.C., in Hooger Leven, 1934, pp. 1612 and 1636, and 1935, pp. 12 and 60.

197 The language of the Nkundó is beautiful, harmonious, flexible, and rich. It has all the qualities needed to become a literary language and is admirably suited to the requirements of teaching. Furthermore, its various dialects are spoken over a considerably large territory, in fact over one of the largest language areas [13] of the Congo. 797 214 In addition to the religious and devotional books of the Catholic missions, a fairly large collection of various academic textbooks is available in this language, thanks primarily to the zeal of the Protestant missionaries. The latter have also published a complete translation of the Bible. Several vocabularies and small grammars have been compiled, and in recent years a large dictionary and an expanded grammar have been added to these, both compiled by A. and L. Ruskin of the Bongandanga Mission. For several years the Protestant mission at Bolenge has been publishing a native magazine, and the Catholic mission is pushing ahead with preparations to publish one also.

114 Father Shebesta's book, Vollblutneger und Halbzwerge, includes a chapter on the Nkundó in which the author gives a good general description of this people. Nevertheless, some of the details given must be accepted with reservations.

121 The general information given above is enough to give the reader a superficial knowledge of the Nkundó.

The purpose of this work is to give a more extensive account of their institutions pertaining to marriage.

As we have previously stated, we are considering only a portion of this people. All our statements cover only the fraction we have delimited. The family institutions of other Nkundó groups are not accounted for, as they are less known to us and we do not want 263 wild [140] throughout the region we visited. All the tribes are acquainted with it and use it regularly.

222 Collecting and preparing pili-pili are tasks especially re-
462 served to women. Upon returning from the fields, a woman 252 spreads the fruits on a mat before her hut and lets them dry for 263 five or six days. Sometimes she uses them fresh, mixing them with palm oil enhanced with salt. The native uses this sauce to season his dishes according to taste.

252 When the pili-pili is quite dry, the woman pulverizes it in 263 a small wooden mortar with a cylindrical pestle or with a small 412 piece of elephant's tusk. The shape of the mortars used for this purpose by the different peoples of the Lukenie varies a great deal. From the Bateke to the Batete, we found only very crude mortars hollowed out from the trunk of a tree. Among the Yaelima and Ipanga this utensil is more carefully worked and finished. The shape is rather like that of a small rectangular box without a lid, but provided with a lug. Among the Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu of the Bena Dibele-Kole region, we collected very crudely shaped and primitive mortars, while others were well made and carefully carved. All of them, however, have the common characteristic of an elongated vertical form, and most of them have a leg. The pestles are always quite long.

We thus again find three ethnic zones characterized by the special shape of these utensils. Of course, this fact alone could not serve as the basis of any ethnic classification, but it might have a relative value and importance in drawing general conclusions based on the whole assemblage of the ethnic characteristics of these various peoples.

263 Once reduced to a fine powder, pili-pili pepper is mixed with salt to season food after cooking. All sauces are spiced with a generous pinch of this pepper. Meat is sprinkled with it, or even stuffed with whole peppers.

When the natives are traveling, they merely pick a few pili-pili and squeeze the juice into the food while it is cooking. [141]

276 The kola nut also is very well known as a stimulant and is widely used. The kola tree is found nearly everywhere. The natives gather the fruit and chew it. Women do not indulge.

224 absolute and inescapable necessity for those tribes who have Batswá, since the latter provide them with a certain amount of the necessary meat, though in insufficient quantity. The people hunt in groups and individually -- in the latter case primarily by means of traps.
Fishing with nets is also very widespread, although various other methods are also known. The picking of fruit, caterpillars, mush-222 rooms, vegetables, etc. continues to be popular.

Among trades, that of the smith is foremost. However, iron 463 casting has been abandoned at the present time. Copper is brought in from other peoples by tribes serving as intermediaries. Wood sculpture is rapidly disappearing. Basketry [12] remains popular.
[286] Weaving no longer exists at the present time; in fact, looms can no longer be found in the region.

The family is patriarchal and the political organization cor-593ˣ responds to it; there are only heads of families. Indeed, among the Nkundó the family is the complete nucleus and foundation of the society. The result is a democratic and oligarchic government, but one very different from any we would call by that name in Europe.
554 Certain men become prominent because of their intelligence, their eloquence, their bravery, or their wealth, having great influence and often giving the appearance of chiefs whose authority extends beyond their own clan, but none of them has ever founded an empire. In the past the Bongíli were the most courageous tribe, and the one most feared. Besides, their geographic location was in their favor, as they had the Lifumba and the Bombomba, two sister tribes, on each side of them.

[517] The artistic tastes of the Nkundó are directed chiefly toward 538 music and the dance. Their oral literature is also very rich; it includes, for example, the epic of Nsongó and Lianja (1) and that of the tortoise.

---

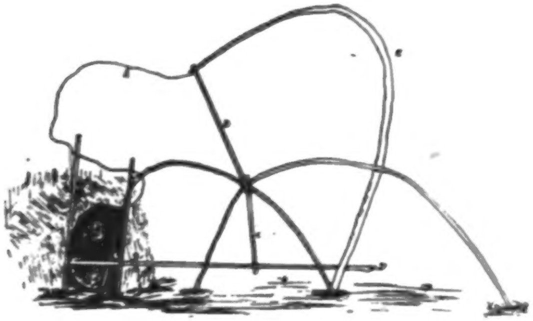
(1) The most important portions of this epic have been translated and published by Father Boelaert, M.S.C., in Congo, 1934, Vol. 1, pp. 49 and 197.

224 857 toward the small clearing. Badgered and frightened, the rats, mice, etc., run madly. Not daring to break through the line of beaters, they are pushed toward the clearing, hesitate an instant before entering it, then bound in. Without moving from their places, the little hunters wait for them and catch them in passing.



A sharp, quick blow and their ribs are smashed in, their skulls broken. Not one escapes; neither their size (some rodents are as big as hares) nor bites nor scratches frighten these tots of three, four, or five years of age.

224 ●223 857 The children also occupy themselves by capturing birds and small rodents with nets and snares. The latter are made with a flexible stalk for a spring and a cord with a noose. A system of small sticks which automatically trigger the release compels the bird to stick its head into the noose to reach the bait. At this moment, the mechanism is released, and the victim is pulled up by the cord attached to the stalk spring.

224 The natives also set snares of the same sort in front of holes of rodents and other animals or at a place where they habitually pass.

At the village of Madjuku, I had occasion to see the mechanism of a rat snare in action. In front of a hole, two arched sticks [62] intersect. A strong rattan stalk (E) has been stuck into the ground, and two piassava cords (A and B) are tied to its tip. One of the cords ends in a noose, which is placed in front of the entrance to the hole. A small stick (C) is attached to the end of the second cord. One of the ends of this stick passes behind the intersection

M 243 The cultivation of rice serves less to nourish the native than for trade. He usually sells his harvest immediately after the husking.

T M 244 Peanuts thrive in the region of the Banfumu and among the Bankutshu. They grow best in light soil and are not suitable for land cleared from the great forest. The crop demands a great deal of care and regular upkeep. Fields invaded by weeds yield nothing.
T M [462] The harvest takes place when the crop is mature and is the task of the women with the help of the children. The peanuts are placed in baskets carried on the back and taken to the village. The native spreads them out in the sun to dry. He turns them again and again, two or three times a day, and brings them into the hut at night.

M 249 Sugar-cane plantations are set up in marshy lowlands.

[462] [273] All the work on this crop falls to the men. These plantations are found only in regions where the natives make masanga, sugar-cane beer. Sugar-cane fields are especially numerous in the villages on the lower Lukenie and the Fimi.

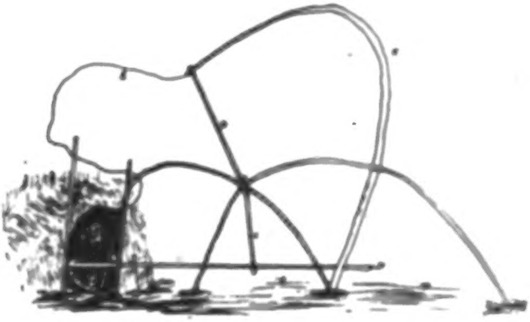
M 244 As a rule the natives also cultivate a few legumes, sweet potatoes, and yams, but on a small scale and without giving them any particular care. [61]

Hunting

● M 224 462 Hunting is practiced only by men. They engage in it, not for sport, diversion, or relaxation, but for the sole purpose of procuring meat and fat.

M 224 857 From their earliest childhood, the boys get together to beat the grass and catch mice, rats, and other rodents which swarm in the bush. Nothing is more interesting than to see them at work. Ten, fifteen, or sometimes twenty of them form a large circle. Armed with sticks, they beat the grass and make an unbelievable din. Little by little the circle narrows, moving in on a small well-cleared space. The oldest, most daring and most agile of the boys keep watch over this space, their eyes alert and riveted on the edge of the grass, ready to pounce. The beaters redouble their zeal, strike, shout, gesture, and gradually drive all the rodents

224 857 toward the small clearing. Badgered and frightened, the rats, mice, etc., run madly. Not daring to break through the line of beaters, they are pushed toward the clearing, hesitate an instant before entering it, then bound in. Without moving from their places, the little hunters wait for them and catch them in passing.



A sharp, quick blow and their ribs are smashed in, their skulls broken. Not one escapes; neither their size (some rodents are as big as hares) nor bites nor scratches frighten these tots of three, four, or five years of age.

224 223 857 The children also occupy themselves by capturing birds and small rodents with nets and snares. The latter are made with a flexible stalk for a spring and a cord with a noose. A system of small sticks which automatically trigger the release compels the bird to stick its head into the noose to reach the bait. At this moment, the mechanism is released, and the victim is pulled up by the cord attached to the stalk spring.

224 The natives also set snares of the same sort in front of holes of rodents and other animals or at a place where they habitually pass.

At the village of Madjuku, I had occasion to see the mechanism of a rat snare in action. In front of a hole, two arched sticks [62] intersect. A strong rattan stalk (E) has been stuck into the ground, and two piassava cords (A and B) are tied to its tip. One of the cords ends in a noose, which is placed in front of the entrance to the hole. A small stick (C) is attached to the end of the second cord. One of the ends of this stick passes behind the intersection

Ntomba

224 of the two arches, and the other one is held in place by a mobile stick (D) placed transversally between the tips of the arches in such a fashion as to bar the mouth of the hole. In leaving or returning, the rodent sticks its head through the noose, and being impeded by the transverse stick (D), it pushes the stick aside with its paws, releasing the trigger stick (C) and the bent branch (E) which snaps up. The rodent is automatically caught in the noose, pulled up, and strangled. This snare is remarkably sensitive, and the rodent who tackles it is invariably caught.

The natives also set up snares for antelope. Being very observant, they quickly discover the place where an antelope passes regularly, as well as the size of the animal. They place a rattan noose at this spot and carefully hide it in the grass and leaves. The animal sticks its head through the noose in passing and is trapped. The more the animal struggles, the tighter the noose is drawn.

The native sets traps for the large flesh-eaters, hyenas, leopards, and large wild cats. [Ed., the text is not translated from the third paragraph, page 62, to the second paragraph, page 64.]

[64] Hunting the elephant and the hippopotamus involves traps, pitfalls, the spear, and the harpoon.

The pitfalls consist of large holes dug along the paths frequented by the pachyderms. These holes are three to four meters long, two meters wide, and four to five meters deep. At the bottom, the native plants wooden stakes whose ends, carved to a point, are hardened by fire. The opening is hidden by a mat of tree branches and roughly plaited creepers, covered with leaves and grass. These traps are a real danger to travelers in the country, and therefore the native is required to indicate their presence by a conventional sign prominently displayed. I first noticed these signposts between the Mosengere villages of Lokila and Gomo Erenge: a strong stake perpendicular to the ground, on top of which the native fastens a hoop and a stick. The latter is fixed obliquely to the ground in the direction of a straight line from the post to the trap. If a native neglects to place the signpost, he [672] loses his right to the game caught in the trap, and he is held responsible for any accidents that might result from his negligence.

●224 Another trap, very often used for the hippopotamus, is made of a heavy iron point suspended above the path frequented by the pachyderms. During the day, they prefer to stay in the water or to sleep on a sand bank. At night, they leave their refuge to graze on the grass of the plain. More often than not the animal leaves quite visible traces of his passage on the bank as he leaves or enters the water. The native places his trap near these places, but avoids putting it at the exact spot where the animal comes out. Experience has shown him that the hippopotamus, being extremely cautious, is alerted by the least [65] alteration of this place and changes to another one immediately.

[411]

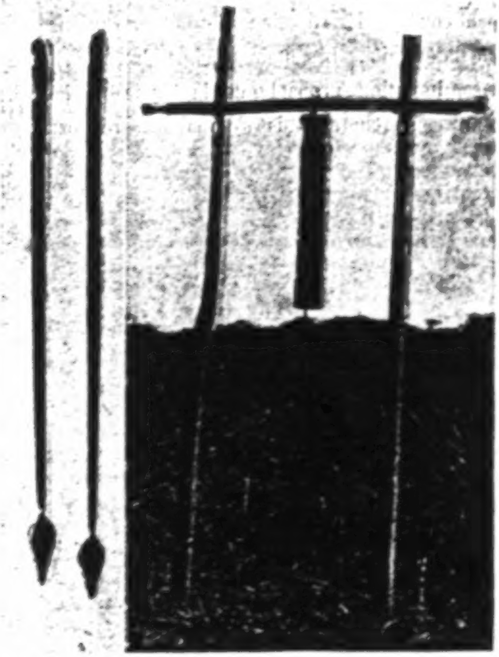


Fig. 40. Hunting Spears and Trap for Large Game, Lake Leopold II.

The iron point is embedded in a large block of wood. The whole apparatus is suspended four or five meters above the ground. A crossbar, one meter above the ground across the track, is held in place by the trigger device which controls the suspension of the

Teke FI33
Sakata FO43

M 224 ●

weapon. As he passes, the pachyderm strikes and dislodges the crossbar, springs the trigger, disrupts the suspension, and the spear falls heavily upon him. The trap is arranged in such a way as to hit the animal on the nape of the neck.

M 224 411

The native hunts with bow and arrow as well as with spear. The bow and arrow, however, is more a weapon than a hunting instrument.

The peoples in the territory between the Congo and the Kasai, as well as the Baboma of the Fimi have now given up these weapons. A few privileged persons own percussion guns which are usually more dangerous to the hunter than to the hunted. When the native fires a shot, he extends his arms, directs the barrel towards the prey, and turns his head aside. If, through cunning and patience, he gets to within a few meters of the game without arousing its attention, the shot has a chance [66] of success. Ordinarily the animal is more or less gravely wounded, unless the overloaded gun explodes in the hands of the imprudent hunter.

S T 411 322

The Bateke, Banfumu, and Baboma store powder in small receptacles made of a simple calabash or cut out of a block of hard wood. The calabashes are sometimes covered with a sheath of serpent or lizard skin to protect the powder more effectively from dampness. The wooden powder flasks are usually pear-shaped, probably to imitate the shape of the calabash. They have a wooden cover that fits very tightly into the body of the object, and the leather strap for hanging it up is attached to two holes cut in the body of the receptacle and drawn through two side openings in the cover. Very often these carved powder flasks are decorated with designs engraved in bas relief, linear motifs arranged in bands. The lines are sometimes curved, sometimes straight, and sometimes also oblique. The bottom of the powder flask is flat so that it may be placed upright [67] on a horizontal surface. The body of the powder flask extends into the straight cylindrical neck onto which the cover is fitted.

S T [53]

M 411 [77]

The bow with rattan thong is relatively rare. We found it only among the Tumba, Balesa, Bobaie, Batete [Tete], Ipanga, Batitu, and the Pygmies. This bow is made with a rattan stem, its convex section facing out and its flat section facing in. The rattan thong is attached to the two ends after having been drawn through 411 Yaelima it is sometimes as deep as five centimeters. The bow and arrow of the type we have just described serves both as an offensive and a defensive weapon. Its importance as a weapon must have formerly been greater. In our time wars between [721] tribes have become almost impossible. Attacks and reprisals by [578] individuals, on the other hand, are still rather frequent. This is especially true of the region east of Opombo. Every free Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and Yaelima owns a bow and arrows and does not hesitate to use them either to defend himself or to attack.

Yaelima

● 224 Hunting with bow and arrow is done on an individual basis. The game taken in this way belongs wholly to the hunter. [69]

[411] Among the Yaelima we found an arrow with a removable head that is notably larger, wider, and stronger, and that is attached to the shaft by thin cords. The natives use these arrows for hunting antelope and buffalo. When the animal is hit, the arrowhead penetrates its body, and the surprised victim flees into the bush or forest. The shaft of the arrow, buffeted by the tall grass or lianas, gradually works itself loose. The head, attached to the shaft by a cord, remains in the wound. With each motion, the animal enlarges its wound. The shaft, sooner or later, is caught in the lianas or grass, with the result that the head is violently jerked from the wound, making it a mortal one. This very dangerous weapon is not widespread, and for good cause. The native can use it effectively only for a point-blank shot. The range of the bow is limited; the arrow with the removable point is heavy; the iron point is very wide and has small barbs. To succeed in planting this arrow in the body of the animal, it is necessary to creep to within several meters of the game, to string the bow without attracting the animal's attention, and to hit it in the belly. The wounded beast may seek its salvation in wild and fatal running, but it sometimes turns against its attacker. In any case, the hunter who uses these arrows cannot do so without risking great [70] danger. Although the native likes to hunt, he also fears the dangers associated with this occupation. The only ones who use these arrows are the intrepid true hunters who have inherited some of the instinct and audacity of the Batua [Twa]. Inunu, chief of the Batitu of the Oshwe region, who was audacious to the highest possible degree and feared no animal, obstacle, or danger, asserted to me that he and a few other hunters did not hesitate to attack elephants with this weapon.

Yaelima

The native most often uses his spear for hunting big game, 224 or he contents himself with setting traps.

The peoples west of the Ipanga have given up elephant hunting. During our sojourn in the region of the Bobale, Basakata, and Balesa, the natives came to complain several times about the invasion of their manioc fields by elephants and the damage done by these inopportune visitors each time they came. They never thought of attacking the animals. To chase them away, they built fires and made an infernal din, while keeping their distance.

Fig. 44. Great Yaelima Hunter Showing his Harpoon Arrow.

[291
411
301]

In the region of the Ipanga-Batitu and among the Bokala-Yaelima, elephant hunting is rather frequent. The most daring hunters attack them with spears. This hunting is done on an individual basis. The hunter covers or smears himself with elephant dung. As he draws near, he takes a thousand precautions not to attract the attention of the animal, who is always on the alert. Once within range, he plants his spear into the under belly of the animal and gets away as fast as he can. The wounded beast 224 lunges forward at random until, exhausted by the wild run and loss of blood, it falls for good. The hunter follows the track for two or three days without ever tiring or losing heart. He infers the probabilities of success from the loss of blood, the footprints, the length of the paces, and many other signs, and as long as any hope remains he keeps up the chase. The animal sometimes manages to get rid of the spear. In this case, the hunter returns to the village and recounts his exploit to all who will listen. He does this not to establish a reputation, but to build up a claim against anyone who might find the animal if, by some wild chance, it should succumb to the wounds.

[441
291]

Fig. 45. Leaving for the Hunt in Yaelima Territory with Spears, Bows, Arrows, and Nets.

Communal hunting is more common. The natives use large [71] nets, spears, knives, and dogs. The group is divided into beaters, directed by a leader, and those who own nets and act as lookouts.

The first native hunt I had the pleasure to attend took place at Tua among the Banfumu.

Sakata FO43
Yaelima

S 224 778

of false bamboo, two or three arrowheads, and a small bow had been stuck in this paste. At the foot of the stake the natives had piled a whole series of antelope and buffalo skulls. These remains alone were vaguely reminiscent of the hunting fetish of the Kasai region.

M S 224 778

It is possible that this very simple form of the nkisi of the hunt is also the earliest and that it is closest to ancestral custom, since the primitive shelters of the neighboring peoples and the huts characteristic of the Bateke-Banfumu tribes are actually a mere elaboration of the custom followed by the parental branch of these peoples, a custom which called for the skull of the largest animal killed during the hunt to be dedicated to the guardian spirits of the hunt and to be placed at the foot of the physical representation of these spirits.

M 224 778

In the region of Oshwe and Bumbuli we found no trace of this custom. Each village, however, possessed its hunting fetish. The one in the Yaelima village of Yanga is among the most interesting. A tall shrub stands near a group of four huts located slightly apart from the principal area of the settlement. Two forked stakes, 1.20 meters apart, stand close by, and a straight stick lies on the ground, which may be placed on the forks. A small piece of a calabash hangs by two lianas, one of which is tied to the tree, the other to one of the forked stakes. The calabash contains substances with magic power: a mixture of mpembe and black earth, forming a muddy paste. Before leaving on a communal hunt, each hunter who owns a net must walk by this fetish. The head of one of his arrows or of his spear is dipped in the small calabash, and part of the mud that sticks to it [81] is spread on the nets. Upon returning from the hunt, a piece of flesh from one of the animals killed is hung on the crossbar lying on the two forked stakes. The custom of depositing skulls does not seem to be known in the region.

The hunting fetish of the Bokala in the village of Yoshomo Monene stands in the center of the native settlement. It consists of two forked stakes which may be joined by a crossbar, exactly like the framework of the Yaelima hunting fetish. The tall shrub is replaced by an herbaceous plant with thick leaves. The calabash containing the magic substances lies on the ground between the 224 778 plant and one of the stakes. The customs and ceremonies observed before leaving for the communal hunt are identical to those we have just described.

Yaelima

224 As to the relations between the fetisher, the hunting fetish, and the individual hunter, we will ignore them, having been unable to obtain any information on this subject in these regions.

Throughout the region we visited, large-scale hunting is done communally. As a rule, all the men participate, including young men from the age of 15. [Ed., the text is not translated from the last paragraph, page 81, to the second paragraph, page 83.]

[83] The catch of the communal hunt is shared among all the families in the village, with the chief and the dignitaries having special rights.

224 622 Individual hunting does not entail any distribution, except when a buffalo, leopard, or elephant is involved. [293] The tail of the buffalo goes to the native chief, who uses it as a fly-chaser and a badge of rank. [281] The skin of the leopard is reserved for the chief, who makes it into a skirt which he displays ostentatiously at important festivities and public dances. The trunk and tusks of the elephant go to the chief, while the bristles go in [778] [361] part to the hunters and [84] in part to the local dignitaries, who use them to make necklaces.

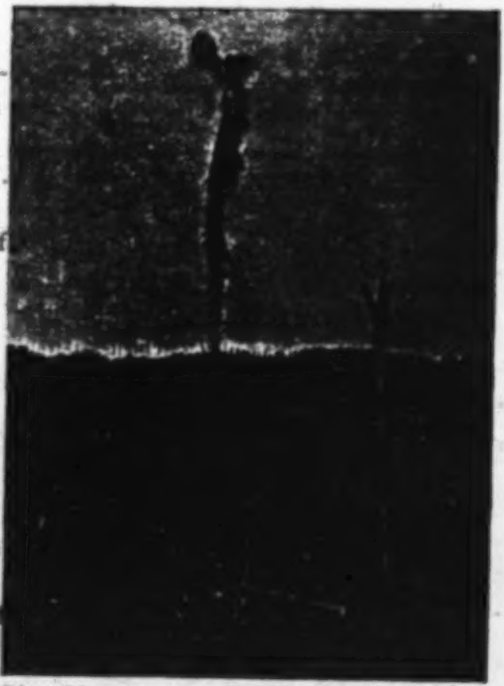

Fig. 51. Yaelima Fetish, Nkisi of the Hunt.

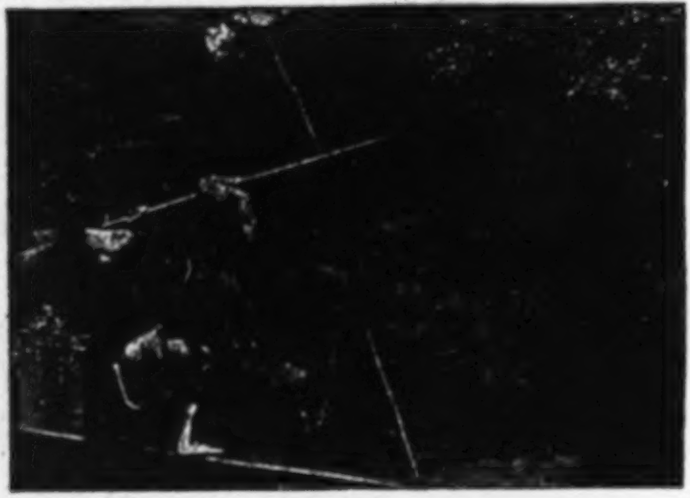
Ntomba

paragraph beginning on page 97 and continued on page 98 is not translated.] 000

[98] On the whole, we note the following special ethnic characteristics. 241

1) Uniformity in the cultivation of manioc, the staple food of all of these peoples. 241

2) Undertaking the cultivation of maize under the influence 177 of the ephemeral encouragement of Bula Matari [Ed., the European administration] among the peoples of the Congo-Kasai, and rice cultivation under Arab influence in the region of Bena Dibele-Kole. Contrary to what we noted concerning maize, the innovation introduced by the Arabs has become firmly implanted in the life of these natives, and the cultivation of rice will probably eliminate manioc eventually.



[226]

Fig. 58. Weir Fishing at a Dam among the Mosengere. Closing the Screens and Capturing the Trapped Fish.

3) Formation of a zone of sugar-cane cultivation, the development of which is in inverse proportion to the extent of the palm groves.

4) Complete absence of animal husbandry of any importance. 231

5) Uniformity in the methods of communal hunting and the 224 ● gradual development of attendant religious customs and practices 174 from east to west, corresponding to a decline in hunting by individuals with traditional weapons. This fact leads us to suppose

Ntomba

224 174 that hunting was practiced as a rule in the ancestral society without special recourse to any protective force or spirit and that primitive man relied wholly on his strength, skill, courage, and necessity. The small yield and the accidents involved in this dangerous sport probably impelled the primitives to go in groups, the first step to communal hunting. In the course of these forays, accidents must have occurred, some men being hurt and others spared. For no apparent cause, one hunt was successful and another failed. Not being able to understand the reason for these occurrence, the natives naturally ascribed their origin to spirits, from which arose the desire to gain the favor of these spirits. One can thus explain the magico-religious beliefs and practices, whose intensity, [99] elaboration, and spread are in direct proportion to the disappearance of individual hunting.

224 174 6) The existence among all the peoples of a few common fishing customs, so little developed unquestionably fish could have played only a minor role in the diet of the ancestral community. This community, therefore, must have lived in an environment ill-suited to the development of a fishing industry or too poor in resources of this kind to invite man's efforts in this direction in his struggle for existence.

7) In their migrations and displacement, certain groups settled in more favorable regions, and the families among them who settled in the immediate vicinity of well-stocked rivers and marshes adopted new fishing customs while partially giving up the hunting customs. [Ed., the remainder of the chapter, through page 100, is not translated.]

060 [101]

Chapter 4

Food

Making fire. -- Extraction of salt. -- Preparation of food. -- Manioc. -- Maize. -- Bananas. -- Meat. -- Fish. -- Peppers. -- Extraction of palm oil. -- Beverages. -- Water. -- Malafu. -- Masanga. -- Pombe. -- Stimulants. -- Hemp. -- Kola nuts. -- Tobacco.

101
619
[825] recollection of an animal of the leopard family which they call bokonga. Their description of it corresponds to the lion. Some soldiers and other expatriates, who were also young people, shown representations of a lion immediately identified it with their bokonga.

The groups under discussion here lived for a time on the banks of the Luwo (Maringa) and the [11] upper Ikelemba, (1) then under pressure from other Mɔ̃ngo tribes, they crossed the Tshuapa-Ruki. They evicted the Ekonda and settled in their present location. This exodus must have taken place a fairly long time ago; it is impossible to determine the date and difficult to make any estimates. In any case it must have occurred 150 to 200 years ago.

[173] 1. It appears that between the Ikelemba and its tributary the Losflifa, there is still a bonkom tree called w'āmenga (of bald heads) under which, according to tradition, the ancestors held their councils. Nearby there is a bosdd whose fruits never ripen.

241 These peoples are primarily farmers; they grow chiefly bananas, manioc, yams, colocasia [taro], sweet potatoes, sugar cane, and various vegetables and condiments. The food crops they grow, together with what they gather and the Elaeis palm trees provide them with a continuous and abundant food supply, as long as elephants do
[231] not interfere. Their domestic animals include chickens, goats, and 224 dogs. (2) Hunting is a pleasant change of activity rather than an

[177] 2. Ducks have been introduced fairly recently, but they were known long before colonial times. They came from the south. Sheep have been introduced only in the last few decades, and they are found only in a few villages on the river banks in the lowlands.

224 absolute and inescapable necessity for those tribes who have Batswá, since the latter provide them with a certain amount of the necessary meat, though in insufficient quantity. The people hunt in groups and individually -- in the latter case primarily by means of traps.
Fishing with nets is also very widespread, although various other methods are also known. The picking of fruit, caterpillars, mush-222 rooms, vegetables, etc. continues to be popular.

Among trades, that of the smith is foremost. However, iron 463 casting has been abandoned at the present time. Copper is brought in from other peoples by tribes serving as intermediaries. Wood sculpture is rapidly disappearing. Basketry [12] remains popular.
[286] Weaving no longer exists at the present time; in fact, looms can no longer be found in the region.

593x The family is patriarchal and the political organization corresponds to it; there are only heads of families. Indeed, among the Nkundó the family is the complete nucleus and foundation of the society. The result is a democratic and oligarchic government, but one very different from any we would call by that name in Europe.
554 Certain men become prominent because of their intelligence, their eloquence, their bravery, or their wealth, having great influence and often giving the appearance of chiefs whose authority extends beyond their own clan, but none of them has ever founded an empire. In the past the Bongīli were the most courageous tribe, and the one most feared. Besides, their geographic location was in their favor, as they had the Lifumba and the Bombomba, two sister tribes, on each side of them.

[517] The artistic tastes of the Nkundó are directed chiefly toward 538 music and the dance. Their oral literature is also very rich; it includes, for example, the epic of Nsongó and Lianja (1) and that of the tortoise.

---

1. The most important portions of this epic have been translated and published by Father Boelaert, M.S.C., in Congo, 1934, Vol. 1, pp. 49 and 197.

583 431 to leave her husband and he, in revenge, were to lay hands on her mother or on one of the other wives of the clan. (1) [148]

1. See Chapter VI, Article VII, 4, (1), and Chapter VIII, Article II, 1.

7) Lombɛ: a wide shoulder strap made of fur or braided [824] bɛkombɛ reeds (Calamus sp.), though valuables of equal worth (one knife or a konga) may be given. Nowadays this boɛ́ngo consists of 2 or 3 rings; it goes to the mother in compensation for the wearying burden of carrying and nursing her daughter. (1)

1. Note that when a mother-in-law brings a child into the world, her son-in-law sends her a shoulder strap of liengɛ́ otterskin or a konga of equivalent value. He does not repeat this gift at each birth, however.

[854] 8) Betɔ́tswá byá nkwá: leaves of the bonkongɛ́ bush used to remove, wipe off, and carry away (tɔ́ta) a child's excrement. This boɛ́ngo consists of a ring and goes to the mother as compensation for her performance of these tasks. In the absence of the mother, it is claimed by another of the father's wives or by a female relative of the mother.

● [224] 9) The bojángá, "hunting net," is demanded in many villages for no special reason. Certain clans, however, scoffed at by others because they have few members, officially ask a man belonging to one of the latter and wishing to marry one of their daughters to bring a net, saying: "You make fun of us because we have no people; bring us a hunting net to surround and enclose us, since we are not many." Thus the village of Boyela of the Bakáala, never gives one of its members in marriage without this boɛ́ngo.

[184] 10) Wɛ́ngɛ́ w'ákɛkɛ: a boɛ́ngo which is not known everywhere but which is customary in certain groups, for example among the Bakáala. One of the woman's relatives takes a piece of a young thorny trunk of the wɛ́ngɛ́ tree. Having scraped one end of it, he holds this

602 brings forth reprimands on the part of the husband and his parents which obviously can easily degenerate into quarrels. If the omissions are so frequent and of such a nature that they can no longer be explained as simply forgetting, a whim, or a fit of peevishness, but [299] are taken to indicate spitefulness or vulgarity, the matter is [621] brought before the ndonga (who is often assisted by the family tribunal) or brought before the authority constituted by the woman's kin. If in spite of everything the expected improvement does not take place, the break-up is inevitable.

606 The husband's father and mother extend the same affection to their son's wife as they feel toward him. They consider her their own child, and it is not unusual to find that their love for the wife equals their feeling for their own son. She is only a relative by marriage, but out of affection for her they call her their child. She, for [601] her part, does not use toward them the term bakanga (or bakilő) but out of filial respect calls them "father" and "mother." Exceptions to this practice may be found, however.

606 224 If the father (and those who fall in the same category such as uncles, elder brothers, etc.) kills a large game animal, he is expected to give his son's (or brother's, etc.) wife a piece of meat, whose size depends on the number of daughters-in-law he has and which consists of one or several chops (bokálako) (1) and the piece at the nape of the neck (botómbyá).

606 835 Illicit relations between the husband's father and his daughter-in-law would be an unheard of crime. The same would be true with respect to any of the "superior" relatives. (2) The laws regulating

---

1. Called lieto among the Bolengé and the tribes of the Losanganya.

[178] [184] 2. Only the Boangi -- like the Elángá of the Losanganya - allow relations between a brother and the wife of his junior; and they are already beginning to find imitators among their neighbors to the southeast, the Injóló.

595x 789 magic known as yoli. She alone participates in the ceremonies that accompany it; with her husband she eats half of the hen that has been killed for that purpose, and on that night she alone may share his bed. Finally, only with her, to the exclusion of the co-wives, may the husband eat the fish called wengɛ́, and only she may and must burn the leavings. Otherwise the magical practice would turn against its owner.

When a piece of game is divided, the bomátsa is entitled 595x to the lintála (the lower portion of the breast), which would go to ●[224] the man's mother (or his father's or his elder brother's wife) were he a bachelor.

In the bomátsa's absence, her place is taken by her ebísa (see below, Article IV) or by the wife who follows her in seniority. At her death, the same rules govern her succession.

The name bomátsa is probably derived from the root mátsa, "to begin." She is the one who founds the family. Sometimes she is also called ikɔ́kɔ́yɔ̂njemba, literally "bachelor's love." The Bombwanja say itɔ́kɔ́yɔ̂njemba (the Ekondà, nkámukolo).

In addition to the bomátsa, reference is sometimes made to [344] bomátsa w'îáli, or "bomátsa of the left." The bomátsa in the strict sense of the term is contrasted to the latter as bomátsa w'îlɔ́me ("of the right"). The bomátsa of the left is a polygamist's second wife. She is given this name because her house is at the left end of [592] the loánjá. She has no special rights or duties, however, unless the actual bomátsa delegates to her the task of looking after her end of the compound. If the harem is large, the husband may set aside [224] for her a special portion of the game, called itɔ́mbantáta, or nape of the neck. In her absence it goes to the eldest daughter.

Article II. The Favorite

595λ 556 All polygamists of any importance have a favorite wife, or nkɔ́ndɛ́. But only the rich and the notables have a true nkɔ́ndɛ́. The minor polygamists, of course, imitate the others (nkɔ́ndɛ́ ɛ́â weɔ́lɛ́ or ɛ́â itsiɔ́, "without great importance"), but they do so without

She does no work in the farm or kitchen. She always has an 595x ebísa to wait on her. If her family has no member they can let her have, she will borrow an ebísa from a distant relative or a friend.
A nkóndé does not travel on foot; she is carried in a hammock [482] (hunting net). Her husband accompanies her on foot, however. But [556] this was done only for a true nkóndé of a rich man, and the custom is disappearing today.

A favorite may not leave her husband, even to go and see her parents. In the past some men were so jealous of their favorites [514] that they would not allow them to satisfy even their most private needs unless they themselves or some sentinel (usually a Botswá) stood watch. A man could not even go into the vicinity of her hut, which is built just behind the husband's shed. For although the husband is sometimes tolerant of the passions of his other wives, he always shows [152] an intransigeant jealousy [346] in relation to his favorite. He never travels without having her accompany him.

The favorite has the honor of performing small personal serv-[515] ices for her husband; she cuts his hair, helps him in the removal of body hair, scratches his pustules from ringworm or prickly heat, anoints him with oil, paints him with ngóla, and, in a word, performs all the tasks connected with his appearance and hygiene.

Out of love for his favorite, her husband can buy her corpse 595x for the price of a slave (in kind or in money). By doing so he obtains 766 the right to have it buried beside his own while those of the other wives must be buried with their native clans. That is why in some regions a husband calls his favorite his ikundaka (from kunda "to bury").
Nevertheless, if her husband dies before she does, his heirs may not trouble themselves about his wishes and no longer require that the favorite be buried in their cemetery. That is what happened to Bongóla of Bongíli, whose husband Ikilinganya of Bongangá (Boéndé) had paid the price of two slaves for this right. When the husband has ●[224] killed large game, the favorite, like the bomátsa, has the right to receive her personal predetermined portion (boando). Her part is the neck or a chop, which in her absence, goes to the sons or their wives.
The other wives do not have the same right; each one obtains only an ordinary piece (liondo).

624 customary manner, with a double clap. They are told by the nkumu to repeat the salutation, and having done so may be asked to do it a third time. They are then 576 given a few rods in payment. If the nkumu sees some member of his own ekopo coming to greet him, he gives him special honour by ordering him to lie flat on his back instead of merely sitting, and at the end he gives him a larger gift of rods than the others receive. In this way the nkumu may pay out a great many rods to those who thus render him homage. Ordinarily a man will receive five or six, but one 624 specially honoured may be given as many as twenty. From the beginning the nkumu has to pay heavily for his honours, and only a wealthy man can hope to attain them.
[556] For this reason a lawful successor, if not wealthy, may be glad to give up his rights to another more fortunate member of the ekopo. Homage having been paid, word is sent out that the nkumu is about to come forth, and crowds begin to gather. A coat [302] of red camwood powder mixed with oil is smeared over the nkumu, the brass plates are attached to his montolo, and he is attired in all his finery. The crowd outside dances, and when tired sits on the ground to await the rest of the ceremony. Inside, [533] the lokombi begins to play, the nyemba to sing, and the Batwa ntotii to praise the nkumu by uttering an ululating sound. Accompanied by Nsono, Bilepo, and the maomi, the nkumu himself begins to dance. The temporary protecting screen round the ipana is pulled down, and he is seen by all. After his dance he retires again and the crowd disperses.

When Nkema Akuke becomes nkumu he changes everything possible so as to [481] become different from other men. Thus he assumes a different gait, a sort of bow-legged waddle, a different tone of voice, and it seems that under this influence even his facial features undergo a change. Accompanied by his retinue, he visits the various villages where he has friends and relatives in order to greet them. This over, the musicians wish to take their departure and are paid for their services by the nkumu.

624 At the conclusion of these ceremonies the nkumu with his ekopo and the molembe negotiate concerning their obligations to one another. If the nkumu is the first of his 596 line, he and his ekopo are given land to cultivate, while succeeding nkumu simply take over the land originally accorded. The molembe call their nkumu their wife, and they 621 designate themselves husband. They thus reckon the relationship between molembe and ekopo to be that of husband and wife, and, as in an actual marriage, there must be an interchange of obligations performed in a spirit of harmony. Also, as in marriage a wife may be divorced, so an nkumu with his ekopo could be sent off to their home and the arrangement terminated. It not infrequently happened that as strangers
the ekopo fell out with their hosts and if such a disagreement could not be righted
they might be refunded the payments with which they had purchased their rights, and sent off home.

224 Among the reciprocal obligations of molembe and ekopo are included the sharing of certain animals and birds killed in the hunt, among which are the leopard and 624 elephant. All killed, whether male or female, must be divided. Of certain other animals, including the wild pig, antelope, and buffalo, if a female, no portion is given, 621 if a male, the required portion is presented. These reciprocal obligations are limited 596 strictly to the ekopa and molembe; if others outside of these groups wish to present the nkumu with meat to honour him or to curry favour, they may do so, but they are under no compulsion. If one of the contracting parties fails to fulfil its pledges in this matter 224

of giving part of the kill, or in anything else, the aggrieved party may call the council together. This consists not only of members of the molembe and ekopo, but of all 624 elders of the village or villages connected with this particular one. The party judged 596
in the wrong, whether ekopo or molembe, will be fined, the injured party receiving its 621 share, and both parties will be charged to live together harmoniously and observe their contracts.

The power of the nkumu was apparently limited, and did not supersede that of 624
the momene mokonda. When trials came up, the aggrieved party might go either to the momene mokonda or to the nkumu. If it was necessary to call the village elders together 695 about it, both these authorities were present at the hearing. First the young men of the group were allowed to give their verdict, then the old men, after that momene mokonda (or the molomi o ehe), and finally the nkumu was given the privilege of the last word. He would comment on the opinions of each of the judges, criticizing one young man, commending another, and then giving his own verdict, at which the group would assent by saying, 'Even so, grandfather'. The whole group of judges would then fix the fines, a double portion of which went to the nkumu.

The actual manual labour which an nkumu may do excludes anything endangering 624 life or limb, or requiring agility and speed. He may clear the bush for his gardens:
this is a man's work. He may take part in the building of his houses, but may do no high work, and, among the inland groups, it is the work of the Batwa to put the [563]
roof on for him. The nkumu may also prepare pitfalls for catching game, but cannot engage in any other type of hunting or do any fishing. Digging a grave is prohibited, for, as we shall see, everything pertaining to death must be ignored by the nkumu.

Other rules affecting the daily life of the nkumu may be roughly divided into three: those affecting his person, those having to do with his food, and social regulations.

One of the great points of observance in the first class of regulations is the impor- 624
tance of the montolo. The nkumu must on no account be seen during daylight hours 292 with an uncovered head. If he wishes relief from the cumbersome montolo he may take it off in the darkness of his house and put on an ordinary hat made of skins, and when night falls he may walk where he will bareheaded if he so desires. The skin hat, known as louku, may be made from two animals only, in the case of an [824]
nkumu, one being the nkulupa, a species of antelope with light-coloured hair, and the other the iyoko, an animal resembling a beaver. The skin of the nkulupa may be used by anyone, but the iyoko is reserved for the nkumu only with one exception. The skin of the iyoko may also be used for the carrying strap for infants known as nyamba, [854] which is worn over one shoulder in bandoleer fashion. For the nkumu the skin of the iyoko is limited to the informal hat, louku, and for making into the lokoto, a pouch used for carrying small objects and worn like a sporran. As a corollary to the importance of the montolo may be noted the importance attached to the head of the nkumu, which must never be seen uncovered in daylight.

The Bonginda nkumu never wash in the daytime, but may wash at night with hot 624 water. The inland nkumu never wash. Even the Bonginda nkumu never wash their heads, and no nkumu ever cuts his hair. If the nkumu becomes too greatly incon- 515
venienced, one of his wives may delouse his head, but only within the privacy of the [184]
house, by the light that enters the rear opening.

Fishing

● M 226 Near rivers, swamps, and lakes, fishing is one of the principal occupations of the native.

M [462] Unlike hunting which is practiced only by men, fishing is done by both men and women. The latter, however, practice it only occasionally and fish only by damming up part of a river bed or marsh. The dam is usually built during the rainy season, but as long as the water is rising, the women leave all the sluices wide open. Toward the end of the rainy season, they narrow the drain channels and set large traps before the openings. These traps M 226 285 are attached to strong wooden stakes on the shore near the dam. The traps are made of splints from the ribs of raffia leaves and are plaited in openwork with the open spaces varying in size. The exterior form is always the same. Cylindrical at one end [85] and the other end closed along the diameter, the trap resembles a large cone ending in a line at the top. These traps are built over a framework made of two, three, or four hoops. Their diameters vary according to their positions. They are set inside the trap, the largest one at the base, the smallest one toward the upper end. The transverse elements, doubled and woven alternately in and out, are spaced 10 to 15 centimeters apart and are usually made of strips of rattan. The inner trap, or entry trap, is plaited in the shape of a broad fan, conical

S M [227 285]

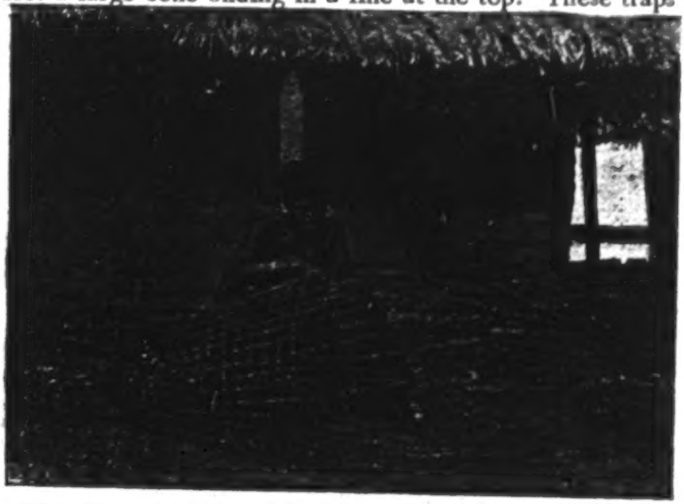

Fig. 52. Making a Fish Trap among the Wadia and Tumba.

in form, with an ellipsoidal base. The open top is the entrance hole. The ends of the splints overlap somewhat on the inside in order to prevent the trapped fish from retracing their paths and escaping. 226 285

These traps are made only by men. When the plaiting is done, the work is flat, and then the finished latticework is fastened to the frame. [462]

The trap is opened by detaching the binding that closes the top.

As the waters recede, a woman lowers the trap. Morning and evening she comes to inspect it and to gather the captured fish. [86] 226

When the waters have fully subsided, the women assemble and go up the river or into the swamp. Standing across the full width of the watercourse, they walk down, chasing before them the fish that remained in the dammed-off area. They make an earshattering din, slapping the water with broad sticks or churning it with arms and legs. The hunted and terrified fish flee wildly only to be caught eventually in the trap. If they try to break through the line of women, the latter do not hesitate to grab and fling them on the bank. [Ed., the text is not translated from the second paragraph, page 86, to the second paragraph, page 87.]

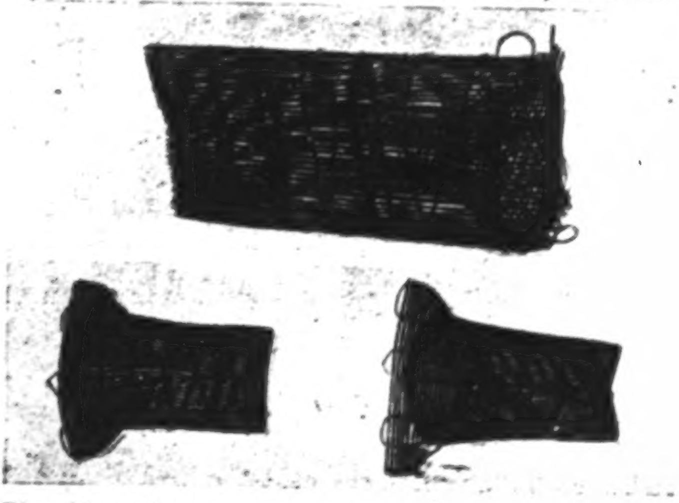

Fig. 53. Fish Traps used by the Peoples of Lake Leopold II.

[226
285]

Yaelima

●226 [87] After the drive through the dammed-off area, there are usually several fish remaining that succeeded in slipping through the chain. The women then take baskets and bail the pool dry, throwing the water over the dam.

Very often the women dam up part of a marsh or stream and bail out the water with baskets without setting traps or waiting for the water level to go down.

In all three cases we find: 1) setting the trap in front of the drain channel; 2) the drive in the dammed-up area; and 3) bailing out this section. The catch is divided equally among the women who participated in the work. [88]

These three methods of fishing prevail among all the riparian peoples of the Congo, Kasai, Fimi, Lake Leopold II, and the lower Lukenie.

On the upper Lukenie, starting with the Oshwe sector, no traps are made. At most the women occasionally dam up a section of the rivers and streams of the interior and bail them out with baskets to catch the fish.

226
184 The Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and Yaelima do not fish at all. They are people of the forest and not of the water. Hunting is their chief occupation, and fishing is unknown to them.

In this connection, these tribes are wholly distinct from their neighbors to the west. It must be noted, however, that even among the latter all the clans do not engage in fishing. The groups of the interior do not fish any more than their brothers of the sector of Oshwe and Bumbuli. The traps and other contrivances which we shall discuss below are unknown to both groups. In this respect, all these peoples have a common characteristic, recalling their common origin. In the lower Lukenie and farther west, however, part of the population, the Bandzali, "people of the water," have adapted themselves to the new conditions of their environment. The river became for them a source of wealth and well-being, and a part of their social activity was oriented toward the exploitation of this precious resource.

226
258 At the present time fishing and the preparation of salt are practically the only means of subsistence and unquestionably the principal occupations of all the riparian groups in the region of Leopoldville, Kwamouth, Lake Leopold II, and the lower Lukenie.

226 258 Among all the tribes of this region, we were able to distinguish clearly between the groups of the interior, whose chief occupation is hunting, and the riparian groups who prefer to fish and make salt.

Two clans arose in this fashion within a single ethnic group. They both belong to the large family known by the name of the tribe, and yet they are completely different in the habits, practices, and customs relating to that aspect of their lives.

226 During the dry season, one sees the natives from villages located two or three hours' march into the interior come to establish camps on the [89] river bank and to set up veritable fisheries. The information that follows applies to these groups and to all the peoples from Leopoldville to the sector of Tolo inclusively. The rivers, lakes, and marshes in this region are extremely well stocked with fish. As a matter of interest, we give here the list of some native names for fish noted by Mr. Bayens and used by the Bandzali of the Tolo region: kinkure mbieme, lepari, ignognienge, mpushu, lokanga, itike, mokonga, n'sombo, loana, sabere, lboie, moelo, n'ikulu, m'binga, pesule, m'butu, mondja, mshime, moekiki, lupungu, ompara, m'vunu, longelenzali, monkie, komoe, ikeke, koshoie, nokama, singa, n'guikemen, m'pio, mwiki, ekambela, lekumu, elangu, evuya, mekamo, m'beli, motume, idzore, kebaie, kupu, mokeja, kevuni, mopa lekeje, mipari.

Aside from fishing with dams, these different groups fish both individually and communally.

Individual fishing is done by the following methods.

1) Fishing with hook and line, angling. The hook is made of a very fine splint of false bamboo, folded back and held in the shape of a hook by a fine raffia fiber. This raffia fiber extends on to form the fishing line. It is attached to a splint of bamboo which serves as a float. The native does not keep watch over his line. He fastens the lines with the hooks on them to a rope of twisted fibers. The lines are spaced 30 to 50 centimeters apart. The rope is 10 to 15 meters long and is attached to a stick at either end. The native plants two stakes in the river bed. He attaches the two ends of the rope to them, taking care that it is stretched perpendicularly to the current. The lines with float and hook are uncoiled, the bait consisting of a pellet of

● 226 chikwangue [Ed., manioc cake] or an earthworm is fastened to the hook, and everything is thrown into the water. Under the pressure of the current, the lines are drawn out and lie parallel to each other, held at one end by the large rope stretched over the water. A fish, attracted by the bait, seizes it and swallows it along with the hook, which remains in the stomach. All its efforts to free itself merely hooks the fish more securely. The native inspects the rope four or five times during the day and pulls in the lines one by one. The hooked fish is cut loose by severing the string from the hook; it is gutted and thrown into the canoe. [90] The hook is replaced with one held in reserve until the first one is recovered while cleaning the catch.

[227]
[285]

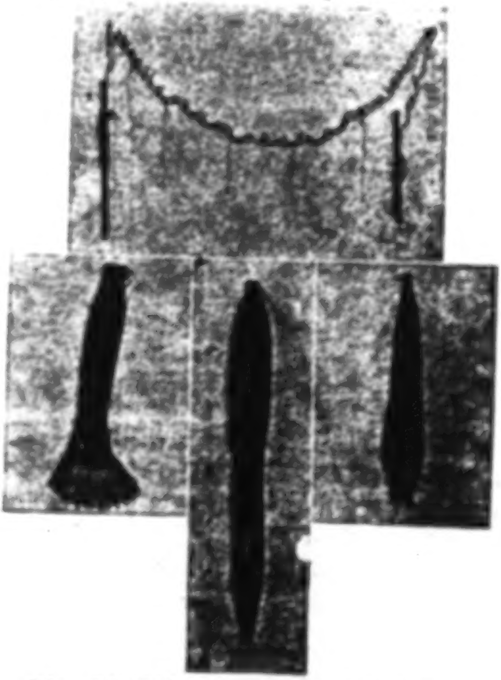

Fig. 54. Fish Traps and Lines, Lake Leopold II.

The native also fishes with a line on the bottom and an inert line without a float. The hook is larger and usually made of iron. The strong rope is coated with oil to make it more durable. The bait, consisting of a piece of chikwangue, entirely covers the hook. The line is thrown into the water, weighted with stones, and attached to a stake on the bank. The native pulls in these lines only in the morning and at night. They are used only for large fish.

2) Fishing with bow and arrow. This is a method of fishing at which the natives excel. During the hot hours of the day, they settle themselves comfortably in their canoe among the grasses and wait patiently for a large fish to wander up to the surface of the water. Immediately, they bend the bow and shoot the arrow. They are fine shots and rarely miss their target. The fish is usually run through and impaled on the arrow. Hampered in its movements, it vainly tries to dive. The native puts down his bow, judges his spring, dives, grabs the fish, and climbs back into his canoe. [91]

3) Harpoon fishing is practiced especially for capturing fish that live in the mud. The native takes to this with real passion. Standing in his canoe, he lets himself be carried along by the current, advancing slowly so that no disturbance of the water will scare the fish. With a slow, regular, methodical motion, he plunges in his harpoon, guided by chance and his instinct. The jerks made by the harpooned fish trying to escape alert the experienced fisherman to his catch. He immediately increases the pressure, and then with a slow, regular, methodical motion he pulls up the harpoon, avoiding any abrupt motion that might detach the prize.

[41] The fishing harpoon is made of a bamboo shaft about 2.50 meters long onto which four wooden prongs are attached with bonds of rattan splints. At the tip of each of these four prongs is fastened an iron point which has four barbs and terminates in a conical socket.

4) Fishing with a trap placed at random in the grass of marshy banks. [92] The traps, made of rattan splints and with an opening that has spikes pointed toward the interior, vary in size, but they are all made by the same technique. The native puts bait inside and submerges the whole trap in the water. The fish, attracted by the bait, try to get it and enter the trap through the opening set on its side. This entrance, easy to negotiate from the outside, bristles with spikes pointed toward the interior, which prevent the fish from leaving the trap. The shape of the traps for small fish is long, tubular, and narrow. They open at one end, and the entrance with spikes is set toward the middle of the trap. The traps for big fish have the shape of a truncated cone, with the top forming a straight line. The entrance, constructed on the same principle as that of the small traps, is set in the forward part, opening toward the interior. These traps are placed in front of the drain channels of dammed-up marshes and rivers. M 226

5) Fishing with a trap, usually set in waters with a strong current. The trap is in the shape of a cone, its movable base serving as a lid and its tip extended by a strong, flexible strip of rattan which acts as a spring. A liana is attached to the end of the rattan. A free-swinging, trapeze-like apparatus is tied to the body of the trap. The bait is attached to a rattan splint inside the trap. This splint is tied to a small, mobile crossbar on the trapeze. The liana tied to the end of the rattan spring is drawn inside the trap through one of the openings near the supporting hoop of the entrance and is attached to the movable lid. The trap is constructed in such a way that when it is not set, the lid is closed by the pull of the rattan spring. To set the trap, the native ties toward the middle of the liana a rattan splint to which a small stick is attached. The end (A) of the latter passes behind M 226 285

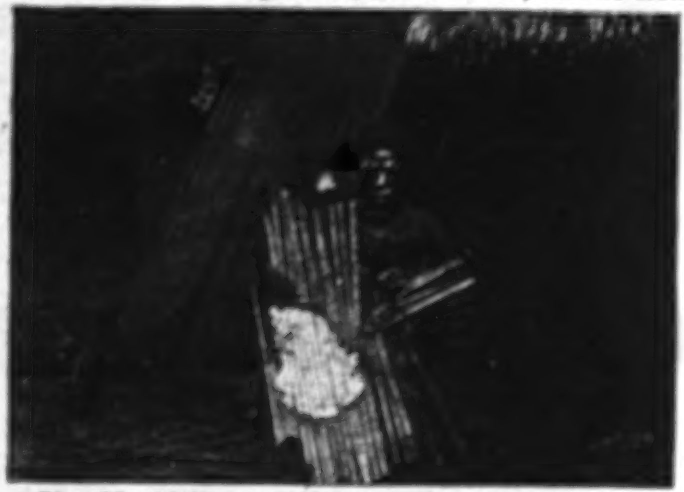

Fig. 55. Making a Fish Trap among the Bobale.

S [227 285]

M 226 285 the bar of the trapeze, and the point (B) is caught behind the mobile crossbar (C). To the latter the native ties a rattan splint, at the end of which he fastens the bait. This consists of a palm nut still covered with pulp. To reach the bait, the fish enters the trap; it takes the bait, pulls on it, and dislodges the triggering crossbar (C). The catches (A) and (B) are freed, the rattan spring is released, and the lid closes, trapping the fish. [93]

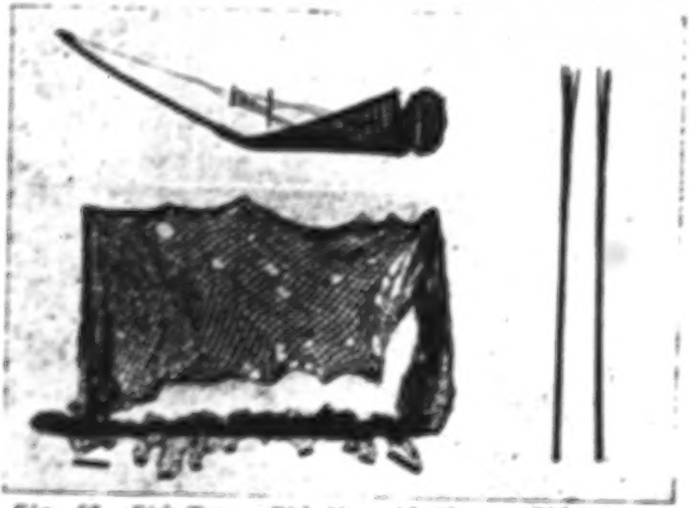

Fig. 56. Fish Trap. Fish Net with Floats. Fishing Harpoons from Lake Leopold II.

M 226 685 In individual fishing, the fish belong to the owner of the trap or to the person who set it. The native respects this right, and, moreover, custom punishes offenses very severely. Native law is rigorous to the point that a man caught red-handed in theft is liable to be driven from the community.

M 226 The yield from individual fishing is of hardly any importance. This kind of fishing is practiced only to vary the diet a little, and it is successful only because of the tremendous abundance of fish in these rivers.

M 5 226 Communal fishing is much more productive. Certain tribes, or to be more exact, certain families among the peoples of the Fimi, Lake Leopold II, and the lower Lukenie make a veritable

Sakata F043

SM 226 industry of it. This sort of thing flourishes especially among the riparian people in the country of the Basakata, Balesa, and Mosengere.

SM 226 361 In the region of the lower Fimi, as well as along the marshy banks of the lower Lulonga, native fishing camps are quite numerous. They are all of the same type and [94] never have the character of a permanent settlement. At the end of the rainy season one sees families of riparian peoples leave their villages temporarily and settle along the marshy rivers. Men and women make this move, while children, old people, and a few able-bodied adults stay in the village to guard the homes.

The fishing camps are set up in very rudimentary fashion. The huts are merely shelters, refuges.

SM [462] Gathering salt grass for making salt is the chief task of the women. The men do the fishing.

SM 226 All the methods for fishing individually are used, but the bulk of the work is done communally.

The procedures are quite varied. We will mention the following.

1) Damming the mouths of small rivers and minor tributaries, along with setting traps in front of the escape channel and the method of driving the fish described above.

SM [286 386] 2) Fishing with a net. Unlike the nets used for hunting, the fishing nets are made of raffia fibers. The type of knot is the same, but the technique is more like the one used for plaiting the hair. The native carefully dyes the fibers black in order to make the mesh invisible under water. He attaches small cylindrical sections of a very light wood to the upper part of the net to serve as floats. At the opposite edge, he attaches the sinkers, made of cylindrical pieces of baked clay. The floats and sinkers are made so that they counterbalance each other and maintain the net in a vertical position in the water. These nets are 20 to 25 meters long. If necessary, the natives use a series of nets and dam the whole river in this way. Five to ten men are stationed with large baskets along the nets. The women go up the river 100 to 200 meters, enter the water, and form a chain to drive the fish before them. These are caught in the meshes of the nets and attract the attention of the fishermen by the efforts they

S M 226 make to free themselves. The fishermen grab them and throw them in their baskets. [95]

Sometimes the natives enclose an area on the grassy banks, move into it, and search the grass for fish. If the fish try to break away for the main channel, they are caught in the meshes of the net.

3) Fishing with screens. This method is the most common. It is easier and more productive than the others. The screens are made of long splints of rattan or raffia, placed parallel to each other one or two centimeters apart. The cross elements of rattan are spaced from 20 to 30 centimeters apart. The height of the screens varies from 66 centimeters to 2.50 meters, and their length from 10 to 20 meters. These screens are used as dams in the river, marshes, coves, and at the mouths of small tributaries. They are fastened to stakes and sunk perpendicularly into the river bed. The natives set them up when the waters first begin to recede. A little upstream of the screens, they throw into the river a number of branches, still bearing their leaves, in such a fashion as to provide a shelter for the fish stopped by the screen. When the water is very low, the natives go a very great distance upstream. They enter the water, form a tight chain, and work methodically downstream toward the screen. All the fish are driven toward it. At 25 or 30 meters from the screen, the natives put another screen in the water. Some of the fishermen are assigned to hold it vertical. The others enter the enclosure formed by the two screens, take out the sheltering branches and grass, and begin to hunt the fish. They have openwork baskets shaped like a truncated cone. The fisherman, with the basket in front of him, sets it down on the river bed, the large opening toward the bottom. If a fish is trapped in the basket, the fisherman can tell by the light bumps against the sides caused by the fish trying to escape. The fisherman plunges his hand into the basket through the top opening, gropes about inside, seizes the fish, breaks its backbone, and throws it into the canoe or on the bank.

S M 251 The catch is carried to the temporary village, and the fish are gutted, cleaned, and thrown on the apparatus for smoking them. This is a [96] grid made with rattan of average thickness, which rests on crossbars placed on forked stakes planted in the ground.

S M The average height is 1.25 meters, the width 2.50 meters, and 251 the length five to ten meters. The women maintain a fire under this smoking-drying apparatus night and day. It is fed with grass and other rubbish, which are not very dry so that a great deal of smoke will be produced. All the fish are turned over twice a day. After eight to ten days the operation is finished. The dried, smoked fish are carefully wrapped after being sorted and graded according to size. Part of the fish will make up the family reserve, and the rest will be used as trade goods. When the grid

S
● M
● [226
285]

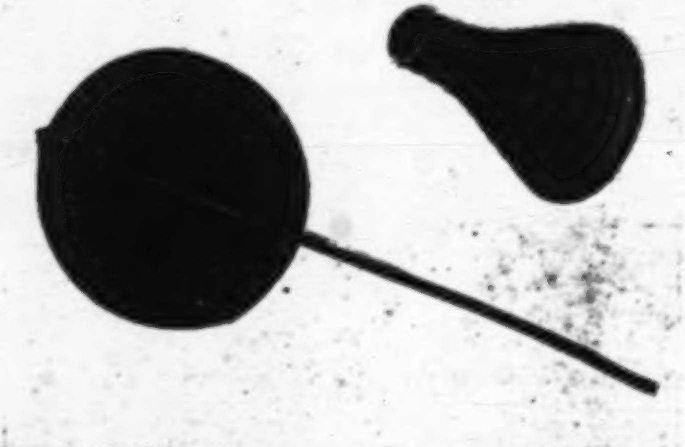

Fig. 57. Baskets for Fishing, Lake Leopold II.

is almost empty, the men go up the river and start fishing again.

S M It is difficult to realize the magnitude of this industry and the unbelievable quantities of fish caught by the natives during their 226 sojourn in the region of the salt grass. We watched one of these miraculous hauls one day, organized through the kind cooperation of Mr. Molin. The river had been dammed for only one night, the natives went up it only 150 [97] meters, this in the middle of the dry season, and yet they brought back four large baskets full of fish.

S M [illegible] The catch from communal fishing is shared at the end of the season. A part is reserved for the chief, the owners of the screens receive a special share, and the rest is divided among all the 008 members of the group participating in the enterprise. [Ed., a

Ntomba

paragraph beginning on page 97 and continued on page 98 is not translated.] 000

[98] On the whole, we note the following special ethnic characteristics. 241

1) Uniformity in the cultivation of manioc, the staple food of all of these peoples.

2) Undertaking the cultivation of maize under the influence of the ephemeral encouragement of Bula Matari [Ed., the European administration] among the peoples of the Congo-Kasai, and rice cultivation under Arab influence in the region of Bena Dibele-Kole. Contrary to what we noted concerning maize, the innovation introduced by the Arabs has become firmly implanted in the life of these natives, and the cultivation of rice will probably eliminate manioc eventually. 241 177

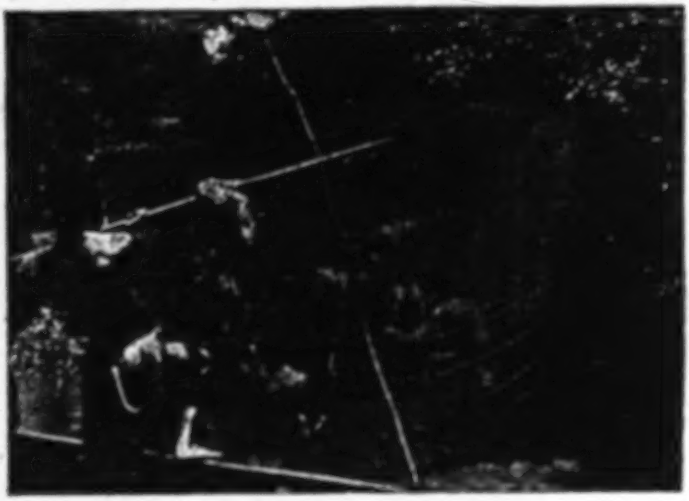

Fig. 58. Weir Fishing at a Dam among the Mosengere. Closing the Screens and Capturing the Trapped Fish.

[226]

3) Formation of a zone of sugar-cane cultivation, the development of which is in inverse proportion to the extent of the palm groves.

4) Complete absence of animal husbandry of any importance. 231

5) Uniformity in the methods of communal hunting and the gradual development of attendant religious customs and practices from east to west, corresponding to a decline in hunting by individuals with traditional weapons. This fact leads us to suppose 224 174

SAKATA FO43

Fishing

M 226 Near rivers, swamps, and lakes, fishing is one of the principal occupations of the native.

M [462] Unlike hunting which is practiced only by men, fishing is done by both men and women. The latter, however, practice it only occasionally and fish only by damming up part of a river bed or marsh. The dam is usually built during the rainy season, but as long as the water is rising, the women leave all the sluices wide open. Toward the end of the rainy season, they narrow the drain channels and set large traps before the openings. These traps are attached to strong wooden stakes on the shore near the dam. M 226 285 The traps are made of splints from the ribs of raffia leaves and are plaited in openwork with the open spaces varying in size. The exterior form is always the same. Cylindrical at one end [85] and the other end closed along the diameter, the trap resembles a large cone ending in a line at the top. These traps are built over a framework made of two, three, or four hoops. Their diameters vary according to their positions. They are set inside the trap, the largest one at the base, the smallest one toward the upper end. The transverse elements, doubled and woven alternately in and out, are spaced 10 to 15 centimeters apart and are usually made of strips of rattan. The inner trap, or entry trap, is plaited in the shape of a broad fan, conical

S ● M ● [227 285]

Fig. 52. Making a Fish Trap among the Wadia and Tumba.

226 chikwangue [Ed., manioc cake] or an earthworm is fastened to the hook, and everything is thrown into the water. Under the pressure of the current, the lines are drawn out and lie parallel to each other, held at one end by the large rope stretched over the water. A fish, attracted by the bait, seizes it and swallows it along with the hook, which remains in the stomach. All its efforts to free itself merely hooks the fish more securely. The native inspects the rope four or five times during the day and pulls in the lines one by one. The hooked fish is cut loose by severing the string from the hook; it is gutted and thrown into the canoe. [90] The hook is replaced with one held in reserve until the first one is recovered while cleaning the catch.

● [227]
[285]

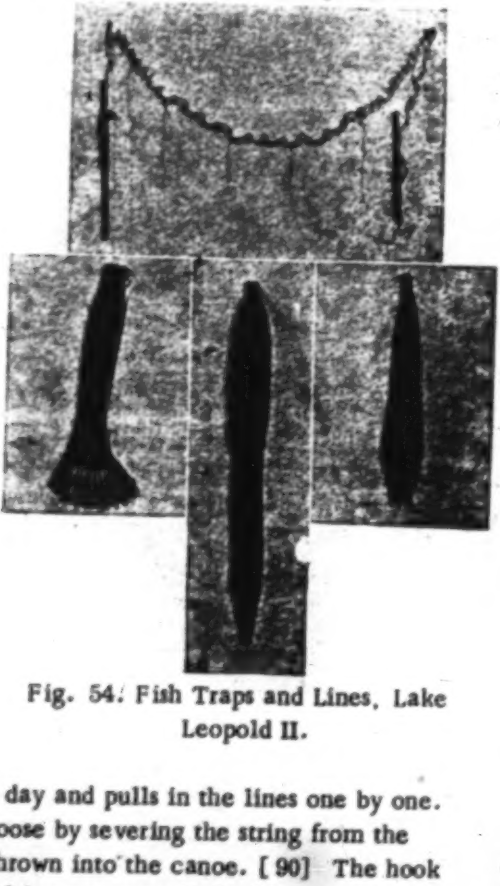

Fig. 54. Fish Traps and Lines, Lake Leopold II.

The native also fishes with a line on the bottom and an inert line without a float. The hook is larger and usually made of iron. The strong rope is coated with oil to make

592 among the Banfumu. [Ed., the remainder of the chapter, through page 54, is not translated.]

[55] Chapter 3

The Native's Means of Subsistence

Animal husbandry: chickens, goats, dogs. -- Agriculture: manioc, maize, rice, bananas, peanuts. -- Hunting: weapons, snares, nkisi, individual method, communal hunting. -- Fishing: general method, dams, basket weirs, traps, harpoons, bows and arrows, cord nets, screens.

● 231 The peoples of the Congo-Kasai-Lake Leopold II region and of the Lukenie do very little animal husbandry. They possess no large animals. At most one may find a few chickens, rare goats, and some hunting dogs in their villages. The dogs get a share of the game and live as best they can the rest of the time.

No care whatever is given to the goats. They wander freely during the day and graze in the forest or plain. Sometimes they venture into the planted fields, from which the hunting dogs chase them at first sight. At night they return to the village and take shelter where they will. During our stay in the village of Toipolo, [485] they even came and disturbed us at night while we were lodged in the hut reserved for strangers.

235 The chickens wander around the village and planted areas during the day and sleep [56] at night in the native's hut, where they have their nest for laying eggs and a place to hatch them.

262 439 435 The native does not eat the eggs. He sells them to agents of the state or of commercial concerns, who collect them for hatching. The chicken itself is rarely eaten by the native. Most often it goes to the kitchens of the Europeans. In 1913-14 the average price of a chicken was half a franc, that of an egg, five centimes, and the price of a goat was from five to 15 francs.

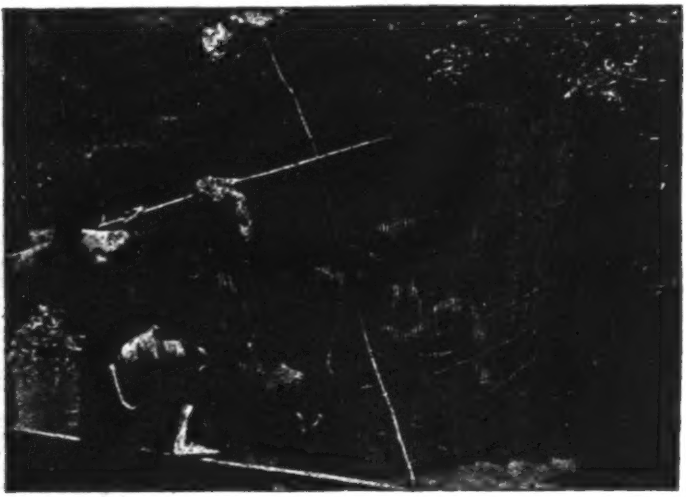
Ntomba

paragraph beginning on page 97 and continued on page 98 is not translated.] 000

[98] On the whole, we note the following special ethnic characteristics. 241

1) Uniformity in the cultivation of manioc, the staple food of all of these peoples.

2) Undertaking the cultivation of maize under the influence of the ephemeral encouragement of Bula Matari [Ed., the European administration] among the peoples of the Congo-Kasai, and rice cultivation under Arab influence in the region of Bena Dibele-Kole. Contrary to what we noted concerning maize, the innovation introduced by the Arabs has become firmly implanted in the life of these natives, and the cultivation of rice will probably eliminate manioc eventually. 241 177



[226]

Fig. 58. Weir Fishing at a Dam among the Mosengere. Closing the Screens and Capturing the Trapped Fish.

3) Formation of a zone of sugar-cane cultivation, the development of which is in inverse proportion to the extent of the palm groves.

4) Complete absence of animal husbandry of any importance. 231 ●

5) Uniformity in the methods of communal hunting and the gradual development of attendant religious customs and practices from east to west, corresponding to a decline in hunting by individuals with traditional weapons. This fact leads us to suppose 224 174

101
619
[825]

recollection of an animal of the leopard family which they call bokonga. Their description of it corresponds to the lion. Some soldiers and other expatriates, who were also young people, shown representations of a lion immediately identified it with their bokonga.

The groups under discussion here lived for a time on the banks of the Luwo (Maringa) and the [11] upper Ikelemba, (1) then under pressure from other Móngo tribes, they crossed the Tshuapa-Ruki. They evicted the Ekonda and settled in their present location. This exodus must have taken place a fairly long time ago; it is impossible to determine the date and difficult to make any estimates. In any case it must have occurred 150 to 200 years ago.

[173] 1. It appears that between the Ikelemba and its tributary the Losálifa, there is still a bonkom tree called w'ãmenga (of bald heads) under which, according to tradition, the ancestors held their councils. Nearby there is a bosáú whose fruits never ripen.

244 These peoples are primarily farmers; they grow chiefly bananas, manioc, yams, colocasia [taro], sweet potatoes, sugar cane, and various vegetables and condiments. The food crops they grow, together with what they gather and the Elaeis palm trees provide them with a continuous and abundant food supply, as long as elephants do ● [231] not interfere. Their domestic animals include chickens, goats, and 224 dogs. (2) Hunting is a pleasant change of activity rather than an

[177] 2. Ducks have been introduced fairly recently, but they were known long before colonial times. They came from the south. Sheep have been introduced only in the last few decades, and they are found only in a few villages on the river banks in the lowlands.

583* generally packed in baskets or [151] in bẹngonjọ (or bẹtẹtẹ), which 431 are baskets woven of palm leaves.

Some ethnologists have introduced the expression douaire, "dowry," (1) to designate the goods given by the woman's family to

1. See for example Torday, in Africa, Vol. 2, no. 3, p. 279.

the man's family. Actually, the word dot would be a much better translation, because it corresponds more closely to the nature of these payments. But this would require changing the terminology adopted, and the introduction of another term (such as marriage payment) for what is generally understood by the word dot, whose use is in any case unfortunate. [Translator's note: Hulstaert uses dot, which would literally be translated into English as "dowry," to designate the payments made by the husband and his family to the wife's family. However, I have employed the term "bride price" in accordance with the usage of English-speaking anthropologists.]

Furthermore, the word douaire already has a precise and accepted meaning, so that its use in this context would lead to confusion. That is why I prefer provisionally to use an entirely new term, and to translate nkọmf as contre-dot [literally, counter-dowry]. (2)

2. This term was suggested to me by Attorney General A. Sohier.

[Translator's note: The term "dowry" has been used to designate this payment in the translation.]

The nkọmf consists of hens, ducks (3), salt, mats, pots, gourds

● [231]
[177]

3. Ducks have been introduced fairly recently; the Nkundó maintain that their ancestors did not have any, and that they got them from the Ekonda. In their classification they place them under the category of chickens.

592 among the Banfumu. [Ed., the remainder of the chapter, through page 54, is not translated.]

[55] Chapter 3

The Native's Means of Subsistence

Animal husbandry: chickens, goats, dogs. -- Agriculture: manioc, maize, rice, bananas, peanuts. -- Hunting: weapons, snares, nkisi, individual method, communal hunting. -- Fishing: general method, dams, basket weirs, traps, harpoons, bows and arrows, cord nets, screens.

231 The peoples of the Congo-Kasai-Lake Leopold II region and of the Lukenie do very little animal husbandry. They possess no large animals. At most one may find a few chickens, rare goats, and some hunting dogs in their villages. The dogs get a share of the game and live as best they can the rest of the time.

No care whatever is given to the goats. They wander freely during the day and graze in the forest or plain. Sometimes they venture into the planted fields, from which the hunting dogs chase them at first sight. At night they return to the village and take shelter where they will. During our stay in the village of Toipolo, [485] they even came and disturbed us at night while we were lodged in the hut reserved for strangers.

235 The chickens wander around the village and planted areas during the day and sleep [56] at night in the native's hut, where they have their nest for laying eggs and a place to hatch them.

262 439 435 The native does not eat the eggs. He sells them to agents of the state or of commercial concerns, who collect them for hatching. The chicken itself is rarely eaten by the native. Most often it goes to the kitchens of the Europeans. In 1913-14 the average price of a chicken was half a franc, that of an egg, five centimes, and the price of a goat was from five to 15 francs.

862 does not really stop nursing till it is about two years old, and sometimes two and a half if it has a weak constitution.

Weaning is not accompanied by any ceremony or feast. In order to break the child's habit, the mother smears her nipples [824] with the sap of the lifété fruit (a kind of small sweet pimento or eggplant) or with a pimento-pepper extract (imbénga). Sometimes she leaves the child with some relative (daughter, sister, etc.) for a time [498] while she lives elsewhere.

As we have seen above, after weaning, the ekelɛ́-bokeka period comes to an end for the mother, and her infidelities no longer have repercussions on the life of her child.

[853] 8) If the mother dies while the infant is still being nursed, [563] the task of nursing is turned over to some woman who is disposed to undertake it even a Botswa, and there always is one. After the child is weaned the woman is suitably recompensed. The use of ●[235] goat's milk is unknown.

854 751 [153] 9) Young children frequently suffer convulsions. This illness is thought to be caused by hawks, and for that reason it is called mpulú (bird). The Nkundó try to prevent it by hanging an amulet around children's necks; it is usually the clavicular triangle of a hen's carcass. In addition they know a remedy whose purpose is to strengthen the nerves: the child is laid on a mat stretched out anywhere on the roof of the hut. An eyewash (bolɔ́ɔ́) is prepared from the sap of leaves from the litɔ́yansombo bush and extract of mbɔ́lɛ́ (fruit of the bosoombɔ́). Using a leaf shaped into a horn, a few drops are put into the child's eyes. Then the father or some other relative pulls out the mat from under the child and lifts it several times, shouting: tɛ́ tɛ́ tɛ́.

856 10) No special importance is attached to teething. But a child whose upper teeth come in before the lower ones (a defect called ingondo) is considered abnormal. Therefore he is forbidden to eat the first fruits of hunting or fishing in an enclosure (mpao), lest the latter lose their productivity.

586x 789 especially very early in the morning at the crowing of the cock. (1)

1. The natives also use this means to call their children who long ago left for the "lowlands" and whose return they ardently desire.

If the one who is called does not return, the charm will take revenge either on her or on her lover, depending on the desire of the person operating it. Another intervention on his part is then required, however, and it varies according to the form used. Note that according to the native view it is impossible for the wife not to hear the call, no matter how far away she may be. If she does not return, it is because she is being obstinate and deserves to be punished.

The spirit of vengeance alone is involved in:

586x 754 [237] 2) The ngondɛ́. This charm comes from the Coquilhatville region or even further away. The word ngondɛ́ is the Lolíngá form of the Lonkundó word nkondɛ́, which means "gavial." The teeth of this reptile actually play a part in its composition. It is used to punish any thief by death. Therefore it has been declared effective against anyone who tries to seduce the wife of another. It will cause the culprit's feet to swell and to open with pus. Like the above practices, this one has not yet crossed Momboyo.

832 177 Such usages like many others have therefore been recently introduced. Before the arrival of Europeans in these parts, only love philters were known. However, it is easily understandable that the Nkundó gladly and confidently received these new practices which are so useful -- in their opinion -- and operate in a domain of capital importance for which colonization has deprived them of their ancient sanctions and means of prevention. [417]

4/2
241
[462] When new fields are prepared, the first work of clearing them falls to the men. This work is done with a knife and an ax. The shape of this latter tool is the same among all the tribes: a wooden handle with a bulge at one end like a club; and a long, narrow, triangular piece of iron embedded laterally in the handle.

After clearing the brush, the men pile the rubbish at the feet of the large trunks and set it on fire. The tree, undermined at its base, finally topples over and remains where it falls.

[462] The women take charge of the other work of cultivation. This varies [57] very little from tribe to tribe, and even the various crops of manioc, maize, peanuts, rice, bananas, and sugar cane require only quite rudimentary special labor.

244
4/2 Manioc is the staple food of the tribes over most of the region we visited. The native cultivates both sweet and bitter manioc. The latter variety is the more widespread. To prepare the ground, the native woman uses an iron hoe, triangular in shape, with a flaring base and a spike at the top. This piece of iron is embedded laterally in a rough-hewn wooden handle which bulges at the end like a club. The purpose of the club-like end is twofold: it provides a better hold for the piece of iron, and it intensifies

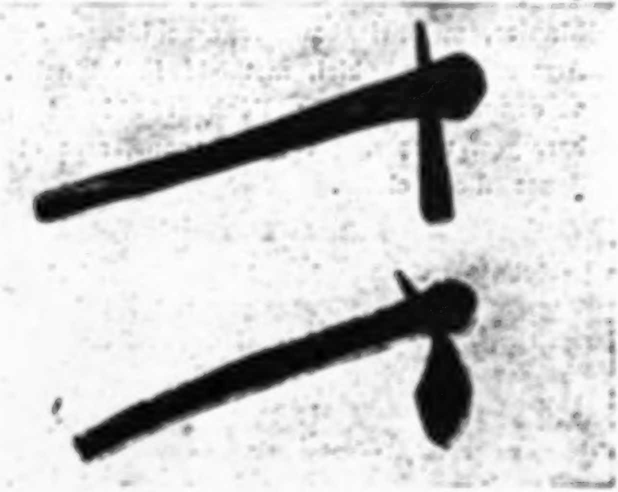

Fig. 37. Ax and Hoe from Lake Leopold II-Lukenie.

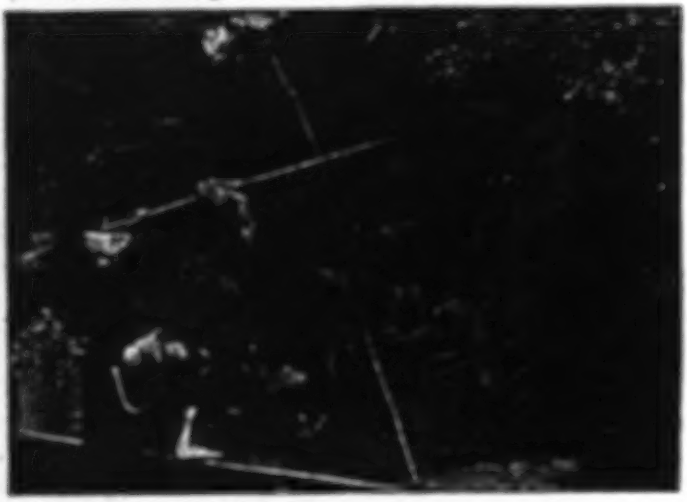
Ntomba

paragraph beginning on page 97 and continued on page 98 is not translated.] 080

[98] On the whole, we note the following special ethnic characteristics. 24/●

1) Uniformity in the cultivation of manioc, the staple food of all of these peoples.

2) Undertaking the cultivation of maize under the influence 241/177



[225]

Fig. 58. Weir Fishing at a Dam among the Mosengere. Closing the Screens and Capturing the Trapped Fish.

of the ephemeral encouragement of Bula Matari [Ed., the European administration] among the peoples of the Congo-Kasai, and rice cultivation under Arab influence in the region of Bena Dibele-Kole. Contrary to what we noted concerning maize, the innovation introduced by the Arabs has become firmly implanted in the life of these natives, and the cultivation of rice will probably eliminate manioc eventually.

3) Formation of a zone of sugar-cane cultivation, the development of which is in inverse proportion to the extent of the palm groves.

4) Complete absence of animal husbandry of any importance. 23/

5) Uniformity in the methods of communal hunting and the gradual development of attendant religious customs and practices from east to west, corresponding to a decline in hunting by individuals with traditional weapons. This fact leads us to suppose 224/776

101 619 [825] recollection of an animal of the leopard family which they call bokonga. Their description of it corresponds to the lion. Some soldiers and other expatriates, who were also young people, shown representations of a lion immediately identified it with their bokonga.

The groups under discussion here lived for a time on the banks of the Luwo (Maringa) and the [11] upper Ikelemba, (1) then under pressure from other Móngo tribes, they crossed the Tshuapa-Ruki. They evicted the Ekonda and settled in their present location. This exodus must have taken place a fairly long time ago; it is impossible to determine the date and difficult to make any estimates. In any case it must have occurred 150 to 200 years ago.

[173] 1. It appears that between the Ikelemba and its tributary the Losflifa, there is still a bonkom tree called w'āmenga (of bald heads) under which, according to tradition, the ancestors held their councils. Nearby there is a bosfé whose fruits never ripen.

● 241 These peoples are primarily farmers; they grow chiefly bananas, manioc, yams, colocasia [taro], sweet potatoes, sugar cane, and various vegetables and condiments. The food crops they grow, together with what they gather and the Elaeis palm trees provide them with a continuous and abundant food supply, as long as elephants do [231] not interfere. Their domestic animals include chickens, goats, and 224 dogs. (2) Hunting is a pleasant change of activity rather than an

[177] 2. Ducks have been introduced fairly recently, but they were known long before colonial times. They came from the south. Sheep have been introduced only in the last few decades, and they are found only in a few villages on the river banks in the lowlands.

[92] THE ECONOMIC LIFE OF THE MONGO NEGRO

INDUSTRY

241 One might say that nature throws into the lap of the Mongo
461 Negro everything he needs in order to exist so that he does not have 181 to exert himself in the slightest to get it. Generally speaking, he has only to look for his food in the forest, to pick it up from the ground as it were, with the exception of his bananas, manioc roots, and moma (a yam that, if it is prepared well, reminds one of potatoes) which are cultivated by his women. Hence, it is quite natural that one finds little industry among the Mongo, and that the Mongo Negro is not prepared to put the least effort into developing or perfecting in any way that centuries-old industry which already exists.

461 He can eat, and that is the main thing as far as he is concerned.

A lazy, inert people, effeminate to the core, each one merely 181 living on the efforts of his many wives and female slaves, cannot have a highly developed industry.

In general, except for hunting which is undertaken primarily by the young men of the village, the Mongo Negro does not bother about anything. Eating, sleeping, looking for and listening to quarrels, carousing at gatherings with sugar-cane beer until they are picked up in a drunken state by their wives (a spectacle one also sees in civilized Europe), this is the dreary, monotonous, drowsy life of the Mongo Negro, one of the least culturally developed but at the same time one of the most highly interesting tribes of the Evenaar district if not of the whole Congo.

He loathes and despises work and is indolence personified.

461- Notwithstanding the extreme idleness of the Mongo [93] people, 462 they do have some of the industry that is necessary for their existence. However, it is on a low level and not widespread. In general, the existing industries are carried on by either the men or the women, and a man will never undertake a job belonging to the women, and vice versa. The work is not done in groups or in family units; where a branch of an industry exists, it is the concern of a single person unless more workers are necessary in order to carry out the work.

M
245 Next to manioc, bananas occupy the first rank among the native crops, at least among the peoples of Lake Leopold II, the [59] lower Lukenie, and the region between the Congo and the Kasai. Among the tribes of the upper Lukenie, cultivation of banana trees is less developed, and in the Bena Dibele-Kole region it is almost completely absent.

The natives prefer to cultivate the large banana. It is less juicy and more floury than the small one and yields larger crops. The banana groves are always set up near the village and most often directly behind the dwellings. It follows that these groves have the general shape of the village and, in a way, frame it.

Banana trees, in order to thrive, must be planted in very fertile soil which has been well cleared and deeply turned. To promote their growth and increase their yield, the natives dump into the banana groves all the waste from the kitchen, ordure, ashes, and sweepings from the regular cleaning of the village and huts. They also go into the groves to answer the calls of nature.

Fig. 39. Hut for the Nkisi of the Hunt and a Banana Tree with Flower and Fruit, Village of Madjuku, Bobaie Tribe.

S
[346]

M [574]

M
● 243 Maize is not cultivated on an important scale. Beyond the post at Tolo, maize seems to be completely unknown. Among

Teke FI33

M
●243 the peoples of the Fimi, Lake Leopold II, and the lower Lukenie, the cultivation of maize is quite rudimentary. On the other hand, we encountered large fields of maize among the Bateke and
T
[243
439] especially among the Banfumu of the Kapanda territories. It is well to note, however, that the intense cultivation of maize in that region was not due to any direct use of it by the native, but to the hope of selling it profitably to the traders and workers of Leopoldville-Kinshasa.

Maize is sown in seed holes, 30 to 60 centimeters apart. The holes are dug in cleared ground as the rainy season draws near. The maize shoots appear after four days. At this time the plants are quite vulnerable to the depredations of birds. The children keep watch over the fields from morning to night for four or five days and drive the birds away with their cries.

Care of the crop includes weeding and thinning out the plants. Maize is neither hoed nor propped. It is sometimes sown as an extra crop in manioc fields. The maturity of maize is marked by the yellow, dry spathes. The harvest takes place some time after its maturity. The maize stalks are pulled out by the women and children, and the ears are cut off on the spot and carried to the village. [60]

The cultivation of rice is unknown in the region we visited, except among the peoples of the Bena Dibele-Kole region. The ground is hoed before sowing. The rice is sown in seed holes during the first quarter of the rainy season. The care of the fields is limited to two or three weedings during the initial stage of the plant's growth. The crop must be guarded regularly and uninterruptedly from morning to night from flowering to harvest. The rice is cut with knives, ear by ear. The ears are gathered by the handful. These are put in loose sheaves and, after several days, piled in stacks. The threshing is done in the village [412] by family groups. The native chooses a large, well-beaten area and uses long rods. Husking is done with a pestle in a wooden mortar. The husked rice is winnowed in baskets of rattan splints, which are circular and shallow with a reinforced rim. The average yield varies between 2,000 and 3,500 kilograms per hectare.
M

M
●243 The cultivation of rice serves less to nourish the native than for trade. He usually sells his harvest immediately after the husking.

T
M
244 Peanuts thrive in the region of the Banfumu and among the Bankumbu. They grow best in light soil and are not suitable for land cleared from the great forest. The crop demands a great
T
M
[462] deal of care and regular upkeep. Fields invaded by weeds yield nothing. The harvest takes place when the crop is mature and is the task of the women with the help of the children. The peanuts are placed in baskets carried on the back and taken to the village. The native spreads them out in the sun to dry. He turns them again and again, two or three times a day, and brings them into the hut at night.

M
249 Sugar-cane plantations are set up in marshy lowlands.

[462] All the work on this crop falls to the men. These plantations are found only in regions where the natives make masanga, sugar-
[273] cane beer. Sugar-cane fields are especially numerous in the villages on the lower Lukenie and the Fimi.

M
244 As a rule the natives also cultivate a few legumes, sweet potatoes, and yams, but on a small scale and without giving them any particular care. [61]

Hunting

M
224
462 Hunting is practiced only by men. They engage in it, not for sport, diversion, or relaxation, but for the sole purpose of procuring meat and fat.

M
224
857 From their earliest childhood, the boys get together to beat the grass and catch mice, rats, and other rodents which swarm in the bush. Nothing is more interesting than to see them at work. Ten, fifteen, or sometimes twenty of them form a large circle. Armed with sticks, they beat the grass and make an unbelievable din. Little by little the circle narrows, moving in on a small well-cleared space. The oldest, most daring and most agile of the boys keep watch over this space, their eyes alert and riveted on the edge of the grass, ready to pounce. The beaters redouble their zeal, strike, shout, gesture, and gradually drive all the rodents

Dengese FO16
Teke FI 33

M
D
252 the mixture is stirred vigorously. This produces a sort of soft bread called kifunge by the natives. The Bankutshu and Basongo-Meno also use maize or millet flour to make kifunge. Both are ground in the large mortars used to make manioc flour and are sifted through the basketwork sieves.

M
D
[264]

Kifunge is always eaten hot. The housewife serves it on a wooden plate previously rubbed with palm oil.

We thus see that the peoples of the Bena Dibele region are differentiated from the other tribes not only by their way of making manioc flour and the shape of the utensils used, mortar, pestle, sieve, and pottery, but also by the special use made of manioc flour and the use of maize and millet flour in making kifunge. There are then, in this respect, two ethnic groups which seem to be quite different from each other. Unfortunately, it is very difficult to determine whether kifunge is truly indigenous to the civilization of [128] these natives or was introduced by the Basonge-Baluba peoples of the Sankuru-Lubefu. When questioned on this subject, the natives sometimes told us that they had always made kifunge, while some old men claimed that kifunge was still unknown during their childhood.

Fig. 73. Bateke Pulverizing Manioc.

T
[252
415
301
516]

M
T
243

As we have noted, the peoples west of the Bena Dibele-Kole region cultivate maize. This crop is of secondary importance, except in the region of the Banfumungu of Kapanda and Engrei.

M
T
243
252

Maize gathered before maturity is eaten raw or roasted over a low fire. The ears which are allowed to ripen on the stalk are carefully shelled, the kernels ground in a wooden mortar with a cylindrical pestle, and the flour is winnowed or passed through a sieve.

M
T
252
412

The mortar used to make maize flour is made from a section of a tree trunk, with a rectangular opening hollowed in the outer surface and perpendicular to the axis of the trunk. These mortars are very crude, poorly worked, and quite rudimentary. Besides these, one sometimes find others which are better made, small cubes provided with a lug or a liana. Let us note, however, that among the Banfumu southeast of Tua we found a mortar of similar shape which the natives used to prepare vegetables.

M
[252
415
291
854]

Fig. 74. Batitu Women Shelling Maize and Preparing Vegetables.

The sieves used for maize flour in this region are also a special type. The sides are made in an open weave. The general form resembles that of a large bottle with a square bottom, cylindrical body, constricted neck, and slightly flared rim.

M
T
252

The housewife mixes the maize flour with palm oil to form a somewhat thick dough. She wraps it carefully in leaves and boils it for 10 to 15 minutes. This dish, the mokwoſ of the Basakata-Mosengere, is served very hot, usually seasoned a little

4/2 241 [462] When new fields are prepared, the first work of clearing them falls to the men. This work is done with a knife and an ax. The shape of this latter tool is the same among all the tribes: a wooden handle with a bulge at one end like a club; and a long, narrow, triangular piece of iron embedded laterally in the handle.

After clearing the brush, the men pile the rubbish at the feet of the large trunks and set it on fire. The tree, undermined at its base, finally topples over and remains where it falls.

[462] The women take charge of the other work of cultivation. This varies [57] very little from tribe to tribe, and even the various crops of manioc, maize, peanuts, rice, bananas, and sugar cane require only quite rudimentary special labor.

● 244 4/2 Manioc is the staple food of the tribes over most of the region we visited. The native cultivates both sweet and bitter manioc. The latter variety is the more widespread. To prepare the ground, the native woman uses an iron hoe, triangular in shape, with a flaring base and a spike at the top. This piece of iron is embedded laterally in a rough-hewn wooden handle which bulges at the end like a club. The purpose of the club-like end is twofold: it provides a better hold for the piece of iron, and it intensifies

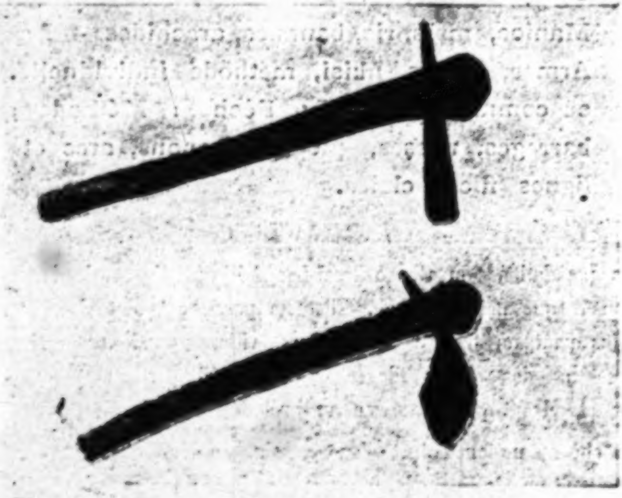

Fig. 37. Ax and Hoe from Lake Leopold II-Lukenie.

Yaelima

244 the worker's efforts without, however, making the use of the tool too tiring. 4/2

After the first hoeing, the woman makes little mounds, 30 centimeters high on the average and spaced about 80 centimeters apart, and inserts four or five manioc cuttings into them. 244

The upkeep of the manioc fields is limited to one or two [58] hoeings to remove the weeds. Manioc requires extremely fertile soil. Its cultivation exhausts the soil to such a point that after three or four years the native must move his fields and abandon the cleared land.

Sweet manioc attains its maximum development at the end of a year, bitter manioc after 15 or 20 months.

Fig. 38. Initial Establishment of the Village of Longinpila in a Clearing, Batitu Tribe.

The manioc tubers or roots are gathered as the family needs them. The root is good to eat at any stage of growth and at any time of year. The maximum yield coincides with the maximum growth of the plant and not with its full maturity. The average yield varies between 12,000 and 14,000 kilograms per hectare. The native woman does not wait until the plants are fully developed to start exploiting the crop. She limits her harvest to a strict minimum throughout the rainy season. At this time the manioc, swollen with water, yields only a little flour and is easily spoiled by soaking.

Teke FI33

M 243 The cultivation of rice serves less to nourish the native than for trade. He usually sells his harvest immediately after the husking.

T M 244 Peanuts thrive in the region of the Banfumu and among the Bankutshu. They grow best in light soil and are not suitable for land cleared from the great forest. The crop demands a great T M [462] deal of care and regular upkeep. Fields invaded by weeds yield nothing. The harvest takes place when the crop is mature and is the task of the women with the help of the children. The peanuts are placed in baskets carried on the back and taken to the village. The native spreads them out in the sun to dry. He turns them again and again, two or three times a day, and brings them into the hut at night.

M 249 Sugar-cane plantations are set up in marshy lowlands.

[462] [273] All the work on this crop falls to the men. These plantations are found only in regions where the natives make masanga, sugar-cane beer. Sugar-cane fields are especially numerous in the villages on the lower Lukenie and the Fimi.

M 244 As a rule the natives also cultivate a few legumes, sweet potatoes, and yams, but on a small scale and without giving them any particular care. [61]

Hunting

M 224 462 Hunting is practiced only by men. They engage in it, not for sport, diversion, or relaxation, but for the sole purpose of procuring meat and fat.

M 224 857 From their earliest childhood, the boys get together to beat the grass and catch mice, rats, and other rodents which swarm in the bush. Nothing is more interesting than to see them at work. Ten, fifteen, or sometimes twenty of them form a large circle. Armed with sticks, they beat the grass and make an unbelievable din. Little by little the circle narrows, moving in on a small well-cleared space. The oldest, most daring and most agile of the boys keep watch over this space, their eyes alert and riveted on the edge of the grass, ready to pounce. The beaters redouble their zeal, strike, shout, gesture, and gradually drive all the rodents 273 a sort of large basin resembling a canoe, two or four beating paddles, a strong stationary bar, a pressing apparatus made of lianas, a storage vat, and calabashes.

244 Sugar cane is grown communally on a rather large scale. [148] The natives cut it shortly before it is fully ripe. Men, women, and children participate in this work. The whole harvest is carried to the brewery shed. The sugar cane, cut in pieces, is thrown into the mash tub, and two or sometimes four men crush it as much as possible with large beetles, reducing it to a sort of whitish pulp. When this pulp is sufficiently thin, the natives put it in the press made of lianas, which is attached so as to hang under the bar and over the vat. To keep the press from coiling up as a result of the twisting, they insert a stick in it perpendicular to the bar. Two men vigorously twist the press, squeezing out every last drop of the sweet juice. The liquid is caught in the vat and then poured into large calabashes and carried to the village. Masanga is truly pleasant, refreshing, and delicious when it is fresh. It has no intoxicating effect. The natives, however, do not drink it until it has fermented. They add to it the bark of a small plains shrub, put the waste from the sugar cane around the calabashes, and expose them to the sun for one or two days to induce very active fermentation.

Sugar-cane beer is always imbibed communally.

All the important ceremonies are accompanied by heavy drinking. Marriage, birth, death, burial, the return from important hunts, the appearance of the new moon, a visit from a neighboring chief, and even our arrival in certain villages are all reasons for organizing big native celebrations where the emptying of great numbers of calabashes of masanga is the order of the day. The natives gather in the shade of the big trees in the village or under the public shelter. The calabashes of masanga are set in the center or poured into big pots. Everyone drinks as much as he wants, as long as there is any left and as long as he can. Meanwhile, the music is in full swing, and there is singing and dancing. Hemp is very often smoked, and the drinking always continues up to the point of brutish drunkenness. It is hard to realize what enormous quantities of this heady beverage some natives can imbibe. Pokei, the Banfumungu chief at Engrei,

M
245
[59] Next to manioc, bananas occupy the first rank among the native crops, at least among the peoples of Lake Leopold II, the lower Lukenie, and the region between the Congo and the Kasai. Among the tribes of the upper Lukenie, cultivation of banana trees is less developed, and in the Bena Dibele-Kole region it is almost completely absent.

The natives prefer to cultivate the large banana. It is less juicy and more floury than the small one and yields larger crops. The banana groves are always set up near the village and most often directly behind the dwellings. It follows that these groves have the general shape of the village and, in a way, frame it.

Banana trees, in order to thrive, must be planted in very fertile soil which has been well cleared and deeply turned. To promote their growth and increase their yield, the natives dump into the banana groves all the waste from the kitchen, ordure, ashes, and sweepings from the regular cleaning of the village and huts. They also go into the groves to answer the calls of nature.

S
[346]

Fig. 39. Hut for the Nkisi of the Hunt and a Banana Tree with Flower and Fruit, Village of Madjuku, Bobaie Tribe.

M [574]

M
243
Maize is not cultivated on an important scale. Beyond the post at Tolo, maize seems to be completely unknown. Among

Teke FI33

M 243 The cultivation of rice serves less to nourish the native than for trade. He usually sells his harvest immediately after the T husking.

M 244 Peanuts thrive in the region of the Banfumu and among the Bankutshu. They grow best in light soil and are not suitable for land cleared from the great forest. T The crop demands a great deal of care and regular upkeep. M Fields invaded by weeds yield [462] nothing. The harvest takes place when the crop is mature and is the task of the women with the help of the children. The peanuts are placed in baskets carried on the back and taken to the village. The native spreads them out in the sun to dry. He turns them again and again, two or three times a day, and brings them into the hut at night.

M ● 249 Sugar-cane plantations are set up in marshy lowlands.

[462] All the work on this crop falls to the men. These plantations are found only in regions where the natives make masanga, sugar- [273] cane beer. Sugar-cane fields are especially numerous in the villages on the lower Lukenie and the Fimi.

M 244 As a rule the natives also cultivate a few legumes, sweet potatoes, and yams, but on a small scale and without giving them any particular care. [61]

Hunting

M 224 Hunting is practiced only by men. They engage in it, not for 462 sport, diversion, or relaxation, but for the sole purpose of procuring meat and fat.

M 224 From their earliest childhood, the boys get together to beat 857 the grass and catch mice, rats, and other rodents which swarm in the bush. Nothing is more interesting than to see them at work. Ten, fifteen, or sometimes twenty of them form a large circle. Armed with sticks, they beat the grass and make an unbelievable din. Little by little the circle narrows, moving in on a small well-cleared space. The oldest, most daring and most agile of the boys keep watch over this space, their eyes alert and riveted on the edge of the grass, ready to pounce. The beaters redouble their zeal, strike, shout, gesture, and gradually drive all the rodents

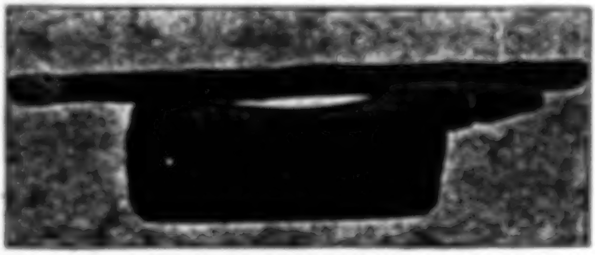
We did not find this particular kind of pottery beyond the Batete area. The Ipanga-Yaelima, as well as the Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu, do not seem to be aware of its existence and, in any case, do not use it. [136] 415

I come now to the important subject of palm oil. We have already noted how frequently the native housewife uses it in preparing meals. This oil takes the place of the butter and fats used in European cooking. Gathering the clusters of palm nuts and making the oil are very important among all the tribes. 262 249

The remarks of Mr. Engels on this subject in his work on the Wangata [Ngata] are applicable to all the peoples we visited.

In each village one or several natives chosen from the nimblest and most daring (the local daredevils) specialize in gathering the clusters from the palm trees. They do this not only for themselves, but also for others for a slight fee. 249 464

Gathering these clusters is always somewhat dangerous. The native must climb to the top of palm trees which are sometimes 20 to 25 meters high and, once there, must work hard to disentangle and sever the cluster. 249 481



[412]

Fig. 78. Mortar and Pestle for Preparing Vegetables and Palm Oil.

The method of climbing varies according to the height of the palm trees. We noted two different procedures among all the tribes visited (see Fig. 77). [137]

If the palm tree is not high, the native climbs to the cluster by using the stubs of cut stems as steps. If the tree is very high, the native uses a rattan belt which encircles both man and tree trunk.

Nothing is more interesting than to watch a native climb up to the crown of a palm tree. He does it with truly extraordinary 249 481 skill and speed. Supported by his belt, with his feet propped against the tree trunk, he proceeds quickly by small bounds, moving the belt constantly upward. Upon reaching the root of the cluster, he stands erect or sits on one of the leaves, and with a hatchet or knife he frees the cluster, cuts it, and lets it fall to the foot of the tree. The women collect the nuts, pull off those still attached to the cluster, clean them very carefully, and carry them to the village.

252 According to whether the housewife wants to make a small or large amount of palm oil, she proceeds in one of two ways.

In the first case, she throws a few palm nuts into an earthenware vessel half full of water and puts them on the fire to boil for a good hour. When the outer part is soft, she pours off the water and puts the nuts in a small wooden mortar in order to separate the pulp from the kernels. For this purpose, she avails herself of the mortar and wooden pestle used in preparing vegetables. When the outer part is completely separated from the nut, the woman takes it and extracts the juice by squeezing it tightly in her hands. The kernels are discarded.

Fig. 79. Installation for Making Palm Oil.

In the second case, each village has a special installation for making palm oil. This very primitive factory usually stands slightly apart from the dwellings. Everyone has access to it, and it belongs to the entire community, but each family uses it individually.

T 276 171 with the bowl and tube made of iron. These pipes are usually very long and cruder than the small clay pipes with wooden tubes. Moreover, it is probable that the latter were copied from imported models. We found them chiefly in villages near the large centers and the government posts. Their shape is strikingly similar to that of imported pipes.

M T 276 171 We found this same type among the Bayanzi of the right bank of the Kasai and north of Kwamouth. These natives are thus connected with the Bateke-Banfumungu group. Thus a new ethnic zone appears, and the territory we visited may be subdivided in this respect into three ethnic regions.

The first one includes all the territory occupied by the Bateke-Banfumungu, the Bayanzi, and part of the Baboma, and it is characterized:

1) by the use of a calabash pipe, a nkisi fetish, for smoking hemp;

2) by the use of pipes with large clay bowls, for smoking tobacco communally, and the small tobacco pipe, the property of the individual, used by both men and women. [160]

The second one extends from the mouth of the Fimi to the confines of Batitu territory.

The hemp pipe is not nkisi. The tobacco pipe, very primitive, is made from the rib of a banana leaf and very often has a wooden or clay bowl. The woman smokes neither tobacco nor hemp, and the custom of smoking the pipe communally is not much in favor.

The third zone is the one where we found the wooden tobacco pipe with a calabash mouthpiece or a neck of monkey bone. It includes the whole Yaelima-Bankutshu region, taking in the Bashilele and Bakuba and, very probably, the Dengese region.

N 276 As a rule, the natives like to smoke tobacco very much. They prefer doing it when the weather is cold, maintaining that it heightens the body heat.

● M 541 Tobacco is not cultivated on a large scale. The crop is always strictly limited to the needs of the person who plants it. When the native wants to smoke tobacco, he plucks a leaf from the plant, dries it at the hearth, crushes it, and reduces it to powder. A pinch of this crudely ground tobacco is placed in the

S M 236 make to free themselves. The fishermen grab them and throw them in their baskets. [95]

Sometimes the natives enclose an area on the grassy banks, move into it, and search the grass for fish. If the fish try to break away for the main channel, they are caught in the meshes of the net.

3) Fishing with screens. This method is the most common. It is easier and more productive than the others. The screens are made of long splints of rattan or raffia, placed parallel to each other one or two centimeters apart. The cross elements of rattan are spaced from 20 to 30 centimeters apart. The height of the screens varies from 66 centimeters to 2.50 meters, and their length from 10 to 20 meters. These screens are used as dams in the river, marshes, coves, and at the mouths of small tributaries. They are fastened to stakes and sunk perpendicularly into the river bed. The natives set them up when the waters first begin to recede. A little upstream of the screens, they throw into the river a number of branches, still bearing their leaves, in such a fashion as to provide a shelter for the fish stopped by the screen. When the water is very low, the natives go a very great distance upstream. They enter the water, form a tight chain, and work methodically downstream toward the screen. All the fish are driven toward it. At 25 or 30 meters from the screen, the natives put another screen in the water. Some of the fishermen are assigned to hold it vertical. The others enter the enclosure formed by the two screens, take out the sheltering branches and grass, and begin to hunt the fish. They have openwork baskets shaped like a truncated cone. The fisherman, with the basket in front of him, sets it down on the river bed, the large opening toward the bottom. If a fish is trapped in the basket, the fisherman can tell by the light bumps against the sides caused by the fish trying to escape. The fisherman plunges his hand into the basket through the top opening, gropes about inside, seizes the fish, breaks its backbone, and throws it into the canoe or on the bank.

S M 251 The catch is carried to the temporary village, and the fish are gutted, cleaned, and thrown on the apparatus for smoking them. This is a [96] grid made with rattan of average thickness, which rests on crossbars placed on forked stakes planted in the ground.

Sakata FO43

S M 251 The average height is 1.25 meters, the width 2.50 meters, and the length five to ten meters. The women maintain a fire under this smoking-drying apparatus night and day. It is fed with grass and other rubbish, which are not very dry so that a great deal of smoke will be produced. All the fish are turned over twice a day. After eight to ten days the operation is finished. The dried, smoked fish are carefully wrapped after being sorted and graded according to size. Part of the fish will make up the family reserve, and the rest will be used as trade goods. When the grid is almost empty, the men go up the river and start fishing again.

S M [226 285]

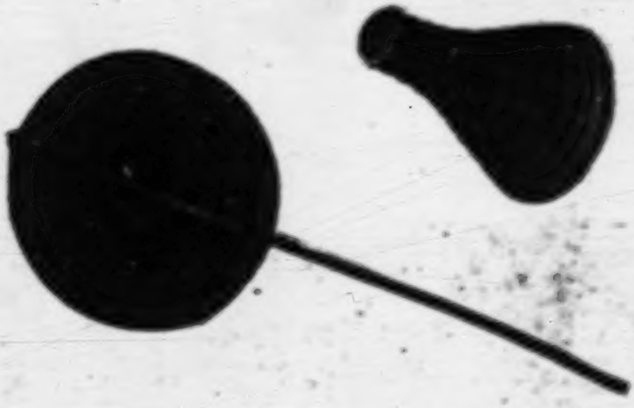

Fig. 57. Baskets for Fishing, Lake Leopold II.

S M 226 It is difficult to realize the magnitude of this industry and the unbelievable quantities of fish caught by the natives during their sojourn in the region of the salt grass. We watched one of these miraculous hauls one day, organized through the kind cooperation of Mr. Molin. The river had been dammed for only one night, the natives went up it only 150 [97] meters, this in the middle of the dry season, and yet they brought back four large baskets full of fish.

S A [illegible] The catch from communal fishing is shared at the end of the season. A part is reserved for the chief, the owners of the screens receive a special share, and the rest is divided among all the members of the group participating in the enterprise. [Ed., a

00[illegible]

M 415 however, shows us that aside from this generally uniform character these different tribes each have their own distinctive pottery. In our opinion the latter should be regarded as a derivative from the original form, known and used by the principal ethnic branch of these various peoples. Each of them has modified the original form according to its tastes, its conceptions, and local circumstances and needs, to the point where each people developed a special and characteristic form that retained only two essential elements of the original: the more or less marked curve of the sides, and the inward, horizontal rim.

M 415 531 Among the Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and Yaelima, the shape of the small pieces of pottery used for preparing meat is altogether different. Here we find neither a regular curvature of the sides nor an inward, horizontal rim. On the contrary, the bottom is a spherical calotte, the body distinctly angled with a sharp edge, the upper surface decorated with incised drawings, and the rim slightly sloping and curved outward. The decoration is the same as that we noted on the pottery for chikwangue in this region.

M D 415 531 Farther east, among the Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu, the shape is again quite different. The sides, which slant obliquely inward and have no rim, meet the round bottom at a sharp angle. They usually have considerable decoration with incised drawings and even some molding in relief.

M ● 251 To preserve meat, the natives proceed in two different ways.

For small quantities, the meat is cut into pieces weighing from one to three kilograms, impaled on a stick, and roasted over [132] a low fire. This procedure does not give very good results. Meat smoked in this way spoils after five or six days, but this does not keep the native from eating it. "It's the meat and not the smell that I eat," he says, "for after the meal the meat is gone and the smell is still with us!"

To store large quantities, the meat is cut into pieces weighing from half a kilogram to one kilogram and then boiled over a brisk fire for a little less than an hour in rather salty, well-spiced water. The pieces are then smoked on a large grid, usually set up in the center of the village. This grid, made of large rattan stems and green branches, rests on four forked stakes 90 centimeters to 1.20 meters high. A woman keeps a slow fire burning under the

M 251 grid, which gives off a great deal of smoke. The boiled meat is lightly packed and covered with large banana leaves. It remains on this grid for two or three days. At the end of this time, it is thoroughly smoked, black as coal, dry, and tough, but it keeps almost indefinitely.

The housewife takes her supply and puts it in the storage place inside her hut, where it is safe from the rats, mice, and other marauders which infest the native huts.

Fig. 75. Communal Smoking Apparatus.

M 415 The meat is usually cooked in large earthenware vessels. [133]

Among the Bateke and Banfunungu, these vessels are shaped like irregular spheres with the top cut off.

Among the Baboma and Basakata, on the other hand, this pottery is cylindrical in form, broad, of moderate height, and has a flat bottom. Among the Bobaie, Balesa, and Batete, the bottom is rounded, broad, and shallow, and it extends into a rather high neck in the shape of a truncated cone, decorated with very even and not very artistic impressed designs. The body has sharp edges, and the small rim has a wide flare. This form is found among the Basakata, although less frequently. It seems to be quite common in the region of the Kundu [Nkundu], northern neighbors of the Bobaie, Balesa, and Batete. M [531]

M 415 531 The Ipanga and Yaelima use pottery vessels similar to those they use for making chikwangue, while the Basongo-Meno and

Dengese FO16

Bankutshu use a bell-shaped form; the bottom is a spherical calotte, the body slightly curved, and the decoration consists of heavy moldings, both sunken and in relief. M D 415 [57]

These same pots are also used by all these tribes for preparing and cooking fish. M 415

The riparian peoples of the Congo-Kasai-Fimi and of the lower Lukenie, as well as the Wadia and Mosengere of the Boriempe-Lalonga, fish a great deal.

Fish is never eaten raw. The natives boil it or eat it dried or smoked. M 252 251●

To preserve fish, the natives smoke it on large grids similar to those they use for smoking meat.

Certain peoples, notably the tribes of the Fimi and lake region and of the lower Lukenie, also use a special form of pottery, rare and heretofore unknown. We were able to bring back only two specimens, which are fortunately very characteristic. [134] M 415

This form is open at the base and closed at the top by a large disk pierced with holes. The sides are curved. The diameter of the bottom opening is a little smaller than that of the upper disk. It varies from 45 to 90 centimeters.

This drying pot, called benge by the natives, is placed on three pieces of wood forming a tripod. Under the tripod, a woman maintains a slow fire of leaves, grass and green wood, which sends thick smoke inside the pot. The gutted fish are placed over the disk. They are left there for four or five days, exposed continually to the action of the fire and smoke. At the end of this time they are sufficiently smoked and dried to keep for several months. Naturally, these pots can be used [135] for preparing and preserving only small quantities of food. They form a part of the native house wife's equipment among these various tribes. She also uses them to smoke chikwangue, to dry bananas, manioc tubers, and ears of maize, and sometimes to smoke meat. The manioc tubers, bananas, ears of maize, and other vegetable M 415 251 M [291]

Fig. 76. Rattan Belt.

415 products to be dried are not exposed to heavy smoke, but to a •251 small fire of very dry wood producing a low, hot flame, or, if possible, to the heat given off by a glowing bed of charcoal.

When completely prepared, protected, and wrapped in leaves, the chikwangue are laid above the benge for six to eight hours, while the housewife maintains a charcoal fire underneath. When dried and smoked in this way, the chikwangue keep a very long time.

Lacking a benge, a woman sometimes uses a pottery vessel with a flat bottom, pierced with small holes, and vertical sides.

[14]

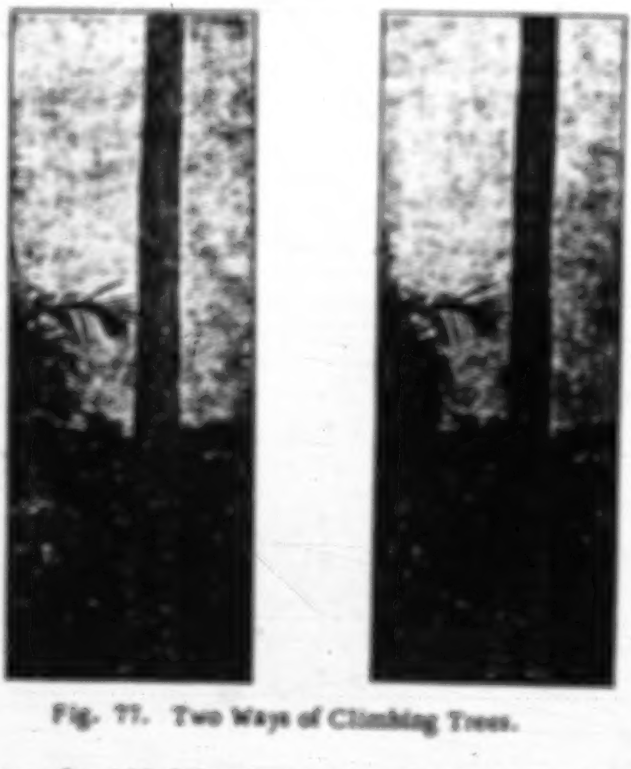

Fig. 77. Two Ways of Climbing Trees.

This fits on top of an old chikwangue pot, mpoko-lepinga, whose bottom has been broken.

The mpoko-lepinga is placed over the fire. The woman seals the juncture between the mpoko-lepinga and the benge with the pierced bottom, using a paste of clay and potter's earth.

583 on the husband's wealth). Theoretically, the knife should be an efamba.
431 In practice it is sometimes possible to substitute an empɔ̃te in an [412] attractive wooden sheath amply adorned with "copper-plated nails."
At other times the knife and spears may be replaced by their corresponding value in bakonga. This is considered the most important [675] boɛngo, and therefore no one gives up his claim to it. If the son-in-law cannot present it to his father-in-law immediately, he promises to do so later, and his father-in-law does not fail to make use of any opportunity to remind him of his promise. Some men insist on a wɛ̌ko as pledge. Others are satisfied with a piece of loasi or a bosɔ́ngɔ́ (splinter or part of the trunk of a palm tree), which the husband gives to the ndonga as a token of acknowledgement of his debt and as evidence of his willingness to pay it as soon as he has the means. Some men, however, insist so strongly on the boɛngo that they will not accept the walo [146] before they have received it. Thus, one day recently, Lomanga d'Ifutɔ́ (Bongîli) refused to accept the walo for his daughter Ekofo, engaged to Bokungɛ́ w'akɔ́yɛ́ (of Bongíli, Ndongɔ́). He insisted that the father of the latter, Bokungɛ́ w'is'ɛ́y'-Ingilɛ́ first go back to get his boɛ́ngo. Since he was unable to find five spears, he substituted for them a second knife and a copper ring; these were accepted by old Lomanga. Shortly thereafter the same thing happened to Bokungɛ́ of Bontole (Bongíli), who wanted to pay the walo for his fiancée Ngelɛ́ of Boɛ́mbo (Bombwanja), the sister of Bongondɛ́, clerk of the Bombwanja. The woman's family refused to take the bride price before receiving the ifakɛ́ l'akongɛ́ b'ïs'ɛ́y'ɔ̌na boɛngo.

2) Byĭkɔ́ byɛ́ nyang'ɛ́y'ɔ̌na, "porcupines for the mother."
● [251] This present consists of two or three fresh or smoked porcupine. Bɛ́tomba, baatɛ́ birds, or bekɔ́ua fish may be substituted for them. The substitution of hens is not well regarded, because they are within the realm of the nkomí. If someone does not have the means to satisfy this requirement, he gives the mother two copper rings saying mɛ́kɛ́ bakonga bɛ́fɛ́ yɔ́somba byĭkɔ́ bikɛ́, "here are two copper rings; go and buy yourself some porcupines." Fabrics are sometimes substituted nowadays.

262 The natives are familiar with two kinds of manioc, sweet and bitter.

Sweet manioc is not highly valued, owing to its insipid taste and the poor consistency of the chikwangue made from it.

● 252 Aside from the soaking, which is done only for bitter manioc, chikwangue is prepared in the same way whether the flour comes from sweet or bitter manioc.

The first harvest of manioc tubers takes place eight to ten months after planting. The natives, however, do not begin harvesting them in earnest until the second year. Only the woman does this work. [462]

[482] The manioc tubers are piled in large baskets carried on the back and taken to the soaking well, a pond of putrid, dirty, muddy water giving off a highly unpleasant odor of putrefaction and fermentation, which is reserved for this task.

262 462 The manioc roots remain submerged from five to eight days to make them ferment and thus eliminate their bitter taste. At the end of this period the woman returns to the pond, tucks up her primitive loincloth as high as possible and enters the swamp. She sinks in up to her knees, and plunging her hands and arms into the mire, she pulls out the roots one by one and throws them on the bank. When her supply seems sufficient, she piles the roots in her basket and goes to wash them in the river. Returning to the village, she cuts the tubers, lets them dry a little in the sun, and then peels them. The Bakete, Banfumungu, and all the tribes of the Fimi-Lake Leopold II-Lukenie region, up to the boundaries of Bobaie and Balesa territory, chop the pieces of manioc root before reducing them to flour, while the Ipanga, Batitu, Yaelima and Bokala crush them between the fingers before throwing them between the fingers before throwing them in the mortar.

412 The chikwangue knife has a double-edged blade, a median rib, and a long, relatively broad oval form. It is pointed at both ends. One of these ends is [120] embedded in a wooden handle with a doubly concave vertical section.

The museum [Ed., Museum of the Belgian Congo] now has only two of these knives, but they are found in every native hut in the Kasai-Fimi-Lukenie region up to the Oshwe sector. It is, however, almost impossible to buy them from the natives. A woman, unable to do without her chikwangue knife a single day 442 and never having a spare one, will not let one go at any price.

M

M
252
462 A woman chops the manioc on a large wooden tray, a crude, slightly hollowed board roughly rectangular in shape among the Bateke, Banfumungu, and Baboma, but circular among the Tumba, Wadia, Mosengere, Bolia, Bobaie, Basakata, and Balesa.

After having chopped up the manioc tubers as finely as she can with the primitive tool at her disposal, the woman removes the woody fibers, remains of rind, and other hard bodies. She then takes the etuti with both hands and rocks it back and forth. While doing this, she is careful to shake the flour from time to time and to remove the impurities she finds in it.

When the flour is quite fine, the housewife sprinkles it with a little water, [121] kneads it, works it into a firm dough of a pale grayish-white color, and carefully removes every little trace of impurities. She then divides the dough into pieces the size of a cubic decimeter which she rolls into more or less symmetrical balls or into sausages 20 to 25 centimeters long.

Fig. 67. Preparation of Manioc Flour among the Bobaie. Special Form of Knife to Chop Manioc.

S
[252
516]

M
[213] These balls or sausages are carefully wrapped in banana or masisa leaves, and the whole bundle is tied with very pliant rattan or raffia splints which serve as string.

Dengese FO16

M 252
4/2

Among the Ipanga, Batitu, Bokala, and Yaelima, we never found the crushing pestle [Ed., a broad, short pestle]. Instead, the woman uses a long, cylindrical pestle on a wooden mortar, a rough plank, very thick and heavy, sometimes square, sometimes round, but always quite irregular in shape. Very often, the mortar is a basket of rattan or raffia splints, rectangular and very shallow. Instead of crushing the manioc into flour, she kneads it and works the dough the same way and in the same mortar.

When the dough is sufficiently kneaded and all the impurities [122] have been removed, she rolls it into sausages and wraps them in banana leaves as we described above.

M
D
252
4/2

The Basongo-Meno and the Bankutshu crush the manioc in large wooden mortars, roughly cylindrical in shape, and use very large pestles. The height of the mortars and the length of the pestles compel the women of that region to stand when preparing manioc flour, while in the Kasai-Fimi-Lukenie region, including the Oshwe and Bambuli sectors, the women are seated for this work.

Fig. 68. Baboma Chopping Manioc.

Moreover, the former group cannot remove the fibers, hard bodies, and other impurities found in the flour in the course of their work, so they make a point of sifting it.

Dengese FO16
Teke F133

M
D 252
412

The little sieve-basket has the shape of a large calotte with the rim slightly raised and the bottom plaited in openwork.

The sifted flour is gathered in small baskets, then made into dough, rolled into small cakes, and wrapped in banana or masisa leaves in the way we have just described.

M
252

The chikwangue are cooked in the same way by all the peoples visited.

The woman lays a wooden grid in the bottom of an earthenware cooking pot. She pours in water up to the level of the grid, lines the whole inner surface of the pot with banana leaves, and places the cakes or sausages one on top the other. She not only fills the pot, [123] but she piles them well above the rim and covers them with more banana leaves, which are tied together so carefully that the whole thing is hermetically sealed. The pot is placed on the fire for several hours. The chikwangue, then are cooked by the steam.

T
[412
252]

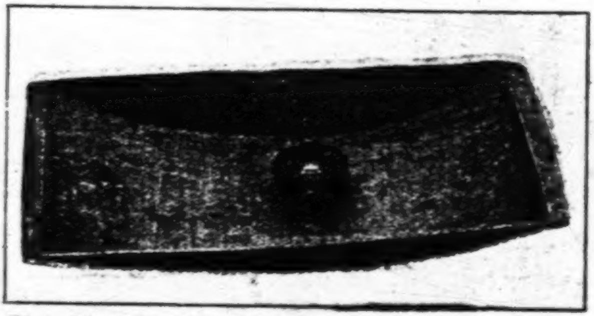

Fig. 69. Mortar with Clay Pestle (Etuti) for Manioc, Banfumu Tribe.

After being cooked, the manioc dough looks like very heavy bread, amber-colored, very slightly translucent on the edges, and of a rather soft consistency. This is chikwangue, the famous kwanga of the natives which plays the same role in their diet as bread does in ours.

M
416

Although the cooking method is the same everywhere we went, the pottery used for the cooking differs notably from one region to the next.

Yaelima

From Stanley Pool to the Bumbuli region, the natives use a large earthenware vessel, generally with very little decoration on the rough, irregular outside surface which is marked with vertical lines. [124] 415 531

The few specimens we collected are the only ones that the Museum of the Belgian Congo possesses.

The vessel is oval and elongated in shape, and the bottom is rounded off so little that the pottery cannot stand upright on a horizontal surface. The opening at the top is wide. Among the Balesa and Bateke, the rim is slightly raised and tilts sharply, while among the Ipanga and Batitu, the rim is wider, and its slope is less accentuated. The latter pottery, moreover, is very often decorated with two or three circular, impressed lines. As one advances eastward, the oval shape tends to disappear. The pot becomes spherical, the rim wider, and the impressed decoration more symmetrical and more painstakingly done.

Fig. 70. Yaelima Women Preparing Manioc.

252
412
516

Among the Bokala and Yaelima, the vessels used to cook the chikwangue have a bottom shaped like a spherical calotte, a rather wide, reversed rim, and a neck and body with sharp edges and distinct angles. The impressed decoration consists of two or three circular lines placed immediately above the bend

Ntomba

415 531 of the body. These parallel lines are intersected in three or four places by small groups of eight to ten little notches. In addition, the part of the body angling inward is quite often decorated with intersecting oblique lines. [125]

415 These types of pottery for chikwangue seem to be modern forms.

The very ancient kind, of which we happily were able to find a specimen still intact, has a less characteristic shape. The bottom is round and irregular; the body is more or less angled but without sharp edges; and the neck is slightly bent back but has no distinct plane surface.

● 252 415 412

Fig. 71. Mortar, Pestle, and Sifter for Manioc Flour among the Bankutu.

252 415 The Bokala, Yaelima, etc., place a wooden grid at the bottom of the chikwangue vessel, line the inside with leaves, and pile the cakes of manioc flour in small mounds higher than the rim of the vessel. To keep these characteristic pyramids stable, they often tie a network of cords, a sort of net with large, wide meshes, to the molding of the neck. The top of this net can be opened or closed at will, and the chikwangue cakes are crammed in it as in a net. Sometimes the wooden grid is replaced by an earthenware shelf which extends beyond the rim of the vessel. This shelf is pierced with large round holes. This type of pottery, however, is quite rare. We were able to find only a few specimens.

M 252 415 The natives do not care for them very much; they regard them as impractical for preparing chikwangue, but readily use them to dry and smoke their provisions.

M 416 531 Beyond the Yaelima, notably among the peoples of the Bena Dibele-Kole region, the pottery used to cook manioc cakes [126] is more reminiscent of the old earthenware cooking pots of Europe. It is spheroid in shape, very symmetrical, with the neck curved out a little, rounded, and slightly arched. The upper part of the body is decorated with broad circular lines, small arcs, and little dots. These pots are a mottled brownish-black in color and are lightly glazed.

M 252 262 Here, too, the chikwangue are cooked by steam. It must be noted, however, that chikwangue does not play the same important role in the diet of the peoples of the Bena Dibele-Kole region, although it is still one of the chief elements even now.

M D 252 415 The Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu also eat kifunge, a manioc bread which is prepared in the following way. The housewife heats water in a large earthenware receptacle with a rounded bottom. It is shaped like a wide, spherical calotte, with the body almost straight, but in any case having sharp edges, and the neck slightly flared but not arched. M D 252 When the water begins to boil, she throws in the manioc flour a little at a time, stirring constantly with a [127] long spatula of polished wood. When the flour has absorbed practically all the water, the vessel is taken off the fire, and more manioc flour is added while

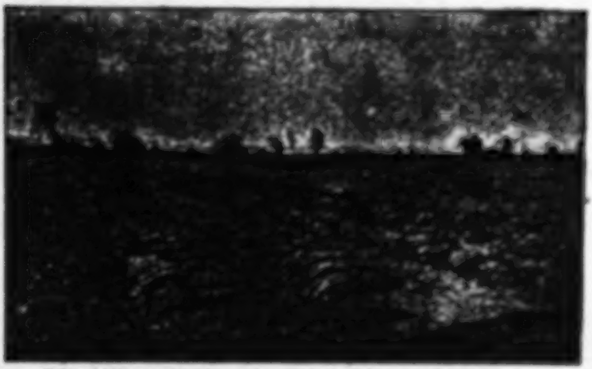

Fig. 72. Chikwangue Brought to the Post.

Dengese FO16
Teke FI 33

M
D
252

the mixture is stirred vigorously. This produces a sort of soft bread called kifunge by the natives. The Bankutshu and Basongo-Meno also use maize or millet flour to make kifunge. Both are ground in the large mortars used to make manioc flour and are sifted through the basketwork sieves.

M
D
262

Kifunge is always eaten hot. The housewife serves it on a wooden plate previously rubbed with palm oil.

We thus see that the peoples of the Bena Dibele region are differentiated from the other tribes not only by their way of making manioc flour and the shape of the utensils used, mortar, pestle, sieve, and pottery, but also by the special use made of manioc flour and the use of maize and millet flour in making kifunge. There are then, in this respect, two ethnic groups which seem to be quite different from each other. Unfortunately, it is very difficult to determine whether kifunge is truly indigenous

T
[252
415
301
576]

Fig. 73. Bateke Pulverizing Manioc.

to the civilization of [128] these natives or was introduced by the Basonge-Baluba peoples of the Sankuru-Lubefu. When questioned on this subject, the natives sometimes told us that they had always made kifunge, while some old men claimed that kifunge was still unknown during their childhood.

M
T
243

As we have noted, the peoples west of the Bena Dibele-Kole region cultivate maize. This crop is of secondary importance, except in the region of the Banfumungu of Kapanda and Engrei.

● M T 243 ● 252

Maize gathered before maturity is eaten raw or roasted over a low fire. The ears which are allowed to ripen on the stalk are carefully shelled, the kernels ground in a wooden mortar with a cylindrical pestle, and the flour is winnowed or passed through a sieve.

M T 252 412

The mortar used to make maize flour is made from a section of a tree trunk, with a rectangular opening hollowed in the outer surface and perpendicular to the axis of the trunk. These mortars are very crude, poorly worked, and quite rudimentary. Besides these, one sometimes find others which are better made, small cubes provided with a leg or a liana. Let us note, however, that among the Bendomu southeast of Tua we found a mortar of similar shape which the natives used to prepare vegetables.

M [25 415 241 854]

Fig. 74. Basitu Women Shelling Maize and Preparing Vegetables.

The sieves used for maize flour in this region are also a special type. The sides are made in an open weave. The general form resembles that of a large bottle with a square bottom, cylindrical body, constricted neck, and slightly flared rim.

M T 252

The housewife mixes the maize flour with palm oil to form a somewhat thick dough. She wraps it carefully in leaves and boils it for 10 to 15 minutes. This dish, the mokwof of the Basakata-Mosengere, is served very hot, usually seasoned a little

T M 252 with palm oil and pili-pili pepper. Whenever the opportunity arises, the native adds fish or meat to it. The dish is very highly regarded among all the peoples of the Bateke-Tselima region, but it should be regarded as a luxury which the family can afford only on special occasions. [129]

M 252 262 The sweet manioc tuber, cooked in ashes, is a more common dish. It is served very hot with slips of manioc greens prepared as vegetables.

Sweet potatoes, which are widespread throughout the region, are peeled, boiled in water, mashed, mixed with palm oil, and served with meat or fish.

Peanuts are eaten boiled or roasted, or sometimes the women crush them raw and mix them with manioc flour or use them instead of palm oil in preparing the meals.

Although the natives eat few vegetables, except yams and sweet potatoes, their diet from time to time includes spinach, native sorrel, small tomatoes, a type of purslane, and leaves of all sorts which the women gather in the forest. The housewife pulverizes them in her small mortar with a cylindrical pestle and stews them over a low fire in small earthenware pots.

M 145 Among certain tribes, notably the Bokala and Tselima, these small pots have an earthenware lid with a small vertical lug, while in other regions the woman covers her pot while it is on the fire with part of a calabash, a piece of bark, or the bottom of an ordinary pot.

Bananas play a major part in the native diet. From Leopoldville to Kole, we found banana trees in all the villages, both near the state posts and far into the interior of the country. Bananas are eaten raw, roasted, stewed, dried in the sun or smoked on grids. Dried bananas are reduced to flour and served as mush with other dishes.

M 262 Meat is greedily devoured by all these peoples, regardless of its origin or condition. The native must content himself with what chance brings him, the game from his hunting, and what the Mundele [Ed., White men] leave for him. The natives do not have enough practical means at their disposal to secure an abundant diet of meat. In the villages of the interior, meat is [130] seldom eaten. The prospect of a good share of meat is enough to get the native to do the hardest kind of work. In the

M 262 course of our journey, our bearers never complained about long marches, heavy loads, or fatigue, as long as they got their ration of one or two kilograms of meat every evening.

M 262 252 The native is passionately fond of meat, and nothing absolutely nothing, is wasted of the animals killed in hunting. The intestines are especially prized. The natives empty them very hastily and do not hesitate to eat them raw. Most often, however, they cut them into small pieces and boil them in big earthenware pots. The fat is very carefully collected and stored for subsequent use in the preparation of vegetables and sauces. The rest is served with vegetables, chikwangue, kifune, etc.

M 252 The meat is cut into small pieces, seasoned with a little palm oil, pepper, and salt, and placed on the fire to boil. It is cooked in small pots which also serve as plates.

T 415 Among the western Bateke and Banfumungu (in the region of Tua, Kunzulu, and Kwamouth), these utensils are very similar to bowls in shape. The bottom is round, and the rim is straight, slightly flared or arched, and not very high.

Among the eastern Banfumungu (in the region of Tua and Bokala), on the other hand, these utensils have an altogether different shape, little known up to now: a wide, spherical calotte, whose rim, two or three centimeters wide, is bent inward and shows a distinctly horizontal surface.

S 415 Among the Baboma in the region of Bokala, Wombali, and Mushie, as well as among the western Wadia and Basakata, the rim of these bowls has the same characteristic inward curve, but the sides are much more symmetrical and better finished. Moreover, the shape is slightly different. The bottom is round and very flat; the body is shallow and curved slightly inward; and the rim is turned back in horizontally. [131]

M 415 The inward curve of the sides of some pottery, terminating in an inward, horizontal rim, is a characteristic that we find again, although much less pronounced, in the bowls used for the same purpose by the Mosengere, Tumba, Bobale, Basakata, and Balesa. All of these peoples thus seem to have a certain ethnic relationship characterized by this special form of pottery rim. The general shape of the various vessels we gathered in this region,

M
D 415
[52]

Baskutshu use a bell-shaped form; the bottom is a spherical calotte, the body slightly curved, and the decoration consists of heavy moldings, both sunken and in relief.

M
415

These same pots are also used by all these tribes for preparing and cooking fish.

The riparian peoples of the Congo-Kasai-Fimi and of the lower Lukenie, as well as the Wadia and Monengere of the Boriempe-Lalonga, fish a great deal.

M 252 ●
251

Fish is never eaten raw. The natives boil it or eat it dried or smoked.

To preserve fish, the natives smoke it on large grids similar to those they use for smoking meat.

M
415

Certain peoples, notably the tribes of the Fimi and lake region and of the lower Lukenie, also use a special form of pottery, rare and heretofore unknown. We were able to bring back only two specimens, which are fortunately very characteristic. [134]

This form is open at the base and closed at the top by a large disk pierced with holes. The sides are curved. The diameter of the bottom opening is a little smaller than that of the upper disk. It varies from 45 to 90 centimeters.

M
415
251

This drying pot, called bonge by the natives, is placed on three pieces of wood forming a tripod. Under the tripod, a woman maintains a slow fire of leaves, grass and green wood, which sends thick smoke inside the pot. The gutted fish are placed over the disk. They are left there for four or five days, exposed continually to the action of the fire and smoke. At the end of this time they are sufficiently smoked and dried to keep for several months. Naturally, these pots can be used [135] for preparing and preserving only small quantities of food. They form a part of the native house wife's equipment among these various tribes. She also uses them to smoke chikwangue, to dry bananas, manioc tubers, and ears of maize, and sometimes to smoke meat. The manioc tubers, bananas, ears of maize, and other vegetable

Fig. 76. Rattan Belt.

M
[291]

249 481 skill and speed. Supported by his belt, with his feet propped against the tree trunk, he proceeds quickly by small bounds, moving the belt constantly upward. Upon reaching the root of the cluster, he stands erect or sits on one of the leaves, and with a hatchet or knife he frees the cluster, cuts it, and lets it fall to the foot of the tree. The women collect the nuts, pull off those still attached to the cluster, clean them very carefully, and carry them to the village.

253 According to whether the housewife wants to make a small or large amount of palm oil, she proceeds in one of two ways.

In the first case, she throws a few palm nuts into an earthenware vessel half full of water and puts them on the fire to boil for a good hour. When the outer part is soft, she pours off the water and puts the nuts in a small wooden mortar in order to separate the pulp from the kernels. For this purpose, she avails herself of the mortar and wooden pestle used in preparing vegetables. When the outer part is completely separated from the nut, the woman takes it and extracts the juice by squeezing it tightly in her hands. The kernels are discarded.

Fig. 79. Installation for Making Palm Oil.

In the second case, each village has a special installation for making palm oil. This very primitive factory usually stands slightly apart from the dwellings. Everyone has access to it, and it belongs to the entire community, but each family uses it individually.

253 It consists of a large hole in the form of a truncated cone. The diameter of the upper part varies from 60 to 70 centimeters, that of the lower part from 20 to 30 centimeters, and the depth varies from 60 to 80 centimeters. The bottom and sides are lined with pieces of raffia stems, placed [137] [Fig. 80 appears here] [138] side by side with their rounded surfaces facing the interior of the pit. The nuts, which have been slightly boiled, are poured into this funnel, which serves as a mortar. The outer part is separated from the nut with a large wooden pestle. The kernels are discarded. The pulp is taken from the hole and tightly pressed between the hands to squeeze out the oil.

Near the funnel-shaped mortar dug in the ground, there is a bench made of two or four forked stakes, graduated in height, over which the natives place large sections of tree bark. The woman throws the pulp from which she has extracted the oil on this bench, spreads it out, and lights a small fire under the wide sections of bark, which serve as drains. Under the influence of the heat, part of the oil remaining in the pulp flows out slowly and is caught in the earthenware vessel placed at the lower end of the drain. Finally, whatever palm oil remains in the pulp is squeezed [101] out by the torsion method. For this purpose, the native has set up a large stationary bar, very strong, to which he attaches one end of a pressing apparatus made of young lianas and fine rattan plaited together. The pulp, still hot, is placed in this press and wrung very tightly to extract every last drop of oil.

252 495 The natives collect and keep the palm oil in large pots covered with banana leaves, in calabashes, or, if possible, in imported bottles. Big demijohns stripped of their protective covering are in special demand for this purpose.

000 We have mentioned above the chief uses the native makes of palm oil in preparing food and the important role it plays in the diet of these primitives. Later we shall have occasion to mention palm oil again when we discuss the role it plays in native body care.

263 A word now about stimulants. Food in general, particularly meat, is always very strongly seasoned with condiments.

The most widespread stimulant is _pili-pili_, red pepper. This pepper, the fruit of _Capsicum minimum_, which is rarely more than one to one and a half centimeters long, is extremely hot. It grows

[text continues on p. 103]

263 wild [140] throughout the region we visited. All the tribes are acquainted with it and use it regularly.

222 Collecting and preparing pili-pili are tasks especially re-
462 served to women. Upon returning from the fields, a woman
252 spreads the fruits on a mat before her hut and lets them dry for 263 five or six days. Sometimes she uses them fresh, mixing them with palm oil enhanced with salt. The native uses this sauce to season his dishes according to taste.

252 When the pili-pili is quite dry, the woman pulverizes it in 263 a small wooden mortar with a cylindrical pestle or with a small 412 piece of elephant's tusk. The shape of the mortars used for this purpose by the different peoples of the Lukenie varies a great deal. From the Bateke to the Batete, we found only very crude mortars hollowed out from the trunk of a tree. Among the Yaelima and Ipanga this utensil is more carefully worked and finished. The shape is rather like that of a small rectangular box without a lid, but provided with a lug. Among the Basongo-Meno and Bankutshu of the Bena Dibele-Kole region, we collected very crudely shaped and primitive mortars, while others were well made and carefully carved. All of them, however, have the common characteristic of an elongated vertical form, and most of them have a leg. The pestles are always quite long.

We thus again find three ethnic zones characterized by the special shape of these utensils. Of course, this fact alone could not serve as the basis of any ethnic classification, but it might have a relative value and importance in drawing general conclusions based on the whole assemblage of the ethnic characteristics of these various peoples.

263 Once reduced to a fine powder, pili-pili pepper is mixed with salt to season food after cooking. All sauces are spiced with a generous pinch of this pepper. Meat is sprinkled with it, or even stuffed with whole peppers.

When the natives are traveling, they merely pick a few pili-pili and squeeze the juice into the food while it is cooking. [141]

276 The kola nut also is very well known as a stimulant and is widely used. The kola tree is found nearly everywhere. The natives gather the fruit and chew it. Women do not indulge.

276
842 According to native belief, the kola nut ensures the fertility of a woman if sexual relations take place the night after the man has used this stimulant.

276 The regular use of kola induces very intense nervous excitement. We noticed that the adolescents and men in their prime scarcely use it. Only the old people use it regularly. Kaiua, the old native chief, chewed it from morning to night. One day I pointed this out to him, asking if he were not afraid of the dangerous effects of this overindulgence. He proudly pointed out to me the huts of his seven wives, saying, "Ask them if they don't have children!"

276
263
278 Among the stimulants we may also mention the peanut, widely used by all the tribes, a type of small ground pea, and certain tree roots known to the natives but the exact nature of which we unfortunately could not determine. It is well to note, moreover, that most of the natives use the stimulants as medicaments as well as condiments. They are used for intestinal pains, colic, and as purgatives.

462
● 252 In all the tribes the preparation of food and meals is exclusively the task of women. They always do it with great car
[142]

Fig. 81. Carrying Firewood.

262 The kitchen, if it can be called one, is always very simple. If the weather is good, cooking is done in the open in the middle of the village, in front of the hut or behind it,

45
31 and very often in the shade of the banana trees. If the weather is rainy or cold, the women prepares the meals inside the hut. [Ed., a passage is omitted here.]

Yaelima

264 The natives eat three meals a day, in the morning, toward noon, and at night after sunset.

The wife is never allowed to eat with her husband or to eat in the same group as he does.

[302] A chief always eats alone, far from the eyes of the common herd. [143]

Leftovers from the meals are ordinarily given to the women and children.

264 415 We did not find tables, spoons, or forks among any of the tribes we visited.

The food is put in small baskets of rattan or raffia splints, plaited in openwork and lined with leaves on the bottom. Sometimes the plate is made of wood or baked clay.

[252]

Fig. 82. Native Outdoor Kitchen, Ipanga-Betiru Tribe.

Among the Betsho-Basfumongo, we collected some earthenware plates which look a great deal like European soup plates, but are less symmetrical in shape and deeper. Among the Baboma-Wadia-Betete, on the other hand, the plates look more like our flat plates. Among the Ipanga-Yaelima, basketwork plates are chiefly used, while in the Bena Dibele-Kole region one finds the pottery plate again, a sort of broadly flared,

356 walls are lined with mats, and the crude bed is raised off the ground to avoid unpleasant and unhealthy contact with the ground.
A mat is spread over the native's bed, [163] and the pillow which is customarily used permits him to lie in a restful position.

515 The natives take a bath almost every day. They usually go to the river during the hottest hours of the day, but sometimes they do so early in the morning or in the evening. The child participates in this from an early age. Aside from these regular baths, the native often washes his whole body with warm water.
[302] He then smears himself with a light film of palm oil to ensure the suppleness of the skin and to protect it from the sun's rays.

264 Before and after each meal the native makes a point of 515 washing out his mouth. After the meal he brushes his teeth with a small brush made of rattan or soft wood, the fibers acting as

Fig. 91. A Scene from Native Life among the Riparian People of the Lower Lukenie.

bristles.

252 Meals are prepared with a genuine concern for cleanliness.
264 All the food is washed, cleaned, and boiled before being eaten.
Kitchen utensils are cleaned and carefully put away. Despite the primitive conditions for preparing manioc flour, the product is as pure as if it had been prepared by an improved method

252 264 with modern machinery. Not content with the state of the utensils in which she serves the meals, the woman is careful to line them at mealtime with fresh and very clean leaves.

515 The natives keep the nails of their hands and feet cut short.

The care of the feet is explained as a hygienic measure and by the necessity of taking precautions to avoid the vermin which like to get into these places (ticks). The care of the hands can be explained only by the concern for cleanliness shown in native eating habits.

Imported soap is not yet commonly used, although we found it in a number of native huts.

318 Many native women know how to make soap. The process is very simple. Dried banana skins, trunks of papaw trees, bark, the fruits of various vegetables, and waste from palm nuts are gathered together and burned. The ashes are carefully collected and mixed with some water for boiling them. At the first ebullition, the woman removes the ashes and impurities that [166] rise to the surface. Boiling is then continued until the evaporation is almost complete. When only a thick and sirupy grayish-black deposit is left, the woman takes it off the fire, washes it, and kneads it in cold water until it takes on a clearer color. She then adds palm oil, mixes it in with great care, and puts the lot back on the fire. The paste is stirred all through the boiling, which is continued until the woman obtains a mixture whose consistency is slightly firmer than that of our soft soaps. [Ed., a passage is omitted from mid-page 166 to mid-page 167.]

Native soap is used only in the care of the body.

(302 303 [167] The native does not merely smear his body with palm oil. The men and especially the women often powder themselves with tukula dust. The women prepare a cosmetic with this and love to cover their whole body with it in a spirit of coquetry. This practice is so widespread among the peoples of Lake Leopold II that the manufacture of ngula has become a veritable local industry in certain areas. This is especially true of the Mosengere. In a village near the Bongo post, we counted 35 installations for making ngula powder. The simplest set of materials includes two blocks of tukula or redwood, a small receptacle containing water, a handful of sand, and a small hand or painting brush. One of the 584 then does she acquire her own establishment. From that moment on she lives permanently with her husband-to-be.

She has come from her parents' home empty handed, without any utensils whatsoever. In her new dwelling she finds everything. Her mother-in-law and sisters-in-law give her what she needs: baskets, pots, gourds, mats, mortars, pestles, and even chickens.

It will be apparent from the preceding that there are no particular rites or ceremonies nor is any special attire worn.

584
595
By this time the bompɛka is already considered a wife; [119] she has all the rights and duties of that status: cohabitation, household tasks, etc. Everything she produces or earns belongs to her husband. Her own family no longer has any rights to the fruits of her work. If, after the payment of the ikulɛ and before any further payment, [illegible] the husband discovers that there are relations between his fiancée and another man, the latter is considered an adulterer and is liable to the sanctions designed to check such infractions. The older the woman, the greater the indemnity, which may be as high as 5 to 10 rings (see Chapter VI, Article VII).

It is logically consistent with what we have described that the fiancé has no special name. Since he is actually a husband, that is what he is called (bɔ́me).

During this period the engaged pair get to know each other physically and morally (sexual relations, work, temperament, virtues, faults). A figurative expression is used to describe what happens -- bakɛngola mpokɛ, "they are trying out the pot." The explanation [595] for this saying is that before a new pot (mpokɛ) is used, it is placed on [252] a shelf above the fire and left there for several days, so that it will harden and become heat resistant. If it cracks it is not suitable for food preparation; if not, one can cook in it without fear. This process is called kɛngola mpokɛ, and the term has been transferred to the trial period of the newlyweds. Thus it is a sort of novitiate, and the English term which can be used to approximate this situation most closely is clearly "engagement," "engaged."

This first period can last several months. Meanwhile the husband seeks the valuables needed for the ndanga payment.

843 777 The Nkundó know an antidote (nsengó or losenjó), however, a means of getting rid of such annoying obstacles. Of the three known processes the last is especially common at present.

1) The husband (or any person to whom the weká is attached and who wants to be rid of it) picks up a nkôngolí chilopod, [125] naturally by means of a leaf, encloses it in a large leaf which he binds with a thin creeper, and makes a small package of it, as one makes a package of meat, fish, etc. He gives this package to his wife, who thinks it contains food and opens it without any suspicion. But when she sees the detested arthropod, she throws it far from her with cries of disgust, while her husband says to her, "You are the one who remains with the wěká." As a result he himself is freed from it.

2) A second means is to take the pregnant woman by the nose when an opportunity presents itself and to say to her: "May the wěká remain attached to you."

[252] [264] 3) The woman prepares some imbóndó (manioc leaves [474] salted and dipped in palm oil). The two spouses eat it together contrary to the usual practice. But the husband arranges matters in such a way that his wife gets the last mouthful and keeps the leaf which serves as a plate and represents the wěká. Then the husband says to her, "Keep the wěká for yourself."

